Or

Or, because that to undoe and unbinde the said bundels, yeeldeth some time and space for choler to coole, and ire to assuage, which is the cause otherwhiles that they change their mindes, and doe not proceed to punishment?

Now forasmuch as among the faults that men commit, some are curable, others remediless: the roddes are to reforme those who may be amended; but the hatchets to cut them off who are incorrigible.

What is the cause that the Romanes having intelligence given unto them, that the Bletonesians, a barbarous nation, had sacrificed unto their gods; a man sent for the magistrates peremptorily, as intending to punish them: but after they were understood, that they had so done according to an ancient law of their country, they let them go againe without any hurt done unto them; charging them only, that from thence forth they should not obey such a law; and yet they themselves, not many yeeres before, had caused for to be buried quick in the place, called the Beast Market, two men and two women; that is to say, two Greekes, and two Gallo-Greekes or Galatians? For this seemeth to be verie absurd, that they themselves should do those things, which they reprooved in others as damnable.

May it not be that they judged it an execrable superstition, to sacrifice a man or woman unto the gods, marie unto devils they held it necessarie?

Or was it not for that they thought those people, who did it by a law or custome, offended highly: but they themselves were directed thereto by expresse commaundement out of the bookes of Sibylla. For reported it is, that one of their votaries or Vestall nunnnes named Helbia, riding on horse backe, was smitten by a thunderbolt or blast of lightning; and that the horse was found lying along all bare belied, and her selfe likewise naked, with her smocke and petticoate turned up above her privie parts, as if she had done it of purpose: her shoes, her rings, her coife and head attire cast here and there apart from other things, and withall lilling the tongue out of her head. This strange occurrent, the soothsayers out of their learning interpreted to signifie, that some great shame did betide the sacred virgins, that should be divulged and notoriously known; yea, and that the same infamie should reach also as far, as unto some of the degree of gentlemen or knights of Rome. Upon this there was a servant belonging unto a certaine Barbarian horseman, who detected three Vestall virgins to have at one time forfeited their honor, & been naught of their bodies, to wit, Aemilia, Lucina, & Martia; and that they had companied too familiarly with men a long time; and one of their names was Buretim, a Barbarian knight, and master to the said enformer. So these vestall votaries were punished after they had beene convicted by order of law, and found guiltie: but after that this seemed a fearful and horrible accident; ordained it was by the Senate, that the priests should peruse over the bookes of Sibyllae, prophesies, wherein were found (by report) those very oracles which denounced and foretold this strange occurrent, and that it portended some great losse and calamitie unto the common-wealth: for the avoiding and diverting whereof, they gave commaundement to abandon unto (I wot not what) maligne and devilish strange spirits, two Greekes, and two Galatians likewise; and so by burying them quick in that verie place, to procure propitiation at Gods hands.

Was it not, for that all policie at the first had the beginning of militarie discipline? and in war, and all expeditions the most part of woorthy exploits are enterprised ordinarily in the night before the day appeare?

Or because the execution of desseignes, howsoever it begin at the sunne rising; yet the preparation thereto is made before day-light: for there had need to be some preparatives, before a worke be taken in hand; and not at the verie time of execution, according as Myson (by report) answered unto Chilo, one of the seven sages, when as in the winter time he was making of a van.

Or haply, for that like as we see, that many men at noone make an end of their businesse of great importance, and of State affaires; even so, they supposed that they were to begin the same at mid-night. For better prooffe whereof a man may frame an argument hereupon, that the Roman chiefe ruler never made league, nor concluded any capitulations and covenants of peace after mid-day.

Or

Or rather this may be, because it is not possible to set downe determinately, the beginning and end of the day, by the rising and setting of the sunne: for if we do as the vulgar sort, who distinguish day and night by the sight and view of eie, taking the day to begin when the sunne ariseth; and the night likewise to begin when the sunne is gone downe, and hidden under our horizon, we shall never have the just Aequinox, that is to say, the day and night equall: for even that verie night which we shall esteeme most equall to the day, will proove shorter than the day, by as much as the body or bignesse of the sunne continueth. Again, if we doe as the Mathematicians, who to remedie this absurditie and inconvenience, set downe the confines and limits of day and night, at the verie instant point when the sunne seemeth to touch the circle of the horizon with his center; this were to overthrow all evidence: for fall out it will, that while there is a great part of the sunnes light yet under the earth (although the sunne do shine upon us) we will not confesse that it is day, but say, that it is night still. Seeing then it is so hard a matter to make the beginning of day and night, at the rising or going downe of the sunne, for the absurdities above laid, it remaineth that of necessity we take the beginning of the day to be, when the sunne is in the mids of the heaven above head, or under our feet, that is to say, either noon-tide or mid-night. But of twaine, better it is to begin when he is in the middle point under us, which is just midnight, for that he returneth then toward us into the East; whereas contrariwise after mid-day he goeth from us Westward.

What was the cause that in times past they would not suffer their wives, either to grinde corne, or to lay their hands to dreffe meat in the kitchen?

Was it in memoriall of that accord and league which they made with the Sabines? for after that they had ravished & carried away their daughters, there arose sharpe wailes betwene them: but peace ensued thereupon in the end; in the capitulations whereof, this one article was expressely set downe, that the Roman husband might not force his wife, either to turne the querne for to grinde corne, nor to exercise any point of cookerie.

Why did not the Romans marie in the moneth of May?

Is it for that it cometh betwene Aprill and June? whereof the one is consecrated unto Venus, and the other to Junio, who are both of them the goddesses which have the care and charge of wedding and marriages, and therefore thinke it good either to go somewhat before, or else to stay a while after.

Or it may be that in this moneth they celebrate the greatest expiatorie sacrifice of all others in the yeere? for even at this day they fling from off the bridge into the river, the images and pourtraictures of men, whereas in old time they threw downe men themselves alive? And this is the reason of the custome now a daies, that the priesttresse of Junio named Flamina, should be always laid and heave, as it were a mourner, and never wash nor dreffe and trim her selfe.

Or what and if we say, it is because many of the Latine nations offered oblations unto the dead in this moneth: and peradventure they do so, because in this verie moneth they worship Mercurie: and in truth it beareth the name of Majus, Mercuries mother.

But may it not be rather, for that as some do say, this moneth taketh that name of Majores, that is to say, ancients: like as June is termed so of Juniores, that is to say, yongkers. Now this is certaine that youth is much meete for to contract marriage than old age: like as Euripides saith verie well:

*As for old age it Venus bids farewell,
And with old folke, Venus is not pleas'd well.*

The Romans therefore married not in May, but staid for June which immediatly followeth after May.

87

What is the reason that they divide and part the haire of the new brides head, with the point of a javelin?

Is not this a verie signe, that the first wives whom the Romans espoused, were compelled to marriage, and conquered by force and armes.

Or

Or are not their wives hereby given to understand, that they are espoused to husbands, martial men and soldiers; and therefore they should lay away all delicate, wanton, and costly imbellishment of the bodie; and acquaint themselves with simple and plaine attire; like as Lycurgus for the same reason would that the doores, windowes, and roofes of houses should be framed with the saw and the axe onely, without use of any other toole or instrument, intending thereby to chafe out of the common-weale all curiositie and wastfull superfluitie.

Or doth not this parting of the haire, give covertly to understand, a division and separation, as if marriage & the bond of wedlock, were not to be broken but by the sword and warlike force?

Or may not this signifie thus much, that they referred the most part of ceremonies concerning marriage unto Juno: now it is plaine that the javelin is consecrated unto Juno, inasmuch as the most part of her images and statues are portraied resting and leaning upon a launce or javelin. And for this cause the goddesse is surnamed Quirita, for they called in old time a speare Quirita, upon which occasion Mars also (as they say) is named Quirita.

What is the reason that the monie employed upon plaies and publike shewes is called among them, Lucar?

May it not well be that there were many groves about the citie consecrated unto the gods, which they named Lucos: the revenues whereof they bestowed upon the setting forth of such solemnities?

Why call they Quirinalia, the Feast of fooles?

Whether is it because (as Juba writeth) they attribute this day unto those who knew not their owne lineage and tribe? or unto such as have not sacrificed, as others have done according to their tribes, at the feast called Fornacalia. Where it that they were hindered by other affaires, or had occasion to be forth of the citie, or were altogether ignorant, and therefore this day was assigned for them, to performe the said feast.

What is the cause, that when they sacrifice unto Hercules, they name no other God but him, nor suffer a dog to be seene, within the purpise and precinct of the place where the sacrifice is celebrat, according as Varro hath left in writing?

* Or about a dog by the Hippocoon-tides.

Is not this the reason of naming no god in their sacrifice, for that they esteeme him but a demigod; and some there be who hold, that whiles he lived heere upon the earth, Evander erected an altar unto him, and offered sacrifice thereupon. Now of all other beasts he could worst abide a dog, and hated him most: for this creature put him to more trouble all his life time, than any other: witnesse hereof, the three headed dog Cerberus, and above all others, when Oeonus the sonne of Licymnius was slaine * by a dog, he was enforced by the Hippocoon tides to give the battell, in which he lost many of his friends, and among the rest his owne brother Isphicles.

Wherefore was it not lawfull for the Patricians or nobles of Rome to dwell upon the mount Capitol?

Might it not be in regard of M. Manlius, who dwelling there attempted and plotted to be king of Rome, and to usurpe tyrannie; in hatred and detestation of whom, it is said, that ever after those of the house of Manly, might not have Marcus for their fore-name?

Or rather was not this an old feare that the Romans had (time out of mind)? For albeit Valerius Poplicola was a personage verie popular and well affected unto the common people; yet never ceased the great and mightie men of the citie to suspect and traduce him, nor the meane commoners and multitude to feare him, untill such time as himselfe caused his owne house to be demolished and pulled down, because it seemed to overlooke and commaund the common market place of the citie.

What is the reason, that he who saved the life of a citizen in the warres, was rewarded with a coronet made of oake branches?

As it not for that in everie place and readily, they might meet with an oake, as they marched in their warlike expeditions.

Or

Or rather, because this maner of garland is dedicated unto Jupiter and Juno, who are reputed protectors of cities?

Or might not this be an ancient custome proceeding from the Arcadians, who have a kind of consanguinitie with oakes, for that they report of themselves, that they were the first men that issued out of the earth, like as the oake of all other trees.

Why observe they the Vultures or Geirs, most of any other fowles, in taking of presages by bird-sight?

Is it not because at the foundation of Rome, there appeared twelve of them unto Romulus? Or because, this is no ordinarie bird nor familiar; for it is not so easie a matter to meete with an aire of Vultures; but all on a sudden they come out of some strange cuntry, and therefore the sight of them doth prognosticke and presage much.

Or else haply the Romans learned this of Hercules, if that be true which Herodotus reporteth: namely, that Hercules tooke great contentment, when in the enterprife of any exploit of his, there appeared Vultures unto him: for that he was of opinion, that the Vulture of all birds of prey was the justest: for first and formost never toucheth he ought that hath life, neither killeth hee any living creature, like as eagles, falcons, hawks, and other fowles do, that prey by night, but feedeth upon dead carrions: over and besides, he forbearth to set upon his owne kind: for never was there man yet who saw a Vulture eat the flesh of any fowle, like as eagles and other birds of prey do, which chase, pursue and plucke in pieces those especially of the same kind, to wit, other fowle. And verily as Aeschylus the poet writeth:

How can this bird, which bird doth eat,
Be counted cleanly, pure and neat.

And as for men, it is the most innocent bird, and doth least hurt unto them of all other: for it destroyeth no fruit nor plant whatsoever, neither doth it harme to any tame creature. And if the tale be true that the Aegyptians doe tell, that all the kinde of these birds be females; that they conceive and be with yong, by receiving the East-wind blowing upon them, like as some trees by the Western wind, it is verie profitable that the signes and prognosticks drawn from them, be more sure and certaine, than from any others, considering that of all, besides their violence in treading and breeding time; their eagernes in flight when they pursue their prey; their flying away from some, and chafing of others, must needs cause much trouble and uncertaintie in their prognostications.

Why stands the temple of Aesculapius without the citie of Rome?

Is it because they thought the abode without the citie more holefome, than that within? For in this regard the Greekes ordinarily build the temples of Aesculapius upon high ground, where in the aire is more pure and cleere.

Or in this respect, that this god Aesculapius was sent for out of the citie Epidaurum. And true it is that the Epidaurians founded his temple; not within the walles of their city, but a good way from it.

Or lastly, for that the serpent when it was landed out of the galley in the Isle, and then vanished out of sight, seemed thereby to tell them where he would that they should build the place of his abode.

Why doth the law forbid them that are to live chaste, the eating of pulse?

As touching beanes, is it not in respect of those very reasons for which it is said: That the Pythagoreans counted them abominable? And as for the richling and rich pease, whereof the one in Greece is called Aedon, and the other epedon, which words seeme to be derived of Erebos, that signifieth the darknesse of hell, and of Lethe, which is as much as oblivion, and one besides of the rivers infernall, it carrieth some reason that they should be abhorred therefore.

Or it may be, for that the solemne suppers and bankets at funerals for the dead, were usually served with pulse above all other viands.

Or rather, for that those who are desirous to be chaste, and to live an holy life, ought to keepe

their

their bodies pure and slender; but so it is that pulse be flaccous and windy, breeding superfluous excrements in the body, which had need of great purging and evacuation.

Or lastly, because they pricke and provoke the fleshly lust, for that they be full of ventosities,

What is the reason that the Romans punish the holy Vestall virgins (who have suffered their bodies to be abused and defiled) by no other means, than by interring them quicke under the ground?

IS this the cause, for that the maner is to burne the bodies of them that be dead: and to burie (by the means of fire) their bodies who have not devoutly and religiously kept or preserved 10 the divine fire, seemed not just nor reasonable?

Or haply, because they thought it was not lawfull to kill any person who had bene consecrated with the most holy and religious ceremonies in the world; nor to lay violent hands upon a woman consecrated: and therefore they devised this invention of suffering them to die of their owne selves; namely, to let them downe into a little vaulted chamber under the earth, where they left with them a lampe burning, and some bread, with a little water and milke: and having so done, cast earth and covered them aloft. And yet for all this, can they not be exempt from a superstitious feare of them thus interred: for even to this day, the priests going over this place, performe (I wot not what) anniversary services and rites, for to appeale and pacifie their ghosts.

What is the cause that upon the thirteenth day of December, which in Latine they call the Ides of December, there is exhibited a game of chariots running for the prize, and the horse drawing on the right hand that winneth the victorie, is sacrificed and consecrated unto Mars, and at the time thereof there comes one behinde that cutteth off his tale, which he carrieth immediatly into the temple called Regia, and therewith imbrues the altar with blood: and for the head of the said horse, one troupe there is coming out of the street called Via sacra, and another from that which they name Suburra, who encounter and trie out by fight who shall have it?

MAY not the reason be (as some doe alledge) that they have an opinion, how the cite of 30 Troy was sometime woon by the means of a wooden horse; and therefore in the memoriall thereof, they thus punished a poore horse?

*As men from blood of noble Troy descended,
And by the way with Latins issue blended.*

Or because an horse is a couragious, martiall and warlike beast; and ordinarily, men use to present unto the gods those sacrifices which are most agreeable unto them; and for that respect, they sacrifice that horse which wan the prize, unto Mars, because strength and victorie are well befitting him.

Or rather because the worke of God is firme and stable: those also be victorious who keepe 40 their ranke and vanquish them, who make not good their ground but fly away. This beast therefore is punished for running so swift, as if celeritie were the maintenance of cowardise: to give us thereby covertly to understand, that there is no hope of safetie for them who seek to escape by flight.

What is the reason that the first worke which the Censors goin hand with, when they are installed in the possession of their magistracie, is to take order upon a certaine prize for the keeping and feeding of the sacred geese, and to cause the painted statues and images of the gods to be refreshed?

WHETHER it is because they would begin at the smallest things, and those which are of 50 least dispense and difficultie?

Or in commemoration of an ancient benefit received by the means of these creatures, in the time of the Gaules warre: for that the geese were they who in the the night season deserted the Barbarians as the skaled and mounted the wall that environed the Capitol fort (where as the dogs slept) and with their gagling raised the watch?

Or because, the Censors being guardians of the greatest affaires, and having that charge and office which enjoyneth to be vigilant and carefull to preserve religion; to keepe temples and and publicke edifices; to looke into the manners and behaviour of men in their order of life; they set in the first place the consideration and regard of the most watchfull creature that is: and in shewing what care they take of these geese, they incite and provoke by that example their citizens, not to be negligent and retchlesse of holy things. Moreover, for refreshing the colour of those images and statues, it is a necessarie piece of worke; for the lively red vermilion; wherewith they were wont in times past to colour the said images, soone fadeth and passeth away.

What is the cause that among other priests, when one is condemned and banished, they degrade and deprive him of his priesthood, and chosse another in his place: onely an Augur, though he be convicted and condemned for the greatest crimes in the world, yet they never deprive in that sort so long as he liveth? Now those priests they call Augurs, who observe the flights of birds, and foreshewed things thereby.

IS it as some do say, because they would not have one that is no priest, to know the secret mysteries of their religion and their sacred rites?

Or because the Augur being obliged and bound by great oaths, never to reveale the secrets pertaining to religion, they would not seeme to free and absolve him from his oath by degrading him, and making him a private person.

Or rather, for that this word Augur, is not so much a name of honor and magistracie, as of art and knowledge. And all one it were, as if they should seeme to disfile a musician for being any more a musician; or a physician, that he should bee a physician no longer; or prohibit a prophet or soothsayer, to be a prophet or soothsayer: for even so they, not able to deprive him of his sufficiency, nor to take away his skill, although they bereave him of his name and title, do not subordinate another in his place: and by good reason, because they would keepe the just number of the ancient institution.

What is the reason that upon the thirteenth day of August, which now is called the Ides of August, and before time the Ides of Sextilis, all servants as well maids, as men make holy day and women that are wives love then especially to wash and cleanse their heads?

MIGHT not this be a cause, for that king Servius upon such a day was borne of a captive woman, and therefore slaves and bond-servants on that day have libertie to play and disport themselves? And as for washing the head; haply at the first the wenches began so to do in regard of that festivall day, and so the custome passed also unto their mistresses and other women free borne?

PER adventure to honor the memorie of those first wives of theirs, whom they ravished: in favour of whom they ordained many other prerogatives for the children which they had by them, and namely this among the rest?

Or it may be, for to grace the prowesse of Tarquinius? For reported it is that being but a verie child, in a great battell which was fought against the Latines and Tuscanes together, hee rode into the vesie throng of his enemies, and engaged himselfe so farre, that being dismounted and unhorsed; yet notwithstanding he manfully withstood those who hotly charged upon him, and encouraged the Romanes to stand to it; in such sort as the enemies by them were put to plaine flight, with the losse of 16000. men whom they left dead in the place: and for a reward of this vertue and valour, received such a jewell to hang about his necke, which was given unto 50 him by the king his father.

Or else, because in old time it was not reputed a shamesfull and villanous thing, to love young boyes wantonly, for their beauty in the flower of their age, if they were slaves borne, as the Comedies even at this day do testifie: but they forbore most precisely, to touch any of them who were free-borne or of gentle blood descended. To the end therefore man might not pretend ignorance in such a case, as if they knew not of what condition any boyes were, if they mette with them naked, they caused them to wear this badge and marke of nobilitie, about their neckes.

Or peradventure, this might be also as a preservative unto them of their honor, continence and chastitie, as one would say, a bridle to restrain wantonnesse and incontinencie, as being put in mind thereby to be abashed to play mens parts, before they had laid off the marks and signes of childhood. For there is no appearance or probabilitie, of that which Varro alledgedly, saying: That because the Aeolians in their Dialect do call βουλι, that is to say, Counsell, βουλι, therefore such children for a signe and preface of wisdom and good counsell, carried this jewell, which they named Bulla.

But see whether it might not be in regard of the moone that they wear this device? for the figure of the moone when shee is at the full, is not round as a bal or boule, but rather flat in manner of a lentill or resembling a dish or plate; not only on that side which appeareth unto us, 10 but also (as Empedocles saith) on that part which is under it.

Wherefore gave they fore-names to little infants, if they were boies upon the ninth day after their birth, but if they were girls, when they were eight daies olde?

May there not be a naturall reason rendred hereof, that they should impose the names sooner upon daughters than sonnes: for that females grow apace, are quickly ripe, and come sometimes unto their perfection in comparison of males; but as touching those precise daies, they take them that immediately follow the seventh: for that the seventh day after children be borne is very dangerous, as well for other occasions, as in regard of the navill-string: for that in many it will unknit and be loose againe upon the seventh day, and so long as it continueth so resolved and open, an infant resembleth a plant rather than any animal creature?

Or like as the Pythagoreans were of opinion, that of numbers the even was female and the odde, male; for that it is generative, and is more strong than the even number, because it is compound: and if a man divide these numbers into unities, the even number sheweth a void place betwene, whereas the odde, hath the middle alwaies fulfilled with one part thereof: even so in this respect they are of opinion, that the even number eight, resembleth rather the female and the even number nine, the male.

Or rather it is because of all numbers, nine is the first square coming of three, which is an 30 odde and perfect number: and eight the first cubick, to wit foure-square on every side like a die proceeding from two, an even number: now a man ought to be quadrat odde (as we say) and singular, yea and perfect: and a woman (no lesse than a die) sure and stedfast, a keeper of home, and not easily removed. Heereunto we must adjoyne thus much more also, that eight is a number cubick, arising from two as the base and foot: and nine is a square quadrangle having three for the base: and therefore it seemeth, that where women have two names, men have three.

What is the reason, that those children who have no certaine father, they were wont to tearme Spurius?

For we may not thinke as the Greeks holde, and as oratours give out in their pleas, that this word Spurius, is derived of Spura, that is to say, naturall seed, for that such children are begotten by the seed of many men mingled and confounded together.

But surely this Spurius, is one of the ordinary fore-names that the Romans take, such as Sextus, Decimus, and Caius. Now these fore-names they never use to write out at full with all their letters, but marke them sometime with one letter alone, as for example, Titus, Lucius, and Marcius, with T, L, M; or with twaine, as Spurius and Cneus, with Sp, and Cn, or at most with three as Sextus & Servius, with S, and Ser. Spurius then is one of their fore-names which is noted with two letters S, and P, which signifie almuch, as Sine Patre, that is to say, without a father; 50 for S standeth for Sine, that is to say, without, and P for patre, that is to say a father. And hereupon grew the error, for that Sine patre, and Spurius be written both with the same letters short, Sp. And yet I will not flicke to give you another reason, though it be somewhat fabulous, and carrieth a greater absurdity with it: forsooth they say that the Sabines in olde time named in their language the nature or privities of a woman, Spurius: and thereupon afterwards as it were by way of reproch, they called him Spurius, who had to his mother a woman unmarried and not lawfully espoused.

Why is Bacchus called with them, Liber Pater?

Is it for that he is the author and father of all liberty unto them who have taken their wine well; for most men become audacious and are full of bolde and franke broad speech, when they be drunke or cup-shotten?

Or because he it is that ministrd libations first, that is to say, those effusions and offerings of wine that are given to the gods?

Or rather (as Alexander said) because the Greeks called Bacchus, Dionysos Eleuthereus, that is 10 to say, Bacchus the Deliverer: and they might call him so, of a city in Baetia, named Eleuthera.

Wherefore was it not the custome among the Romans, that maidens should be wedded upon any daies of their publicke feasts; but widowes might be remarried upon those daies?

Was it for that (as Varro saith) virgins be ill-apaied and heavie when they be first wedded; but such as were wives before, * be glad and joyfull when they marrie againe? And upon a festivall holiday there should be nothing done with an ill will or upon constraint.

Or rather, because it is for the credit and honour of yong damofels, to be married in the view 20 of the whole world; but for widowes it is a dishonour and shame unto them, to be seene of many for to be wedded a second time: for the first marriage is lovely and desirable; the second, odious and abominable: for women, if they proceed to marrie with other men whiles their former husbands be living, are ashamed thereof; and if they be dead, they are in mourning state of widowhood: and therefore they chuse rather to be married closely and secretly in all silence, than to be accompanied with a long traine and solemnity, and to have much adoe and great stirring at their marriage. Now it is well known that festivall holidays divert and distract the multitude divers waies, some to this game and pastime, others to that; so as they have no leisure to go and see weddings.

Or last of all, because it was a day of publicke solemnitie, when they first ravished the Sabines 30 daughters: an attempt that drew upon them, bloody warre, and therefore they thought it ominous and prefiging evill, to suffer their virgins to wed upon such holidays.

Why doe the Romans honour and worship Fortune, by the name of Primigenia, which a man may interpret First begotten or first borne?

Is it for that (as some say) Servius being by chance botme of a maid-servant and a captive, had Fortune so favourable unto him, that he reigned nobly and gloriously, king at Rome? For most Romans are of this opinion.

Or rather, because Fortune gave unto the city of Rome her first originall and beginning of so mightie an empire.

Or lieth not herein some deeper cause, which we are to fetch out of the secrets of Nature and Philosophie; namely, that Fortune is the principle of all things, inso much, as Nature consisteth by Fortune; namely, when to some things concurring casually and by chance, there is some order and dispose adjoined.

What is the reason that the Romans call those who act comedies and other theatriall plaies, Histriones?

Is it for that cause, which as Claudian Rufus hath left in writing? for he reporteth that many 50 yeeres ago, and namely, in those daies when Caius Sulpitius and Licinius Stolo were Consuls, there reigned a great pestilence at Rome, such a mortalitie as consumed all the stage plaiers indifferently one with another. VVhereupon at their instant praier and request, there repaired out of Tuscan to Rome, many excellent and singular actours in this kinde: among whom, he who was of greatest reputation, and had caried the name longest in all theaters, for his rare gift and dexteritie that way, was called Hister; of whose name all other afterwards were tearmed Histriones.

Why espoused not the Romans in marriage those women who were neere of kin unto them?

WAs it because they were desirous to amplifie and encrease their alliances, and acquire more kinsfolke, by giving their daughters in marriage to others; and by taking to wife others than their owne kintred?

Or for that they feared in such wedlock the jarres and quarrels of those who be of kin, which are able to extinguish and abolish even the verie lawes and rights of nature?

Or else, seeing as they did, how women by reason of their weaknesse and infirmities stand in need of many helpers, they would not have men to contract marriage, nor dwell in one house 10 with those who were neere in blood to them, to the end, that if the husband should offer wrong and injurie to his wife, her kinsfolke might succour and assist her.

Why is it not lawfull for Jupiters priest, whom they name Flamen Dialis to handle or once touch meale or leaven.

FOr meale, is it not because it is an unperfect and raw kind of nourishment? for neither continueth it the same that it was, to wit, wheat, &c. nor is that yet which it should be, namely bread: but hath lost that nature which it had before of seed, and withall hath not gotten 20 the use of food and nourishment. And hereupon it is, that the poet calleth meale (by a Metaphor or borrowed speech) Myrpharon, which is as much to say, as killed and marred by the mill in grinding: and as for leaven, both it (selfe) is engendered of a certaine corruption of meale, and also corrupteth (in a manner) the whole lump of dough, wherein it is mixed: for the said dough becommeth lesse firme and fast than it was before, it hangeth not together; and in one word the leaven of the paste seemeth to be a verie putrefaction and rottennesse thereof. And verely if there be too much of the leaven put to the dough, it maketh it so sharpe and soure that it cannot be eaten, and in verie truth spoileth the meale quite.

Wherefore is the said priest likewise forbidden to touch raw flesh?

Is it by this custome to withdraw him farre from eating of raw things? Or is it for the same cause that he abhorreth and detesteth meale? for neither is it any more a living animall, nor come yet to be meat: for by boiling and roasting it groweth to such an alteration, as changeth the verie forme thereof: whereas raw flesh and newly killed is neither pure and impolluted to the eye, but hideous to see to; and besides, it hath (I wot not what) resemblance to an ugly sore or filthy ulcer.

What is the reason that the Romans have expressly commaunded the same priest or Flamen of 40 Jupiter, not onely to touch a dogge or a goat, but not so much as to name either of them?

TO speake of the Goat first, is it not for detestation of his excessive lust and lecherie; and besides for his ranke and filthy favour? or because they are afraid of him, as of a diseased creature and subject to maladies? for surely, there seemeth not to be a beast in the world so much given to the falling sicknesse, as it is; nor infecteth so soone those that either eate of the flesh or once touch it, when it is surpris'd with this evil. The cause whereof some say to be the streightnesse of those conduits and passages by which the spirits go and come, which oftentimes happen to be intercepted and stopped. And this they conjecture by the small and slender voice that this beast hath; & the better to confirme the same, we do see ordinarily, that men likewise who be 50 subject to this malady, grow in the end to have such a voice as in some sort resembleth the bellowing of goats. Now, for the Dog, true it is haply that he is not so lecherous, nor finellesh altogether so strong and so ranke as doth the Goat; and yet some there be who say, that a Dog might not be permitted to come within the castle of Athens, nor to enter into the Isle of Delos, because forsooth he lineth bitches openly in the sight of everie man, as if bulls, boares, and stalcions had their secret chambers, to do their kind with females, and did not leape and cover them in the broad field and open yard, without being abashed at the matter.

But

But ignorant they are of the true cause indeed: which is, for that a Dog is by nature fell, and quarrelsome, given to erre and warie upon a verie small occasion: in which respect men banish them from sanctuaries, holy churches, and privileged places, giving thereby unto poore afflicted suppliants, free access unto them for their safe and sure refuge. And even so verie probable it is, that this Flamen or priest of Jupiter whom they would have to be as an holy, sacred, and living image for to flie unto, should be accessible and easie to be approached unto by humble suiters, and such as stand in need of him, without any thing in the way to empeach, to put backe, or to affright them: which was the cause that he had a little bed or pallet made for him, in the verie porch or entrie of his house; and that servant or slave, who could find meanes to come 10 and fall downe at his feet, and lay hold on his knees was for that day freed from the whip, and past danger of all other punishment: I say he were a prisoner with irons, and bolts at his feet that could make shift to approach neere unto this priest, he was let loose, and his givens and fetters were thrown out of the house, nor at the doore, but flung over the verie roofof thereof.

But to what purpose served all this, and what good would this have done, that he should shew himselfe so gentle, so affable, and humane, if he had a curst dog about him to keepe his doore, and to affright, chase and feare all those away who had recourse unto him for succour. And yet so it is, that our ancients reputed not a dog to be altogether a clean creature: for first and foremost we do not find that he is consecrated or dedicated unto any of the celestiall gods; but being sent unto terrestriall & infernall Proserpina into the quarrefires and crosse high waies to make 20 her a supper, he seemeth to serve for an expiatory sacrifice to divert and turne away some calamitie, or to cleanse some filthy ordure, rather than otherwise: to say nothing, that in Lacedaemon, they cut and slit dogs down along the mids, and so sacrifice them to Mars the most bloody god of all others. And the Romanes themselves upon the feast Lupercalia, which they celebrate in the lustfull moneth of Purification, called February, offer up a dog for a sacrifice: and therefore it is no absurditie to thinke, that those who have taken upon them to serve the most soveraigne and purest god of all others, were not without good cause forbidden to have a dog with them in the house, nor to be acquainted and familiar with him.

For what cause was not the same priest of Jupiter permitted, either to touch an ivie tree, or to passe thorow a way covered over head with a vine growing to a tree, and spreading her branches from it?

Is not this like unto these precepts of Pythagoras: Eat not your meat from a chaire: Sit not upon a measure called Chamix: Neither step thou over a broome or * beosome. For surely none of the Pythagoreans feared any of these things, or made scruple to doe, as these words in outward shew, and in their literall sense do preteind: but under such speeches they did covertly and figuratively forbid somewhat else: even so this precept: Go not under a vine, is to be referred unto wine, and implieth this much; that it is not lawfull for the said Priest to be drunke; for 40 such as over drinke themselves; have the wine above their heads, and under it they are depressed and weighed downe, whereas men and priests especially ought to be evermore superiours and commanders of this pleasure, and in no wise to be subject unto it. And thus much of the vine.

As for the ivie, is it not for that it is a plant that beareth no fruit, nor any thing good for mans use: and moreover is so weake, as by reason of that feeblenesse it is not able to sustain it selfe, but had need of other trees to support and beare it up: and besides, with the coole shadow that it yeelds, and the greene leaves alwaies to be seene, it dazeleth, and as it were bewitcheth the eyes of many that looke upon it: for which causes, men thought that they ought not to nourish or entertaine it about an house, because it bringeth no profit; nor suffer it to claspe about any thing, considering it is so hurtfull unto plants that admit it to creepe upon them, 50 whiles it sticketh fast in the ground: and therefore banished it is from the temples and sacrifices of the celestiall gods, and their priests are debarr'd from using it: neither shall a man ever see in the sacrifices or divine worship of Juno at Athens, nor of Venus at Thebes, any wilde ivie brought out of the woods. Mary at the sacrifices and services of Bacchus, which are performed in the night and darknesse, it is used.

Or may not this be a covert and figurative prohibition, of such blind dances and fooleries in the night, as these be, which are practised by the priests of Bacchus: for those women which are transported with these furious motions of Bacchus, runne immediately upon the ivie, and catching catching it in their hands, plucke it in pieces, or else chew it betweene their teeth; in so much as they speake not altogether absurdly, who say, that this iwie hath in it a certaine spirit that stirreth and mooveth to madnesse; turneth mens mindes to furie; driveth them to extasies; troubleth and tormenteth them; and in one word maketh them drunke without wine, and doth great pleasure unto them, who are otherwise disposed and enclined of themselves to such fantastical ravishments of their wit and understanding.

What is the reason that these Priests and Flamins of Iupiter were not allowed, either to take upon them, or to sue for any government of State? but in regard that they be not capable of such dignities, for honour sake and in some sort to make some recompense for that defect: they have an usher or vergier before them carrying a knitch of rods yea and a curial chaire of estate so to upon?

IS it for the same cause, that as in some cities of Greece, the sacerdotall dignitie was equivalent to the royall majestie of a king, so they would not chuse for their priests, meane persons and such as came next to hand.

Or rather, because Priests having their functions determinate and certaine, and the kings, undeterminate and uncertaine, it was not possible, that when the occasions and times of both concurred together at one instant, one and the same person should be sufficient for both: for it could not otherwise be, but many times when both charges pressed upon him and urged him at ones, he should pretermitt the one or the other, and by that means one while offend and fault in religion toward God, and another while do hurt unto citizens and subjects.

Or else, considering, that in governments among men, they saw that there was otherwhiles no lesse necessitie than authority; and that he who is to rule a people (as Hippocrates said of a physician, who seeth many evill things, yea and handleth many also) from the harmes of other men, reapeth griefe and sorrow of his owne: they thought it not in policy good, that any one should sacrifice unto the gods, or have the charge and superintendence of sacred things; who had been either present or president at the judgements and condemnations to death of his owne citizens; yea and otherwhiles of his owne kinsfolke and allies, like as it befell sometime to Brutus.

DEMANDS AND QUESTIONS AS TOUCHING Greeke Affaires:

THAT IS TO SAY,

A Collection of the maners, and of divers customes and fashions of certaine persons and nations of Greece: which may serve their turne verie well, who reading old Authors are desirous to know the particularities of Antiquitie.

I Who are they that in the citie Epidaurus be called Conipodes and Arinyi?

Here were an hundred and fourescore men, who had the managing and whole government of the Common weale: out of which number they chose Senatours, whom they named Arinyi; but the most part of the people abode and dwelt in the countrey, and such were termed Conipodes, which is as much to say, as Dusty-feet; for that when they came downe to the citie (as a man may conjecture) they were known by their dusty feet.

What

2 What was she, who in the citie of Cumes they named Onobatis?

When there was any woman taken in adultery, they brought her in to the publick marketplace, where they set her upon an eminent stone to the end that she might be seene of all the people: and after she had stood there a good while, they mounted her upon an asse, and so led her round about the city: which done, they brought her backe againe into the marketplace, where she must stand as she did before upon the same stone: and so from that time forward she led an infamous and reprochfull life, called of every one by the name of Onobatis that is to say, she that hath ridden upon the asse backe. But when they had so done, they reputed that stone polluted, and detested it as accursed and abominable.

There was likewise in the same city a certaine office of a gaoler, whom they called Phylastes: and looke who bare this office, had the charge of keeping the prison at all other times: onely at a certaine assembly and session of the counsell in the night season, he went into the Senat, and brought forth the kings, leading them by the hands, and three held them still, during the time that the Senat had made inquisition and decreed whether they had deserved ill and ruled unjustly or no: giving thus their suffrages and voices privily in the darke.

3 What is she, whom they name in the city of Soli, Hypecaustria?

SO call they the priestresse of Minerva, by reason of certaine sacrifices (which she celebrateth) and other divine ceremonies and services, to put by and divert threwd tunes, which other wise might happen: the word signifieth as much as a chaufecure.

4 Who be they in the city Gnidos, whom they call Annemones? as also who is Apehester among them?

There are three score elect men out of the better sort and principall citizens, whom they imploid as overseers of mens lives and behaviour, who also were consulted first, and gave their sentence as touching affaires of greatest importance: and Annemones they were named, for that they were not, (as a man may very well conjecture) called to any account, nor urged to make answer for any thing that they did: unlesse haply they were so named, quasi Polymnemones, because they remembered many things and had so good a memorie. As for Apehester, he it was who in their scrutinies, demanded their opinions and gathered their voices.

5 Who be they, whom the Areadians and Lacedemonians rearme, Chrestos?

The Lacedemonians having concluded a peace with the Tegeates, did set downe expressly the articles of agreement in writing, which they caused to be engraven upon a square colunne, common to them both, the which was erected upon the river Alpheus: in which among other covenants this was written: That they might chase the Messenians out of their countries; howbeit, lawfull it should not be to make them Chrestos, which Aristotle expoundeth thus and saith; That they might kill none of the Tegeates who during the warre had taken part with the Lacedemonians.

6 What is he whom the Opuntians call, Crithologos.

The greatest part of the Greeks in their most auncient sacrifices use certaine barley, which the citizens, of their first fruits did contribute: that officer therefore who had the rule and charge of these sacrifices, and the gathering and bringing in of these first fruits of barley, they named Crithologos, as one would say the collector of the barley. Moreover, two priests they had besides, one superintendent over the sacrifices and ceremonies for the gods; another for the divels.

7 Which be the clouds called Ploiaides.

Those especially which are waterish and disposed to raine, and withall wandering too and fro, and carried heere and there in the aere; as Theophrastus in the fourth booke of Meteoros

or

or impressions gathered above in the region of the aire, hath put it downe word for word in this manner: Considering that the clouds Pluades (quoth hee) and those which be gathered thicke, and are fetled unmooveable, and besides very white, shew a certteine diversitie of matter, which is neither converted into water, nor resolved into winde.

Whom doe the Bœtians meane by this word, Platychatas?

Those whose houses joine one to another, or whose lands doe border and confine together, in the Aeolique language they called so, as if they would say, being neere neighbours: to which purpose one example among many I will alledge out of our law Theismophylacium, &c. * * * *

What is he who among the Delphians is called Hofioter, and why name they one of the moneths, Byfios.

They name Hofioter that sacrificer who offereth a sacrifice when he is declared Hofios, that is to say, holy; and five there be who are all their life time accounted Hofios, and those doe and execute many things together with their prophets, and joine with them in divers ceremonies of divine service, and gods worship, inasmuch as they are thought to be defended from Deucalion. And for the moneth called Byfios, many have thought it to be as much as Physius: that is to say, the springing or growing moneth; for that then, the spring beginneth, and many plants at that time do arise out of ground and budde. But the truth is not so: for the Delphians never use B, in stead of Ph, like as the Macedonians do, who for Philippus, Phalaros, and Pheronice, say, Bilippus, Balacros, and Beronice: indeed they put B, for P, and it as ordinary with them, to say Batein, for Patein, Bieron, for Pieron: and so Byfios, is all one with Physius, that is to say, the moneth in which they consult with their god Apollo, and demand of him answers and resolutions of their doubts: for this is the custome of the countrey, because in this moneth they propounded their demands unto the Oracle of Apollo, and they supposed the seventh day of the same to be his birth-day, which they furnamed also, Polyphemus, not as many do imagine, because they then do bake many cakes, which are called Plithois, but for that it is a day wherein divers do resort unto the Oracle for to be resolved, and many answers are delivered: for it is but of late daies that folke were permitted to consult with the Oracle when they list in everie moneth; but before time the religious priestesse of Apollo, named Pythia; opened not the Oracle, nor gave answer but at one time in the yeere, according as Callistenes and Alexandrides have recorded in writing.

What signifieth Phyximelon?

Idle plants there be, which when they burgeon and shoot out first, the beasts love passing well: their first buds and sprouts which they put forth; but in brouzing and cropping them, great injurie they do unto the plants and hinder their growth: when as therefore they are grown up to that height that beasts grasing thereabout, can do them no more harme, they be called Phyximela, that is as much to say, as having escaped the danger of cattell, as witnesseth Aeschylus.

Who be they that are named Aposphendoneti?

In times past the Eretrians held the Island Corteyra, untill Charierates arrived there with a fleet from Corimb and vanquished them: whereupon the Eretrians tooke sea againe, and returned toward their naturall countrey: whereof their fellow-citizens being advertised, such I say as stirred not but remained quiet, repelled them, and kept them off from landing upon their ground by charging them with shot from slings. Now when they saw they could not win them by any faire language, nor yet compel them by force of armes, being as they were inexorable, and besides many more than they in number, they made sail to the coasts of Thracia, where they possessed themselves of a place: wherein they report, Methon, one of the predecessors and progenitors of Orpheus sometime dwelt: and there having built a citie, they named it Methone; but them selves themselves were furnamed Aposphendoneti, which is as much to say, as repelled and driven backe by slings.

What is that which the Delphians call, Charila?

The citizens of Delphos do celebrate continually three Enneaterides, that is to say, feasts celebrated every ninth yeere, one after another successively. Of which, the first they name, Septerion; the second, Herous; and the third, Charila. As touching the first, it seemeth to be a memorial representing the fight or combat that Phæbus had against Pythion; and his flight after the conflict, and pursuit after him into the valley of Tempe. For as some do report he fled by occasion of a certaine manslaughter and murder that he had committed, for which he sought to be purged: others say that when Pythion was wounded, and fled by the way which we call, Holy, Phæbus made hot pursuit after him, inasmuch as he went within a little of overtaking him, and finding him at the point of death: (for at his first comming he found that he was newly dead of the wounds which he had received in the foresaid fight) also, that he was entered and buried by his sonne, (who as they say) was named Aix: this novenarie feast therefore, called Septerion, is a representation of this historie, or else of some other like unto it. The second named Herous, containeth (I wot not what) hidden ceremonies and fabulous secrets, which the professed priests (in the divine service of Bacchus called Thyades) know well enough: but by such things as are openly done and praesided, a man may conjecture, that it should be a certaine exaltation or assumption of Semele up into heaven. Moreover, as concerning Charila, there goeth such a tale as this. It fortuned upon a time, that after much drough, there followed great famine in the citie of Delphos, inasmuch as all the inhabitants came with their wives and children to the court gates, crying out unto their king, for the extreame hunger that they endured. The king thereupon caused to be distributed among the better sort of them, a dole of meale, and certaine pulse, for that he had not sufficient to give indifferently to them all: and when there came a little yong wench, a sicely orphan, fatherlesse and motherlesse, who instantly besought him to give her also some reliefe; the king smote her with his shoe, and flung it at her face. The girle (poore though she was, forlorne and destitute of all worldly succour; howbeit carying no base mind with her; but of a noble spirit) departed from his presence, and made no more a doe, but undid her girdle from her waist and hanged her selfe therewith. Well, the famine daily encreased more and more, and diseases grew thereupon: by occasion whereof, the king went in person to the Oracle of Apollo, supposing to finde there some meede and remedie: unto whom Pythia the propheticke made this answer: That the ghost of Charila should be appeased and pacified, who had died a voluntarie death. So after long search and diligent enquire, hardly found in the end it was, that the yong maiden whom he had so beaten with his shoe, was named Charila: whereupon they offered a certaine sacrifice mixed with expiatorie oblations, which they celebrate and performe from nine yeers to nine, even to this day. For at this solemnity, the king sitting in his chaire, dealeth certaine meale and pulse among all comers, as well strangers as citizens: and the image of this Charila is thither brought, resembling a yong girle: now after that everie one hath received part of the dole, the king beareth the said image about the eares with his shoe: and the chiefe governeesse of the religious women called, Thyades, taketh up the image, and carieth it into a certaine place full of deepe caves, where after they have hung an halter about the necke of it, they enterre it under the ground in that verie place where they buried the corps of Charila, when she had strangled her selfe.

What is the meaning of that which they call among the Aeaeians, Begged-flesh,

The Aeaeians in times past had many transigrations from place to place: for first they inhabited the countrey about the Plaine called Dotion: out of which they were driven by the Lapithæ; and went to the Aethicæ; and from thence into a quarter of the province Molossia, called Aræa, which they held, and thereof called they were Paravæ. After all this they seized the citie Cirra: wherein after that they had stoned to death their king Onolus, by warrant and commandement from Apollo; they went downe into that tract that lieth along by the river Inachus, a countrey inhabited then by the Inachiens and Achaëans. Now they had the answer of an oracle on both sides, to wit, the Inachiens and Achaëans, that if they yielded and gave away part of their country, they should lose all: and the Aeneians, that if they could get once any thing at their hands with their good wils, they should for ever possesse and hold all. Things standing in these tearmes, there was a notable personage among the Aeneians, named Temon, who putting on ragged clothes, and taking a wallet about his necke, disguised himselfe like unto a begger, and in this habite went to the Inachiens to crave their almes. The king of the Inachiens scorned and laughed at him, and by way of disdain and mockerie, tooke up a clod of earth and gave it him; the other tooke it right willingly and put it up into his budget: but he made no semblance, neither was he seene to embrace this gift, and to joy therein; but went his way immediately without begging any thing else, as being verie well content with that which he had gotten already. The elders of the people wondering hereat, called to mind the said oracle, and presenting themselves before the king, advertised him not to neglect this occurrent, nor to let this man thus to escape out of his hands. But Temon having an inckling of their desseigne, made haste and fled apace, in so much as he saved himselfe, by the means of a great sacrifice, even of an hundred oxen which he vowed unto Apollo. This done, both kings, to wit, of the Inachiens and the Aeneians sent defiance one to the other, and chalenged combat to fight hand to hand. The king of the Aeneians Phemius, seeing Hyperochus king of the Inachiens comming upon him with his dog, cried out and said: That he dealt not like a just and righteous man, thus to bring an assistant and helper with him: whereat as Hyperochus turned his head about, and looked backe for to chase away his dog, Phemius raught him such a rap with a stone upon the side of his head, that he felled him to the ground and killed him outright therewith in the verie place. Thus the Aeneians having conquered the country, and expelled the Inachiens and the Achaeans, adored ever after that stone as a sacred thing, and sacrificed unto it, and within the fat of the beast sacrificed, enwrap it verie charily. Afterwards, whensoever they have according to their vow offered a magnificent sacrifice of an hundred oxen to Apollo, and killed likewise an ox unto Jupiter; the send the best and most daintiest piece of the said sacrifice, unto those that are lineally descended from Temon, which at this day is called among them, The Begged flesh, or the Beggers flesh.

Who be those whom the inhabitants of Ithaca, named Coliades? and who is Phagilus among them?

After that Ulysses had killed those who wooed his wife in his absence, the kinsfolke and friends of them being now dead, rose up against him to be revenged: but in the end they agreed on both sides to send for Neoptolemus, to make an accord and atonement betweene them: who having undertaken this arbitrement, awarded that Ulysses should depart out of those parts, and quit the Isles of Cephalenia, Ithaca and Zacynthus, in regard of the bloodshed that he had committed. Item, that the kinsfolke and friends of the said woers, should pay a certaine fine everie yeere unto Ulysses in recompence, for the riot, damage, and havoc they had made in his house. As for Ulysses, he withdrew himselfe and departed into Italie: but for the mulkt or fine imposed upon them, which he had consecrated unto the gods; he tooke order that those of Ithaca should tender the payment thereof unto his fowne: and the same was a quantitie of meale and of wine, a certaine number of * wax-lights or tapers, oyle, salt, and for sacrifices the bigger sort and better grown of Phagili: now Phagilus, Aristotle interpreteth to be a lambe. Moreover, as touching Eumaeus, Telemachus enfranchised him and all his posteritie; yea, and ended them with the right of free burgeoisie. And so the progenie of Eumaeus are at this day the house and family, called Coliades, like as Bucoly be those who are descended from Philetius.

Loerius was the sonne of Phrygius, who had to his father Amphyzion. This Loerius had by Calya a sonne named likewise Loerius: with him his father was at some variance; who having gathered a number of citizens to him, consulted with the oracle about a place where he should build a new citie, and people it in the nature of a colonie. The oracle returned unto him this answer: That in what place a dog of wood did bite him, there he should found a citie. And so when he had passed over to the other side of the sea, and was landed, he chanced to tread as he walked along upon a brier, which in Greeke is called Kurosfidros, and was so pricked therewith, that that he was constrained there to sojourn certaine daies: during which time, after he had well viewed and considered the country, he founded these townes, to wit, Phyfees and Hyanthia, and all those besides, which were afterwards inhabited by the Locrians, surnamed Ozola, that is to say, Stinking: which surname some say was given unto these Locrians, in regard of Nessus, others in respect of the great dragon Pythion, which being callt up a land by the sea, purfished upon the coast of the Locrians: others report, that by occasion of certaine sheeps fells and goats skins, which the men of that country used to weare; and because that for the most part they conversed among the flocks of such cattell, and smellt ranke, and carried a strong stinking savour about them, thereupon they were cleped Ozola. And some there be who hold the cleane contrarie, and say that the country being full of sweet flowers, had that name of the good smell; among whom is Architas of Amphissa, for thus he writeth:

Attract with crowne of grapes full lovely dight:
Scenting of flowers like spice Macynae night.

What is which the Megarians call Aphabroma?

Nissus, of whom the city Nissas tooke the name being king of Megara, espoused a wife out Baotia named Abrota, the daughter of Onchestus, and sister to Megareus, a dame of singular wildome, and for chastity and vertue incomparable: when she was dead the Megarians for their part willingly and of their owne accord mourned: and Nissus her husband desirous to eternize her name and remembrance by some memoriall, caused her bones to be set together, and the same to be clad with the very same apparell that she was wont to weare in her life time: and of her name he called that habit and vesture Aphabroma. And verily it seemeth that even god Apollo himselfe did favourize the glorie of this ladie: for when the wives of Megara were minded many times to change these robes and habillements, they were alwaies forbidden and debarred by this oracle.

Who is Doryxenus among the Megarians?

The province Megara was in old time inhabited by certaine townes and villages; and the citizens or inhabitants being divided into five parts, were called Heraens, Pyraens, Megarians, Cynosuriens, and Tripodislaens: now the Corinthians their next neighbours, and who spied out all occasions, and sought meanes to reduce the province Megara under their obedience, practised to set them together by the eares, and wrought it so, that they warred one upon another: but they carried such a moderate hand, and were so respective in their warres, that they remembered evermore they were kinsfolke and of a blood: and therefore warred after a milde and gentle manner; for no man offered any injury or violence to the husbandmen that tilled the ground on either side: and looke whosoever chanced to be taken prisoners, were to paie for their ranfome a certaine piece of money, set downe betweene them: which summe of money was received ever after they were delivered, and not before, because no man would demaund it: for looke who had taken a captive in the warre, he would bring him home with him into his house, and make him good cheere at his owne table, consult together, and then send him home in peace: and the party thus set free, when he came duely and brought his ranfome as aforesaid with him, was commended and thanked for it, yea, and continued ever after unto his dying day, friend unto him who received the money: and thus in stead of Doryxenus, which signifieth a prisoner taken in warre, he was called Doryxenus, that is to say, a friend made by warre; for he who kept backe the laide money, and defrauded the right master thereof; became all his life time infamous, not onely among enemies, but also among his owne fellow-citizens, as being reputed a wicked, perfidious, and false wretch.

What is Pallutocia among the Megarians?

The Megarians when they had expelled their tyrant Theagenes, for a pretie while after, used good and moderate government in their common wealth: but when as their flatterers orators and clambaks of the people began unto them once (as Plato very well said) in a cup of the meere and undelaid wine of libertie, that is to say, commended unto them excessive licentiousness, they came to be exceeding faucie and malepart, and were utterly corrupt and murthered, inasmuch as they committed all insolent outrages that could be devised against the substantiall and wealthy burgeses: and among other bold parts, the poore and needy would presume to goe into their houses, and command them for to enterteine them with great cheere, & to feast them sumptuously: if they refused so to do, they would make no more adoe, but take away perforce whatsoever they could lay hands on in the house, & in one word, abuse them all most villanously. In conclusion, they made a statute and ordinance, by vertue whereof it might be lawfull for them to demand backe againe at the hands of those usurers, who had let them have money before time, all the interest and consideration for use which they had paid before, 10 and this they called Palmioci.

What city or country is that Anthedon, whereof the prophesse Pythia spake in these verses.

Drinke out thy wine, the lees the dregges and all,

Anthedon thou thy country canst not call.

For that Anthedon which is in Bœotia, is not so plentifull of good wines; Calauria indeed as fables make report, was sometime called Irene, by the name of a lady so cleped, the daughter of Nephele and Melambia, who was the daughter of Alpheus; but afterwards being held and inhabited by Anthos and Hyperes, surnamed it was, Anthedonia and Hyperia: for the answer 20 of the oracle, as Aristotle testifieth, went in this manner:

Drinke out thy wine, with lees, with dregges and all,

Anthedon thou thy country canst not call;

Nor Hyperia that sacred isle, for there

Thou might'st it drinke without dregges pure and cleere.

Thus (I say) writeth Aristotle: but Minasigton saith, that Anthos being brother of Hyperes, was lost when he was but a very childe; and when his brother Hyperes for to search him out, travelled and wandered to and fro all about, he came at length to Pheres, unto Acæstus or Adræstus, where by good fortune Anthos served in place of cup-bearer, and had the charge of the wine cellar: now as they sat feasting at the table, the boy Anthos when he offered a cup of wine 30 unto his brother, tooke knowledge of him, and said softly in his eare:

Drinke now your wine, with lees, with dregges and all,

Anthedon you can not your country call.

What is the meaning of this by-word in Priene: Darknesse about the oake?

The Samians and Prienians warred one against the other, doing and suffering harme reciprocally, but so, as the domages and losses were tolerable, untill such time as in one great battell fought betweene them, those of Priene put to the sword in one day, a thousand Samians: but seven yeeres after in another conflict which the Prienians had against the Milesians neere unto a place called Spous, that is to say, Oake, they lost the most valiant & principall citizens they had; which hapned at the very time when sage Byas being sent embassador unto Samos, won great honour and reputation: this was a wofull day and a pittifull, and heave calamitie to all the dames of Priene in generall; for there was not one of them but this common losse in some measure touched; inasmuch as this by-word was taken up amongst them afterwards, in forme of a cursed malediction or solemne oath, in their greatestt affaires to binde them withall. By that Darknesse at the oake; for that either their fathers, brethren, husbands, or children, were then and there slaine.

What were they among the Candiot, who were called Catacautæ?

It is reported that certaine Tyrthenians having ravished & caried away by force, a number of the Athenians daughters & wives out of Brawron, at what time as they inhabited the Islands Imbros and Lemnos, were afterwards chased out of those quarters and landed upon the coast of Laconia, which they inhabited; where they entred into such acquaintance with the women of the country, that they begat children of them; whereupon in the end they grew to be suspected and 50 ill spoken of by the naturall inhabitants, so that they were forced to abandon Laconia, and to returne againe into Candy under the conduct of Pellus and his brother Crataidæ: where, warring upon them that held the country, they left many of their bodies who died in fundrie skimmishes lying upon the land neglected and unburied: at the first because they had no time and leisure to interre them, by reason of the sore warre which they maintained continually, & the danger that would have ensued, in case they had gon to take up their bodies: but afterwards because they abhorred to touch those dead carcases that lay stinking and putrifying with the heat of the sun, for that they had continued so long above ground: Pellus therefore one of their leaders devised certain honors, priviledges, exemptions, & immunities, to bestow partly upon the priests 10 of the gods, and in part upon those who buried the dead; and consecrated solemnly these prerogatives unto some terrestriall deities, to the end they might be more durable and remaine inviolate: the afterwards he parted with his brother by lot. Now the one sort were named Sacrificers, and the other Catacautæ; who governed a part, with their owne lawes and particular discipline: by vertue whereof among other good orders and civill customes, they were not subject to certaine crimes and enormities, whereunto other Candiot are commonly given; namely to rob, pill and spoile one another secretly: for these did no wrong one to another; they neither did steale, nor pilfer, nor carrie away other mens goods.

Cotmus and Acæstus the sonnes of Xuthus arrived at Eubœa, to seeke them a place of habitation; the which isle was for the most part possessed and occupied by the Acœlians. Now Cotmus had a promise by oracle, that he should prosper in the world, and have the upper hand of his enemies, in case he bought or purchased that land: wherefore being come a shore with some few of his men, he found certaine yong children playing by the sea side; with whom he joyined, disported with them, made much of them, shewing unto them many prettie gauds and toies that had not bene before time seene in those parts: and when he perceived that the children were in love thereof, and desirous to have them; he said that he would not give them any 30 of his fine things, unless by way of exchange he might receive of them some of their land: the children therefore taking up a little of the mould with both hands, gave the same unto him, and having received from him the foresaid gauds, went their waies. The Acœlians hearing of this, and withall discovring their enemies under faile directing their course thither, and ready to invade them, taking counsell of anger and sorrow together, killed those children: who were entombed along that great high way, by which men go from the citie to the streight or frith called Euripus. Thus you see wherefore that place was called the Childrens sepulcher.

What is he whom in Argos they call Mixarchagenas? and who be they that are named Elafians?

As for Mixarchagenas, it was the surname of Castor among them; and the Argives beleeve verily that buried he was in their territorie. But Pollux his brother they revered and worshipped as one of the heavenly gods.

Moreover, those who are thought to have the gift to divert and put by, the fits of the Epileptic or falling sickenes, they name Elafie, and they are supposed to be descended from Alexidæ, the daughter of Amphiaræus.

What is that which the Argives call Enenisma?

Those who have lost any of their neere kinsfolkes in blood, or a familiar friend, were wont presently after their mourning was past, to sacrifice unto Apollo, and thirtie daies after unto Mercurie: for this they thought, that like as the earth receiveth the bodies of the dead, so doth Mercurie the soules. To the minister of Apollo they give barley, and receive of him againe in lieu thereof, a piece of flesh of the beast killed for sacrifice. Now after that they have quenched the former fire as polluted and defiled, they goe to seeke for others elsewhere, which after they have kindled, they roast the said flesh with it, and then they call that flesh, Enenisma. 50

For we must not beleve it is, as some beare us in hand, that they be Aliterij, who in time of famine, goe prying and spying those who * grind corne in their houses, and then carrie it away by violence: but we are to thinke that Alastor is he who hath committed acts that be Alastia, that is to say, not to be forgotten, and the remembrance whereof will continue a long time after. And Aliterius is he who for his wickednesse deserueth ἀλῆστρας, that is to say, to be thunned and avoided of all men; and such an one is otherwise called Palamæus: and thus much saith Socrates, was written in tables of brasse.

What should the meaning of this be, that the Virgins who accompanied them that drive the bee from Aenus, toward the citie Cassiopea, go all the way even unto the verie borders chanting this dittie:

*Would God, returne another day,
To native soile you never may?*

The Aenians being driven out of their owne countrey by the Lapithæ, inhabited first about Aethiæ; and afterwards in the province of Molossis neere unto Cassiopea. But seeing by experience little good or none growing unto them out of that countrey, and withall finding the people adjoining to be ill neighbours unto them; they went into the plaine of Cirra, under the leading of their king Oenclus: but being surprised there, with a wonderfull drought, they sent unto the oracle of Apollo, who commanded them to stone their king Oenclus to death, which they did: and after that put themselves in their voiage againe, to seeke out a land where they might settle and make their abode; and so long travelled they until at the last they came into those parts which they inhabit at this day, where the ground is good and fertill, and bringing forth all fruitfull commodities. Reason they had therefore you see to wish and pray unto the gods, that they might never returne againe unto their ancient countrey, but remaine there for ever in all prosperitie.

What is the reason that it is not permitted at Rhodes for the herault or publicke crier, to enter into the temple of Ocriidon?

It is for that Ochimus in times past affianced his daughter Cydippe unto Ocriidon, but Cerephus the brother of Ochimus being enamoured of his niece Cydippe, perswaded the herault (for in those daies the manner was to demand their brides in mariage, by the meanes of heraults, and to receive them at their hands) that when he had Cydippe once delivered unto him, he should bring her unto him: which was effected accordingly. And this Cerephus being possessed of the maiden fled away with her: but in processe of time when Ochimus was verie aged, Cerephus returned home. Upon which occasion the Rhodians enacted a law, that from thence forth, there should never any herault set foot within the temple of Ocriidon, in regard of this injurie done unto him.

What is the cause that among the Tenedians, it is not lawfull for a piper or plaier of the flutes to come within the temple of Tenes: neither is it permitted to make any mention there of Achilles?

It is not because when the stepmother of Tenes had accused him, for that he would have liened with her, Malpus the minstrell avouched it to be true, and most falsely bare witness against him: whereupon he was forced to flie with his sister unto Tenedos?

Furthermore it is said, that Tenes is the mother of Achilles, gave expresse commandement unto her sonne, and charged him in any wise not to kill Tenes; for that he was highly beloved of Apollo. Whereupon she commanded one of his servants to have a carefull eie unto him, and enioones to put him in mind of this charge that he had from her; lest haply he might forget himselfe, and at unwares take away his life: but as he overran Tenedos, he had a sight of Tenes sister, a faire and beautifull ladie and pursued her: but Tenes put himselfe betwene, for to defend and save the honour of his sister; during which conflict she escaped and got away: but her brothers fortune was to be slaine: but Achilles perceiving that it was Tenes, when he lay dead

upon the ground, killed his servant outright, for that being present in place during the fray, he did not admonish him according as he was commanded: but Tenes he buried in that verie place where now his temple standeth. Lo, what was the cause that neither a piper is allowed to go in to his temple, nor Achilles may be once named there.

Who is that, whom the Epidamnians call Polletes?

The Epidamnians being next neighbours unto the Illyrians, perceived that their citizens who converted, commeced, and traded in trafficke with them, became nought, and fearing besides some practise for the alteration of state: they chose everie yeere one of the best approved men of their citie, who went to and fro for to make all contracts, bargains, and exchanges, that those of Epidamnus might have with the Barbarians, and likewise dealt reciprocally in these affaires and negociations, that the Illyrians had with them: now this factour that thus bought and solde in their name, was called Poletes.

What is that, which in Thracia they call Aræni Acta, that is to say, the Shore of Arænus?

The Andrians and Chalcidians having made a voiage into Thrace, for to chuse out a place to inhabit: surprised jointly together the citie Sana, which was betrayed and delivered into their hands. And being advertised that the Barbarians had abandoned the towne Achantia, they sent forth two spies to know the truth thereof: these spies approched the towne so neere, that they knew for certaine, that the enemies had quit the place and were gone. The partie who was for the Chalcidians ran before to take the first possession of it in the name of the Chalcidians: but the other, who was for the Andrians, seeing that he could not with good footmanship overtake his fellow; flang his dart or javelin from him which he had in his hand: and when the head thereof stucke in the citie gate, he cried out aloud, that he had taken possession thereof in the behalfe of the Andrians, with his javelin head. Hereupon arose some variance and controverfie betwene these two nations, but it brake not out to open warre: for they agreed friendly together, that the Erythraens, Samians and Parians should be the indifferent judges to arbitrate and determine all their debates and sutes depending betwene them. But for that the Erythraens and Samians awarded on the Andrians side, and the Parians for the Chalcidians: the Andrians in that verie place tooke a solemne oth, and bound the same with imprecations, curses, and maledictions, that they would never either take the daughters of the Parians in marriage, or affianceth their owne unto them: and for this cause they gave this name unto the place, and called it the Shore or banke of Arænus, where as before it was called, the Port of the Dragon.

Why do the wives of the Eretrians at the solemne feast of Ceres, yest their flesh meat nor at the fire, but against the Sunne, and never call upon her by the name of Calligenia?

It is for that the dames of Troy whom the king led away captive, were celebrating this feast in this place: but because the time served to make saile, they were enforced to halte away and leave their sacrifice unperfect and unfinished?

Who be they whom the Atilians call Ainautæ?

After that the tyrants Tham and Damajonus, had bene defeated, there arose within the city two factions that maintained their severall sides: the one named Plautia & the other Cheironomacha. In the end, that of Plautia (who were indeed the richest & mightiest persons in the city) prevailed, and having gotten the upper hand, seized the soveraigne authority & government: and because when they minded to fit in consultation of their waightiest affaires, they went a ship-board, and launched into the deepe a good way off from the land; and after they had resolved and decreed what to doe, returned backe againe into the haven, therefore they were surnamed Ainautæ, which is as much to say, as alway sailing.

What is the cause that the Chalcidians name one place about Pythophon; The assembly of lusty gallants?

Naplum (as the report goeth) being chased and pursued by the Achæans, fledde for refuge like an humble suppliant to the Chalcidians; where partly hee answered to such imputations which were laide against him, and in part by way of recrimination, recharged them with other misdemeanors and outrages: whereupon the Chalcidians being not purposed to deliver him into their hands, and yet fearing lest by treachery and privy practise hee should be made away and murdered, allowed him for the guard of his person, the very flower of 10 the lustiest young gallants in all their citie, whom they lodged in that quarter where they might alwaies converse and meet together, and so keepe Naplum out of danger.

What was he who sacrificed an ox unto his benefactor?

THere hovered sometime a shippe of certeine men of warre, or rovers, and ankered about the coast of Ithacestia, within which there was an old man who had the charge of a number of earthen pots, containing Amphors a piece, with pitch in them: now it fortuned that a poore mariner or barge-man named Pyrrius, who got his living by ferrying and transporting 20 passengers, approached the said shippe, and delivered the old man out of the rovers hands, and saved his life, not for any gain that hee looked for, but onely at his earnest request, and for very pure pitie and compassion: now in recompence hereof, albeit hee expected none, the old man pressed instantly upon him to receive some of those pots or pitchers aforesaid: the rovers were not so foone retired and departed out of the way, but the old man seeing him at libertie, and secure of danger, brought Pyrrius to these earthen vessels, and shewed unto him a great quantitie of gold and silver mingled with the pitch: Pyrrius heerby growing of a sudden to be rich and full of money, entreated the old man very kindly in all respects, otherwise and besides sacrificed unto him a beeve: and hereupon as they say arole this common proverb: No man ever sacrificed an ox unto his benefactor but Pyrrius. 30

What is the cause that it was a custome among the maidens of the Bottians in their dauncing to sing as it were the faburden of a song: Go we to Athens.

THe Candiots by report upon a vow that they had made, sent the first borne of their men unto Delphos; but they that were thus sent, seeing they could not finde sufficient means there to live in plentie, departed from thence to seeke out some convenient place for a colonic to inhabit: and first they setled themselves in Tapigia, but afterwards arrived to this verie place of Thracia, where now they are, having certeine Athenians mingled among them: for 40 it is not like that Atimos had caused those young men to be put to death whom the Athenians had sent unto him by way of tribute, but kept them there to doe him service: some therefore of their issue, &c. descended from them, being reputed naturall Candiots, were with them sent unto the citie of Delphos; which is the reason that the young daughters of the Bottians in remembrance of this their originall descent, went singing in their festivall daunces: Go we to Athens.

What should be the reason that the Eliens wives, when they chaum himnes to the honour of Bacchus, pray him to come unto them, (Eliens mod.) that is to say, with his bull foote; for the hymne runneth in this forme: Please th in thee right worthy Lord Bacchus to come unto this holy maritime temple of thine, accompanied with the Graces; Whom I say to this temple with an ox or beeve foot: then for the faburden of the song, they redouble; O worthy bull, O worthy bull?

Is it for that some name this god, The sonne or begotten of a cow; and others tearme him, Bul; or is the meaning of Eliens mod. with thy great foot, like as Homer when hee callith Juno or any other Goddes, significth her to have a bigge and large eie, and by the epithit Goddes, meaneth one that braggeth and boasterh of great matters? 50

B. i. v.

Or rather because that the foot of a beeve doth no harme, howsoever horned beafts otherwise be hurtfull and dangerous; therefore they invoke thus upon him, and beseech him to come loving and gracious unto them.

Or lastly, for that many are perswaded, that this is the god who taught men first to plough the ground and to sowe corne.

Why have the Tanagraans a place before their city called Achilleum? for it is said, that Achilles in his life time bare more hatred than love unto this city, as who ravished and stole away Stratonicon the mother of Poemander, and killed Acestor the sonne of Ehippus.

10

Poemander the father of Ehippus, at what time as the province of Tanagra, was peopled and inhabited by tenures and villages onely, being by the Achæans besiedged in a place called Stephon, for that he would not go forth with them to warre, abandoneth the said fort in the night time, and went to build the citie Pæonindria, which he walled about. The architect or master builder Polyerithus was there, who dispraised all his worke, and derided it, in so much as in a mockerie he leapt over the trench; whereat Pæmander tooke such displeasure, and was so highly offended, that he meant to sling at his head a great stone, which lay there hidden of olde upon the nightly sacrifices of Bacchus. But Pæmander not knowing so much, pulled it up by force, and threw it at him; and missing Polyerithus, hit his son Leucippus, and killed him outright. Here- 20 upon according to the law and custom then observed, there was no remedie but needs he must depart out of Bæotia, in manner of an exiled man; and so as a poore suppliant and stranger to converse, wandering abroad in another country, which was neither safe nor easie for him to doe at that time, considering that the Achæans were up in armes and entred into the country of Tanagra. He sent therefore his sonne Ehippus unto Achilles, for to request his favour; who by earnest supplications and praiers prevailed so much, that he entreated both him, and also Therpelemus the sonne of Hercules; yea and Peneleus the sonne of Hippalemus, who were all of their kindred: by whose meanes Pæmander had safe conduct, and was accompanied as farre as the citie of Chalcis, where he was assailed, absolved and purged by Elpenor, for the murder which he had committed. In remembrance of which good turne by those princes received, he ever 30 after honoured them, and to them all erected temples; of which that of Achilles continueth unto this day, and according to his name is called Achilleum.

Who be they, whom the Bæotians call Plooes, and who be Acolies.

THe report goeth that Leucippe, Arsmoe and Alcæthe, the daughters of Minyas, being enraged and beltraight of their right wits, longed exceedingly to eat mans flesh, and cast lots among themselves, which of them should kill their owne children for that purpose. So the lot falling upon Leucippe, she yeelded her sonne Hippasus to be dismembred and cut in pieces; by 40 occasion whereof, their husbands simply arraigned, and in mourning weeds for sorrow and griefe were called Plooes, as one would say, foule and smokie; and the women Acolies, that is to say, distracted and troubled in their minds, or Oenobolæ: so as even at this day the Orchomenians, call those women who are descended from them by those names: and everie second yeere during the festivall daies called Agrionia, the priest of Bacchus runneth after them with a sword drawn in his hand, courting and chasing them: yea and lawfull it is for him to kill any one of them that he can reach and overtake. And verily in our daies Zoilus the priest killed one; but such never come to any good after: for both this Zoilus himselfe upon a certaine little ulcer or sore that he had, fell sicke; and after he had a long time pined away and consumed therewith, in the end died thereof: and also the Orchomenians being fallen into publicke calamities, and held in generall 50 for condemned persons, translated the priesthood from that race and lineage, and conferred it upon the best and most approved person they could chuse.

What is the cause that the Arcadians stone them to death, who willingly and of purpose enter within the powprife and precincts of Lyncæum: but if any come into it of ignorance and unaware; then they send to Eleutheræ?

As for these, may it not be that they are held free and absolved who do it upon ignorance: And by reason of this their absolution, this maner of speech arole, to send them to Eleutheræ, 10

there, which signifieth Deliverance: much like as when we say thus, ὡς ἀπὸ τοῦ πόντου, that is to say, into the region of the secure; or thus, ἔξω ἐκ τῶν δεινῶν τόπων, that is to say, thou shalt go to the Mannour of the Pleasant. Or haply it alludeth to the tale that goeth in this wise; that of Ixeons sonnes there were but two onely, to wit, Eleuther and Lebadus, who were not partakers of the horrible crime, that their father committed in the sight of Jupiter, but fled into Beotia; in token whereof, the Lebadians enjoy still their burgeoise in commune with the Arcadians: and therefore to Eleuthera they send those, who against their willes or unawares are entred within that pourprile consecrat unto Jupiter, into which it is not lawfull for any man to go.

Or rather, as Architemus writeth in his Chronicles of Arcadia, for that there were some who being ignorantly entred into the said place, were delivered and yekeld unto the Phliansians, who put them over to the Megarians, and from the Megarians they were carried to Thebes: but as they were transported and conveyed thither, they were staied about Eleuthera, by meanes of violent raine, terrible thunder, and other prodigious tokens; by occasion whereof, some would have the citie to take the name Eleuthera.

Moreover, whereas it is said that the shadow of him who commeth within this precinct of Ixeon, never falleth upon the ground: it is not true, howbeit it goeth generally currant, and is constantly beleeved for an undoubted truth. But is it not thinke you, for that the aire turneth presently into darke cloudes, and looketh obscure and heavie (as it were) when any enter into it: or because, that whosoever commeth into it incontinently, suffereth death. And you know what the Pythagoreans say, namely, that the soules of the dead, cast no shadow nor winke at all.

Or rather, for that it is the sun that maketh shadows, and the law of the country bereaveth him that entred into it, of the sight of the sunne; which covertly and enigmatically they would give us to understand under these words: For even he who commeth into this place is called Elaphos, that is to say a Stag; and therefore Cantharion the Arcadian, who fled unto the Elians of his owne accord to side with them, at what time as they warred upon the Arcadians; and as he passed with his bootie that he had gotten, went through this sacred place: when after the warre was ended, he returned to Lacedamon; was by the Lacedaemonians delivered up to the Arcadians, by direction and commandement of the oracle, which enjoined them to render the Stag.

What is that Demi-god in Tanagra, known by the name of Eunoſtus? And what is the reason that women may not enter within the grove dedicated unto him?

THIS Eunoſtus was the sonne of Elieus, the sonne of Cepheſus and Seias; so named of Ennoſta a certaine nymph that nourished and brought him up: who being faire and just withall, was also chaste, continent and of an austere life. Howbeit the report goeth, that one of the daughters of Collonius named Ochma, being his cousin germane became enamoured upon him: but when he had tempted him and assaied to win his love; Eunoſtus repulsed and rejected her with reprochfull tearmes, and went his way intending to accuse her unto her brethren: which the maiden suspecting and fearing, prevented him and slandered him first before her brethren Ochemus, Leon, and Bucolus, whom she incensed against Eunoſtus, that they would kill him, as one who by force had deflowered their sister. These brethren then having lien in ambush for the young man, murdered him treacherously: for which fact Elieus cast them in prison; and Ochma her selfe repenting of that which she had done, was much troubled and tormented in mind therefore, being desirous besides to deliver her selfe from the griefe and agonie which she endured by reason of her love, and withall pitying her brethren imprisoned for her sake, discovered the whole truth unto Elieus; and Elieus againe unto Collonius: by whose accord and judgement, these brethren of Ochma fled their country and were banished: but she cast her selfe voluntarily downe headlong from an high rocke, according as Myrris the poetesse hath left in verse. And this is the cause, that both the temple of Eunoſtus, and also the grave about it remained ever after, inaccessible, and not to be approached by women: inso much as many times when there happen any great earthquakes, extraordinary droughts, and other fearefull and prodigious tokens from heaven, the Tanagrians make diligent search and inquisition, whether there have not bene some one woman or other, who secretly hath presumed to come neere unto the said place. And some have reported (among whom was one Clidamus a noble and honourable personage) that they met with Eunoſtus upon the way, going to wash and cleanse himselfe in the sea, for that there was one woman who had bene so bold as to enter into his sanctuary.

And

And verely Dionys himselfe in a treatise that he made of Demi-gods, or such worthy men as had bene deified, maketh mention of a certaine edict, or decree of the Tanagrians, touching those things which Clidamus had related unto them.

How cometh it that in the country of Beotia, the river that runneth by Eleon, is called Scamander?

Deimachus the sonne of Eleon, being a familiar companion with Hercules, was with him at the Trojan warre: during the time whereof, continuing as it did verie long, he entertained the love of Glauca the daughter of Scamander, who was first enamoured of him, and so well they agreed together, that in the end she was with child by him. Afterwards it fortuneth, so that in a skirmish with the Trojans he lost his life: and Glauca tearing that her belly would tell tales and bewray what she had done, fled for succour unto Hercules, and of her owne accord declared unto him, how she had bene surprised with love, and what familiar acquaintance there had passed betweene her and Deimachus late deceased. Hercules as well in pite of the poore woman, as for his owne joy and contentment of mind, that there was like to remaine some issue of so valiant a man, and his familiar friend beside, had Glauca with him to his ships: and when she was delivered of a faire sonne, carried her into the country of Beotia, where he delivered her and her sonne into the hands of Eleon. The child then was named Scamander, and became afterwards king of that country; who surnamed the river machus after his owne name Scamander, and a little riveret running thereby, Glauca, by the name of his mother: as for the fontaine Scidusa it was so cleped according to his wives name; by whom he had three daughters, who are even unto this day honoured in that country, and called by the name of the virgins.

Whereupon arose this proverbiall speech, ἀνταρκία, that is to say, these things shall stand or prevvaile?

Dion the captaine generall of the Tarentines, being a right valiant and hardie warrior, when as the citizens by their voices and suffrages denied a sentence which he had delivered as the herault or crier proclaimed and published with a loud voice that opinion which prevailed, lifting up his owne right hand himselfe: Yea but this (quoth he) shall carie it away when all is done. Thus Thaphrastus reporteth this narration: but Apollidorus relateth moreover in his Rhymus that when the herault had proclaimed thus ἀνταρκία, that is to say, these be more in number, meaning the voices of the people: Yea but (quoth he) ἀόλου φατίν, that is to say, these be better; and in so doing, confirmed the resolution of those who were in number the fewer.

Upon what occasion was the citie of the Ithaceſians, named Alalcomene?

MOST writers have recorded, that Anticlia being yet a virgin, was forced by Sisyphus, and conceived Ulyſſes. But Hister of Alexandria hath written moreover in his Commentaries, that the being given in marriage unto Laertes, and brought into the citie Alalcomenium in Beotia, was delivered there of Ulyſſes; and therefore he (to renew the memorie of that citie where he was borne and which was the head citie standing in the heart of that country) called that in Ithaca by the name thereof.

Who beshey in the citie Aegina, which are called Monophagi?

OF those Aeginets, who served in the Trojan warre many died in fight, howbeit more were drowned by meanes of a tempest in their voyage at sea. But those few who returned were welcomed home, and joyfully received by their kinsfolke and friends: who perceiving all their other fellow-citizens to mourne and be in heaviness, thought this with themselves, they ought not to rejoice nor offer sacrifice unto the gods openly, but in secret: and so, everie man a part in his privat house, entertained those who were escaped and came home safe with feasts and banquets: and served at the table in their owne persons, unto their fathers, their brethren, and cousins and friends, without admitting any stranger whatsoever: in imitation whereof they do yet every yeere sacrifice unto Neptune in secret assemblies, which sacrifices they call Thysis during which solemnities they doe feast one another privately for the space of sixteene daies together with silence, and there is not a servant or slave there present to wait at the boord: but afterwards for to make an end of their feasting, they celebrate one solemne sacrifice unto Venus. And thus you may see why they be called Monophagi, that is to say, Eating alone, or by themselves.

What is the cause that in the country of Caria, the image of Jupiter Labradeus is made, holding aloft in his hand an axe, and neither a scepter nor a thunderbolt, or lightning? 10

For that Hercules having slaine Hippolite the Amazon, and among other armes of hers won her battell axe, and gave it as a prelent unto Omphale: this axe, all the kings that reigned in Lydia after Omphale, caried as an holy and sacred monument; which they received successively from hand to hand of their next progenitors, untill such time as Candaules disdaining to beare it himselfe, gave it unto one of his friends to carie. Afterwards, it chanced that Gyges put himselfe in armes against Candaules, and with the helpe of Arcelus, who brought a power of men to aide him out of Mylis, both defeated him, and also killed that friend of his from whom he tooke away the said axe, and put the same into the image of Jupiters hand, which he had made. In which respect he furnished Jupiter, Labradens, for that the Lydians in their language call an axe Labra.

Wherefore do the Trallians call the pulse Ervil Catharter, that is to say, the purger: and use it more than any other in their expiatorie sacrifices of Purification?

IS it for that the Minyans and Lelegians, having in old time disseized the said Trallians of their cities and territories, inhabited and occupied the same themselves? but the Trallians made head afterwards, and prevailed against them, inso much as those Lelegians who were neither slaine in battell, nor escaped by flight, but either for feebleness, or want of meanes otherwise to live, remained still, they made no reckoning of, whether they died or lived; enacting 30 a law, that what Trallian foever killed either a Lelegian or Minyan, he should be absolved and held quit, in case he paid unto the next kinsfolke of the dead partie; a measure called Medimmi, of the said Eruvil.

What is the reason that it goeth for an ordinarie by-word among the Elians to say thus; To suffer more miseries and calamities than Sambicus?

There was one Sambicus of the cite Eliu, who by report having under him many mates and complices at command, brake and defaced sundrie images and statues of brasle within the cite Olympia, and when he had so done, sold the brasle and made money of it: in the end he proceeded so farre as to rob the temple of Diana furnished Episcopus, that is to say, a vigilant patronesse and superintendant. This temple standeth within the cite Eliu, and is named Aristarchium. After this notorious sacriledge he was immediately apprehended, and put to torture a whole yeere together to make him for to bewray and reveale all his companions and confederats: so as in the end he died in these torments, and thereupon arose the said common proverbe.

What is the reason that at Lacedæmon the monument of Ulysses, standeth close to the temple of the Leucippidae? 50

Hercules one of the race descended from Diomedes, by the Ionian instigation of Temenus induced, robbed out of Argos the renowned image of Minerva, called Palladium, and that with the privitie and assistance of Leager in this sacriledge: now this Leager was one of the familiars and inward companions of Temenus: who being fallen out afterwards with Temenus, in a fit of anger, departed to Lacedæmon with the said Palladium: which the kings there received at his hands right joyfully and placed it neere unto the temple of the Leucippides: but afterwards they sent to the oracle at Delphos, to know by what meanes they might keepe and preserve serve the said image in safety: the oracle made this answer, that they should commit the keeping of it unto one of them who had stollen it away: whereupon they built in that verie place a monument in memoriall of Ulysses, where they shrined Palladium; and besides, they had the more reason so to do, because in some fort Ulysses was allied to their citie, by his wives side ladie Penelope.

What is the reason that the Chaldeonian dames have a custome among them, that whensoever they meet with any men that be strangers unto them, but especially if they be rulers or magistrates, to cover and hide one of their cheeks.

The men of Chalcedon warred somtime against their neighbours the Bithynians, provoked threto by all light injuries, and wrought that might minister matter and occasion therof: inso much as in the daies of king Zeipatus who reigned over the Bithynians, they assembled all their forces, and with a puissant power (beside of the Thracians, who joynd to aide them) they invaded their country with fire and sword, spoiling all before them: untill in the end king Zeipatus gave them battell neere unto a place named Phalium, where they lost the day, as well in regard of their presumptuous boldnesse, as of the disorder among them, inso much as there died of them in fight 8000. men. Howbeit utterly they were not defeated, for that Zeipatus in favour of the Bizantines, was contented to grow unto some agreement & composition. Now for 20 that their citie was by this meanes verie much dispeopled and naked of men, many women there were among them, who were constrained to be remarried unto their enfranchised servants, others to aliens and strangers coming from other cities: but some againe, chusing rather to continue widows still and never to have husbands, than to yeeld to such mariages, followed their owne causes themselves what matter foever they had to be tried or dispatched in open court before the judges or publicke magistrates; onely they withdrew one part of their veile, and opened their face on one side: the other wives also who were married againe, for modestie and womanhood, following them as better women than themselves, used the same fashion also, and brought it to be an ordinarie custome.

Wherefore do the Argives drive their ewes unto the sacred grove of Agenor, when they would have their ammes to leape them?

IS it not for that Agenor whiles he lived, was verie expert and skilfull about sheepe; and of all the kings that ever were among them, had the most and fairest flocks of them?

Why do the Argives children, at a certaine festivall time that they keepe, call one another in plaie and sport Ballachrades?

IS it because, the first of that nation, who were by Inachus brought out of the mountaines into the plaine and champion country, made their chiefe food (by report) of wilde hedge-peares? 40 Now these chok-peares, some say, were found in Peloponnesus, before they were seen in any other part of Greece, even whiles that region was called Apia. And hereupon also it came that these wilde peares commonly called Achrades, changed their name into Apia.

What is the cause that the Eliens, when their mares be hot after the horse, leade them, out of their owne confines to be covered by the Italians?

IS it for that Oenomaus was a prince, who of all others loved best a good race of horses, & took the greatest pleasure in these kind of beastes; & cursed with al manner of execrations, those Italians 50 which covered his mares in Eliu? And therefore they fearing to fall into any of these maledictions, avoid them by this maner.

What was the reason of this custome among the Guosians, that those who tooke up any money at any interest, snatched it and ran away with it?

WAS it to this end, that if they should denie the debt, and seeme to defraud the usurers, they might lay an action of felonie, and violent wrong upon them: and the other by this means might be more punished?

What is the cause that in the citie of Samos they invoke Venus of Dexicreon?

It is for that, that when in times past the women of Samos were exceedingly given to enormous wantonnesse & lechery, so that the brake out into many lewd acts: there was one Dexicreon, a mounte-banke or confensing juggler, who by (I wot not what) ceremonies and expiatorie sacrifices, cured them of their unbridled lust?

Or because this, Dexicreon being a merchant-venturer who did traffike and trade by sea, went into the Isle of Cyprus; & when he was ready to load or charge his ship with merchandize, Venus commanded him to freight it with nothing else but water, and then immediately to hoist up saile: according to which he did, and having put a great quantie of water within his vessell, he set saile and departed. Now by that time they were in the maine sea, they were verie much becalmed, so as for want of a gale of winde many daies together, the rest of the mariners and merchants a ship boord, thought verily they should all die for verie thirst: whereupon he sold unto them his water which he had aboard, and thereby gat a great quantitie of silver; of which afterwards he caused to be made an image of Venus, which he called after his owne name, Dexicreon his Venus. Now if this be true, it seemeth that the goddesse purposed thereby, not onely to enrich one man, but to save also the lives of many.

How cometh it to passe, that in the Isle of Samos, when they sacrifice unto Mercurie furnished Charidotes, it is lawfull for whosoever will, to rob and rife all passengers?

Because in times past according to the commandement and direction of a certaine oracle, the ancient inhabitants departed out of Samos and went into Mycale, where they lived and maintained themselves for ten yeeres space by pyracie and depredation at sea; and afterwards being returned againe into Samos, obtained a brave victorie against their enemies.

Why is there one place within the Isle Samos called Panama?

It is for that the Amazones to avoid the furie of Bacchus, fled out of the Ephesians country into Samos and there saved themselves? But he having caused ships to be built and rigged, gathered together a great fleet, and gave them battell, where he had the killing of a great number of them about this verie place, which for the carnage and quantitie of blood shed there, they who saw it, marvelled thereat, and called it Panama. But of them who were slaine in this conflict, there were by the report of some, many that died about Phlaon, for their bones are there to be seene. And there be that say, that Phlaon also clave in sunder, and became broken by that occasion; their crie was so loud, and there voice so piercing and forcible.

How cometh it that there is a publike hall at Samos, called Pedetes?

After that Damoteles was murdered, and his monarchie overthrowen, so that the nobles or Senators Geomori, had the whole government of the State in their hands; the Megarians tooke armes, and made warre upon the Perinthians (a colonie drawn and descended from Samos) carrying with them into the field, fetters and other irons, to hang upon the feet of their captive prisoners: the said Geomori having intelligence thereof, sent them aide with all speed, having chosen ten capitaines, manned also and furnished thirtie ships of warre; whereof twaine came to saile, caught fire by lightning, and so consumed in the verie mouth of the haven: howbeit the foresaid capitaines followed on in their voyage with the rest, vanquished the Megarians in battell, and tooke sixe hundred prisoners: upon which victorie, being puffed up with pride, they intended to ruinate the Oligarchie of those noble men at home, called Geomori, and to depose them from their government: and verily those rulers themselves ministred unto them occasion, for to set in hand with this their desseigne; namely by writing unto them, that they should leade those Megarians prisoners, fettered with the same gives which they themselves had brought: for no sooner had they received these letters, but they did impart and shew them secretly secretly unto the said Megarians, perswading them to band & combine with them, for to restore their citie unto libertie. And when they devised and consulted together about the execution of this comploted conspiracie: agreed it was betweene them to knocke the rings off, or lockers of the fetters open, and so to hang them about the Megarians legs, that with leather thongs they might be fastened also to their girdles about the wattle, for feare that being slacke, as they were, they should fall off and be readie to drop from their legs as they went. Having in this wisest forth and dressed these men, and given everie one of them a sword, they made all the haste they could to Samos; where being arrived and set aland, they led the Megarians through the market place to the Senate house, where all the nobles called Geomori were assembled and sat in consultation: hereupon was the signall given, and the Megarians fell upon the Senators, and massacred them everie one. Thus having received the freedome of the citie, they gave unto as many of the Megarians as would accept thereof, the right of free burgeoisie: and after that built a faire towne-hall, about which they hung and fastened the said bolts and fetters of irons, calling it upon this occasion Pedetes, that is to say, the Hall of Fetters.

What is the reason that in the Isle of Coos, within the citie Antimachia, the priest of Hercules being arrayed in the habit of a woman, with a mitre on his head, beginneth to celebrate the sacrifice?

Hercules, when he was departed from Troy with sixe ships, was overtaken with a mightie tempest, and with one ship alone (for that all the other was lost) was cask by the windes upon the Isle of Coos, and landed at a place called Laeter: having saved nothing else but his armor and the men that were with him in the ship; where finding a flocke of sheepe, hee desired the shepherd who tended them, to give him a ram. The shepherds name was Antagoras, who being a lustie, tall and strong man, would needs challenge Hercules to wrestle with him, upon this condition, that if Hercules could overthrow him and lay him along on the ground, the ram should be his. Hercules accepted the offer; and when they were close at hand, gripes, the Meropians, certaine inhabitants of the Isle came in to succour Antagoras, and the Greekes likewise to aide Hercules; in such sort, as there ensued a sharp and cruell fight: wherein Hercules finding himselfe to be overlaid and pressed with the multitude of his enemies, retired and fled (as they say) unto a Thracian woman, where for to hide and save his life, he disguised himselfe in womans apparell. But afterwards having gotten the upper hand of those Meropians, and being purged, he espoused the daughter of Alciopus, and put on a fairer robe and goodly stoale. Thus you may see whereupon his priest sacrificeth in that verie place where the battell was fought; and why new married spouses being arrayed in the habit of women, receive their brides?

Whereof cometh it, that in the citie of Megara, there is a lineage or family named Hamaxylysta?

In the time that the dissolute and insolent popular State of government, called Democratie (which ordained that it might be lawfull to recover and arrest all monies paid for interest and in consideration of use, out of the usurers hands, & which permitted sacrilege) bare sway in the citie: it hapned there were certaine pilgrims, named Theori of Peloponessus, sent in commission to the oracle of Apollo at Delphos, who passed thorow the province of Megara, and about the citie Aegiri, neere unto the lake there, lay and tumbled themselves upon their chariots here and there, together with their wives and children, one with another as it fell out: where certaine Megarians, such as were more audacious than the rest, as being thoroughly drunke, full of insolent wantonnesse and cruel pride, were so lustie as to overthrowe the said chariots, and thrust them into the lake; so as, many of the said Theori or commissioners were drowned therein. Now the Megarians (such was the confusion and disorder in their government in those daies) made no reckoning at all to punish this injurie and outrage: but the counsell of the Amphydiones, because the pilgrimage of these Theori was religious and sacred, tooke knowledge thereof and late upon an inquisition about it; yea and chastised those who were found culpable in this impietie; some with death, others with banishment: and hereupon the whole race descending from them, were called afterwards Hamaxylysta.

THE PARALLELS, OR A BRIEFE COLLATION OF ROMANE NARRATIONS, WITH THE SEMBLABLE REPORT OF THE GREEKS.

In the margin of an old manuscript copie, these words were found written in Greeke:
This booke was never of PLUTARCHS making, who was an excellent and most learned Author; but penned by some odde vulgar writer, altogether ignorant both of Poetrie, and also of Grammar.

* or Learning.

Any doe thinke, that ancient histories be but fables and tales devised for pleasure. For mine owne part having found many accidents in our daies, semblable unto those occurrents which in times past fell out among the Romans in their age: I have collected some of them together; and to everie one of those ancient Narrations, annexed another like unto it, of later time, and therewith alledged the Authors who have put them downe in writing.

I Darys lieutenant generall under the king of Persia, being come downe into the plaine of Marathon within the countrey of Attica, with a puissant power of three hundred thousand fighting men, there pitched his campe, and proclaimed warre upon the inhabitants of those parts. The Athenians making small account of this so great a multitude of Barbarians, sent out nine thousand men, under the conduct of these foure captains; namely, Cynegyrus, Pollizelus, Callimachus, and Altiades. So they stricke a battell, during which conflict, Polyzelus chanced to see the vision of one represented unto him surpassing mans nature, and thereupon lost his sight and became blind; Callimachus wounded through divers parts of his bodie with many pikes and javelins, dead though he was, stood upon his feet; and Cynegyrus, as he staied a Persian ship which was about to retire backe, had both his hands smitten off.

Arasball the king being possessed of Sicily, denounced warre againe the Romans: and Mettellus being cholen lord generall by the Senate, obtained a victorie in a certaine battell against him; in which battell lord Glauco a noble man of Rome, as he held the admirall-ship of Arasball lost both his hands: as Aristides the Milesian writeth in the first booke of the annales of Sicily, of whom Diodorus Siculus hath learned the matter and subiect argument of his historie.

Xerxes being come to lie at anchor neere the cape Artemisium with five hundred thousand fighting men, proclaimed warre upon the people of that countrey: whereat the Athenians being much astonished, sent as a spie (for to view & survey his forces) Agefilas the brother of Themistocles; albeit his father Neocles had a dreame in the night, and thought that he saw his sonne dismembred of both his hands; who entering the campe of the Barbarians in habit of a Persian, slew Marodonius one of the captains of the kings corps de guard, supposing he had bene Xerxes himselfe: and being apprehended by them that were about him, was brought tied and bound 50 before the king, who was then even readie to offer sacrifice upon the altar of the Sunne: into the fire of which altar, Agefilas thrust his right hand, and endured the force of the torment, without crying or groning at all; whereupon the king commaunded him to be unbound: and then said Agefilas unto him: We Athenians be all of the like mind and resolution, and if you will not beleeve me, I will put my left hand also into the fire: whereat Xerxes being mightily afraid, caused him to be kept safely with a good guard about him. This writeth Agatharides the Samian, in his second booke of the Persian Chronicles.

Porfena king of the Tuscans, having encamped on the further side of the river Tyber, warred upon the Romans, and by cutting off the victuals and all provision that was wont to be brought to Rome, distressed the said Romans with famine: and when the Senat hereupon was wondrously troubled; Nucius a noble man of the citie (taking with him foure hundred other brave gentlemen of his owne age, by commission from the Consuls, in poore and simple array) passed over the river: and calling his eie upon the capitaine of the kings guard, dealing among other captains, victuals and other necessities, supposing he had bene Porfena, killed him: whereupon he was presently taken and brought before the king, who put his right hand likewise into the fire, and enduring the paines thereof whilst it burned, most stoutly seemed to smile there-10 at and said: Thou barbarous king, so how I am loose and at libertie even against thy will; but note well this besides, that we are foure hundred of us within thy campe that have undertaken to take away thy life: with which words Porfena was so affrighted, that he made peace with the Romans: according as Aristides the Milesian writeth, in the third booke of his storie.

The Argives and the Lacedæmonians, being at war one with another about the possession of the countrey Thyreatis, the Amphitryones gave sentence that they should put it to a battell, and looke whether side wan the field, to them should the land in question appertaine. The Lacedæmonians therefore chose for their capitaine Othryades; and the Argives, Thersander: when the battell was done, there remained two onely alive of the Argives, to wit, Agenor and Chromius, who caried tidings to the citie, of victorie. Meane while, when all was quiet, Othryades not 20 fully dead but having some little life remaining in him, bearing himselfe, and leaning upon the truncheons of broken lances, caught up the targets and shields of the dead, and gathered them together, and having erected a trophée, he wrote thereupon with his owne blood: To Jupiter Victor and guardian of Triumphees. Now when as both those parties maintained still the controversy about the land, the Amphitryones went in person to the place to be eie-judges of the thing, and adjudged the victorie on the Lacedæmonians side: this writeth Chrysærmus in the third booke of the Peloponnesiack historie.

The Romans levying warre against the Samnites chose for their chiefe commander Posthumus Albinus, who being surprized by an ambush within a streight betwene two mountains, called Furtæ Caudine, a verie narrow passe, lost three of his Legions, and being himselfe deadly 30 wounded, fell and lay for dead: howbeit about midnight, taking breath, was quick againe, and somewhat revived, he arose, tooke the targets from his enemies bodies that lay dead in the place, and erected a trophée, and drenching his hand in their blood, wrote in this manner: The Romans, to Jupiter Victor, guardian of Triumphees, against the Samnites: but Marius surnamed Ourges, that is to say, the glutton, being sent thither as generall capitaine, and viewing upon the verie place, the said trophée so erected: I take this gladly (quoth he) for a signe and presage of good fortune; and thereupon gave battell unto his enemies and won the victorie, tooke their king prisoner, and sent him to Rome, according as Aristides writeth in his third booke of the Italian historie.

The Persians entred Greece with a puissant armie of 500000. men; against whom Leonidas was sent by the Lacedæmonians with a band of three hundred, to guard the streights of Thermopyle, and impeach his passage: in which place as they were merie at their meat, and taking their refection, the whole maine power of the Barbarians came upon them. Leonidas seeing his enemies advancing forward, spake unto his owne men and said: Sit still tirs and make an end of your dinner hardly, so as you may take your suppers in another world: so he charged upon the Barbarians, and notwithstanding he had many a dart sticking in his bodie, yet he made a lane through the presse of the enemies untill he came to the verie person of Xerxes, from whom he tooke the diademe that was upon his head; and so died in the place. The Barbarians king caused his bodie to be opened when he was dead, and his heart to be taken forth, which was found to be all over-growne with haire; as writeth Aristides in the first booke of the Persian historie.

The Romans warring against the Cathaginians, sent a companie of three hundred men under the leading of a capitaine named Fabius Maximus, who had his enemies battell, and lost all his men; himselfe being wounded to death, charged upon Anniball with such violence, that he 50 tooke from him the regall diademe or frontall that he had about his head, and so died upon it, as writeth Aristides the Milesian.

In the citie of Celæna in Phrygia, the earth opened and clave a funder, so as there remained a mightie chinke, with a huge quantitie of water issuing thereout, which caried away and drew into the bottomlesse pit thereof, a number of houses with all the persons great and small within

with in them. Now Midus the king was advertised by an oracle, that if he cast within the said pit the most precious thing that he had, both sides would close up againe, and the earth meet and be firme ground. So he caused to be thrown into it a great quantitie of gold and silver: but all would do no good. Then Anchurus his son, thinking with himselfe, that there was nothing so precious as the life & soule of man, after he had lovingly embraced his father, and bid him farewell, and with all taken his leave of his wife Timothea, mounted on horseback, and cast himselfe horte and all into the said chinke. And behold, the earth immediatly closed up: whereupon Midus made a golden altar, of Jupiter Idæus, touching it only with his hand. This altar about that time, when as the said breach or chinke of earth was, became a stone: but after a certaine prefixed time passed, it is scene all gold: this writeth Callisthenes in his second booke of Transformations.

The river Tybris running through the mids of the market place at Rome, for the anger of Jupiter Tursus, caused an exceeding great chinke within the ground, which swallowed up many dwelling houses. Now the oracle rended this answer unto the Romans, that this should cease in case they flang into the breach some costly and precious thing: and when they had cast into it both gold and silver, but all in vaine: Curtius a right noble young gentleman of the citie, pondering well the words of the oracle, and considering with himselfe that the life of man was more precious than gold, cast himselfe on horseback into the said chinke, and so delivered his citizens and countymen from their calamitie: this hath Aristides recorded in fortieth booke of Italian histories.

Amphiarus was one of the princes and leaders that accompanied Polyntes: and when one day they were feasting merrily together, an eagle soaring over his head, chanced to catch up his javelin and carrie it up aloft in the aire, which afterwards when she had let fall againe, sticke fast in the ground and became a lawrell. The morrow after, as they joined battell, in that verie place, Amphiarus with his chariot was swallowed up within the earth: and there standeth now the citie Harma so called of the chariot: as Trismachus reporteth in the third booke of his Foundations.

During the warres which the Romans waged against Pyrrhus king of the Epirotes, Paulus Aemilius was promised by the oracle that he should have the victorie, if he would let up an altar in that verie place where he should see one gentleman of qualitie and good make, to be swallowed up alive in the earth, together with his chariot. Three daies after *Valerius * Conatus*, when in a drem he thought that he saw himselfe adorned with his priestly vestments (for skillfull, he was in the art of divination) led forth the armie, and after he had slaine many of his enemies, was devoured quick within the ground. Then Paulus Aemilius caused an altar to be reared and wane the battell, wherein he tooke alive an hundred and threecore elephants carying runners upon their backs, whom he sent to Rome. This altar useth to give answer as an oracle about that time that Pyrrhus was defeated: according as Critolaus writeth in the third booke of the Epirotick historie.

Pyrrhus king of the Eubœans, whom Hercules being yet but a young man vanquished, and tying him betwene two horses, caused his bodie to be plucked and torne in pieces; which done, he cast it forth for to lie unburied: now the place where this execution was performed, is called at this day, Pyrrhus his hortes, situate upon the river Heracium: and whensoever there be any horses watered there, a man shall sensibly heare a noice as if horses neighed: thus we find written in the third booke entituled, Of rivers.

Tullius Hostilius king of the Romans, made warre upon the Albanes, who had for their king Metius Sufetius: and many times he seemed to retire and lie off, as loth to encounter and joine battell, inso much as the enemies supposing him to be discomfited, betooke themselves to mirth and good cheere; but when they had taken their wine well, he set upon them with so hot a charge that he defeated them: and having taken their king prisoner, he let him fast tied betwene two steeds and dismembred him, as Alexarchus writeth in the fourth booke of the Italian histories.

Philp intending to force and sacke the cities of Methone and Olynthus as he laboured with much ado to passe over the river Sandanus, chanced to be shot into the eie with an arrow by an Olynthian, whose name was Aster, and in it was this verse written:

Philp beware, have at thine eie:

After this deadly shaft lets flie.

Whereupon Philp perceiving himselfe to be overmatched, swam back againe unto his owne companie, and with the losse of one eie escaped with life, according as Callisthenes reporteth in the third booke of the Macedonian Annales.

Porfena king of the Tuskans lying encamped on the other side of Tybris, warred upon the Romans, and intercepted their victuals, which were wont to be conveyed to Rome, whereby he put the citie to great distresse in regard of famine: but Horatius Cocles being by the common voice of the people chosen capitaine, planted himselfe upon the wooden bridge, which the Barbarians were desirous to gaine, and for a good while made the place good, and put backe the whole multitude of them pressing upon him to passe over it; in the end finding himselfe overcharged with the enemies, he commanded those who were ranged in battell-ray behind him, to cut downe the bridge: meane while he received the violent charge of them all, and impeached their entrance, untill such time as he was wounded in the eie with a dart; whereupon he leapt in to the river, and swam over unto his fellowes: thus Theotimus reporteth this narration in the third booke of Italian histories.

There is a tale told of Icarus, by whom Bacchus was lodged and entertained, as Erasophenes in Erigone hath related in this wife. Saturne upon a time was lodged by an husbandman of the countrey, who had a faire daughter named Entoria: her hee doted on, and begat of her four sonnes, Janus, Hymnus, Faustus and Felix; whom hee having taught the manner of drinking wine, and of planting the vine, enjoyed them also to enpart that knowledge unto their neighbours, which they did accordingly: but they on the other side: having taken upon a time more of this drinke than their usuall manner was, fell a sleepe, and slept more than ordinarie: when they were awake, imagining that they had drunke some poyson, stoned Icarus the husbandman to death: whereat his nephewes or daughters children rooke such a thought and conceit, that for verie griefe of heart, they knit their neckes in halters, and strangled themselves. Now when there was a great pestilence that raigned among the Romanes, the oracle of Apollo gave answer, that the mortality would stay, in case they had once appeased the ire of Saturne; and likewise pacified their ghosts, who unjustly lost their lives. Then Lutatius Catulus, a noble man of Rome, built a temple unto Saturne, which standeth neere unto the mount Tarpeius, and erected an altar with foure faces; either in remembrance of those foure nephewes above laid, or respective to the foure seasons and quarters of the yeece; and withall instituted the moneth Ianuarie. But Saturne turned them all foure into starres, which be called the fore-runners of the Vintage: among which that of Janus ariseth before others, and appeareth at the feet of Virgo, as Critolaus testifieth in his fourth booke of Phenomena, or Apparitions in the heaven.

At what time as the Persians overranne Greece, and wasted all the countrey before them: Paulanias generall capitaine of the Lacedæmonians, having received of Xerxes five hundred talents of gold, promised to betray Sparta: but his treason being discovered, Agessilaus his father pursued him into the temple of Minerva called Chalciceos, whither he fled for sanctuarie; where he caused the doore of the temple to be mured up with brick, & so famished him to death. His mother tooke his corps, and cast it forth to dogs, not suffering it to be buried: according to Chrysfermus in the second booke of his storie.

The Romanes warring against the Latines, chose for their capitaine Publius Decius. Now there was a certaine gentleman of a noble house, howbeit poote, named Cassius Brutus, who for a certaine summe of money which the enemies should pay unto him, intended in the night season to set the gates of the citie wide open for them to enter in. This treacherie being detected, he fled for sanctuarie into the temple of Minerva, surnamed Auxiliaris; where Cassius his father, named also Signifer, shut him up and kept him so long, that he died for verie famine; and when he was dead, threw his bodie forth, and would not allow it any sepulture: as writeth Clitonimus in his Italian histories.

Darius king of Persia having fought a field with Alexander the Great, and in that conflict lost seven of his great lieutenants & governours of Provinces, besides five hundred and two war chariots armed with trenchant fibres, would notwithstanding bid him battell againe: but Arriobazanes his sonne, upon a pitifull affection that he carried to Alexander, promised to betray his father into his hands; whereat his father tooke such displeasure and indignation, that he caused his head to be smitten off. Thus reporteth Aretades the Gnidian in his third booke of Macedonian histories.

Brutus being chosen Confull of Rome by the generall voice of the whole people, chafed out of the citie, Tarquinius Superbus who raigned tyrannically; but he retrying himselfe unto the Tuskans, levied warre upon the Romanes. The sonnes of the said Brutus conspiring to betray their father, were discovered, and so he commanded them to be beheaded: as Aristides the Milesian writeth in his Annals of Italie.

12 Epaminondas captaine of the Thebanes, warred against the Lacedæmonians: and when the time was come that magistrates should be elected at Thebes, himselfe in person repaired thither, having given order and commandement in the meane while unto his sonne Stesimbrotus, in no wise to fight with the enemye. The Lacedæmonians having intelligence given them, that the father was absent, reproched and reviled this young gentleman, and called him coward; wherewith he was so galled, that he fell into a great fit of cholere, and forgetting the charge that his father had laid upon him, gave the enemies battell, and achieved the victorie. His father upon his returne, was highly offended with his sonne, for transgressing his will and commandement: and after he had set a victorious crown upon his head, caused it to be striken off, as Ctesiphon recordeth in the third booke of the Boeotian histories.

The Romanes during the time that they maintained warre against the Samnites, chose for their general captain, Manlius surnamed Imperious; who returning upon a time from the camp to Rome, for to be present at the election of Consuls, straightly charged his son not to fight with the enemies in his absence. The Samnites hereof advertised, provoked the young gentleman with most spitefull and villanous tearmes, reproching him likewise with cowardise: which he not able to endure, was so farr moved in the end, that he gave them battel and defeated them: but Manlius his father when he was returned, cut him shorter by the head for it: as testifieth Aristides the Milesian.

13 Hercules being denied marriage with the Ladie Iole, tooke the repulse so neere to heart, that he forced and sacked the citie Oechalia. But Iole flung herselfe headlong downe from the wall into the trench under it: howbeit so it fortune that the winde taking hold of her garments as she fell, bare her up so, as in the fall shee caught no harme, as witnesseth Nicetas of Mileta.

The Romans whiles they warred upon the Tuskans, chose for their commander Valerius Tolumnus; who having a sight of Clusia their kings daughter, fancied her, and demanded her of him in marriage: but being denied and rejected, he wane the citie, and put it to the fackage. The Ladie Clusia flung herselfe downe from an high tower; but through the providence of Venus, her habillments were so heaved up with the winde, that they brake the fall, and albeit shee light upon the ground, shee escaped alive. Then the captaine before named, forced her and abused her bodie: in regard of which dishonour and villanie offered unto her, by a generall decree of all the Romanes, confined he was into the Isle of Corfica, which lieth against Italy: as witnesseth Theophilus in the third booke of his Italian historie.

14 The Carthaginians and Sicilians, being entred into league, banded themselves against the Romanes, and prepared with their joint forces to warre upon them: whereupon Metellus was chosen captaine, who having offered sacrifice unto all other gods and goddesses, left out onely the goddesse Vesta; who thereupon raised a contrarie winde to blow against him in his voiage. Then Caius Julius the soothsayer said unto him, that the winde would lie, in case before he embarked and set saile, he offered in sacrifice his owne daughter unto Vesta. Metellus being driven to this hard exigent, was constrained to bring forth his daughter to be sacrificed: but the goddesse taking pitie of him & her, in stead of the maiden substituted a young heyfer, and carried the virgin to Lavinium, where she made her a religious priestresse of the Dragon, which they worship and have in great reverence within that citie: as writeth Pythocles in his third booke of Italian affaires.

In like manner is the case of Iphigenia which hapned in Aulis a citie of Baoria: reported by Meryllus in the third booke of Boeotian chronicles.

15 Brennus a king of the Galatians or Gallo-Greekes, as he forraied and spoiled Asis, came at length to Ephesus, where he fell in love with a young damosell, a commoners daughter; who promised to lie with him, yea and to betray the citie unto him, upon condition that he would give unto her carquansets, bracelets, and other jewels of gold, wherewith ladies are wont to adorne and set out themselves. Then Brennus requested those about his person to cast into the lap of this covetous wench, all the golden jewels which they had; which they did in such quantitie, that the maiden was overwhelmed under them quick, & pressed to death with their weight: as Chirrho writeth in the first booke of the Galatian historie.

Tarpeia a virgin, and young gentlewoman of a good house, having the keeping of the Capitoll, during the time that the Romanes warred against the Albanes, promised unto their king Tatius, for to give him entrance into the castle of mount Tarpeius, if in recompence of her good service, he would bestow upon her such bracelets, rings, and carquansets, as the Sabine dames used to weare when they trimmed up themselves in best manner: which when the Sabines understood, they heaped upon her so many, that they buried her quick underneath them: according as Aristides the Milesian reporteth in his Italian historie.

16 The inhabitants of Tegea and Pheneas two cities, maintained a lingring warre one against the other so long, until they concluded in the end to determine all quarrels and controversies by the combat of three brethren, twinned of either side. And the men of Tegea put forth into the field for their part, the sonnes of one of their citizens, named Reximachus: and those of Pheneas for themselves, the sonnes of Damoftratus. When these champions were advanced forth into the plaine, to performe their devoir, it fortune that two of Reximachus his sonnes were killed outright in the place; and the third whose name was Critolans, wrought such a stratagem with his three concurrents that he overcame them all: for making semblance as though he fled, he turned suddenly back, & slew them one after another, as he elyped his advantage, when they were singled and severed asunder in their chafe after him. At his returne home with this glorious victorie; all his citizens did congratulate and rejoice with him, onely his owne siter named Demo-dice, was nothing glad therefore, because one of the brethren whom he had slaine, was espoused unto her, whose name was Demoicus. Critolans taking great indignation hereat, killed her out of hand. The mother to them both sued him for this murder, and required justice; howbeit hee was acquit of all actions and enditements framed against him: as writeth Demostratus in the second booke of Arcadian acts.

20 The Romanes and the Albanes having warred a long time together, chose for their champions to decide all quarrels, three brethren twinned, both of the one side and the other. For the Albanes were three Curatius, and for the Romanes as many Horatius. The combat was no sooner begun, but those of Alba laid two of their adversaries dead in the dust; the third helping himselfe with a feigned flight, killed the other three one after the other, as they were divided asunder in pursuit after him: for which victorie, all other Romanes made great joy; only his owne siter Horatia shewed herselfe nothing well pleased herewith, for that to one of the other side she was betrothed in marriage: for which he made no more ado, but stabbed his siter to the heart: this is reported by Aristides the Milesian, in his Annales of Italy.

17 In the citie Ilium, when the fire had taken the temple of Minerva, one of the inhabitants named Ilus ranne thither, and caught the little image of Minerva named Palladium, which was supposed to have fallen from heaven, and therewith lost his sight, because it was not lawfull that the said image should be seene by any man: howbeit afterwards when he had appeased the wrath of the said goddesse, he recovered his eie sight againe: as writeth Deryllus in the first book of Foundations.

Metellus a noble man of Rome, as he went toward a certaine house of pleasure that hee had neere unto the citie, was slaid in the way by certaine ravens that flapped and beat him with their wings: at which ominous accident being astonied, and presaging some evil to be toward him, he returned to Rome: and seeing the temple of the goddesse Vesta on fire, he ran thither and tooke away the petie image of Pallas, named Palladium, and so likewise suddenly fell blind: howbeit afterwards being reconciled unto her, he got his sight againe: this is the report of Aristides in his Chronicles.

18 The Thracians warring against the Athenians, were directed by an oracle which promised them victorie, in case they saved the person of Codrucus king of Athens: but he disguising himselfe in the habit of a poore labourer, and carrying a bill in his hand, went into the campe of the enemies, and killed one, where likewise he was killed by another, and so the Athenians obtained victorie: as Socrates writeth in the second booke of Thracian affaires.

Publius Decius a Romane, making warre against the Albanes, dreamed in the night, and saw a vision which promised him, that if himselfe died, he should adde much to the puissance of the Romanes: whereupon he charged upon his enemies where they were thickest arranged; and when he had killed a number of them, was himselfe slaine. Decius also his sonne, in the warre against the Gaules, by that meanes saved the Romanes: as saith Aristides the Milesian.

19 Cyprius a Siracusan borne, sacrificed upon a time unto all other gods, but unto Bacchus: whereat the god being offended, haunted him with drunckenneses so as in a darke corner he bestowed forcibly his owne daughter, named Cyane; but in the time that he dealt with her, she tooke away the ring off his finger, and gave it unto her nourse to keepe, for to testifie another day who it was that thus abused her. Afterwards the peltence rained fore in those parts: and Aspido gave answer by oracle, that they were to offer in sacrifice unto the gods that turned away calamities, calamities, a godlesse and incestuous person: all others wist not whom the oracle meant; but Cyane knowing full well the will of Apollo, tooke her father by the haire, and drew him perforce to the altar, and when she had caused him to be killed, sacrificed her selfe after upon him: as writeth Dositheus in the third booke of the Chronicles of Cicily.

Whiles the feast of Bacchus called Bacchanalia was celebrated at Rome, there was one Aruntius who never in all his life had drunke wine but water onely, and alwaies despised the power of god Bacchus: who to be revenged of him, caused him one time be so drunke that he forced his owne daughter Medullina, & abused her bodie carnally; who having knowledge by his ring who it was that did the deed, and taking to her a greater heart than one of her age, made her father one day drunke, and after she had adorned his head with garlands & chaplets of flowers, led him to a place called the altar of Thunder, where with many teares she sacrificed him who had surprised her, & tak away her virginity, as writeth Aristides the Milesian in his third booke of Italian Chronicles.

20 Erechtheus warring upon Eumolpus, was advertised that he should win the victorie, if before he went into the field he sacrificed his owne daughter unto the gods: who when he had imparted this mater unto his wife Praxitheia, he offered his daughter in sacrifice before the battell, where Euripides maketh mention in his tragædie Erechtheus.

Marius maintaining warre against the Cimbrians, and finding himselfe too weake, saw a vision in his sleepe, that promised him victory, if before he went to battell, he did sacrifice his daughter named Calpurnia: who setting the good of the weale publicke, and the regard of his countymen, before the naturall affection to his owne blood, did accordingly and wane the field: and even at this day, two altars there be in Germanie, which at the verie time and howe that this sacrifice was offered, yeeld the found of trumpets: as Dorotheus reporteth in the third booke of the Annales of Italy.

21 Cyanippus a Thieffalian borne, used ordinarily to go on hunting; his wife a young gentlewoman intreated this fancie of jealousie in her head, that the reason why he went forth so often, and staid so long in the Forrest, was because he had the companie of some other woman whom he loved: whereupon she determined with her selfe to lie in espiall: one day therefore she followed and traced Cyanippus, and at length lay close within a certaine thicket of the Forrest, waiting and expecting what would fall out and come of it. It chanced that the leaves and branches of the shrubs about her stirred: the hounds imagining that there was some wild beast within, leaped upon her, and so tare in pieces this young dame (that loved her husband so well) as if he had beene a savage beast. Cyanippus then seeing before his eyes, that which he never would have imagined or thought in his mind, for verie griefe of heart killed himselfe: as Parthenius the Poet hath left in writing.

In Sybaris a cite of Italy, there was sometime a young gentleman named Aemilius, who being a beautifull person, and one who loved passing well the game of hunting, his wife who was young also, thought him to be enamoured of another ladie: and therefore got her selfe close within a thicket, and chanced to flirre the boughes of the shrubs and bushes about her. The hounds thereupon that ranged and hunted thereabout, light upon her and tare her body in pieces: which when her husband saw, he killed himselfe upon her, as Clytonimus reporteth in his 40 second booke of the Sybaritick historie.

22 Smeyna the daughter of Cinyras having displeased and angered Venus, became enamored of her owne father, and declared the vehement heat of her love unto her nourse. She therefore by a wily device went to work with her master, and bare him in hand that there was a faire damosell a neighbours daughter, that was in love with him, but abashed and ashamed to come unto him openly, or to be seene at all with him: the master beleved this & lay with her: but one time above the rest, desirous to know who she was with whom he companied, called for a light; and so soone as he knew it was his owne daughter, he drew his sword, and followed after this most vilanous and incestuous filth, intending to kill her: but by the providence of Venus, transformed she was into a tree, bearing her name, to wit, Myrtle, as Theodoros reporteth in his 50 metamorphoses or transmutations.

Valeria Tullulanaria, having incurred the displeasure of Venus; became amorous of her owne father, and communicated this love of hers unto her nourse: who likewise went cunningly about her master, and made him beleve that there was a young maiden a neighbours child, who was in fancie with him, but would not in regard of modestie be known unto him of it nor be seene when she should frequent his companie. Howbeit her father, one night being drunk called for a candle: but the nourse prevented him, and in great hast wakened her: who fled thereupon upon into the country great with child: where she cast her selfe downe from the pitch of a steep place, yet the fruit of her wombe lived; for notwithstanding that fall she did not miscarie, but continued still with her great belly: and when her time was come, delivered she was of a sonne, such an one as in the Roman language is named Sylvanus, and in Greeke Aegipanes. Valerius the father tooke such a thought thereupon, that for verie anguish of mind he threw himselfe downe headlong from a steepe rocke: as recordeth Aristides the Milesian in the third booke of Italian histories.

23 After the destruction of Troy, Diomedes by a tempest was cast upō the coast of Libya, where reigned a king named Lyons: whose maner and custome was to sacrifice unto his owne father god Mars, all those strangers that arrived and were set a land in his country. But Callirohæ his daughter casting an affection unto Diomedes, betrayed her father, and saved Diomedes by delivering him out of prison. And he againe not regarding her accordingly, who had done him so good a turne, departed from her and failed away: which indignitie she tooke so neere to the heart, that she hanged her selfe, and so ended her daies: this writeth Tuba in the third booke of the Libyan historie.

Calpurnius Crassus a noble man of Rome, being abroad at the warres together with Regulus, was by him sent against the Massilians, for to seize a stronge castle, and hard to be won, named Garatun; but in this service being taken prisoner and destined to be killed in sacrifice unto Saturne, it fortune that Bylatia the kings daughter fancied him, so as she betrayed her father, and put the victory into her lovers hand; but when this young knight was retired and gone, the damself for sorrow of heart cut her owne throat: as writeth Hesimach in the third booke of the Libian historie.

24 Priamus king of Troy, fearing that the city would be lost, sent his young sonne Polydorus into Thrace, to his sonne in law Polymeſter who married his daughter, with a great quantity of golde: Polymeſter for very covetousnesse, after the destruction of the city, murdered the childe, because he might gaine the golde: but Heecuba being come into those parts, under a colour and pretence that she should bestow that golde upon him, together with the helpe of other dames prisoners with her, plucked with her owne hands both eyes out of his head: witnesseth Euripides the tragædian poet.

30 In the time that Hanniball overran and wasted the countrey of Campania in Italy; Lucius Junius bestowed his sonne Rufius for safetie, in the hands of a sonne in law whom he had, named Valerius Gellius, and left with him a good summe of money. But when this Campanian heard that Aniball had wonne a great victorie, for very avarice he brake all lawes of nature, and murdered the childe. The father Thymobrius as he travelled in the country lighting upon the dead corps of his owne sonne, sent for his sonne in law aforesaid, as if he meant to shew him some great treasure: who was no sooner come, but he plucked out both his eyes, and afterwards crucified him: as Aristides testifieth in the third booke of his Italian histories.

25 Aeneas begat of Psamatha one sonne named Phocus, whom he loved very tenderly: but Telamon his brother not well content therewith, trained him forth one day into the forest a hunting, where having rouzed a wilde bore, he launched his javelin or bore-speare against the childe whom he hated, and so killed him: for which fact, his father banished him: as Dorotheus telleth the tale, in the first booke of his Metamorphoses.

Caius Maximus had two sonnes, Similius and Rhesus: of which two, Rhesus he begat upon Amelia, who upon a time as he hunted in the chafe, killed his brother, and bbing come home againe, he would have perswaded his father that it was by chance, and not upon a propensed malice that he slew him: but his father when he knew the truth, exiled him: as Aristoteles hath recorded in the third booke of Italian Chronicles.

26 Mars had the company of Althea, by whom she was conceived and delivered of Melaeger: as witnesseth Euripides in his tragædie Melaeger.

30 Septimius Marcellus, having married Sylvia was much given to hunting, and ordinarily went to the chafe: then Mars taking his advantage, disguising himselfe in habit of a shepherd; forced this new wedded wife, and gat her with childe; which done, he bewraied unto her who he was, and gave her a lance or speare, saying unto her: That the generositie and descent of that issue which she should have by him, consisted in that lance: now it hapned that Septimius slew Talquinius: and Mamercus when he sacrificed unto the gods for the good encrease of the fruits upon the earth, neglected Ceres onely; whereupon she taking displeasure for this contempt, sent a great wilde bore into his country: then he assembled a number of hunters to chafe the said beast and killed him; which done, the head and the skinn he sent unto his espoused wife: Scimbrates and Muthias her uncles by the mother-side, offended heereat, would have taken all away from the damosell; but hee tooke such displeasure thereat, that hee slew his kindmen: and his mother for to be revenged of her brethrens death, buried that cursed speare: as Menylus reporteth in the third booke of the Italian histories.

27 Telamon the sonne of Aecus and Endeis, fledde by night from his father, and arrived in the isle of Eubaea. * * The father perceiving it, and supposing him to be one of his subjects, gave his daughter to one of his guard, for to be cast into the sea; but he for very commiseration and pity, fould her to certaine merchants; and when the shippe was arrived at Salamis, Telamon chanced to buy her at their hands, and she bare unto him Ajax: witnesse Arctas to dos the Gnidian, in the second booke of his Insular affaires.

Lucius Trocius had by his wife Patris, a daughter named Florentia: her Calphurnius a Romane deflowered: whereupon he commaunded the yong maid-childe which she bare, to be cast into the sea; but the fouldiour who had the charge so to doe, tooke compassion of her, and chose rather to sell her unto a merchant; and it fortun'd so, that the ship of a certaine merchant arrived in Italy, where Calphurnius bought her, and of her body begat Contrufcus.

28 Aeolus king of Tuscan, had by his wife Amphithea six daughters, and as many sonnes; of whom Macareus the yongest, for very love deflowered one of his sisters, who when the time came brought forth a child: when this came once to light, her father sent unto her a sword, and she acknowledging the fault which she had committed, killed her-selfe therewith, and so 20 did afterwards her brother Macareus: as Softratus reporteth in the second booke of the Tuscan storie.

Papyrius Polucer, having espoused Julia Pulchra, had by her six daughters, and as many sonnes; the eldest of whom named Papyrius Romanus, was enamoured of Canulia, one of his sisters lo as she was by him with childe: which when the father understood, hee sent unto her likewise a sword, wherewith the maid away her-selfe; and Romanus also did as much: thus Chrysippus relateth in the first booke of the Italian Chronicles.

29 Aristonymus the Ephesian, sonne of Demostratus, hated women, but most unnaturally he had to doe with a she asse; which when time came, brought forth a most beautifull maide childe, surnamed Onofselis: as Aristotle writeth in the second booke of his Paradoxes or strange 30 accidents.

Fulvius Stellus was at warre with all women, but yet he dealt most beastly with a mare, and she bare unto him after a time, a faire daughter, named Hippona: and this is the goddesse forth that hath the charge and overseeing of horses and mares: as Ageilius hath set downe in the third booke of Italian affaires.

30 The Sardians warred upon a time against the Smyrneans, & encamped before the walles of their city; giving them to understand by their ambassadors, that raise their siege they would not, unlesse they sent unto them their wives to lie withall: the Smyrneans being driven to this extremity, were at the point to doe that which the enemies demanded of them: but a certaine waiting maiden there was, a faire and wellfavoured damosell, who ranne unto her master Philarchus and said unto him, that he must not faile but in any case chuse out the fairest wenches that were maide-servants in all the citie, to dresse them like unto citizens wives, and free borne women, and so to send them unto their enemies in stead of their mistresses, which was effected accordingly; and when the Sardians were wearied with dealing with these wenches, the Smyrneans issued forth, surprized and spoiled them: whereupon it commeth that even at this day in the citie of Smyrna there is a solemne feast named Eleutheria: upon which day, the maide-servants weare the apparell of their mistresses which be free women: as saith Dositheus in the third booke of Lydian chronicles.

Antepomarus king of the Gaules, when he made warre upon the Romans, gave it out flatly and said, that he would never dislodge and break up his campe before they sent unto them their 50 wives, for to have their pleasure of them: but they by the counsell of a certaine chamber maide, sent unto them their maide-servants: the Barbarians medled so long with them, that they were tired, and fell sound asleepe in the end: then Rhetana (for that was her name who gave the said counsell) tooke a branch of a wilde figge tree; and mounting up to the toppes of a rampier wall, gave a signall thereby to the Consuls, who sallied forth and defeated them; whereupon there is a feastvall day of chambermaids: for so saith Aristides the Milesian, in the first booke of the Italian histories.

31 When the Athenians made warre upon Eumolpus, and were at some default of victuals, Pyander who had the charge of the munition & was treasurer of the State (for to make spare of the provision) diminished the ordinary measure, and cut men short of their allowances: the inhabitants, suspecting him to be a traitor to his country in so dooing, stoned him to death as Callistratus testifieth in the third booke of the Thracian history.

The Romans warring upon the Gaules, and having not sufficient store of victuals, Cinna abridged the people of their ordinary measure of corne: the Romans suspecting therupon that he made way thereby to be king, stoned him likewise to death: witnesse Aristides in his third booke of Italian histories.

10 32 During the Peloponnesiack warre, Pisistratus the Orchomenian hated the nobles and affected men of base and low degree; whereupon the Senators conspired and resolved among them selves to kill him in the Counsell house, where they cut him in pieces, and every one put a gobbet of him in his bosome, and when they had so done they scraped and clenfed the floore where his blood was shed. The common people having some suspicion of the matter rushed into the Senat house: but Telamachus the kings yongest sonne, who was privy to the foresaid conspiracie, withdrew the multitude from the common place of assembly; and assured them that he saw his father Pisistratus carying a more stately majesty in his countenance than any mortal man, ascending up with great celerity the top of mount Pisum, as Theophilus recordeth in the second of his Peloponnesiackes.

20 In regard of the warrs forerere unto the city of Rome, the Roman Senat cut the people short of their allowances in corne: whereat Romulus being not well pleased, allowed it them a gaine, rebuked, yea and chastised many of the great men: who therupon banded against him and in the midst of the Senat house made him away among them, cut him in pieces, and bestowed on every man a slice of him in his bosome. Whereupon, the people ran immediately with fire in their hands to the Senat house minding to burne them all within; but Proculus a noble man of the city assured them, that he saw Romulus upon a certaine high mountaine, and that he was bigger than any man living and become a very god. The Romans beleved his words, (such authority the man caried with him) and so retired back, as Aristobolus writeth in the third booke of his Italian Chronicles.

30 33 Pelops the sonne of Tantalus and Eurianassa, wedded Hippodamia who bare unto him Atrous and Thyestes: but of the Nymph Danaus a concubine, he begat Chrysippus, whom he loved better than any of his legitimate sonnes: him Laius the Theban being inamoured stole away by force; and being attached and intercepted by Atrous and Thyestes, obtained the good grace and favour of Pelops to enjoy him, for his love sake. Howbeit Hippodamia perswaded her two sonnes Atrous and Thyestes to kill him, as if he knew that he aspired to the kingdome of their father: which they refusing to doe, she her selfe imploied her owne hands to perpetrate this detestable fact: for one night as Laius lay sound asleepe, she drew forth his sword, and when she had wounded Chrysippus as he slept, she left the sword sticking in the wound: thus was Laius suspected for the deed because of his sword: but the youth being now halfe dead, discharged and 40 acquit him and revealed the whole truth of the matter: whereupon Pelops cauled the dead body to be enterred, but Hippodamia he banished: as Dositheus recordeth in his booke Pelopida.

Helius Tolix having espoused a wife named Nuceria, had by her two children: but of an infranchised bond woman he begat a son named Phenius Firmus a childe of excellent beauty, whom he loved more deerey than the children by his lawfull wife. Nuceria detesting this base son of his, solicited her own children to murder him which when they (having the feare of God before there eyes) refused to do, she enterprised to execute the deed her selfe. And in truth she drew forth the sword of one of the Iquires of the body in the night season, and with it gave him a deadly wound as he lay fast asleepe: the foresaid Iquire was suspected and called in question for this act, for that his sword was there found; but the childe himselfe discovered the truth: his 50 father then commanded his body to be buried; but his wife he banished: as Dositheus recordeth in the third booke of the Italian Chronicles.

34 Thesens being in very truth the naturall sonne of Neptunus, had a sonne by Hippolite a princeesse of the Amazones whose name was Hippolytus: but afterwards married againe, and brought into the house a stepmother named Phaedra, the daughter of Minos: who falling in love with her sonne-in-law Hippolytus, sent her nurse for to sollicite him: but he giving no eare unto her, left Athens and went to Troezen, where he gave his minde to hunting. But the wicked and unchaste woman seeing her selfe frustrate and disappointed of her will, wrot shrewd letters unto her husband against this honest and chaste yong gentleman, informing him of many lies, and when she had so done, strangled her selfe with an halter, and so ended her daies. Theseus giving credit unto her letters, beought his father Neptune of the three requests, whereof he had the choise, this one; namely, to worke the death of Hippolytus. Neptune to satisfie his mind, sent out unto Hippolytus as he rode along the sea side, a monstros bull, who so affrighted his coach horses, that they overthrew Hippolytus, and so he was crushed to death.

Comminius Super the Laurentine, having a sonne by the nimph Ageria, named Comminius, got pouised afterwards Gidias, and brought into his house a stepmother, who became likewise amorous of her son-in-law; and when she saw that she could not speed of her desire, she hanged her selfe, and left behind her certaine letters devised against him containing many untruths. Comminius the father having read these slanderous imputations within the said letters, and beleeving that which his jealous head had once conceived, called upon Neptune, who presented unto Comminius his sonne as he rode in his chariot, a hideous bull: which let his steeds in such a fright, that they fell a flinging, and so haled the young man that they dismembred and killed him: as Dositheus reporteth in the third booke of the Italian historie.

35 When the pestilence raigned in Lacedemon; the oracle of Apollo delivered this answer: That the mortalitie would cease, in case they sacrificed yearly, a young virgin of noble blood. Now when it fortune that the lot one yeere fell upō Helena, so that she was led forth all prepared and set our readie to be killed; there was an eagle came flying downe, caught up the sword which lay there, and caried it to certaine droves of beasts, where the laid it upon an heyfer: whereupon ever after they forbore to sacrifice any more virgins; as Aristodemus reporteth in the third Collect of fables.

The plague was fore in Falerij, the contagion thereof being verie great, there was given out an oracle, That the said affliction would stay and give over, if they sacrificed yearly a yong maiden unto Juno: and this superstition continuing alwaies still, Faleria Lupercal was by lot called to this sacrifice: now when the sword was readie drawn, there was an eagle came downe out of the aire and caried it away: and upon the altar where the fire was burning laid a wand, having at one end in manner of a little mallet: as for the sword, she laid upon a young heyfer, feeding by the temple side; which when the young damsell perceived, after she had sacrificed the said heyfer, and taken up the mallet, she went from house to house, and gently knocking therewith all those that lay sicke, raised them up and said to everie one: Be whole and receive health: whereupon it commeth that even at this day this myserie is still performed and observed: as Aristides hath reported in the 919. book of his Italian histories.

36 Phylonome the daughter of Nymphis and Arcadia, hunted with Diana; whom Mars disguised like a shepherd, got with child. She having brought forth two twinnes, for feare of her father threw them into the river Erymanthus: but they by the providēce of the gods, were caried downe the streame without harme or danger, and at length the current of the water cast them upon an hollow oake, growing up on the banke side, whereas a she wolfe having newly kennelled had her den. This wolfe turned out her whelps into the river, and gave sucke unto the two twins above said: which when a shepherd named Tyliphus, once perceived and had a sight of, he took up the little infants, and caused them to be nourished as his owne children, calling the one Lycastus, and the other Parrhasius, who successively reigned in the realme of Arcadia.

Amulius bearing himselfe insolently and violently like a tyrant, to his brother Numitor; first killed his sonne Aeneas as they were hunting; then his daughter Sylvia he cloistred up as a religious nunne to serve Juno. She conceived by Mars; and when there was delivered of two twins, confessed the truth unto the tyrant: who standing in feare of them, caused them both to be cast into the river Tybris; where they were carried downe the water unto one place, whereas a shee wolfe had newly kennelled with her yong ones: and verily her owne whelps shee abandoned and cast into the river; but the babes shee suckled. Then Fausus the shepherd chauncing to espie them, tooke them up and nourished as his owne; calling the one Remus, and the other Romulus: and these were the founders of Rome citie: according to Aristides the Milesian in his Italian histories.

37 After the destruction of Troy, Agamemnon together with Cassandra was murdered: but Orestes who had beene reared and brought up with Strophius, was revenged of those murderers of his father: as Pyander saith in his fourth booke of the Peloponnesian historie.

Fabius Fabricianus, descended lineally from that great Fabius Maximus, after he had wonne and sacked Tusium, the capitall citie of the Samnites, sent unto Rome the image of Pennus Victor.

reffe, which was so highly honoured and worshipped among the Samnites. His wife Fabula had committed adulterie, with a faire and well favoured yong man, named Petronius Valentinus, and afterwards treacherously killed her husband. Now had Fabula his daughter saved her brother Fabrianus, being a verie little one, out of danger, and sent him away secretly to be nourished and brought up. This youth when he came to age, killed both his mother and the adulterer also; for which act of his, acquit he was by the doome of the Senate: as Dositheus delivereth the storie in the third booke of the Italian Chronicles.

38 Basilis is the sonne of Neptune, and Anippe daughter of Nilus, under the colour of pretended hospitalitie, and courteous receiving of strangers, used to sacrifice all passengers: but divine justice met with him in the end, and revenged their death: for Hercules set upon him and killed him with his club: as Agathon the Samian hath written.

Hercules as he drave before him thorow Italy, Geryons kine, was lodged by king Faunus the sonne of Mercurie, who used to sacrifice all strangers and guests to his father: but when hee meant to do unto Hercules, was himselfe by him slaine: as writeth Dercyllus in the third booke of the Italian histories.

39 Phalaris the tyrant of the Agrigentines (a mercilesse prince) was wont to torment & put to exquisite paine such as passed by or came unto him: and Perillus (who by his profession was a skillfull brasie-founder, had framed an heyfer of brasie, which he gave unto this king, that hee might burne quicke in it the said strangers. And verily in this one thing did this tyrant shew himselfe just; for that he caused the artificer himselfe to be put into it: and the said heyfer seemed to low, while he was burning within: as it is written in the third booke of Causus.

In Argeffa a citie of Sicilie, there was sometime a cruell tyrant, named Aemilius Censorinus, whose manner was to reward with rich gifts those who could invent new kinds of engines to put men to torture: so there was one named Aruntius Paternulus, who had devised and forged a brasen horse, and presented it unto the foresaid tyrant, that he might put into it whom he would. And in truth the first act of justice that ever hee did was this, that the partie himselfe, even the maker of it gave the first handell thereof; that he might make triall of that torment himselfe, which he had devised for others. Him also hee apprehended afterwards, and caused to bee thrown downe headlong from the hill Tarpeius. It should seeme also that such princes as reigned with violence, were called of him Aemylis: for so Aristides reporteth in the fourth booke of Italian Chronicles.

40 Euenus the son of Alar & Sterope tooke to wife Aleippe daughter of Oenomachus, who bare unto him a daughter, named Marpissa, whom he should have kepte a virgin still: but Aphareus seeing her, carried her away from a daunce, and fled upon it. The father made sue after, but not able to recover her: for verie anguish of mind, he cast himselfe into the river of Eycormus, and thereby was immortalized: as saith Dositheus in the fourth booke of his Italian historie.

Anius king of the Tuskans, having a faire daughter, named Salus, looked straightly unto her that she should continue a maiden: but Cathetus one of his nobles, seeing this damoelle upon a time as she disposed herselfe was enamoured of her, and not able to suppress the furious passion of his love, ravished her and brought her to Rome. The father pursued after; but seeing that he could not overtake them, threw himselfe into the river, called in those daies Paricissus, and afterwards of his name Anio. Now the said Cathetus lay with Salus, and of her bodie begat Salus and Latinus; from whom are descended the noblest families of that country: as Aristides, the Milesian, and Alexander Polyhistor, write in the third booke of the Italian historie.

41 Egestratus an Ephesian borne, having murdered one of his kinsmen, fled into the citie Delphi, and demanded of Apollo in what place he should dwell: who made him this answer, that he was to inhabit there, whereas he saw the peasants of the countrey dauncing, and crowned with chaplets of olive branches. Being arrived therefore at a certaine place in Asia, where he found the rural people crowned with garlands of olive leaves, and dauncing; even there hee founded a citie, which he called Elasus: as Pythothes the Samian writeth in the third booke of his Georgicks.

Telegonus the sonne of Vlysses by Circe, being sent for to seeke his father, was advised by the oracle to build a citie there, where he should find the rusticall people and husbandmen of the countrey, crowned with chaplets and dauncing together: when he was arrived therefore at a certaine coast of Italie, seeing the peasants adorned with boughes & branches of the wild olive tree, passing the time merrily, and dauncing together: he built a citie, which upon that occurrent

he named Prineffa; and afterwards the Romans altering the letters a little, called it Preneffe: as Aristotle hath written in the third booke of the Italian historie.

THE LIVES OF THE TEN ORATOVS.

The Summarie.

In these lives compendiously described, Plutarch sheweth in part, the government of the Athenian common-weale which flourished by the means of many learned persons; in the number of whom we are to reckon those under written; namely, Antipho, Andocides, Lysias, Isoocrates, Isæus, Aeschines, Lycurgus, Demosthenes, Hyperides, and Dinarchus: but on the other side he discovereth sufficiently the indigression of certain oratours, how it hath engendred much confusion, yea and the most part of such personages themselves; and finally overthrowen the publick estate: which he seemeth expressly to have noted and observed, so the end that every one might see, how dangerous (in the managemēt of State affaires) he is, who hath no good parts in him but onely a fine and nimble tongue. His meaning therefore is, that lively vertue (indeed) should be joined unto eloquence: meane while, we observe also the lightnesse, vanitie, and ingratitude of the Athenian people in many places: and in the divers complexions of these ten men here depicted; evident it is, how much availeth in any person, good instruction from his infancy, and how powerfull good teachers be, for to frame and fashion tender minds unto high matters, and important to the weale publicke. In perusing and passing through this treatise, a man may take knowledge of many points of the ancient popular government, which serve verie well to the better understanding of the Greeke historie, and namely, of that which concerneth Athens: As also by the recompenses both demanded, and also decreed in the behalfe of vertuous men, we may perceive and see among the imperfections of a people which had the sovereignty in their hands, some moderation from time to time: which ought to make us magnifie the wisdom and providence of God, who amid so great darknesse, hath maintained so long as his good pleasure was, so many States and governours in Greecke, which afterwards fell away and came to nothing, so as at this present that goodly countrey is become subject, and made thrall to the most violent, wicked and wretched nation under heaven.

THE LIVES OF THE ten oratours.

ANTIPHON. I.

Antipho the sonne of Saphilus, and borne in the borough and corporation of Karannum, was brought up as a scholar under his owne father, who kept a Rhetorick schoole, whereunto Alcibiades also (by report) was wont to go and resort when he was a young boy, who having gotten sufficiencie of speech and eloquence, as some thinke, himselfe, (such was the quicknesse of his wit, and inclination of his nature) he betooke himselfe to affaires of State: and yet he held a schoole nevertheless, where he was at some difference with Socrates the Philosopher in matter of learning and oratorie, not by way of contention and emulation, but in manner of reprehension quest for to be pleaded and pronounced in judiciall courts: and as it is given out by some, was the first who gave himselfe to this course, and professed so to do: for there is not extant one oration written in manner of a plea, by any oratours who lived before his time, no more by those that flourished in his daies (for it was not the manner yet and custome to compose orations for others) Themistocles (I meane) Pericles, and Aristides; notwithstanding that the time presented unto them many occasions, yea and meere necessities so to do: neither was it upon their insufficiencie, that they thus abstained, as it may appear by that which Historians have written of everie one of these men above mentioned. Moreover if we looke into the most ancient oratours whom we can call to mind, to wit, Alcibiades, Critias, Lysias and Archilochus, who have written ten one & the same stile, and exercised the same forme & manner of pleadings; it wilbe found that they all converted and conferred with Antipho, being now very aged and farre step in yeeres: for being a man of an excellent quicke and readie wit, he was the first that made and put forth the Institutions of oratorie; so as, for his profound knowledge he was surnamed Neffor. And Cecilius in a certaine treatise which he compiled of him, conjectureth, that he had beene sometime schoolemaster to Thucydides the Historiographer; for that Antipho is so highly commended by him. In his speeches and orations he is verie exquisite and full of perswasion, quicke and subtil in his inventions: in difficult matters verie artificiall; assailing his adversarie after a covert manner; turning his words and sayings respective to the lawes, and to move affections withal, aiming alwaies to that which is decent & seemely, and carrying the best apparence & shew with it.

He lived about the time of the Persian warre, when Gorgias Leontinus the great professor in Rhetorick flourished, being somewhat younger than he was; and he continued to the subversion of the popular state and government, which was wrought by the 400 conspirators, wherein himselfe seemed to have had a principall hand, for that he had the charge and command of two great galleies at sea, and was besides a captaine and had the leading of certaine forces: during which time he won the victorie in divers battels, and procured unto them the aide of many allies: also he moved the young and lustie able man of warre to take armes; he rigged, manned, and set out sixtie galleies, and in all their occasions was sent embassadour to the Lacedaemonians, when as the citie Eetionia was fortified with a wall: but after that those 400 before laid were put downe and overthrowen, he was together with Archipollemus one of the 400, accused for the conspiracie, condemned and adjudged to the punishment which is due unto traitours. His corps was cast forth without sepulture; himselfe and all his posteritie registred for infamous persons upon record: and yet some there be who report, that he was put to death by the 30 tyrants, and namely among the rest, Lysias testifieth as much in an oration which he made for Antiphos daughter; for a little daughter he had, unto whom Callesthemus made claime in right for his wife: and that the thirtie tyrants were they who put him to death, Theopompus beareth witness in the fiftieth of his Philippikes. But more moderne surely was this man, and of a later time, yea and the sonne of one * Lysidionides, of whom Cratinus maketh mention, as of no wicked man in his comedie called Pytine. For how should he who before was executed by those 400 returne to life againe in the time of the thirtie usurpers or tyrants: but his death is reported otherwise; namely, that being verie aged he failed into Cicily, when as the tyrannie of the former Dionys was at the highest: and when the question was proposed at the table, which was the best brasse? as some said this, and others that: he answered, that for his part he thought that brasse was best, whereof the statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton were made: which when Dionys heard, he imagining that the speech imported thus much covertly, as to set on the Syracusians, for to attempt some violence upon his person, commanded him to be put to death. Others report, that the said tyrant gave order that he should be made away, upon indignation that he scoffed at his tragedies.

There be extant in this oratours name three score orations; whereof as Cecilius saith 25 are untruly reported to be his. Noted he is and taxed by Plato the comick poet, together with Pylander, for avarice & love of money. It is said moreover, that he composed certaine tragedies alone, and others with Dionysius the tyrant, who joined with him. At the same time also when he gave his mind unto Poetrie, he devised the art of curing the griefes and maladies of the minde, like as physicians pretend skill for to heale the diseases and paines of the bodie. Certes, having built a little house at Cormuth in the market place, hee set up a bill on the gate, wherein hee made profession: That he had the skill to remedie by words, those who were vexed and grieved in spirit: and he would demand of those who were amisse, the causes of their sorrow, and according thereto, apply his comforts and consolations. Howbeit afterwards supposing this art and profession fiftene yeeres old, that verie yeere when as Praxiteles was provost: where he remained, and was instructed by Nicias, & Tissias, two Syracusans. Now having bought him an house, with the portion of land which fell unto his share, he lived there, in state of a citizen, and was called to government of common weale, when his lot came, for the space of 63 yeeres, untill the time that Clearchus was provost of Athens: but the yeere next following when Callias was provost; namely, in the 92 Olympias, when as the Sicilians and Athenians fought a field, by reason whereof many of their allies stirred and revolted, and especially those who dwelt in Italy and coasted thereupon, accused he was to have favoured the Athenians and sided with them, and thereupon was banished with three other. Now being arrived at Athens in the yeere wherein Callias was provost next after Cleeritus, while the foure hundred usurers were possessed of 10 the State, hee there rested: but after the navall battell was stricken neere to a place called the Goats rivers, when as the thirtie tyrants had the administration of the common weale in their hands, banished he was from thence for the space of seven yeeres; lost his goods and his brother Polemarchus; himselfe escaped with life narrowly out of the house at a posterne gate or backe-doore; in which house he had bene beset with a full purpose that he should end his life there: and then he retired himselfe to the citie Megara, where he abode. When as those of Phila had made a reentry into the citie, and chased out the tyrants; for that he shewed himselfe (above all others) most forward in this enterprise, as having contributed (for the exploiting of this service) two thousand dragmes weight in silver, and two hundred targuets: and being sent besides with Herman, waged three hundred and two souldiers, and wrought so effectually with Thrasyllus the 20 Elia, his friend and old host, that he helped him unto certaine talents of silver: in regard whereof, Thrasyllus (upon his returne and reentry into the city) propoed unto the people: That for and in consideration of these good services, the right of free burgeoisie should be granted unto him. This hapned in the yeere of the Anarchie, when there was no provost elected, next before the provostship of Enclides. This was granted and ratified by the people: onely there was one Archinus stood up, and impeached the proceeding thereof, as being against the law, because it was propoed unto the people, before it was consulted upon in the Sonate: so the fore-said decree was annulled and revoked. Thus being disappointed of his right of burgeoisie, he remained nevertheless (during his life) as a citizen, and enjoyed the same rights, franchises and privileges that other burgresses did; & so died in the end, when he had lived the space of foure 30 score and three yeeres, or as some say, three score and sixteene; and as others write, foure score: so that he lived to see Demosthenes a child. It is said, that he was borne the yeere that Philotes was provost. There goe in his name foure hundred orations; of which number (according to Dionysius and Cecilius) two hundred and thirtie be of his owne making in deed: in the pronouncing of all which, he failed but twice, and had the foile. There is extant also, that very oration which he made against Archinus, in the maintenance and defence of the said decree; by vertue whereof, the right of burgeoisie was given unto him: also another, against the thirtie tyrants. Apt he was to perswade; and in those orations which he gave out to others, very briefe and succinct. There be found likewise of his making, certaine introductions to Rhetoricke, and speeches delivered publicly before the people; letters missive; solemne praises; funerall orations; 40 discourses of love; and one defence of Socrates, which directly seemed to touch the judges to the quicke. His stile was thought to be plaine and easie, howbeit, inimitable. Demosthenes in one oration which he made against Nicias, saith: That he was enamoured of one Metaneira, a servant with Nicias; but afterwards he espoused and tooke to wife the daughter of his brother Brachyllus. Plato himselfe maketh mention of him in his booke entituled Phaedrus, as of an orator passing eloquent, and more ancient than Socrates. Philiscus who was familiar with Socrates, and the companion of Lysias, made an Epigram upon him, whereby it appeareth, that he was more ancient, (as also it is evident by that which Plato hath said) & the Epigram is to this effect:

Now shew Callippes daughter, thou that art so eloquent;
If ought of witte spirit thou hast, and what is excellent:
For mee it is that thou shouldst bring,
some little Lysias forth:
To blaze his fathers name abroad,
for vertuous deeds of worth.
Who (now transform'd, and having caught

He composed likewise an oration for Iphierates, which he pronounced against Harmodius, as also another wherein he accused Timotheus of treason, and both the one and the other he overthrew: but afterwards when Iphierates tooke upon him againe to enquire into the doings of 10 Timotheus, calling him to account for the revenues of the State which he had managed, and set in hand againe with this accusation of treason, hee was brought into question judicially, and made answer in his owne defence by an oration that Lysias penned for him. And as for himselfe he was acquit of the crime and absolved; but Timotheus was condemned and fined to pay a great summe of money. Moreover, he rehearsed in the great assembly and solemnity at the Olympick games, a long oration, wherein he perswaded the Greekes, that they should be reconciled one to another, and joine together for to put downe the tyrant Diomyssus.

ISOCRATES. IIII.

20 Isocrates was the sonne of one Theodorus, an Erechthian, a man reckoned in the number of I mean citizens, one who kept a sort of servants under him, who made flutes and hautboies; by whose workmanship he became so rich, that he was able to bring up and set out his children in worshipfull manner. For other sonnes he had besides, to wit, Telestippus and Diomestus; and also a little daughter unto them. Hereupon it is that he was twitted and flouted by the comick poets Aristophanes and Strattis, in regard of those flutes. He lived about the 86. Olympias elder than Lysimachus the Myrrhineusian by two and twentie yeeres, and before Plato some seven yeeres. During his childhood, he had as good bringing up as any Athenian whatsoever, as being the disciple & scholar of Prodicus the Chian, of Gorgias the Leontine, of Tissias the Syracu- 30 san, & *Theramen*es the professed Rhetorician: who being at the point to be apprehended & taken by the 30. tyrants, & flying for refuge to the altar of Minerva the Counsellor, when all other friends were affrighted and amazed: onely Isocrates arose and shewed himselfe for to assist and praye him to desist; saying, that it would be more dolorous and grievous unto him, than his owne calamitie, in case he should see any of his friends to be troubled and endangered for the love of him. And it is said, that he helped him to compile certaine Institutions of Rhetoricke, at what time as he was maliciously and falsely slandered before the judges in open court: which Institutions are gon under the name and title of Bolon.

When he was grown to mans estate, he forbore to meddle in State matters, and in the affaires of common-weale; as well for that he had by nature a small and feeble voice, as because 40 naturally he was fearfull and timorous: and besides, his state was much impaired, by reason that he lost his patrimonie in the warre against the Lacedaemonians. It appeareth that to other men he had bene assistant in counsell, and giving testimonie for them in places of judgement: but it is not knowne that he pronounced above one onely oration, to wit, de animarum; that is to say, concerning counterchange of goods. And having set up a publicke schoole, he gave himselfe to the studie of philosophie, and to write; where he composed his Panegyrique oration, and certaine others of the Deliberative kind: and those that he wrote himselfe, some he read, some he penned for others; thinking thereby to exhort and stirre up the Greekes to devise and performe such duties as befieemed them to doe. But seeing that he missed of his purpose and intention, hee gave over that course, and betooke himselfe to keepe a schoole: first, as some say, in 50 Chios, having nine scholars that came unto him: where when he saw that his scholars paid him downe in money his Minervals for their schooling, hee wept and said: I see well now that I am sold unto these youtnes. He would confesse willingly with those that came to devise and talke with him, being the first that put a difference betweene wrangling pleas or contentious orations, and serious politike discourses of common-weale, in which he rather employed himselfe. He ordained magistrates in Chios, erecting the same forme of government there, which was in his owne country. He gathered more silver together by teaching schoole, than ever any professor in in Rhetoricke or schoole-master was knowne to have done; so that he was well able to defray the charges of a galley at sea. Of scholars he had to the number of one hundred: and among many others, Timotheus the sonne of Conon; with whom he travelled abroad, and visited many cities: he penned all those letters which Timotheus sent unto the Athenians; in regard whereof he bestowed upon him a talent of silver, the remainder of that money due by composition from Salmos. There were besides of his scholars Theopompus the Chian, and Ephorus of Cumes; Asclepiades also who composed tragical matters and arguments; and Theodectes, who afterwards wrote tragedies (whose tombe or sepulcher is as men go toward Cyamite, even in the sacred way or street that leadeth to Eleusis, now altogether ruinate and demolished: in which place he caused to be erected and set up the statues of famous poets together with him, of all whom there remaineth none at this day but Homer alone;) also Leodamus the Athenian; Lacritus the law-giver unto the Athenians, and as some say, Hyperides and Isaas. And it is said that Demosthenes also came unto him whiles he yet taught a Rhetoricke schoole, with an earnest purpose to learne of him, using this speech: that he was not able to pay him a thousand drachms of silver, which was the onely price that he made and demanded of everie scholar; but meanes he would make to give him two hundred drachms, so he might learne of him but the fift part of his skill, which was a proportionable rate for the whole; unto whom Isocrates made this answer: We use not, Demosthenes, to do our businesse by piece-meale; but like as men are wont to sell faire fishes all whole; even so will I, if you purpose to be my scholar, teach and deliver you mine art full and entire, and not by haltes or parcels.

He departed this life the verie yeere that Charonides was Provost of Athens; even when the newes came of the discomfiture at Charonea, which he heard being in the place of Hippocrates publicke exercises: and voluntarily he procured his owne death, in abstaining from all food and sustenance the space of foure daies, having pronounced before this abstinence of his, these three first verses which begin three tragedies of Enripides:

- 1 King Danaus, who fiftie daughters had,
- 2 Pelops the sonne of Tantalus, when he to Pisa came.
- 3 Cadmus whom, the citie Sidon left.

He lived 98 yeeres, or as some say, a full hundred, & could not endure to see Greece fower times brought into servitude: the yeere before he died, or as some write, fower yeeres before he wrote his Panathenaick oration: as for his Panegyrik oration, he was in penning it tenne yeeres, and by the report, of some, sitene, which he is thought to have translated and borrowed out of Gorgias the Leontine and Lysias: and the oration concerning the counterchange of goods, he wrote when he was fourescore yeeres old & twaine: but his Philippike oration he set downe a little before his death: when he was farse stepped in yeeres, he adopted for his sonne, Aphareus, the yongest of the three children of Plathane his wife, the daughter of Hippias the oratour, and professed Rhetorician. He was of good wealth, as well for that he called duely for money of his scholars, as also because he received of Nicoles king of Cypres, who was the sonne of Enagoras, the summe of twenty talents of silver for one oration which hee dedicated unto him: by occasion of this riches, he became envied, and was thrice chosen and enjoined to be the captaine of a galley, and to defray the charges thereof: for the two first times he feigning himselfe to be sicke, was excused by the meanes of his sonne; but at the third time he rose up and tooke the charge, wherein he spent no small summe of money. There was a father, who talking with him about his sonne whom he kept at schoole, said: That he sent with him no other to be his guide and governour, but a slave of his owne: unto whom Isocrates answered: Goe your waies then, for one slave you shall have twaine. Hee entred into contention for the prize at the solemne games which queene Artemisia exhibited at the funerals and tombe of her husband Naupolus: but this enchiomastical oration of his which he made in the praise of him, is not extant: another oration he penned in the praise of Helena; as also a third in the commendation of the counsell Areopagus. Some write, that he died by abstaining nine daies together from all meat: others report but fower; even at the time that the publicke obsequies were solemnized for them who lost their lives in the battell at Charonea. His adopted sonne Aphareus composed likewise certaine orations: entred hee was together with all his linage and those of his blood, neere unto a place called Cynolarges, upon a banke or knap of a little hill on the left hand, where were bestowed, the sonne, and father Theodorus; his mother also and her sister Anaxo, aunt unto the oratour; his adopted sonne likewise Aphareus, together with his cousin german Socrates, sonne to the aforesaid aunt Anaxo Isocrates mothers sister: his brother Theo-

who bare the name of his father, his nephewes, or children of his adopted sonne Aphareus, and his naturall Theodorus; moreover, his wife Plathane mother to his adopted sonne Aphareus: upon all these bodies there were six tables or tombs erected of stone, which are not to be seene at this day: but there stood upon the tombe of Isocrates himselfe, a mightie great ramme engraven, to the height of thirtie cubits, upon which there was a syren or mermaid seven cubits high, to signifie under a figure his milde nature and eloquent stile: there was besides neere unto him, a table containing certaine poets and his owne schoole-masters: among whom was Gorgias looking upon an astrological sphere, and Isocrates himselfe standing close unto him: furthermore, there is erected a brasse image of his in Eleusis, before the entrie of the gallery Stoa, which Timotheus the sonne of Caron caused to be made, bearing this epigram or inscription:

*Timotheus upon a loving minde,
And for to honour mutuall kindnesse,
This image of Isocrates his friende, Erected hath unto the goddesse.*

This statue was the handi-woke of Leochares. There goe under his name threescore orations, of which five and twentie are his indeed, according to the judgement of Dionysius: but as Cecilius saith, eight and twentie; all the rest are falsely attributed unto him. So farse was hee from ostentation, and so little regard had hee to put forth himselfe and shew his sufficiencie, that when upon a time there came three unto him, of purpose to heare him declame and discourse, he kept two of them with him, and the third he sent away, willing him to returne the next morrow: For now (quoth he) I have a full theater in mine auditorie. He was wont to say also unto his scholars and familiars: That himselfe taught his art for ten pounds of silver; but hee would give unto him that could put into him audacity, and teach him good utterance, ten thousand. When one demanded of him how it was possible that he should make other men sufficient orators, seeing himselfe was nothing eloquent: Why not (quoth he) seeing that whet stones which can not cut at all, make iron and Steele sharpe enough and able to cut. Some say, that he composed certaine books as touching the art of rhetoricke; but others are of opinion, that it was not by any method, but exercise onely, that he made his scholars good oratours: this is certaine, that he never demanded any money of naturall citizens borne, for their teaching. His maner was to bid his scholars to be present at the great assemblies of the citie, and to relate unto him what they heard there spoken and delivered. He was wonderfull heavy and sorrowfull out of measure for the death of Socrates, so as the morrow after he mourned & put on blacke for him. Again, unto one who asked him what was Rhetoricke he answered: It is the art of making great matters off small, & small things of great. Being invited one day to Nicores the tyrant of Cypres; as he sat at the table, those that were present, requested him to discourse of some theme; but he answered thus: For such matters wherein I have skill the time will not now serve; and in those things that fit the time, I am nothing skillfull. Seeing upon a time Sophocles the tragical poet, following wantonly and hunting with his eie, a yong faire boy; he said: O Sophocles an honest man ought to containe not his hands onely, but his eies also. When Ephorus of Cumes went from his schoole non proficiens, and able to doe nothing, by reason whereof his father Demophilus sent him againe with a second salary or minervall; Isocrates smiled thereat, and merily called him Diphoros, that is to say, bringing his money twice: so hee tooke great paines with the man, and would himselfe prompt him, and give him matter and invention for his declamatorie exercise.

Inclined he was and naturally given unto the pleasures of wanton love; in regard whereof he used to lie upon a thinne and hard short mattresse, and to have the pillow and bolster under his head perfumed, and wet with the water of saffron. So long as he was in his youth he married not; but being now stricken in age and grown old, he kept a queene or harlot in his house, whose name was Lagides, by whom he had a little daughter, who died before she was married, when she was about twelve yeeres old. After that, he espoused Plathane, the wife of the rhetoritian \ Gorgias*, who had three children before, of whom he adopted Aphareus for his owne sonne, as hath beene said before, who caused his statue to be cast in brasse, and erected it neere unto the image of Jupiter Olympius, as it were upon a colunne, with this Epigram:

*This portraict of Isocrates in brasse,
His sonne adopted, Apharcus, who was,
Erected hath to Jupiter, in view*

*Of all the world thereby to make a shew,
That unto gods he is religious,
And honoureth his father vertuous.*

It is said, that whiles he was but a young boy, he ran a course on horseback; for he is to be scene in brasse in the citadell of the city, sitting and riding his horse, in forme and proportion of a boy within the tenise court of those priests of Minerva, which attend there, to take the sacred secrets, not to be revealed, as some have reported. In all his life time there were two only sutes commended against him: the former, for the exchange of his goods, being challenged and provoked by Megacles; for the triall whereof, he appeared not personally at his day, by reason of sicknesse: the second action was framed against him by Lyfimachus, for the exchange of his goods, with charge to defray the expenses of maintaining a galley at sea: in which proceesse he was cast, and forced to fet out a galley. There was also a painted image of his in the place called Pompeium. And Apharus composed verily orations, though not many, both judiciall and also deliberative. He made also tragedies, to the number of seven and thirtie; whereof there be two which were contradicted. And he began to have his works openly heard in publicke place, from the yeere wherein Lyssibratus was provolt, unto that yeere wherein Soficles was in place; to eight and twentie yeeres: in which time he caused six civill plaies to be acted, and twice gained the prize of victorie, having set them forth by a principall actour or plaier, named Dionysius; and by other actours he exhibited two more, of the Lenaick kind, that is to say, full of mirth, and to move laughter.

There were the statues also to be scene within the citadell, of the mother of Isoerates and of Thesodorus, as also of Anaco her sister; of which, that of his mother is yet extant; and it standeth neere unto the image of Hygia, that is to say Health; onely the inscription is changed: but the the other of Anaco is not to be found. This Anaco had two sonnes, Alexander by Canes, and Ufoles by Lyfias.

ISAEUS. V.

Isaeus was borne in Chalcis: and being come to Athens, he studied the works of Lyfias, whom he did so neerely imitate, as well in the apt couching of his words, as in the witty device & subtiltie of his inventions; that if a man were not very well practised & perfect in the stile and matter of writing of these two orators, hardly he should be able to discern many of their orations, and distinguish one from another. He was in greatest name, about the time of the Peloponne-siacke warre, as may be conjectured by his orations; and continued unto the reigne of king Philip. He gave over his publicke schoole, and went to teach Demosthenes privately at home, for the sum of ten thousand drachmes of silver; whereby he became very famous: and as some say, he it was that composed for Demosthenes certaine exhortatory orations. He left behind him three score and foure orations going in his name; whereof fittie are his indeed: also some particular introductions of his owne, and rules of Rhetoricke. He was the first who began both to forme and to turne the sense of his stile unto the politicke management of affaires; a thing that Demosthenes doth most of all imitate. Of this oratour, Theopompus the comick poet maketh mention in his Thesius.

AECHINES. VI.

Aechines was the sonne of Atrometus (a man who being banished in the time of the thirtie tyrants, was a meane to aide the people, and to set up the popular state againe) and his mothers name was Glaucothea. He was of the burrough or tribe Cotibocis: so that his parents were neither for nobilitie of race, nor yet for wealth and riches renowned in the citie: but being young, and of a lustie and able constitution, he fortified and confirmed the same more by bodily exercise: and finding himselfe to have a strong brest and cleere voice; thereupon afterwards he made profession to act tragedies; but (as Demosthenes said of him by way of reproch) hee went after others, and could never proceed higher than to act the third and last parts in the solemnities of the Bacchanale plaies under one Aristodemus. When he was but a boy, he taught petties the letters; namely, to spel and reade together with his father: and being of some growth, he served as a common souldier in the warres. The scholar and auditor he was (as some thinke) of Isoerates & Plato; but according to Cecilius of Leodamar. Being entred into the managing of State affaires, and that not without credit & reputation; because he made head & sided against the faction of Demosthenes, employed he was in many embassages; and namely unto K. Philip for

for to treat of peace: for which, accused he was by Demosthenes, and charged to have bene the cause that the nation of the Phocaeans was rooted out, and for that he kindled waere betwene the Amphyctions and the Amphissians, what time as he was chosen one of the deputies to be present in the assembly or diet of the Amphyctions, who made also an haven, whereby it hapned withall, that the Amphyctions put themselves into the protection of Philip, who being wrought through the port and favourable countenance of Eubulus the sonne of Spintharus a Proballustian, who was of great credit and reputation among the people, and spake in his behalfe, he escaped, and was found unguiltie, and caried it by thirtie voices; although others say, that the oratours had penned their orations, and were at the point to plead; but upon the newes of the overthrow at Cheronas, which impeached the proceeding of law, the matter was not called for, nor the cause pleaded.

A certeine time after, when king Philip was dead, and his sonne Alexander gone forward in his expedition into Asia, he accused Ctesiphon judicially, for that he had passed a decree contrary unto the lawes, in the honour of Demosthenes; but having on his side not the fitt part of the suffrages and the voices of the people, he was banished out of Athens, and fled to Rhodes, because he would not pay the fine of a thousand drachmes, in which he was condemned, upon his overthrow at the barre. Others say, that over & beside, he was noted with infamie, because he would not depart out of the citie; and that he retired himselfe to Ephesus unto Alexander. But upon the decease of Alexander, when there was great troubles towards, he returned to Rhodes, where he kept a schoole, and beganne to teach the art of Rhetoricke. He read other-whiles unto the Rhodians (and that with action and gesture) the oration which he had pronounced against Cte-siphon; whereat, when all the hearers marvelled, and namely, how possibly he could be cast, if he acted such an oration: You would never wonder at the matter (quoth he) my masters of Rhodes, if you had bene in place and heard Demosthenes impleading against it. He left behinde him a schoole at Rhodes, which afterwards was called the Rhodian schoole. From thence he sailed to Samos, and when he had staid a time in the Isle, within a while after, he died. A pleasant and sweet voice he had, as may appeare both by that which Demosthenes hath delivered of him, and also by an oration of Demochares.

There be found foure orations under his name; one against Timarchus; another as touching false embassages; and a third against Ctesiphon, which in truth be all three his: for the fourth entitled De Iliaca, was never penned by Aechines. True it is indeed, that appointed and commanded he was to plead judicially the causes of the temple of Delos; but he pronounced no such orations; for that Hyperides was chosen in stead of him, as saith Demosthenes. And by his owne saying two brethren he had, Aphobus and Demochares. He brought unto the Athenians the first tidings of the second victorie which they obtained at Tamnye, for which he was rewarded with a crowne.
Some give it out that Aechines was scholar to none, and never learned his Rhetoricke of any master; but being brought up to writing, and a good pen-man, he became a clark or notarie; and so grew up to knowledge of himselfe by his owne industrie, for that he ordinarily conversed in judiciall courts, and places of judgement. The first time that ever he made publicke speech before the people, was against king Philip: and having then audience with with great applause and commendation, he was presently chosen embassadour, and sent to the Arcadians; whither when he was come, he raised a power of ten thousand men against Philip. He presented and indicted Timarchus for maintaining a brothell house; who fearing to appeare judicially, and to have the cause heard, hung himselfe, as after a sort Demosthenes in some place saith. Afterwards elected he was to go in embassage unto Philip with Ctesiphon & Demosthenes, about a treatie of peace, wherein he carried himselfe better than Demosthenes. A second time was hee chosen the tenth man in an embassage, for to goe and conclude a peace upon certaine capitulations and covenants; for which service he was judicially called to his answer and acquit, as hath bene said before.

LYCURGUS. VII.

Lycurgus was the sonne of Lycophon, the sonne of Lycurgus; him I meane whom the thirtie tyrants did to death, by the procurement & instigation of one Aristodemus that came from Buta; who having bene treasurer generall of Greece, was banished during the popular government. Of the burrough or tribe he was named Buta, and of the family or house of the Eteobuta- des.

des. At the beginning the scholar he was of Plato the philosopher, and made profession of philosophy: but afterwards being entred into familiar acquaintance with Alexander, he became his scholar, and dealt in affaires of State where he was great credit, as well by his deeds, as words; and so put in trust he was with the management of the cities revenues: for treasurer general he was the space of fifteen yeeres; during which time, there went thorow his hands fortie millions of talents, or as some say, fourscore millions fix hundred and fiftie talents. And it was the orator Stratotes who preferred him to this honor, by propounding him unto the people. Thus I say at the first was he himselfe chosen treasurer in his own name; but afterwards he nominated some to one of his friends; and yet nevertheless managed all, and had the whole administration of it in his owne hands; for that there was a Statute enacted and published, that none might be chosen to have the charge of the publicke treasure above five yeeres. He continued alwaies an overseer of the citie workes both winter and summer: and having the office and charge committed unto him for provision of all necessaries for the warres, he reformed many things that were amiss in the common-wealth. He caused to be built for the citie four hundred gallies. He made the common hall or place for publicke exercises in Lyceum, and planted the same round about with trees: He reared also the wrestling hall, and finished the theater which is at the temple of Bacchus. He was repured a man of such fidelity him selfe in person to oversee and direct the workmen. He was repured a man of such fidelity and to good a conscience, that there was committed upon trust into his hands, to the summe of two hundred and fiftie talents of silver, by divers and sundrie private persons to be kept for their use. He caused to be made many faire vessels of gold and silver to adorne and beautifie the citie: as also sundrie images of Victorie in gold. And finding many publicke workes unperfected and halfe done, he accomplished and made an end of them all: as namely the Arsenals, the common halls for armour and other utensiles and implements, serving for the citie uses. He founded a wall round about the spacious cloisture, called Panathenaeikes, which he finished up to the verie cape and battlements; yea and laid level and even, the great pit or chinke in the ground: for that one Dimus, whose plot of ground it was, gave away the proprietie which he had in it unto the citie, in favour especially of Lycurgus, and for his sake. He had the charge and custodie of the citie, and commission to attache and apprehend malefactours, whom he drave all quit out of the citie, and commission to the poets and subtle sophisters would say, that Lycurgus dip not his pen in blacke inke, but in deadly blood, when he drew his writs against malefactours: In regard of which benefit unto the common-weale, so well beloved he was of the people, that when king Alexander demanded to had him delivered into his hands, the people would not forgo him. But when as king Philip made warre upon the Athenians the second time, he went in embassage with Polyclusus and Demosthenes, as well into Peloponnesus, as to other States and cities. All his time he lived in good estimation among the Athenians, repured evermore for a just and upright man, in such sort that in all courts of justice, if Lycurgus said the word, it was held for a great prejudice & good foredoome in his behalte, for whom he spake. He proposed & brought in certaine lawes; the one to this effect, that there should be exhibited a solemnitie of plaies or comedies at the feast Cytræ, wherein the poets should do their best, and strive a vie in the theatre for the prize; and whosoever obtained victorie, should therewith have the right and free dome of burgeslie, a thing that before was not lawfull nor granted unto poets; and thus he brought unto use and practise againe, a solemn game which he had discontinued. Another, that there should be made at the publicke charges of the citie, statues of brasile for the poets Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides; that their tragedies should be exempted and engrossed faire, for to be kept in the chamber of the citie; and that the publicke notarie of the citie should read them unto the plaiers, for otherwise unlawfull it was to act them. A third there was, that no citizen, nor any other person resident and inhabitant within the citie of Athens, should be permitted to buy any prisoners taken in warre, such as were of free condition before, to make them slaves, without the consent of their first masters. Item, that within the haven Piræum, there should be exhibited a solemn play or game unto Neptune, consisting of round daunces, no fewer than three: and that unto those who woon the first prize, there should be given for a reward no fewer than ten pound of silver; to the second, eight at the least; and to the third, not under six, according as they should be adjudged by the timpiers. Item, that no dame of Athens might be allowed to ride in a coach to Eleusis; for feare that the poore might be defaced by the rich, and here- in reputed their inferiours: but in case any of them were so taken riding in a coach, the should be fined and pay fix thousand drachms: now when his owne wife obeyed not his law, but was surprized in the manner by the sycophants and promoters, he himselfe gave unto them a whole talent talent, with which afterwards when he was charged, and accused before the people: You see yet (quoth he) my masters of Athens that I am overtaken for giving, and not for taking silver.

He mette one day as he went in the street, a publicane or farmer of the forraine taxes and tributes for the city, who had laid hands upon the philosopher Zenocrates, and would have ledde him to prison in all haste, because he paid not the duties imposed upon strangers; for which he gave the publicane a rappe on the head with the rodde or walking staffe which hee had in his hand, and recovered the philosopher out of his clowches; which done, he caft the said officer himfelfe into prison for his labor, as having comitted a great indignity unto fuch a perfonage: a few daies after, the fame philosopher meeting him with the children of Lycurgus: I have (quoth he unto them) my good children rendred thanks unto your father, and that right fpecially, in that he is fo praifed and commended of all men for fuccouring and refcuing me. He propofed and published certaine publicke decrees, uſing the helpe herein of one Euchides an Olynthian, who was thought to be a very ſufficient man in framing and penning ſuch acts; and alther he was a wealthy perſon, yet he never ware but one and the ſame kinde of garment both winter and ſummer, yea, and the ſame ſhooes he went in every day, what neede foever was. He exerciſed himfelfe continually in declaiming both night and day, for that he was not fo fit to ſpeak of a ſudden and unprovided, upon his bedde or pallier where he lay, he had onely for his covering a ſheepes ſkinne, fell and all, and under his head a bouliſter, to the end that the ſooner and with more eaſe, he might awake and goe to his ſtudy. There was one who reproched him, for that he paid his money till unto ſophiſters and profeſſed rhetoricians, for teaching him to make orations: But (quoth he) againe, if there were any would promiſe and undertake to profit my children and make them better, I would give him willingly not onely a thouſand deniers, but the one moiety of all my goods. Very bold he was and reſolute to ſpeake his minde frankly unto the people, and to tell them the truth plainly, bearing himſelfe upon his nobility; inſomuch as one day when the Athenians would not ſuffer him to make a ſpeech in open audience, he cried out with a loud voice; & whiſſep of Corfu, how many talents art thou worth? Another time, when ſome there were who called Alexander god: And what maner of god may he be (quoth Lycurgus, out of whoſe temple whoſoever go, had need to be ſprinkled and drenched all over with water to purifie themſelves.

After he was dead, they delivered his children into the hands of the eleven officers for execution of justice, for that Thraſicles had framed an accusation, & Menelachmus ended them; but upon the letters of Demosthenes, which in the time of his exile he wrote unto the Athenians, advertising them that they were ill spoken of about Lycurgus his children, they repented themselves of that which they had done, and let them go: & verily Democles the ſcholar of Thucydides justified them, and ſpake in their defence. Himſelfe and ſome of his children were carried at the cities charges, over and againſt the temple of Minerva Pæonia, within the orchard or grove of Melanthus the philoſopher: and found there be even in theſe our daies certain tombes with the names of Lycurgus and his children written thereupon. But that which is the greateſt thing that ſoundeth moſt to the praiſe of his government, he raiſed the revenues of the common-weale unto twelve hundred talents, whereas before they amounted but unto threeſcore. A little before he died, when he perceived death to approach, he cauſed himſelfe to be carried into the temple of Cybele the great mother of the gods, and into the Senate houſe, deſirous there to render an account of his whole adminiſtration of the common-weale: but no man was ſo hardy as to come forth and charge him with any unjuſt and wrongfull dealing, ſave only Menelachmus; now after he had fully answered thoſe imputations which he charged upon him, he was carried home againe to his houſe, where he ended his daies; & repured all his life time for a good and honeſt man, commended for his eloquence, and never condemned in any ſine, notwithstanding many actions and acculations were framed againſt him.

Three children he had by Calpio, the daughter of Abron, and sister to Calvus, the sonne also 50 of Abron, of the burrough Bata, who was treasourer of the campe during the warres that yeere wherein Cheronidas was provolt; of this affinitie and alliance, Dinarchus maketh mention, in that oration which he made against Patistu. He left behinde him these children, Abron, Lycurgus, and Lycophron; of whom Abron and Lycurgus died without issue; but Abron after he had with good reputation and credit, managed State matters, changed this life: and Lycophron having espoused Calistomacha, the daughter of Philippus Aixenes, begat a daughter named Caleta, married afterwards to Cleombrotus, the sonne of Democritus, an Acharnian, who by her had a sonne named Lycophron, whom Lycophron the grand-father adopted for his owne

sonne; and he departed this life without children: after the decease of this Lycophon, Callisto was remarried unto Socrates, unto whom the bare a sonne, named Symmachus; who begat Aristonymus; and of Aristonymus came Charmides, whose daughter was Philipe, and the bare a sonne, to wit, Lysander Medius, who became an interpreter also, one of the Emolpides: of him and of Timothea the daughter of Glauco descended Laodamia and Medius, who held the priesthood of Neptune Erechtheus: Philippa also a daughter, who afterwards was a religious priestesse, devoted to Minerva; for before time, had Dioeles the Melitian espoused her, and he tooke to wife Hediste the daughter of Abron, of whose body he begat Philippide and Nicostrata; and Theophilus the torch-bearer sonne of Theophrastus married Nicostrata, by whom he had Theophrastus and Dioeles, notwithstanding he was priest unto Neptune Erechtheus.

There be found of this oratours penning, fiftene orations. Crowned hee was many times by the people: and ordained there were for him divers statues and images, whereof there was one all of brasse, according to a publike decree of the cite, standing in the street Cerameum, that yeere when Anaxicrates was provost; under whom there was allowed unto himselfe and his sonne Lycurgus, as also to his eldest nephew, table and diet in Prytanæum, by vertue of the same decree of the people: howbeit, after the decease of Lycurgus, Lycophon his eldest sonne made sute by law for this gift and donation. He pleaded also many times for matters of religion, and accused Antolycus the fenatour, and one of the high court Areopagus, Lysicles also the captain, and Demades the sonne of Demius, together with Menescelmus, and many others, whom he overthrew and caused to be condemned every one. Moreover, he called judicially into question Diphilus, for that he tooke away out of the metall mines, those middle posts or props which supported the weight of earth bearing upon them, by which meanes he enriched himselfe, directly against the lawes: and whereas the penaltie of this crime was death, he caused him to be condemned. He distributed out of his goods, unto every citizen of Athens fiftie drachmes, or as some say, one mina, or pound of silver: for the totall summe of his wealth amounted unto an hundred and threecore talents. He accused likewise Aristogiton, Cleocrates, and Autolycus, for that being no better than slaves, they carried themselves like men of free condition. This Lycurgus was surnamed Ibis, that is to say, the blacke Stork: and men commonly would say to Lycurgus, this, like as to Xenophon, Nycterus, that is to say, the Howlet. The most ancient of this house, were descended from Erechtheus, the sonne of the Earth and of Vulcane; but the nextest, from Lycomedes and Lycurgus, whom the people honoured with publicke funerals and obsequies. And this descent of their race, is drawn from those who were priests of Neptune, and set downe in a full and perfect table, which hangeth up in the temple Erechtheum, and was painted by Spineta the Chalcidian; where also stand certaine statues of wood, atwell of Lycurgus as of his children, to wit, Abron, Lycurgus and Lychophon, which sometimes were made by Timarchus and Cephisodorus the sonnes of Praxitelis the imager. He who set up and dedicated the painted table before said, was Abron, unto whom by order of hereditarie succession, fell the priesthood, but he gave over his right thereto voluntarily unto his brother Lycophon: this is the reason that he is painted giving a three-forked mace unto his brother. Now this Lycurgus having caused to be engraven upon a square pillar, a briefe of his whole administration of the comon weale, caused it to be planted just before the wrestling hall, for every man to see it that would. Neither could any man be so fildio hardy, as to accuse him for robbing the State, or inverting any thing to his own use. He propounded unto the people, that there should be a coronet given unto Neoptolemus the sonne of Anicles, and a statue besides, for that he undertooke and promised to gild (all over) the altar of Apollo in the market place, according to the commandement & direction of the oracle. He demanded also, that honour should be decreed for Eumonymus the sonne of Diotimus, whose father was Diopithes, in that yeere wherein Ctesicles was provost.

DEMOSTHENES. VIII.

Demosthenes the sonne of Demosthenes and of Cleobule the daughter of Gylon, of the linage or tribe of Paania, being left an orphan by his father, at the age of seven yeeres, together with a sister five yeeres olde; during the time of orphanage kept with his mother a widow, and went to schoole unto Isocrates, as some say, or as most men give out, to Isaas the Chalcidian the disciple of Isocrates, who lived in Athens: he imitated Thucydides and Plato the Philosopher, in whole schoole there be that say he was first brought up: but as Hegeſus the Magnesian reporteth, eth, being advertised that Callistratus the sonne of Empedocles, an Aphidiean and famous orator, who had bene captain and commander of a troupe of horsemen, and who had dedicated an altar to Mercurie surnamed Agoraios, that is to say, the Speaker, was to make a solemne oration unto the people, craved leave of his tutor and schoolemaster, that he might go to heare him: and no sooner had he heard him speake, but he was in love with his eloquence.

But as for this oratour, he heard him but a while, even until he left the cite; for banished he was. Now after that he was departed into Thrace, by which time Demosthenes grew to be a yong man; then began he to frequent the company of Isocrates and Plato: howbeit, afterwards hee tooke home into his house Isaas, whom he entertained the space of foure yeeres, and exercised himselfe in the imitation of his stile, or (as Ctesibius reporteth in his treatise of Philosophie) he wrought so, that by the meanes of Callias the Syracusan, he recovered the orations of Zethus the Amphipolitan, and by the helpe of Charicles the Chariitian, he got them also of Alcidamus, and those he gave himselfe wholly to imitate. But in proceſſe of time, when he was come to mans estate, and past a ward, seeing that his tutors and guardians allowed him not sufficiently out of his living and patrimonie, he called them to account for their guardianship, that yeere wherein Timocrates was provost of Athens. Now three tutors or governours he had, to wit, Aphobus, Theripides, Demophon aliàs Demus, whom he charged more than the rest, being his uncle by the mothers side: he laied actions upon them of ten talents a peece, and so much he demanded of them by law: he overthrew them all; but he could not come by ought of that wherein they were condemned: for neither recovered he money nor favour of the one or the other.

When Aristophan was now so aged, that he could not take paines nor attend to set out the solemne dances and shewes, for which he was chosen commissarie and overseer, he gave over his place, and Demosthenes in his roome was substituted the matter of the said dances: and for that in the open theater as he was buſie in his office about setting out and ordering the dances, Medius the Anagyrasian, gave him a box of the eare with his fist, he fust him, an actiõ of batterie: howbeit, he gave over his sute for the sum of three thousand drachmes of silver, which Medius paid him. This is reported of him, that being a yong man, he retir'd himselfe apart into a certeine cave, where he gave himselfe unto his booke, having caused his head to be shaven the halfe of it, because he might not goe abroad to be seene, and so leave his booke: also, that he lay upon a very streight and narrow bed, for that he would the sooner awake, and with more ease: and there he exercised and forced himselfe to frame his speech better: but for that he had an ill grace with him, ever as he spake, to shake and shrinke up his shoul'd'r, he remedied that, by sticking up a broch or spit, or as some say a dagger, to the floore over head, that for feare of pricking his shoul'd'r, he might forget this evill custome that he had in his gesture: and according as he profited and proceeded forward in the art, he caused a mirror to be made juſt as bigge as himselfe, before which he used to declame, that thereby he might observe the evill gestures or ill-favoured faces that he made when he spake, and learne to reforme and amend them: also, he used otherwhiles to goe downe to the water side, to the haven Phalerum, for to exercise himselfe in declaming, even where the surging waves of the sea did beat upon the banks, to the end that he might at no time after be troubled nor put out and driven to an exaltie, with the noise and clamour of the people when hee should speake before them: but for that naturally hee was short-winded, and his breath commonly failed him, hee bestowed upon Neoptolemus a famous actour or stage-plaier, tenne thousand drachmes of silver, to teach him for to pronounce long periods and sentences with one breath, and not taking his winde betweene.

When he began to enter into the management of the publike State, finding that the citizens were divided into two factions; the one siding and taking part with king Philip; the other speaking and pleading still for their liberties and freedom, he chose to joine with that which was opposite in all their doings unto Philip; and all his life time he continued counselling and persuading the people to succour those who were in danger to fall under the hands of Philip: communicating his counsels in the administration of State affaires, & devising evermore with Hypereides, Nausicles, Polyeuctus, and Diotimus: and therefore he drew into league & confederacy with the men of Athens, the Thebanes, Euboeans, Corryceans, Corinthians, Boeotians, and many others besides. One day he chanced to be out, and his memorie to faile him, so that he was hissed at by the people in a great assembly of the cite: for which disgrace he was out of hearty, and ill appaid, in so much as in great discontentment he went home to his house; where by the way, Eutromus the Thriasian, being now an ancient man, met with him, who cheered up Demosthenes, and comforted him all that he could: out most of all Andronicus the stage-plaier; who said unto him:

That

play a part in a tragedie, you can not make me believe that you are the man whom you represent; no more shall you persuade me now to give care unto your counsell: and when the other laid hands on him and would have drawn him forth by violence, those of the city would not suffer him; then said Demosthenes unto them: I fiedde not unto Calabria for my safetie, and with any intention to save my life, but to convince the Lacedæmonians of their impietie and violence, even against the gods; and with that he called for writing tables, and wrote this distichon; as fath Demetrius the Magnesian, which the Athenians afterwards caused to be set as an Epigram over the statue:

Had thy good heart Demosthenes, mette with as good an hand:
The Greeks of Macedonian sword, should never have had command.

This image of his standeth neere unto the purpise or cloister, wherein is erected the altar of the twelve gods, and made it was by the hands of Polygnotus: but as some say, this was found written withall: Demosthenes to Antipater greeting. Philochorus saith, that he died of poison which he drank: but Satyrus the historiographer reporteth, that the penne was poisoned where-with he beganne to write his epittle, and chancing to put it into his mouth, so soone as ever he tasted thereof, died: Erastosthenes writeth otherwise, namely that hee standing in feare a long time of the Macedonians, was provided of poison, which he caried within a little ring or bracelet that he wore about the wrist of his arme: & there be againe who say, that he killed himselfe by holding his winde so long, that he was overcome and stifled withall: last of all, others write that he caried a strong poison within the collet of his signet, which he tasted, and died thereof, * * * two and twenty.

When king Philip was dead, he came abroad wearing a faire & rich new robe, although but a while before he had buried his owne daughter, so glad was he of the death of that Macedonian king. He aided the Thebanes also when they warred with Alexander, and all other Greeks he encouraged as much as possibly he could at all times; and therefore Alexander after he had destroyed the city of Thebes, demanded of the Athenians for to have him, menacing them if they would not deliver him into his hands. And when the said king warred upon the Persians, and required of the Athenians their shipping, Demosthenes opposed himselfe and denied it: For who is able to say (quoth he) that he will not use the same shippes even against our selves that fend them. He left behinde him two sonnes by one wife, the daughter of one Heliodorus a principall citizen. One daughter he had, who died before he was married, being but yet a young childe. A sister also he had, who being married unto Laches the Leuconian his nephew or sisters sonne, bare Demochares, a valiant man in warre, and besides, for policie and eloquence inferior to none in his time. There is an image of his to be seene at this day, standing within the common hall of the citie, called Prytaneum, on the right hand as men do enter in and go toward the altar. The first man he was who made an oration to the people with a sword by his side girded over his robe: for in that habit it is said, that he delivered a speech unto the citizens, when Antipater came to demand their oratours: but afterwards, the Athenians both ordained allowance of diet in the Prytaneum for the kindred of Demosthenes, and also set up a statue for himselfe when he was dead, in the Marketplace, that very yeere when Gorgias was provost, at the sute of Demochares his nephew or sisters sonne, who required these honours for his uncle: yea, and afterwards, Laches the sonne of Demochares a Leuconian, made sute for the like honours for himselfe, the yeere that Pitharatus was provost, which was ten yeeres after; namely, his statue for to stand in the market place, and allowance of diet in the palace Prytaneum, aswell for himselfe as for the eldest alwaies of his house and linage in every descent, with a priviledge of the highest room or uppermost place at all solemn fights and games. And these decrees as touching them both, are registred, and to be seene engroffed upon record. As for the image of Demochares, whereof we have already spoken, it was transported into the palace or hall of the citie named Prytaneum.

There be extant orations which be his in deed, to the number of three score and five. Some say, that he lived a dissolute and riotous life, and that he would not sticke to goe in womens apparel, to banquet, to be one ordinarily in all masks and mommeries; whereupon he was surnamed Batalus: though others there are, who say that this was the name of his nourise, and that therupon he was so tearmed by way of flouting speech or nick-name. Diogenes the dogged Cy-nick, spied him one day in a tavern; wherat Demosthenes was abashed, & retired more inward into into the house: Nay (quoth Diogenes to him) the more you draw or shrink backward, the further still you go into the tavern. The same Diogenes said to him upon a time, when he was disposed to scoffe: That in words he was a Scythian, that is to say, a tough Tartarian and a brave warrior; but in warre, a fine and delicate burgesse of Athens. He tooke golde of Ephialtes also, being one of the oratours who went in embassage to the king of Persia, and brought with him a great summe of money secretly to distribute among the oratours of Athens, to this end, that they might stirre coales, and blow the fire, to kindle warre against Philip: and it is said, that he for his part had at one clap of the king, three thousand daricks. He caused one Anaxilus of the citie of Orea, to be apprehended, who had otherwise bene his familiar friend; and being cast into prison, put him to be examined by torture, as a spie; and albeit he confessed nought, yet he sued out a writ or decree that he should be committed into the hands of the eleven executioners of justice. One day when he meant to make a speech in the full assembly of the people, they were not willing to heare him: Why (quoth he unto them) it is but a short tale that I purpose to tell unto you: which when they heard, they gave him audience willingly: and then began he in this manner: There was not long since (quoth he) a young man who hired an asse in the time of Summer, from this citie to Megara: now when it was noone time of the day, and the Sun exceeding hot, both the one and the other, aswell the owner of the asse as he who hired him, would needs have the benefit of the asses shade, and stand under it, but they hindred and impeached one another; for the owner said that he had let to hire, his asse, but not the shadow of him: the other againe who hired him, pleaded that the asse, shadow and all was in his power. Having thus begun his tale, he came downe and went his way: the people then called him backe, and praised him to tell the tale out, and make an end thereof: Why my masters (quoth he) how is it; that you are so desirous that I should tell you a tale of the shadow of asse, and will not give me the hearing when I am to speake unto you of your affaires of great importance? Poleis the famous actour and stage-plaier made his boast upon a time, that in two daies wherein he plaied his part, he had gotten a whole talent of silver: And I (quoth he) have gained five in one day, for holding my peace and keeping silence. His voice upon a time, when he made a speech unto the people, failed him; whereupon his audience being not well pleased, and himselfe somewhat troubled, he said aloud unto them: You are to judge plaieurs by their pleasant and strong voice; but oratours by their good and grave sentences. Epicles seemed to upbraid and reproch him, for that he was alwaies musing and premeditating: I would be assumed (quoth he unto him) it being to speake before so great an assembly of people, I should come unprovided. It is written of him, that he never put out his lampe, that is to say, that he never ceased studying how to file and polith (as it were) his orations, untill he was fiftie yeeres old. He said of himselfe, that he drunke nothing but faire water. Lysias the oratour had knowledge of him: and Isocrates saw him to manage the affaires of State, untill the battell of Cheronæa, yea, and some alio of the Socraticall oratours. The most part of his orations he pronounced ex tempore and of a sudden, as having a ready and pregnant wit, and one who naturally was fitt to speake. The first that ever propoed and put up a bill unto the people, that he should be crowned with a coronet of golde, was Aristophanes the Anagyrasian the sonne of Nicophanes: and Diondas did second the motion with an oath.

HYPERIDES. IX.

Hyperides the sonne of Glaucippus, who was the sonne of Dionysius of the burrough Colytes, had a sonne who bare the name of his father Glaucippus, an orator who composed certaine orations and he begat another oratour, named Alphius. He was at one time the scholar of Plato the Philosopher, of Lycurgus and of Isocrates. He dealt in the State at what time as Alexander the Great intended the affaires of Greece, and he crossed him as touching those captainties which he demanded of the Athenians, as also about the gallies which he required to have. He advised the people not to casse and discharge those souldiers which were enterred at Tenura, who had for their captaine, Chares, and whose friend particularly he was. He pleaded ordinarily at the first as an advocate for his fee; and was suspected to have received part of that money which Ephialtes brought out of Persia. Cholen he was the captaine of one great galley, at what time as king Philip went to lay siege unto the citie Bizantium: and sent he was to aide the Bizantines. The very same yeere he tooke the charge of defraying the expenses of the tolenne dances; whereas the rest of the captaines were exempt from all publicke offices for that yeere. He passed a decree, that certaine honours should be done unto Demosthenes; and when

this traitor was, and how much he had done

the said decree was by Diondas repealed, as made against the lawes, and himselfe thereupon accused, yet found he was unguiltie, and thereupon acquit. Friend he was to Demosthenes, Lysicles and Lycurgus; howbeit, in this amitie he continued not unto the end: for after that Lysicles and Lycurgus were dead, when Demosthenes was once called in question for taking money of Harpalus, he alone (for that his hands onely were free of bribery) was nominated and picked out from the rest, to frame an accusation against him, because they were all thought culpable in the same fault, and so he judicially accused him: but himselfe was charged by Aristogiton for publishing fault, and so he judicially accused him: That all the inhabitants and acts contrary to the lawes, after the battell at Charonea, namely; That all the inhabitants and dwellers in Athens, should be burgessees of the citie; that all slaves should manumized and made free; that all sacred and holy reliques; that women and children should be bestowed with-10 made free; that all sacred and holy reliques; that women and children should be bestowed with- in the port or haven Pireum: howbeit, absolved he was, and went cleere away. And when some there were who found fault with him, and marvelled how he should be so negligent and over- there were who found fault with him, and marvelled how he should be so negligent and over- seene, as not to know so many lawes which were directly opposit to the said decrees; he made this answer: If (quoth he) the armes of the Macedonians and the battell of Charonea, had not darzeled and dimmed my sight, I had never written nor proposed such an edict. But certeine it is, that after this, Philip being affrighted, gave the Athenians leave to take up the bodies of their dead that lay in the field, which before he had denied unto the heralds that came of purpose un- to him out of Lebada.

Afterwards, upon the defaulture at Crannon, when he was demanded by Antipater, and the peo- ple resolved to deliver him into his hands, he forsooke the citie, and fled into the Ille Aegina, 20 ple resolved to deliver him into his hands, he forsooke the citie, and fled into the Ille Aegina, with other persons who likewise were condemned; where meeting with Demosthenes, he desired him to holde him excused, for that he had by constraint accused him. And when he minded to depart from thence, surprisid he was by one Archias surnamed Phygadothes, a man borne in the citie of Thurii, and who at the first was a professed stage-plaier, but then imploied in the ser- vice and aid of Antipater: so he was apprehended perforce within the temple of Xenocrus; not- withstanding hee held the image of the said god in his armes; and from thence brought to Co- rintb before Antipater; where being set upon the racke, and put to torture, he bit his tongue off with his owne teeth, because he would not discover the secrets of the city, and so ended his daies the ninth day of the moneth October: howbeit, Hermippus saith, that as he went into Macedo- nie, he had his tongue cut out of his head, and his dead corps was cast forth unto the beasts of 30 nie, he had his tongue cut out of his head, and his dead corps was cast forth unto the beasts of the field without sepulture: yet one Alphimus his cousin germaine, or as some say, the counsell of Glaukipus his sonne obtained licence (by the means of Philopithes a certeine physician) to take up his bodie, who burnt the same in a funerall fire; the ashes and bones whereof, he carried to Athens afterwards, among his kinsfolke and friends, contrary to the orders and decrees set downe, both by the Macedonians and the Athenians: for by vertue thereof they were not onely banished but interdicted, so as they might not be interred within their owne country. Others say, that he was carried unto the citie Cleone with others, where he died; and that his tongue was cut, and afterwards, himselfe murdered in manner aforesaid. Howbeit, his kinsmen and friends gathered up his bones when his corps was burnt, and buried them amongst his parents and pro- genitours before the gates called Hippades, according as Heliodorus hath recorded in the third booke of his monuments. But his sepulchre at this day is quite demolished, and no token re- maineth thereof to be seene.

He had a singular name above all other oratours, for speaking before the people; in somuch, as some have ranged him even above Demosthenes. There go in his name, three score and seven- teene orations; of which, two and fiftie are truly attributed unto him, and no more. Given he was exceeding much to the love of women, which was the cause that he drave his owne sonne out of his house, and brought in thither Mysticilla the most sumptuous and costly courtesan in those daies: and yet in Pyreum he kept Aristagora, and at Ekusum (where his lands and posses- sions lay) he had another at command, namely, Phile a Thebane borne, who cost him twentie pounds weight of silver. His ordinarie walke was every day thorow the fish market. And when 50 pounds weight of silver. His ordinarie walke was every day thorow the fish market. And when the famous courtesan Phryne (whom he loved also) was called into question for Atheisme and impietie, inquisition was made after him likewise; and so he was troubled with her and for her sake, as it should seeme: for, so much he declareth himselfe in the beginning of his oration: now when he was at the very point to be condemned, he brought the woman forth in open court before the judges, rent her clothes, and shewed unto them her bare breest; which the judges see- ing to be so white and faire, in regard of her very beautie absolved and dismissed her.

He had very closely and secretly framed certeine accusatorie declarations against Demosthe- nes, as, yet so, as they came to light in this maner: for when Hyperides lay sicke, it fortuned that De- mosthenes came one day to his house for to visit him, where he found a booke drawn full of ar- ticles against him; whereat when he was much offended, and tooke it in great indignation, Hyperides made him this answer: So long as you are my friend, this shall never hurt you; but if you become mine enemy, this shall be a curbe to restraine you from enterprising any thing prejudiciall unto me. He put up a bill unto the people, that certeine honours should be done unto Jolas, who gave unto Alexander the cuppe of poison. He sided with Demosthenes, and joined in the raising of the Lamiacke warre, and made an admirable oration at the funerals of those who lost their lives therein. When king Philip was ready to embark & passe over into the 10 the Euboea, whereupon the Athenians were in great feare and perplexitie; he gathered together in a small time a flecte of fortie saile, by voluntarie contribution, and was the first man who for himselfe and his sonne rigged and set forth two gallics of warre. When there was a contro- versie in law betweene the Athenians and Delians to be decided, unto whether of them apper- tained by right the superintendence of the temple at Delos, and that Aschynus was chosen to plead the cause, the counsell of Areopagus elected Hyperides; and his oration as touching this matter is at this day extant, entituled The Deliaque oration. Moreover, he went in embassage to Rhodes, where there arrived other embassadours in the behalfe of Antipater, whom they high- ly praised, as a good, milde, and gracious prince: True it is (quoth Hyperides unto them again) I know well that he is good and gracious, but we have no need of him to be our lord and master 20 how good and gracious foever he be. It is said, that in his orations he shewed no action nor ge- sture at all: his maner was onely to set downe the case and lay open the matter plainly and sim- ply, without troubling the judges any otherwise than with a naked narration. Sent hee was likewise unto the Elians for to defend the cable of Calippus, one of the champions at the sacred games, unto whom this imputation was laid, that by corruption he had caried away the prize, and indirectly obtained the victorie. He opposed himselfe also against the gift which was or- dained in the honour of Phocion, at the instant fure of Midias of Anagyra, the sonne of Midias, the yere wherein Xenius was provolt, the 27. day of the moneth of May; and in this cause he was cast and had the overthrow.

DINARCHUS. X.

Dinarchus the sonne of Socrates or Sofistratus, borne as some thinke in the countrey of Atti- ca, or as others would have him, in Corinth, came to Athens very young, at what time as king Alexander the Great, passed with his armie into Asia, where he dwelt, and frequented the lecture of Theophrastus, who succeeded Aristotle in the Peripateticke schoole: he conversed also with Demetrius the Phalerian, and tooke his time especially to enter into the admini- stration of State affaires, after the death of Antipater, when the great oratours and states-men were some dead and made away, others banished and driven out of the citie: and being besides 40 and taking money for his orations, of those at whose request he composed them. He banded against the most renowned oratours in his time; not by putting himselfe forth to come in open place to speake before the people (for no gift nor grace he had therein) but by penning orations for those who made head against them. And namely when Harpalus had broken prison and was fled, he composed divers accusatorie declarations against all such as were suspected to have take money of him, and those he delivered into the hands of their accusers to be pronoun- ced accordingly. Long time after, being accused himselfe to have communicated, conferred, and practised with Antipater and Cassander, about the time that the haven Munichia was surpris- ed by Antigonus and Demetrius, who placed there a garrison in that yere when Antixerates was provolt of the city, he sold most part of his goods, and made money, and when hee had 50 done, fled out of the way to Chalcis, where he lived as it were in exile the space well neere of 15. yerees; during which time, he gathered great riches, and became very wealthy, and so return- ed againe to Athens, by the means of Theophrastus, who procured both him and other bani- shed persons to be recalled and restored: he abode then in the house of one Proxenus his fami- liar friend; where being now very aged, and besides weake-sighted, he lost his gold that he had gotten together; and when Proxenus his host would have given information thereof, and seem- ed to make inquisition, Dinarchus called him into question judicially for it; and this was the first time that ever he was known to speake & plead personally at the barre. This oration of his

is now extant, and there are besides in mens hands threescore and foure more acknowledged all to be his, and yet some of these are to be excepted, as namely, that against Aristogiton. He did imitate Hyperides, or as some thinke Demosthenes in regard of that pathetical spirit in moving affections, and the emphaticall force which appeareth in his stile. Certainly in his figures and exornations he followeth him very evidently.

DECREES PROPOSED UNTO the people of Athens.

Demochares the sonne of Laches, of the burrough Leucon, demandeth for Demosthenes, the sonne of Demosthenes of the burrough of Paania, a statue of bras to be set up in the market place or common hal of Athens: also allowance of diet in the palace Prytanæum, & the first place or seat in al honorable assemblies for himselfe, & the eldest of his house in every descent for ever; for that he the said Demosthenes hath alwaies bene a bene factour to the citie, & given counsell unto the people of Athens, in many of their honorable affaires to their behoote; for that he hath at all times exposed his goods to the service of the common-weale, & namely, of his liberrall and bountifull minde contributed eight talents of silver, and maintained one galley of warre, at what time the people freed & delivered the isle Eubæa: & another, when captaine Cephalodorus set out his voiage into Hellepont; as also a third when Chares and Phocion were sent as captaines to Byzantium by the people. Item, for that with his owne money he ransomed and redeemed many citizens taken prisoners & captives in Pydne, Methone & Olynthus by king Philip. Item, for that he defraited at his own proper cost & charges, the publick plaies & daunces when the tribe of the Pandionides failed to furnish the officers & wardens appointed thereto. Item, for that he armed many poore citizens who had not wherewith to set themselves forth to the warres, Item, for that being chosen by the people one of the Aediles or Commisaries, for repairing the citie walles, he laid out of his owne purse to the value of three talents of silver, over and besides ten thousand drachms which of his owne money he employed, in casting of two trenches about Pyreum. Item, that after the disastrous battell of Charonea, he gave out of his owne stocke one talent; & another to buy come with all in time of a dearth and great famine. Item, for that by his effectuell remonstrances, faire perswasions, holosome counsels, and good demerits, he had induced the Thebanes, Eubœans, Corinthians, Megarians, Achians, Locrians, Bizantines, and Messenians, to enter into a league as well offensive as defensive with the people of Athens. Item, for that he levied a power of ten thousand footmen well armed, and a thousand horsemen, over and above the contribution of monies, by the people and their allies. Item, for that being embassadour, he had perswaded the associats and confederates of Athens, to make a contribution of money to the summe of five hundred talents and above, toward the warres. Item, for that he impeached the Peloponnesians for aiding king Alexander against the Thebanes; for which service he parted with his owne silver, and went personally in embassage. As also in regard of many other good deserts, and woorthie exploits by him achieved: in consideration likewise of much wise counsel and advice, which he hath given unto the people, and of his politicke government & manning of State affaires, wherein he hath carried himselfe as well, yea and much better than any in his time: for the preservation of the libertie and maintenance of the authoritie of the people. Over and besides, in that he was banished out of his country by certaine seditious usurpers, who for the time oppressed the authoritie of the people: and finally lost his life in Calauria, in the quarrell of the said people, and for the love and good will that he alwaies bare affectionately unto the commonalty of Athens, there being sent of purpose from Antipater certaine soldiers to apprehend him. Notwithstanding, which present danger wherein he stood, being now in the hands of his enemies, yet persisted he firme & fast in his heartie affection alwaies unto the people: inso much as he never did any deed, nor let fall any word prejudiciall to his country, or unbefitting the honour of the people, as neere as hee was unto his death. Subscribed, that verie yeere when Pytharatus was Provost.

Laches the sonne of Demochares, of the burrough Leucon, demandeth in free gift of the Senate and people of Athens, for Demochares the sonne of Laches, of the tribe or burrough Leucon, one statue of bras to be erected in the market place: also his table and diet in the palace or citie citie hall Prytanæum for himselfe, and for him that shall be the eldest of his house in everie descent for ever; as also the priviledge of precedence or first seat at all solemne fights and publicke plaies: for that he hath alwaies bene a benefactour and good counsellor unto the people of Athens, as having deserved well of the common-weale in these particulars; as well in those things which he hath penned, proposed and negotiated in his embassage, as in the administration of common-weale; in that he hath caused the walles of the citie to be built, made provision of harnesse & armor, as well offensive as defensive; of fabricks & engines of battery, & of artillery with shot to be discharged out of them; in that he hath well fortified the citie during the warres with the Boeotians which continued for the space of foure yeeres: for which good service done, banished he was and chased out of the citie by the tyrants, who oppressed the libertie and authoritie of the people: and in that being restored againe and called home by an honourable decree of the said people, when Diocles was Provost, he was the first man who restrained the administration and manning of those who made spaire of their owne goods, and sent embassages unto Lysimachus: in that also hee levied for the good of the common-weale at one time thirtie talents, and at another a hundred talents of silver; in that he moved the people by a bill preferred unto them, for to send an embassage to king Ptolemæus in Aegypt; by means whereof they that went that voyage, brought backe with them fittie talents of silver for the people. Item, in that being sent embassadour to Antipater, he received thereby twenty talents of silver, which he brought unto the people into the citie of Eleusis, where he practised and perswaded with them to receive the same. Item, in that he suffered banishment, because he was a protectour and defender of the popular State, never siding nor taking part with any faction of the usurpers; nor bearing office or magistracie in common-weale, after that the said popular State was put downe and abolished. Item, in that he onely in his time, of all those who medled in the affaires of State, never studied nor intended alteration, and to reduce his country unto any another kind of government, but popular. Item, in that by his politicke counsell and administration he hath put in safetie and securitie all judgements passed; all lawes enacted; all decrees concluded; yea and the goods and substance of all the Athenians: finally, in that he hath gone about and attempted nothing prejudiciall unto the popular government, either in word or deed.

Lycophron the son of Lycurgus, of the burrough or communalitie of Bura, hath presented this request: That he might be allowed his diet in the palace Prytanæum, according to the free gift granted before time to his father Lycurgus by the people, in that yeere wherein Anaxicrates was Provost of the citie, and the tribe Antiochis President of Prytanæum: which Stratocles the son of Euthydemus, of the burrough Diomeia, proposed it in this forme: Forasmuch as Lycurgus, the sonne of Lycophron of Bura, hath received of his ancestors (as it were) from hand to hand a certaine hereditarie love and affection to the people of Athens, and his progenitours likewise, Dionmedes and Lycurgus, both during their lives were esteemed and highly honoured by the people; and after their death, had this honour done unto them in testimonie of their vertue and valour, as to be entered at the publick charges of the citie in that conspicuous street called Ceramicum: considering also, that Lycurgus himselfe (whiles he managed the affaires of the State) enacted many good and holosome lawes for his country, and being treasurer-generall of all the cities revenues, by the space of fiftene yeeres, during that time, had the receipt and laying out of the publick moneys, to the summe of eightene thousand and nine hundred talents: and for that many private mens stocks were put into his hands upon trust, for the confidence they had in him, in regard of his fidelitie; in regard also, that he hath disbursed and laied forth of his owne moneys at sundry times and upon divers occasions, for the benefit of the citie and communalitie, as much as amounteth in all, to fixe hundred and fittie talents: for that likewise in all his employments, having bene ever found most trustie, just and loyall, and to carie himselfe as an honest man and good citizen, he hath bene many times crowned by the city: moreover, in this respect, that having bene chosen by the people the receiver of the finances, hee gathered together a great masse of money, and brought the same into the common chest within the citadell, and besides, provided ornaments for the goddess Minerva, to wit, images of victorie all of beaten gold, vessels to carie in procession both of golde and silver, besides other jewels of fine gold for the service and worship of the said goddess, and namely, to the number of one hundred Camephoræ, that is to say, Virgins carrying paniers or baskets with sacred reliques upon their heads. Item, for that being elected commissarie for the munitions and provisions necessarie for the warres, he brought into the citadell a great number of armours and weapons, and among the rest, fittie thousand shot; rigged and set a float foure hundred gallies, some new built, others repaired and trimmed: over and besides, for that finding certaine of the citie works imperfect, to wit, the Arceall, the Armorie and the Theater of Bacchus, he caused them to be made up, and withall, finished both the Cirque or running place Panathenaeum, and also the empaied parke for publicke exercises, and built the Lycium likewise, and adorned the citie with many faire buildings and publicke edifices: whereas also, king Alexander the Great, having already subdued all Asia, and intending generally to be commander over all Greece, demanded to have Lycurgus delivered up into his hands, for that he onely stood in his way, and crossed his desires, the people would not deliver him for any feare they had of Alexander: and for that being oft times called judicially to his answer, and to render an account of his government and administration in a free citie and governed by a popular State, he was alwaies found innocent and unprovable, not tainted with any briberie, nor spotted with corruption and taking gifts for to pervert justice all his life time. To the end therefore, that all men might know that they who are well affected to the maintenance of liberty and popular government be highly accounted of by the people whiles they live, and that after their death the citie is willing to render unto them immortal thanks; in a good and happie houre, let it be ordained by the people, that Lycurgus the sonne of Lyciphron of Buta, be honoured for his vertue and righteousnesse; and that the people erect his statue all of brasie in the market-stead, unlesse it be in some place where the trade expressly forbiddeth it to stand. Item, that there be allowance of diet in the Prytaneeum, to the eldest of his house in every descent for ever. Also, that the decrees by him propoed, shalbe ratified and engrossed by the publicke notarie of the citie, yea, and engraven in pillars of stone, and set up in the citadell neere unto the offerings consecrated unto the goddesse Minerva: and for the engraving of the said pillars, the treasure of the citie shall defray fiftie drachmes of silver out of those moneys which are allowed for the citie decrees.

OF THREE SORTS OF GOVERNMENT: MONAR- CHIE, DEMOCRATIE AND OLIGARCHIE.

AS I devised with my selfe and purposed to put to question for to be decided by this judicious companie, a matter which yesterday I discoursed of before you; me thought that I heard politicke vertue in a true vision in deed (and not in the vaine illusion of a dreame) thus to say unto me:

The golden base and ground that now belongs Unto our worke, is laid with sacred songs.

I have already laid the foundation of a discourse, perswading and exhorting to the management of State affaires, if now we can proceed to build upon it the doctrine fit for such an exhortation, which is a due debt unto Astium: for meet it is and requisite, that after a man hath received an admonition inciting him to deale in politicke matters of common-weale, there should consequently be given unto him and founded in his eares the precepts of policie; the which he observing and following, may (as much as lieth in man to performe) be profitable to the common-weale; and withall, in the meane time manage his owne private businesse, both in safetie, and also with such honour as is just and meet for him.

First and forme therefore, we are to consider and discourse of one point; which as it is a very materiaall precedent unto all that shall be said, so it dependeth, and is necessarily to be inferred of that which hath bene delivered already; namely, What maner of policie and government is best: for as there be many sort of lives in particular men; so there are of people in general:

nerall: and the life of a people or commonaltie, is the politicke state and government thereof. Necessarie it is therefore, that we declare which is simply the best; that a man of State may chuse it from among the rest: or at leastwise, if that be impossible, take that which most resembleth the best. Now there is one signification of this word Politia, that is to say, Policie, which is as much as Burgesie, that is to say, the indument and enjoying of the right and priviledges of a citie: as for example, when we say that the Megarians (by a publicke ordinance of their citie) gave unto Alexander the great, their Politia, that is to say, their Burgesie: and when he seemed to laugh at this offer and grant of theirs, they made him answer againe: That they had never decreed this honour to any, but first to Hercules, and now to himselfe: which speech of theirs he so admired, that he accepted of their gift, reputed it honourable, because it was so rare. Also the life of a politicke person who administred State affaires, is called Policie: according to which sense and acceptation of the word, wee commend the policie of Pericles and Bias, that is to say, their manner of government, but contrariwise, we discommend that of Hyperbolus and Cleon. Moreover, others there be, who call some one worthy act or memorable deed tending to the good of the common weale, by the name of Policie: as for example, the contribution of money, the final ending and dissolution of warre, and the publishing or declaration of some notable decree: in which signification we use commonly to say: Such a man hath this day bene the author of a good policie, if haply he have done and effected some worthy things, importing the weale-publicke. Over and above all these significations before specified, there is another; namely, the order and state of a citie and common-wealth, by which are managed and administered all the affaires thereof: and according to this sense we say, there be three sorts of policies, Monarchie, that is to say, Roialtie; Oligarchie, that is to say, Seignory; and Democratie, that is to say, Popular authoritie: of which three Herodotus maketh mention in the third booke of his historie, comparing them together; and it seemeth that these be the most generall, for all others be (as it were) the depravations and corruptions of these, according to want or excess, like as it falleth out in accords and consonances of musick, when the first and principall sitings or notes are stretched over high, or let downe to low: and so hee divided these three governments among those nations which had the largest empire and greatest dominion: for the Persians held the Monarchie and absolute roialtie, for that their king had plenary power in all things, not subject to be called unto account by any person whatsoever. The Spartians or Lacedaemonians, maintained a grave and severe counsell, consisting of some few, and those the best and principall personages of the city, who managed and dispatched all affaires. The Athenians embraced a popular government, living under their owne lawes, free, and without all mixture whatsoever. Now of these States and governments, when they be faulty and out of order, the transgressions, exorbitations and excesses, be called tyrannies, lordly oppressions of the mightier, and unbridled rule, or licentious misrule rather of the multitude: to wit, when the prince in his absolute roialtie taketh upon him insolent pride, to commit wrong and outrage unto whom he list: when some fewe senators or rulers in their seignorie enter into an arrogant and presumptuous lordlinesse, whereby they contemne and oppress all others: also when the multitude in their popular isonomie, runne into anarchie, unrulinesse, disobedience, teames of equalitie, and unmeasurable libertie: and in one word, when all these sorts of government fall to rash and witlesse folly: like as therefore a skilfull and harmonick musician can make use of all kinds of instruments, framing and accommodating himselfe by art and cunning unto every one, striking each one according as he knoweth the quality and nature thereof, to give the sweetest and most pleasant found: howbeit, if he follow the counsell of Plato, will passe by the fiddles, rebeckes, dulcimers, the many stringed psalteries or virginals, the vials likewise & the triangled harpes, preferring before all others the lute and the citheron or bandora: even so a good politician, will handle with dexteritie the Laconicke seignorie, and manage well enough Lycurgus his Oligarchie, applying and fitting his companions in government, who have equall authoritie unto himselfe, gently drawing and reducing them by little and little unto the bent of his bow: sensibly, he will carie himselfe with wisdom and discretion in the popular State, as if he had to deale with an instrument of many sounds, and as many strings, letting downe and remitting some matters, setting up and extending other things in the government, as he seeth his time, giving ease and liberty, and againe, carying a hard hand and a rigorous, as one who knoweth when to resist and withstand stoutly any proceedings: But if he were put to his choise, among these musickall instruments as it were of a politicke government; certes if he be ruled by Plato, he would never chuse any other but that regall and princely Monarchie, which onely is able to mainteine that direct, absolute and * loftie note (indeed) of vertue, and not suffer it either by force of necessitie, or upon affectionate favour and grace, to frame it selfe to gaine and profit; for other governments after a sort as they be ruled by a politician, so they rule him, and as he leadeth them, so they cary him, for that he hath no assured power over those, from whom he hath his authority, but oftentimes he is enforced to exclaim and refound these verses of Aeschylus the poet, which Demetrius Poliorcetes was wont to alledge unto fortune, after that he had lost his kingdom:

Thou mad'st me budde and burgen fresh at first, but now at last, Thou seem'st my lovely bloume to burne, and beauty for to blast.

A BREVIARIE OF THE COMPARISON BE- TWEENE ARISTOPHANES AND MENANDER.

The Summarie.

HE preferreth Menander an excellent comical poet, in all respects before Aristophanes, who is here described and painted in his colours. Then examineth he in particular what he had said before in generality. He considereth the stile, disposition, uniformity, and artificiall contriving of Menanders comedies, shewing that Aristophanes in comparison of him was no better than a counterfett cosier, a craftie and prating companion, ignorant, audacious and intollerable unto all: having written his comedies not to be read of any honest men, but onely for lewd and dissolute persons.

A BREVIARIE OF THE COM- parison betweene Aristophanes and Menander.

TO speake in generall and summarily, he preferreth Menander by many degrees before Aristophanes; but to come unto particularities, see what he addeth moreover: The stile of Aristophanes, and his manner of language is unfavorie and unpleasant, counterfeite, base and mechanically, whereas in Menander there is no such thing to be seene. And verily a grosse, ignorant, and unlettered idiot may take pleasure and be delighted in Aristophanes his speeches; but a learned man will soone bee displeased and discontented therewith. I meane, his Amisthera or oppositie rearmes; his clauses ending alike, and his allusions to names, which Menander useth but now and then to good purpose, and with great reason and judgement, being therein verie sparie, warie, and religious: whereas the other ever and anon abuseth them hand over head, and out of season without all grace or life to commend them. Praised he is (forsooth) for these cold jests; namely, when he saith: That he had drenched over head and eares the treasurers, who were not so wise, but laudes. Also, This fellow doth breath out, either malice or slanderous calumnie. Again, Here is one that liveth for his belly, his entrails and his guts. Likewise, Even for verie laughter, I shall breake out a laughing. Moreover, What shall I do to thee thou unhappy damned picher, and and banished: semblaby, You women, here I shall make you wild and savage evils, like as I am my selfe, who have beene fed among wild and savage worts: but these curled tresses and frilled hairens surely have devoured my crest: lastly,

Come bring him hither his target round, with Gorgons hideous head:

But give me here my cake as round, as face, buckler in his stead.

besides many other bald jests of the like sort: for there is in the composition and texture of his words, that which is tragical and comical both: proude and insolent; base also and lowly; to darke and myttical, and anon plaine and familiar; swelled, puffed up and loftie; but afterwards, vannie, lightnes, and lothsome scurrilitie, enough to overturne a mans stomacke. Now there being in his writings such diversitie, difference, and dissimilitude; yet giveth not he to every person that which is proper and becomming. As for example, he attributeth not unto a king, a high and loftie language; to an oratour, eloquent and pithie speech; to a woman, a plaine and simple tongue; to an ignorant and unlettered commoner, base and lowly words; to a busie bariter or pragmaticall merchant, shrewd and odious rearmes; but he alloteth unto everie person at a venture whatsoever attributes come first to hand; so that a man cannot know nor discern by any speech, whether he be a sonne or a father that speaketh; a countrey peasant or a citizen; a god or an old woman, or some demi-god: whereas the stile and phrase of Menander is so uniforme; so consonant and like it selfe, that howsoever it be conversant in sundrie maners and divers passions, howsoever it be accomodate to all sorts of persons, yet it seemeth still one and the same, and to keepe the semblance in common and familiar words, and such as are alwayes in use. And if perhaps otherwhiles according to the matter and present occasion offered, there bee required some extraordinarie narration or strange bruit and unexpected noise; he setteth a worke and openeth (as it were) all the holes of his pipe; but presently and with a seemely grace he reducth and composeth his voice to the naturall state againe. Now albeit there be in all arts & mysteries excellent artificians; yet was there never known any shoemaker to make a shooe; nor artificer a make or visour; nor tailor a robe or garment; but would fit at one time a man and woman both; a young youth, an aged person, and a valet; but Menander hath so framed his phrase and speech, so that proportionate it is and futable to all natures & sexes, to each state and condition, yea and to every age, and this was he able to performe and doe in his very youth, when he began to write: for then died he when he entred into his floure and best time, either of composing or setting out and publishing his works, at such an age, when as the stile (as Aristotle saith) is come to the very growth and height in them who make profession to pen or write ought. And if a man would consider the first comedies of Menanders making, and conferre them with those in the middes, and which he made in his latter end, a man thereby may soone know how much hee would have added to these in other, if he had lived longer: for that of them who put forth their works to be seene and read, some write to the capacity of the multitude and vulgar sort, others for men of marke and understanding; and hardly is a man able to name the author, who can skill how to observe that which is meet and besitting two kinds of people. As for Aristophanes he is neither pleasing unto the common sort, nor acceptable to men of worth and judgement; but his poeie may be likened unto an old stale and overworne whoore, who forsooth would counterfett an honest married wife; for as the people cannot endure his arrogance; so men of account and quality, detest his intemperance and maliciousnesse: whereas Menander on the contrary side, with a good and seemely grace, satisfieth and contenteth all, serving as a lecture, a knowledge and exercise common to theaters, schooles, sports, pastimes, feasts, and bankets, shewing thereby, that his poeie is one of the goodliest things that ever Greece brought forth; making it to appeere what a gay matter, and how puissant is the dexteritie of speech and language, passing throughout, with an attractive grace, which it is impossible to escape, ravishing and winning everie mans eare and understanding, who hath the knowledge of the Greeke tongue. For wherfore should a learned man take paines to go unto the theater, but for Menanders sake? when are the theaters frequented and full of great clearks, but when there is a masked shew before of acting his comedies? And at banquets, for whom doth the table make room or Bacchus give place more justly than for Menander? And as for philosophers, great scholars and students, like as painters when they have wearied their eies with looking upon fresh, lively & bright colours, turne them to those that are verdant and Greene; as namely, upon herbes and flowers for to recreat and refresh their sight; even so Menander is he who intertaineth their minds and an armie and went against them, under the leading of Phedrus, who at that time was the chiefe ruler of Thebes, and laid siege unto the said towne; which being otherwise strongly fortified, was in the end forced for want of water: where they stoned to death the murderers; brought the inhabitants unto bondage and slavery; rased their wallles; overthrew their dwelling houles; and devided their whole territorie among the Thebanes and Coronæans. The report groweth, that over-night before that this towne of Hippocrene was wonne, there was a voice heard from the mount Helicon of one estoones iterating these words: Here I am, Here I am; which voice the thirty wooers knew all verie well to be the speech of Phocæus. Also the same day that they were stoned, it is said that the monument or tombe of this old man, which stood at Gleissas, flowed and ran with saffron. Thus when Phedrus the captaine and ruler of the Thebanes, returned from warre with 10 victorie, newes came unto him that his wife was delivered of a daughter; which he taking to be a good presage, named her thereupon Neosfrata.

5 Alcippus, a Lacedæmonian borne, espoused a ladie named Democrita; by whom hee was the father of two daughters, who alwaies both giving counsell unto the citie for the best things, and also ready in person to serve, & execute the same in al occurrences presented, for the good of his country, incurred the envie and emulation of his concurrents in the government of the State, who with false surmises and slanderous imputations, went about to seduce the Ephori, buzzing into their heads, how this Alcippus would overthrow the lawes, and change the whole State and common-wealth of Sparta: inso much as they banished him out of his country, and would not suffer his wife with her daughters to follow him: and that which woore is, 20 they did confiscate his goods, to the end that his daughters might have no portions to bestow them for their advancement in marriage. And notwithstanding that divers yoong men in regard of their fathers vertue, made meanes for to marie these maidens without any dowry, yet his adversaries wrought so cunningly, that they passed an act and publicke edict, forbidding exprelly, that any man should seeke unto them for marriage: for they alledged and pretended that their mother Democrita had often times made her praiers unto the gods, that her daughters might quickly bring forth children who might be revenged for the iniurie done unto their father. Democrita then perceiving how on every side she was hardly belted & driven to a straight, 30 observed her time, and waited a certaine solemne and festivall day, which the dames of the citie, with their daughters virgins, with their maid-servants likewise and little children, did celebrate: 30 on which day, the wives of magistrates and men of honour, watched and passed the whole night by themselves in a great and spacious hall. When this day was come, she girded herselfe with a dagger or skeine under her clothes, and taking her daughters with her, when night came, went into the temple; and observing the opportunitie of the time when all the said dames were busie in their divine service and hard at their devotions in the hall above said, when all the waies and passages were shut up, she brought a great deale of wood which was provided for the sacrifice, and piled the same against the doores, and so fet it on fire. But when their husbands came running for to helpe from all parts, Democrita killed her two daughters and herselfe up- 40 on them. The Lacedæmonians not knowing upon whom to discharge their anger, caused the dead bodies of Democrita and her two daughters to be thrown without the confines and liberties of their territorie: for which act of theirs, God being highly displeased, sent (as the Chronicles do record) a great earthquake among the Lacedæmonians.

WHETHER CREATURES BE MORE WISE, THEY OF THE LAND, OR THOSE OF THE WATER.

The Summarie.

IN this treatise and discourse, affording (among other things) much pleasure in the reading, Plutarch bringeth in two yoong gentlemen, Aristotimus and Phœdinus, who in the presence of a frequent companie plead the cause of living creatures: Aristotimus in the first place, for them of the land; and Phœdinus in the second, for those 10 of the water: the drift and conclusion of whose pleas cometh to this point, that without respecting unto whom the prize ought to be adjudged, one of the companie inferreth that the examples alledged both of the one side and of the other, do prove that those creatures have some use of reason. Moreover, we may distinctly divide this booke into three principall parts: the first containeth a conference betweene Soclarus and Autobulus, who gave ear afterwards unto the others: for Soclarus taking occasion to speake of a written discourse recited in the praise of hunting, commendeth this exercise, and preferreth it before combats of sword plaiers and sencers; which Autobulus will in no wise approve, but holdeth that this warre against beasts, schooleth (as it were) and traineth men to 20 learne for to kill one another afterwards. And for that some entrance and acceſſe there was to be given unto the principall disputation of the intelligence and knowledge which is in brute beasts, they doe examine the opinion of the Stoicks, who bereserve them of all understanding, passion and pleasure: which opinion of theirs being at large debated, is afterwards refuted; with this resolution that man out-goeih beasts in all subtiltie and quicknesse of wit, in justice and equitie meet for civill societie: and yet beasts, although they be more dull and heavier than men, are not therefore void of all discourse and naturall reason. Then Autobulus confirmeth this by the consideration of horses and dogges enraged: a sufficient testimonie that such creatures before time had reason and understanding. Soclarus opposeth himselfe against such a confirmation, in the behalfe of the Stoicks and Peripateticks: whereupon Autobulus distinguisheth of the arguments, and inclining partly to the side of the Pythagoreans, sheweth what manner of justice or injustice we ought to consider in the carriage of men toward beasts. And then come the two yoong gentlemen above named in place; where Aristotimus taking in hand the cause of 40 land-beasts, discourses at large thereupon, which is the second part of this present treatise. True it is, that all the beginning of his plea is defective and wanting: howbeit, that which remaineth and is extant, sheweth sufficiently the careful industry of our author in searching into the history of nature, and examples drawn out thereof, as also out of an infinit number of booke, to passing good purpose. Well then, Aristotimus sheweth in the first place, that the hunting of land-beasts, is a far nobler and more commendable exercise than that of the water: and coming then to the point; namely, to the use of reason, which consisteth in the election and preference of one thing before another, in provisions, forecasts and prerogatives in affections, as well those which be mild and gentle, as the other which are violent: in diligence and industry in arts and sciences, in hardihood, equitie, temperance, courage and magnanimitie, he proveth all this to be (without comparison) farre more in land-creatures than in other: 50 for the prooffe and verifying whereof, he produceth bulles, elephants, lions, mice, swallows, spiders, ravens, dogs, bees, geese, cranes, herons, pismires, wolves, foxes, mules, partridges, hares, beares, urchins, and divers sorts besides of fowle footed beasts: of fowles likewise, insects, worms and serpents: all which are specified in particular afterwards. In the last part, Phœdinus making some excuse that he was not well prepared, taketh in hand nevertheless, the cause of fishes; and in the very entrance, declareth, that notwithstanding it be an hard matter to shew the sufficiency of such creatures, which are so divided and severed from us; yet notwithstanding, produce he will his prooffs and arguments drawn from certaine and notable things, recommending fishes in thurselves, that they are so wise

and considerate (as he sheweth by examples) being not taught nor monished unto any waies framed and trained by man, like as most part of land beasts be; and yet by the way he prooveth by eeles, lampreys, and crocodiles, that fishes may be made tame with men, and how our ancients esteemed highly the institution of such mute creatures: after this he describeth their naturall prudence, both in defending themselves and also in offending and assailing others, alleading infinite examples to this purpose: as the skill and knowledge they have in the Mathematicks, their amity, their fellowship, their love, their kinde affection to their young ones: alleading in the end drivers histories of dolphins love unto men: whereupon Soclarus taking occasion to speake, inferreth that these two pleaders agree in one point, and if a man would joine and lay together their arguments, proofes, and reasons, they would make head passing well and strongly against those, who would take from beasts both of land and water, all discourse of reason.

WHETHER CREATURES BE more wise; they of the land, or they of the water.

AUTOBULUS.

Eonidas, a king of Lacedemon, being demanded upon a time what he thought of Tyrtam: I take him to bee (quoth he) a good poet, to whet and polish the courages of young men; for that by his verses he doth imprint in the hearts of young gentlemen an ardent affection, with a magnanimous desire to winne honour and glorie, in regard whereof, they will not spare themselves in batels and fights, but expose their lives to all perils whatsoever: Semblably, am I greatly afraid my very good friends, lest the discourse as touching the praise of hunting, which was read yesterday in this company, hath so stirred up and excited beyond all measure our young men, who love that game so well, that from henceforth they will thinke all other things but accessories and by-matters, or rather make no account at all of other exercises, but will runne altogether unto this sport, and minde none other besides, considering that I finde my selfe now a fresh more hotly given, and youthfully affectionate thereunto than mine age would require, inso much as according to the words of dame Phadra in Euripides:

*All my desire is now to call
And cry unto my hounds in chase,
The dapple stagge and hinde withall,
To hunt and follow hard at trace.*

So neere unto the quicked did that discourse touch me, alleaging such a number of proper and pitthy reasons.

SOCLARUS.

True it is that you say Autobulus, for me thought that therein he stirred up and awakened his singular eloquence and skill in Rhetoricke, which some time he had discontinued & which lay asleepe, to gratifie (as I take it) those young gentlemen who were present in place, and withall to solace and disport himselfe among them, but that which pleased me most was this: When hee represented unto our eyes by way of comparifon, sword-fencers fighting at sharpe one with another to the utterance, alleading this for one of his reasons, wherefore he principally commending hunting, in that it diverteth and calleth away a certaine affection that we have either naturally engrafted, or else acquired by use and custome to take pleasure in seeing men at sword point enter into combat for life & death one against another, & turneth it especially hither, yielding unto us a faire pure and innocent spectacle of artificial cunning, conjoined with hardinesse and courage, guided with reason, against brutish force and witlesse strength: and in so doing giveth us to understand that this sentence of Euripides is worthy to be praised when he saith:

*Small is mans strength and puissance corporall;
His wit is great and prudence naturall;
It tames all fish beneath his safo deepe
And wily beasts aloft on earth! hat keepe.*

AUTOBULUS.

AUTOBULUS.

And yet my good friend Soclarus, some there be who hold, that this inflexible rigour and savage impassibility of not being moved at all with pity, came from hence into mens hearts, namely, from the custome of killing of beasts in chase, and of learning not to have in honour the sight of bloudshed, and of the grievous wounds of beasts which they received, but to take delight in seeing them to die, and to be cut in pieces: and like as in the citie of Athen, when it was reduced under the tyrannie of the thirtie usurpers, the first man whom they put to death was a lycophant, of whom it was said then, that hee had well deserved it, and was rightly served; and so they said by a second and a third: but from thence they went forward by little and little, untill they came to lay hold upon honest men, and in the end spared not the best and most vertuous citizens: even so he that killed at the first a beare, or a wolfe, was highly commended, and thought to have done a very good deed; and an oxe or a swine that had eaten some things provided for a sacrifice or oblation to the gods, was condemned as fit and worthy to die: heereupon staggies and hinds, hares also and goates, which men began already to eat, invited also the flesh of theeepe, yea, and in some places of dogges and horses to the table. But they who taught first to dismember, and cut in pieces for meat, a tame goose, a house dove, and familiar pigeon, a dung-hill cocke, or domesticall henne of the rount, and that not for to satistie and remedie the necessitie of hunger, as doe these wezzils and cattes, and but onely for pleasure, and to feed a daintie tooth, surely have confirmed and strengthened all that bloudiness and savage cruelty which was in our nature, and made it altogether inflexible and immoveable without any compassion: but contrariwise enfeebled and dulled for the most part all naturall mildnesse and humanitie; whereas on the other side the Pythagoreans would have men to accustom themselves to use gentlenesse even towards beasts, as an exercise of pity and mercy to men: for custome which traineth us familiarly by little and little to any passion and affection, hath a wonderous efficacie, to set a man forward thereunto. But I wot not how, being entred into speech, we have forgotten our selves, and not kept us to that which was begun yesterday, and should be continued and held on this day: for yesterday as you know very well, having agreed upon this: That all sorts of living creatures have in them some little discourse and reason, we gave good occasion and matter of a learned and pleasant disputation, unto our young gentlemen, who love hunting so well, namely, as touching the wit and wisdom of beasts, whether there be more in them of the land, or those of the sea? which question we are as I take it, this day to decide, in case Aristotimus and Phadimus hold on still, and persist in their defiances and challenges, which yesterday they gave one another; for the one of them undertooke unto his friends and companions, to maintaine that the earth bringeth forth beasts of more sense, capacitie and understanding; and the other contrariwise promised as much in the behalfe of the water.

SOCLARUS.

That they do, Autobulus, they are of the same mind still to dispute it out, and here they will be anon for this very purpose; for I saw them in the morning betimes, addresseing & making themselves readie: but if you thinke it good, before this combat begin, let us go in hand againe with that which yesterday should have been handled, and was not; partly for that the time and place served not thereto; or rather because the matter was proposed unto them at the table, and among the cups of wine, which went merrily about, and not treated of in good earnest and sadnesse in deed: for one there was, who seemed after a pragmaticall sort to relound on the adverse part not impertinently, as if he came out of the Stoicks schoole, thus much: That like as mortal is opposite unto immortal, corruptible unto incorruptible, and corporall to incorporall; even so, confess we ought, that reasonable is contrarie to unreasonable; so that if one of them be, the other ought likewise of necessitie to be, and that this onely couple of contraries among so many other, ought not to be left defectuous or imperfect.

AUTOBULUS.

And what is he, friend Soclarus, who will say, that if we admit in nature, that which is reasonable to subsist and have being; we should not likewise allow that which is unreasonable: for (no doubt) it is, and that in great measure, namely in all creatures which have no life nor soule: neither need we to seeke farther for any other opposition unto that which is reasonable; for whatsoever is without life and soule, is incontinently opposite unto that which together with soule, hath the use of understanding and reason: and if any one there be who maintaineth, that nature for all this is not unperfect, in that everie substance having soule is either reasonable or unreasonable: another will say unto him likewise, that a nature endued with life and soule, is not defective, namely in that, either it hath imagination, or else it without; it is either sensitive, or else hath no sense; to the end that it may have on either side these two oppositions or privations, making counterpoise one against another, about one and the same kind, as two contrarie branches arising out of one stemme or trunk. And if he thinke him to be absurd, who demaundeth that it should be granted unto him, that of a nature endued with soule, one branch should be sensitive, and another senseless; for that he thinketh that everie nature which hath a soule is incontinently both sensitive, and also imaginative: yet for all this shall he have no more appearance to require that one should suppose this unto him for to be true; namely, that whatsoever hath soule, should be either reasonable or unreasonable, discoursing with those men, who held to opinion that nothing hath sense, but the same hath understanding withall; and that there is not one kind of animal creatures, but it hath some manner of opinion and discourse of reason, like as it hath sense and naturall appetite: for nature, who as men say, and that right truly, maketh all things for some cause and to some end, hath not made a living creature sensitive, onely and simply to have a passive sense: but whereas there be a number of things proper and agreeable to it, and as many againe for the contrarie, it could not possibly endure and continue the minute of an hour, if it knew not how to fit it selfe with one, and to take heed and beware of the other. So it is therefore, that sense giveth unto every animal creature the knowledge of them both indifferently: but the discretion which accompanieth the said sense, in chusing, receiving, and pursuing after that which is profitable; or refusing, rejecting and flying from that which is hurtfull and pernicious: there is no appearance at all of reason to induce us to say that those creatures have, if they had not withall some meane facultie and aptitude naturall, to discourse, judge, conceive, comprehend, retaine, and remember: as for those creatures verily, from which you take altogether the gift of expectation, remembrance, election, provision, and preparation afore hand: and moreover, the facultie of hoping, fearing, desiring and refusing; good have they none at all of their eies, or of any other sense, apprehension or imagination, in case there be no use thereof: and farre better it were for them, that they were cleane destitute and quite deprived of such faculties, than to suffer travell, paine and sorrow, and have not wherewith to purby and repell such inconveniences: and yet there is a discourse extant of the naturall philosopher Strato, shewing by plaine demonstration, that impossible it is to have any sense at all, without some discourse of reason: for many times we runne over the letters in bookes and writings with our eies; yea and we heare the sound of words with our eares, without conceiving and comprehending either the one or the other, but they fly and passe away, when as our mind is otherwise occupied: but afterwards when the mind is come againe to it selfe and united it, it runneth and pursueth after the same, and gathereth every thing together againe which was scattered: In regard whereof it was not said amisse in old time:

*The mind it is, that doth both heare and see:
As for the rest, full deafe and blind they bee.*

as if the motion and passion about the eies and eares, caused no sense at all, if the mind and understanding were away. And therefore Cleomenes king of Lacedemon, being one day at a feast in Egypt, where there was rehearsed at the table a pretie Acroame or eare-delight, which pleased the companie verie well; being demaunded the question what hee thought of it? and whether hee judged it not verie well penned and set downe? As for that (quoth he) I report me unto you that heard it, and I referre it to your judgement: for mine part, my mind was all the while in Peloponnesus. And therefore necessarie it is, that everie creature which hath sense, should likewise be endued with discourse of reason and understanding, considering that by our understanding wee come to sense. But set the case that the senses have no need at all of the understanding, to exercise their functions & operations: but when the sense hath done her part, in discerning that which is proper and familiar unto a living creature, from it that is contrarie & adverse unto it, it passeth away and is gone: What is it then that remembereth and calleth to minde? what is it that seareth things noisome and offensive, and contrariwise desireth those which be good and holosome? what is it that seeketh meanes to compassse and get things when they are not present? what is it that deviseth and prepareth offensive, torts and retracts, yea, and engins to catch and take; or contrariwise, shifts and policies to escape nets and grinnas laied for them when they are at the point to be caught and surprisid? and yet these men say as much as this comes to, when ever and anon in all their introductions they dull our eares and make our heads ake againe with their definitions; for they define meditations, that is to say, a project or deliberat purpose, to be a desieigne of

of bringing somewhat to effect; meditatio, that is to say, endeavour, to be an appetite or desire before an appetite; meditatio, that is to say, provision, to be an action before action; meditatio, that is to say, remembrance or memorie, to be the comprehension of a proposition affirmative or negative, already past; whereof the present truth was otherwise comprised by the sense: for of all these faculties, there is not so much as one reasonlesse (I meane) not proceeding from the discourse of reason: and yet they all concur, and are to be found in every living creature: and even so verily, they define visions, that is to say, intelligences, to be notions laied up apart and reserved within; but visions, that is to say, cogitations, to be notions still in motion: as for passions, they confesse and defining them all in generality to be evil judgements & false opinions, 10 a wonder it is, how they passe over so many effects and motions which are to be found in brute beasts; some proceeding from anger and choler, others againe from feare: and besides all this, envie (I may tell you) and jealousie; when as they themselves (beleeve me) sticke not to punish their horses, and beat their dogs, when they do a fault; not rashly and in vaine, but consideratly, for to correct them and make them wiser, working thereby & imprinting in them a displeasure with themselves proceeding from paine, which we call repentance: as touching other pleasures and delights, that which passeth and is received by the eares, they terme it (forsooth) visions, that is to say, an enchantment; that which cometh by the eie, visions, that is to say, bewitching: and they use both the one and the other against wilde beasts; for certein it is, that staggas and horses do joy in the sound of whistles, flutes and hautboies: also men call forth crabfish, crevilles and grampels out of their holes perforce, with burning torches and light fire brands: more- 20 over, it is said, that the fish alosa hearing men to sing, to clap their hands, or otherwise to make a noise, will arise out of the water, and come abroad: likewise, the home owle or bustard is (as it were) enchanted with the beholding of men dancing together in his sight, and so far overtaken he is with the delight thereof, that whiles he thinketh to counterfeite their jestures, stirring and moving his shoulders according to the measures with them, he suffereth himselfe (like a toole) to be taken by the fowler. As for those who of these matters speake so foolishly and absurdly, saying, that beasts rejoice not, are not angry, nor fearfull; and namely, that the * nightingale doth not studie, meditate and prepare against her singing; that the bee hath no memorie; but that the swallow seemeth onely to make provision by a kinde of providence; that the lion is (as 30 it were) angry; and the hinde given as though she were afraid: I wot not what answer they will make to those who shall urge them to this, that they may awell say, that the same creatures neither see nor heare, but seeme onely (as it were) to heare and see and to have a voice; and in one word, that they live not at all, but seeme to live: for I assure you (in my judgement) these are no more repugnant to evidence and daily experience, than the other.

SOCLARUS.

I thinke no lesse (6 Autobulus) and therefore range me among those of your opinion in this point. But to compare the maners, lives, actions, behaviours and conversations of men, with those of beasts, & to affirme that beasts herein fort with us: besides, that I see in this, great indignitie derogatorie to mans worthinesse, I doubt much, and can not conceive how nature hath 40 given unto them the beginning of vertue, which is reason, and unto which reason is referred and doth aime, considering they can not attaine unto the end: and besides, there is not one of them all that sheweth any signe of tending thereto, of progresse therein, or of desire and appetite that way.

AUTOBULUS.

Yea, but this (my good friend Soclarus) is no strange and absurd thing with these men, I meane the Stoicks: for notwithstanding that they put downe the naturall love and affection which we have to the issue of our owne bodies begotten, for the foundation of civill societie and of justice, and see the same in brute beasts very evident and puissant, yet for all that, they flatly and stoutly denie that they have any part of justice in them. And that which more is, mules are 50 not without all the instruments of generation; for nature hath given to the males generative members, and to the females the parts fit for conception; yea, and in the use of these members and instruments they have the same delight and pleasure which other creatures have; howbeit, they never speed, nor attaine to the end of generation. Consider againe on the other side, whether it were not a ridiculous absurditie for such philosophers as they would seeme to be, to affirme and mainteine, that Socrates and Plato, and such men as they, were no lesse vicious than any vile slave or wicked wretch in the world, but that all were foolish, wideffe, lascivious and unjust alike (because forsooth, all sinnes with them be equal) and then to lay the blame and fault in the source and beginning of vertue, that is to say, Reason, as being not pure nor perfect in brute beasts to the accomplishment of vertue: as if this were not some defect and imbecillitie of reason, seeing they confesse themselves that there is an imperfection in the use of reason, of which all beasts be full: for we see in many of them, that there is cowardise, intemperance, injustice and malice. Now he who affirmeth that whatsoever is not apt and fitted by nature, to receive reason aright and in absolute manner, is simply not capable of reason: first he doth as much as if he mainteined, that neither the ape is capable of illfavoured deformitie, nor the tortoise of slow pace, because the one of them is not susceptible of beautifull favour, nor the other of swiftnesse and good footmanship. Again, he doth not see and marke the difference between reason perfect, and simple reason; for reason simply proceedeth from nature, but honest, virtuous, and perfect reason commeth by industry, study, diligence, and teaching; which is the cause that all creatures endued with a sensitive soule, are capable and susceptible of a kinde of discipline and learning by the meanes of this facultie of discourse and reason: many this absolute and right reason indeed which we affect and seeke for, and is nothing else but sapience and wisdom, they are not able to name any one man, that ever attained unto it. Like as therefore a difference there is betweene sight and sight; betweene flight and flight; for hawks see otherwise than grasshoppers doe; eagles also and partridges flie not alike; even so all creatures endued with reason, have not the like vivacity, promptitude and nimblenesse of reason, as to reach up to the highest pitch and perfection thereof: for we may observe in some beasts many evident tokens of just societie, of valour, of witty industry in their provision and dispose: and contrariwise, in others as many signes of insociable violence and injustice, of cowardise and sottishnesse, as witnesseth that which now mooveth the contention and debate betweene our young gentlemen; for as if they both supposed there was a difference in this behalfe, some of them mainteine that naturally, the beasts of the land are proceeded farther in vertue; and others contrariwise affirme, the same of those in the sea and waters: a thing very evident, whosoever will compare storkes with the river horses; for those doe nourish and feede their fathers who engendred them, whereas these doe kill them, because they might ride and cover their mothers: as also who will but conferre cocke-doves with partridges; for doves doe oftentimes squash and marre the egges, yea, and otherwhiles kill the hennes when they cover or sit, because they are not willing during that time to be troden; whereas the male partridges take upon them part of the care and paine in sitting upon the egges, and in their turne doe keepe them warme, that they chill not; yea, and that which more is, they be the first that bring meat in their bills unto the little ones newly hatched; and if haply the damme raunge abroad, tarie forth too long out of the nest, the male beats and pecks her with his bill, drives her home to her egges and young birds. As for Antipater who reprocheth and rebuketh both asses and sheepe for their filthinesse, and being so negligent in keeping themselves cleane, he hath forgotten (I wot not how) to speake of ounces and swallows: for the ounces seeke a by-place by themselves apart, where to bestow their urine, and by all meanes hide and conceale that fine stony substance, called Lyncurium, which is engendred of it: and the swallows teach their young ones to turne their tails so, as they may meut out of their nests. Moreover, why say we not that one tree is more ignorant or untaught than another, like as we hold, and that truly, that a sheepe is more dull of capacitie than a dogge? or that this herbe is more fearefull than that lion, like as we affirme very well, that a stagge is more timorous, or rather lesse valourous than a lion: and as in things which are unmooveable, we never say, that one is more flow than another; not among such things as yeeld no sound at all, that this hath a smaller or bigger voice than that; Semblably, it is never said, that there is lesse witte, more dulnesse, and greater intemperance in such or such things, unlesse it bein that kinde, whereof all by nature are endued with the gift of reason, and of prudence in some measure, which puissance and facultie being given to some more, and to others lesse, is that which maketh all the difference that we see. Yea mary, but there is no comparifon will some man say, betweene men and beasts; so infinitely surpasseth he them in finenesse of witte, in justice and equity, befeeming civill societie, that it is wonderfull: And even so, (my good friend) there be many which in biggenesse and strength of bodie, in swiftnesse of feet, in quicknesse of eie-sight, and subtilty, of hearing out-goe all the men in the world, and leave them farre behinde, and yet for all this, we are not to inferre and conclude that man is blinde, that he is impotent of hand and foot, or otherwise deafe: neither hath nature deprived us altogether of bigge armes and bodies, or of strength both in the one and the other, although in comparifon of the elephant and the camell, our force and bulke of body dy is nothing: after the same maner may we speake of beasts; if their discourse and understanding be more grosse, if their witte be more dull than ours, it followeth not thereupon, that they have neither reason nor naturall witte: for without all question, both they have, feeble though they be and troubled, like as an eie is otherwhiles weake, dimme, and muddy: and were it not that I certainly expect, and that among our young men who are studious, learned and verie well seene in the books of our auncient writers, that they will alleadge an infinit number of examples, the one from the land, and the other out of the sea; I could not containe my felicitie but recite and alledge heere before you an innumerable sort of proofes and arguments, as well of the naturall subtilty of beasts, as of their docility, which the beautifull and famous city of Rome hath afforded unto us to draw and lade up abundantly by whole scuppets and buckets full (as they say,) from the stately theaters of their emperours, and the princely games exhibited there.

But let us leave this matter fresh and entire for those young men, thereby to embellish their discourses, and let out their eloquence: meane while I would gladly examine and consider one point with you now that we are at leisure. For I suppose that in every part & naturall power or facultie of our bodie, there doth befall some proper defect, some maiime or maladie; as namely, in the eie, blindnesse; in the legges, lamenesse; in the tongue, stutting and stammering; and that which is proper to one member, is not incident unto another: for wee use not to say, that a thing is become blinde, which never had power by nature to see, nor lame which was not ordained to goe; neither was there ever man who would say, that a thing stammered which never had tongue, or muffed and wharled, which naturally yeeldeth no voice at all: and even so we cannot (to speake properly and truly) reame that foolish, furious, or enraged, which by course of nature is not capable of understanding, discourse and reason: for impossible it is, that a part may be said to be interested, affected or prejudiced in a thing, which never had an aptitude or naturall power, that might receive diminution, privation, mutilation, or otherwise some infirmity: and yet I doubt not but you have otherwhiles seene dogges runne madde; and for mine owne part I have knowne horses enraged; and there be moreover, who affirme that kine and other beestes will be horne-wood, yea and foxes as well as dogges: but the example of dogges whereof no man makes doubt, may suffice to proove and beare witnesse, that this kinde of beast hath reason and understanding, and therefore not in final measure to bee contented but when it chanceth that it is troubled and confounded, then comes upon them that disease which is called rage and madnesse; for at such a time we cannot perceive in them, that either their sight or their hearing is altered: but like as he that should give out of a man who is overcharged with a melancholike humour, or given to rave and go beside himselfe, that his understanding is not transported and out of order, that his discourse of reason is not out of the way, nor his braines broken, or memorie corrupt, were very absurd: for that the ordinary custome and behaviour of such foolish and bestraght persons sufficiently convinceth, that they are past themselves, and have lost the discourse of reason; even so, whosoever thinketh that mad dogges suffer any other passion, than a confusion and perturbation of that part in them, which before 40 time was wont to imagine, discourse and remember, in such sort that when they be thus surprised with rage, they are so foolish and sottish, as they know not their best friends, who were wont to make much of them, but flie those places of their feeding and bringing up, which they used most to haunt & to converse in, & do not so much as disceerne; but oversee that which is presented plaine before them: this man (I say) seemeth obstinately to strive against the truth, and not to comprehend that which daily experience doth shew.

SOCRUS.

Certes, your conjecture in mine opinion is very good, and you are in the right: but the Stoicks and Peripateticks stify stand against all this, and impugne it with tooth and nail, saying: That justice cannot have any other breeding and beginning; and that impossible it is to main- 50 taine that there is any justice in the world, if it be confessed that all beasts are any waies capable of reason: for that necessarie it is, either that we do injurie in not sparing them; or in case we make no use of them for our food, that impossible it were for us to live; or else our life should remaine destitute of such things as well it may not misse and be without. In summe, that we were to live in some sort a savage and beastlike life, if wee should reject the profits and commodities which they afford. For I passe by infinit thousands and millions of the Troglodyts and Nomades, that know no other feeding, but of flesh only and nothing else: but as for us who seeme to leade a mild, civill, & more gentle life, what worke were there left for us to do upon the land; what bu-

finesse have wee at fear? what skill or art should wee exercise among the mountaines? what ornament or beautie would there be in our life, if wee were taught this once as a true lesson, that we ought to respect all beastes, and use all equitie towards them, as being reasonable creatures as we are, and made of the same mould that we be? Certes, it were verie hard to say; and therefore there is no answer to asfoile this doubt; no medicine or salve to heale this fore; no device to undo this knot, and difficulty which taketh away, either all civillitie, or else all iustice out of mans life, unless wee keep that ancient limet and lawe, whereby God having separated (according as He iudex faith) sundrie natures and distinguish'd every kind a part by it selfe:

To fishes, beasts and feathered fowles, hath graunted power and might,
One of another for to feed, because they haue no right
To doe so: he iustifie his herein to take delight.

Given (I say) he hath justice unto them for to exercise among themselves; and as for other living creatures as they cannot deal justly with us; so it is certain that we cannot use injustice to them: and looke who ever reject this conclusion and resolution, have left no other use, nor so much as a simple way whereby justice may enter and come among us.

Autovulus.

Now truly my friend, you have said this very well, and even according to the mind and hearts desire of these men: howbeit we are not to give & grant unto these philosophers (as the manner is to be about those women who have hard travell, some Oxytocium, or medicinable drogue, to cause them forth to have more speedy and easie deliverance) this device to hang upon them, that so they may with ease and without all paine, beare and bring forth iustice unto us; seeing that in the maine and most important points of all philosophie, they would not allow Epicurus to smale a thing, & so vile, as to decline one only atomic, or indivisible body never to little aside, for to make way for the farrres, for living creatures, and fortune to come into the world, and that thereby our free will might be saved: for they ought either to prove by demonstration, that which is doubtfull, or to suppose that which of it selfe is manifest; and not to take this article as touching beasts, for to establish iustice, seeing that it is neither confessed & granted unto them, nor they otherwise doe prove it: for another path-way there is to bring in iustice among men, which is nothing to slipperie, dangerous, and full of steepe downfalles, nor that which leadeth thorough the subversion and overthrow of things most evident; even that which my sonne 30 and one of your familiar friends (Soclarus) having learned of Plato, doeth shew and teach those who will not obstinately contest, but follow reason and learne: for that man is not altogether cleere and void of injustice, in using beasts, and dealing with them as he doeth. Heraclitus and Empedocles receive as an undoubted truth, complaining in many places, and reproaching nature, as if she were under necessity, and a very warre, having in her nothing that is simple, pure, sincere, and unmixt, but performing all her operations by many unjust accidents and passions; seeing they hold that even her generation proceeded from injustice, namely, by conjunction of mortall with immortal, and in that the thing which is engendered thereof, rejoiceth to dismember unnaturally, that which engendered it: but haply all this may seeme too bitter and exceeding sharpe: well there is another gentle meane, and easie remedy of this inconvenience which doth not quite bereave beasts of all use of reason, and saveth iustice in those who use them as they ought: which meane and indifferent way being in times past brought in by wise men, was afterwards rejected and wholly destroyed by a conspiracie of gourmandise and fleshly pleasure together; howsoever Pythagoras would have recovered it againe, by teaching men how they might make use and commoditie of beasts, and yet doe them no wrong nor injurie; for they who punish and put to death those wilde beasts which have no societie nor fellowship at all with man, but rather doe him much hurt and damage, commit no injustice; no more than they who make them tame and familiar, training them up to their use and employing them in services, whereunto they are by nature most fit: whom Prometheus in a tragœdie of Aeschylus, saith he bestowed upon us,

*The race of horse and asses for to breed,
With bulles encrease, which in the fields doe feed.*

To serve and drudge in stead of us,
And do our works laborious.

Neither do they any wrong, who make use of dogges to keepe their flocks of goats and sheepe: not they who milke goats and sheepe, and sheare their fleeces for the wooll, especially if they give them pasture: for it can not be said, that men can not live, or their life is utterly undone, if they have not their platters of fish, or their livers of geese, or if they cut not beefs and goats into pieces for to serve up at their feasts : or if for their idle disport in theaters, or to take their pleasure in chase and hunting, they put not some to the combat and force them to fight whether they will or no ; and kill others which have no defence of their owne , nor any means to make resistance : for he who needs will have his delights and pastimes, ought in all reason (as I thinke) to make himselfe merrie, and solace his heart with those that can play and disport together with him ; and not to do (as Bien said) like to little children, who joy in throwing stones at frogs, and make a game of it ; meane while, the poore frogges have no pleasure in this their game, for they are sure to die for it in good earnest ; even so we are not either to hunt or fish for any delight to that we have in the paine, and much lesse in the death of other creatures : no more to take a pleasure in driving or taking them away from their whelps and young ones , a pitifull sight to behold ; for they be not they that commit injustice, who use beasts, but such as misuse them unmercifully and cruelly, without any respect and commiseration.

SOCULARUS.

Stay a while, good Aristobolus, and put off this invective of yours unto another time; for now I see coming toward us neere at hand, a crew of young gentlemen, all great hunters and lovers of the game, whom it were neither an easie matter to drive off unto another day, neither is it needfull to provoke and offend them.

AUTOEULUS.

10 True it is that you say, and I like your admonition; but as for Eubiotus, I know very well, and my nephew Ariston; the two sonnes also of Dionysius a citizen of Delphos, to wit, Acides and Aristonimus, yea, and after them, Nicander the sonne of Euthydamus,

All skilfull hunters (in good faith) upon the land (as Homer saith) and therefore (no doubt) they will side every one with Aristotimus, and take his part; whereas contrariwise, the others who be Islanders, and were borne along the sea side, I meane Heracleon of Megara, and Philostatus of the isle Eubœa,

Who cunning are upon the seas,
And therein much themselves do please.

20. Loq. how they accompanie your friend Phadimus, and are ready to stand with him :

*As for Tydides there, 'tis hard to say,
To whether side he will in judgement sway.*

I meane that same Opratus, our fellow and companion in yeeres,

Who of wilde beasts on mountaines slaine,
and fishes caught in sea,

With many first fruits and essays, to testifie his prea.

Hath often duly honoured

Diana goddess bright,

40 *Who cleped is * Agrotera,* *and is * Dictynna hight.*

for lo, how he commeth directly toward us, as one who will not range himselfe to one side more than to another. How say you, Oprato, do we not conjecture well, that you meane to be an indifferent arbitratour or common umpire betwene these two yong gentlemen.

OPTATUS.

Very well guessed of you Autobulus, I purpose so indeed; for long since was that law of Solon repealed and abolished, by vertue wherof, they were punished who in a civil sedition joined not to the one side nor to the other.

Autoreulus.

50 Come hither, therefore, and sit by us, that if we have need of any testimonies, we trouble not the books of Aristotle, with dripping and turning over their leaves; for that we will referre our selves and stand to that which you shall say, as justly and truly delivered, in regard of your great knowledge and experience.

SOCULARUS.

How now my masters, you two gentlemen, are you agreed betwene your selves of the order, who shall begin first to speake?

PHAEDIMUS.

PHABIDIMUS.

Yes Soclarus, we are at a point for that now, although we were long enough debating about it, for in the end (to use the very words of Enripides)

*Lot, Fortunes childe, hath this case cried,
As one ordain'd doubt's to decide.*

and hath appointed that the land-beasts cause should be pleaded before theirs of the sea.

SOCLARUS.

Well then it is time (Aristotimus) that both you begin to speake, and we also to heare.

* * * * *

In this place a great defect and breach there is in the Greeke originall, which can not be made up and supplied without the helpe of some ancient copie, not yet extant.

* It may seeme he speaketh of certaine milt- to rem the kind of fishes, by way of opposition to some land-creatures.

The barre and the hall is for them that plead. * But these destroy the spawne within the wombe, by running upon their females when they be great and neere the time of casting the same. And one kinde there is of spotted mullets, called thereupon Perdia, which feed upon their owne

* slime and glutinous substance that proceedeth from themselves. As for the poule or polyp fish, he catcheth and gnaweth himselfe, sitting still all Winter

*In house full colde, without fire-light,
In wofull bale and wretched plight.*

so idle is he, or so blockish and senselesse, or els so gluttonous, or rather subject to all these vices together: which is the reason that Plato also in his booke of lawes, forbiddeth chisloones young men to set their minds upon fishing in the sea, or rather he detesteth it in them, as an abominable thing, if they should take a love thereto. For no exercise there is of hardinesse and valour, no proofe of wit or triall of wisdom; no imploiment of strength, swiftnesse or activitie of bodie in combats and fights with the wide mouthed sea-pikes, with congres or gultheades, like as there is in hunting upon the land, where the fierce and courageous beasts exercise the fortitude of those who encounter them, and stirring up their animositie to enter upon dangers: the wily and craftie, whet and sharpen the wits of such as set upon them, causing them to looke about and bestirre themselves every way with great circumspection: and the swift and light-footed, trie the able, nimble, and painfull bodies of those who have them in chase: in all which respects hunting is reputed an honest and commendable exercise: whereas contrariwise, fishing hath nothing in it to commend the game, and make it honourable; neither shall you ever finde my good friend, any one of the gods, desirous to be called Congroffonus, that is to say, the conger-killer; as Apollo gloried to be named Lycoglossus, that is to say, the killer of wolues: nor any of them delighted in the name of Triglobolus, that is to say, the striker of barbels: like as Diana joied in the epithit of Elaphobolos, that is to say, a shooter at stagges and hindes: and no marvell, considering that it is more laudable for a gentleman to take in chase a wilde boare, a stagge, a fallow deere, a roe bucke, yea, & it were but an hare, than to buie any of these with his money: but surely it is more for his credit & reputation to go into the fish market as a cater to exchange his coine for a tunny, a lobster, or the * Amia, than to be seene fishing for them: for the cowardise, blockishnesse, stupiditie, want of shifts and meanes in fishes, either offensive, or defensive, cause the taking of them to be dishonest, discommendable, unlovely, and illiberrall.

In summe, forasmuch as the proofes and arguments which philosophers alledge, to shew that beasts have some discourse and use of reason, are drawn from their projects, their elections in preferring one thing before another, their provisions and forecasts, their memories, their affections, their tender care of their young ones, their thankfulness to those who have done them good, their hatred & rankor against them who have done them a shrewd turne: their industry to find out things necessary for them, the evident apparence of vertues in them, to wit, of fortitude, sociable equity & communion, temperance and magnanimitie: Let us consider these maritime sea creatures, whether they have any one at all of these parts, or if there be any little shew thereof, it is so darke and obscure, that uneth or hardly it can be perceived, how diligent soever we be in searching after it; whereas in these terrene beasts, and such as the land breedeth, a man may conceive, yea and plainly see most cleere, evident, and assured examples of ech, of the qualities before said. First & formost behold I pray you the first setting out, the preparatives and

and flourisheth as it were, that bulles and boares make against their combat, how they raise and cast up the dust with their feet al about them, as also how these whet & sharpen their tusks; the elephants likewise for that one of their two teeth wherewith they root in the earth, or plucke up and cut such matter as they feed upon, is ordinarily thereby worned dull and blunt, they use it onely for these purposes, but the other they keepe and reserve alwaies sharpe pointed and keene edged, for to serve their turnes when they are to fight; the lion when he goeth in the forrell, marcheth evermore with his pawes drawn in close and turned round, hiding his cleies and nailes within, for feare lest being worned with going, their points should be dull and blunt, as also because he would give no light by his tractes to the hunters that follow in chase; for hardly and with much ado shall you trace a lion by his foot, the print of his clawes is so small that it cannot be seene, whereby they that are full upon their footing, yet misle of him, and wander a contrary way.

Yee have heard I am sure of the Ichnewnon or ratte of India, how he prepares himselfe against he should fight with the crocodile, no lesse than a legionarie souldiour armed at all pieces, in compleat harnesse, such a deale of muddle, and the same hardened and baked in maner of a crust, hath he all over his body, as it were a good curace of prooffe.

What provision and preparation the swallows or martines make against their breeding and laying time, we daily see; namely, how in building of their nests, they lay first as a ground-work underneath, good stickes, stiffe straws, and sound bents, and those they entrelace afterwards with others that be more gentle and pliable; and if they see that their nests had need of some glutinous muddle to glue and fodder all together, what doe they? many they flie floting to close to the water of some river, lake, or the sea, that lightly they dippe their wings therewith, so that they may be onely wette, and in no wise heavy and overcharged with moisture, then they role and basker themselves in the dust, by which means they close up, binde, and knit as with parget or plastre, all chinks and breaches, and whatsoever was not well compact and united together in their nests: as for the forme and figure thereof, they make them not cornered nor yecliding many sides and faces, but even and smooth as possible may be, and the same round as a ball; for surely this kinde of workmanship is most durable without, and of greatest capacity within, and such as giveth least hold unto other beasts abroad that lie in wait to destroy them.

The copwebs that spiders weave, which serve for patterns, as wel for our women to make their webbes of cloth, as for fishers to knit and worke their nets, are in many respects very admirable: first in regard of the fine threads, and the subtil weaving thereof, which are not distinct one from another, nor ranged after the order of the warpe & woofe in our artificiall webbes upon the loome, but are continued and runne all into one, in maner of thinnelme, kell, & skin, united and sodred as one would say, with I wot not what glutinous humidity mingled among, after an invissible and imperceptible maner; then the tincture and colour thereof, which maketh it seeme a farre off like unto some thicke or dusky aire, to the end that it selfe might the lesse be perceived; but principally and above all, the very governing, conduct, and managing of this fabrick & device made by her selfe, surpasseth; namely, when some flie or small creature is gotten within the compasse of this toile & entangled, to see how immediately the perceiveth it, and can skill quickly to pull in and draw the nette; no hunter & fouler in the world, be he never so cunning, more nimble, for to enclose the prey: al which because we daily see in our continuall experience presented unto our eyes, we beleve and know to be true; otherwise we would hold all to be fables: like as wee thinke that to be a tale of the crows and ravens in Barbary, who when they are very thirsty & the water settled so low where they should drinke, that they can not reach unto it, cast stones into it for to make it arise so high as they may easily meet with it. And verily upon a time, I marvelled my selfe very much when I saw a dog within a ship, while the mariners were out of the way, to cast little stones into an earthen pot, which was nothing neere full of oyle, how he should discourse and reason thus in his mind, that the lighter things, as namely oyle, must needs mount up & be driven aloft, when the weightier such as the stones were went downe to the bottome. As much may be said of the bees in Candia, and the geefe of Cilicia. As for the bees, being to double a point or capelying into the sea, which is much exposed to the winds, they ballast themselves with small grit or pretie stones, for to bee able to endure the weather, and not be carried away against their wils with the wind through their lightnes otherwise. And the geefe aforesaid being afraid of the eagles, which have their aeries upon the high rocks, at what time as they should passe over the mountaine Taurus, take every one within their bills a good big stone, thereby to stop and muzzle (as it were) their mouthes, that being by nature clamorous morous and given much to gagling, they might make no noise nor crie at all during their flight, and so in silence and safetie both, get beyond the said hill. The verie order that cranes keepe in their flying is wonderfull and memorable: for when the aire is troubled and the wind aloft, they fly not as they use to do when it is faire weather and calme, either all afront, or in manner of the halfe moone or croissant: but presently at their first setting out, they cast themselves into a triangle with the point forward, thereby to cut and pierce the wind that bloweth before and about them, to the end that their ranke thus raunged and set in order, might not possibly bee broken: afterward when they are alighted and settled upon the ground; looke whose course and charge it is to watch at night, stands up right upon one leg, & in the foot of the other claspes a stone and holds it up aloft; for the continuall streining of themselves to hold the said stone, keepeth them 10 that long they cannot sleepe: and when once they chance to let go their hold, the stone falling upon the rocke, quickly awaketh her that let it fall. So that after I had seene this, I did not greatly wonder at Heracles, if putting his bow under his arme hole, and clipping it hard with his mightie strong arme neither marvelled I much at him who first devised the meanes how to open an oyster clofe and hard shut, when I beheld once the craftie subtiltie of herons: for the heron when he hath swallowed downe an oyster, or other shell fish, all whole and fast shut, although it put him to some trouble, yet he endureth for a time and keepeth it within his craw or giser, untill he perceive that it 20 is mollified and relaxed by the naturall heat of his bodie, then casteth he it up againe by vomit, findeth it gaping and wide open, and so picketh out of it the good meat therein.

As touching the industrious provision and care of housekeeping which is in pismires, to discourse thereof in particular, and exquisitely to deliver the same were a verie hard piece of worke, if not impossible; and to passe the same over in silence, argueth supine negligence: for looke throughout the whole historie of nature, you shall not find so small a mirrour againe for to represent greater things and more beautifull, being (as it were) a most pure and cleere drop, wherein appeareth most apparently the full resemblance of entier vertue. Here may be seene lovely friendship and civill societie: here sheweth it selfe the verie image of valour and prowesse, with painfull patience and industrie: here may a man behold many feeds of continence, many sparks 30 of wisdom, and as many of righteoufnes. Cleanthes the philosopher, although he maintaineth not that beasts have any use of reason, made report nevertheless that he was present at the sight of such a spectacle and occurrent as this. There were (quoth he) a number of ants which went toward another ants hole, that was not their owne, carrying with them the corps of a dead ant: out of which hole, there came certaine other ants to meet them on the way (as it were) to parle with them, and within a while returned backe and went downe againe: after this they came forth a second, yea a third time, & retired accordingly untill in the end they brought up from beneath (as it were a ransom for the dead body) a grub or little worme; which the others received and tooke upon their shoulders, and after they had delivered in exchange the foresaid corps, departed home: moreover, it is worth the observation, although it be a thing daily seene of everie 40 man, what curtesie and civilitie they use in meeting one another, how those who be light and carie nothing, willingly give way unto such as bee charged and loaden, and suffer them to passe: likewise how they gnaw asunder and divide piece meale such burdens, as they being single, cannot beate whole, to the end that the same may be caried and transported from place to place by more in number. Aratus in his prognostickes setteth this downe for a signe of raine toward, when they bring forth their feeds and graines, and lay them abroad to take the aire:

Forth of their holes to carrie them abroad.*

And yet there be some who in this place write not eggs, that is to say, eggs, but eggs, as if they would say, their goods, to wit, the fruits or seeds which they have gathered and laid up for their provision, when they perceive them to begin to mould or bee fustie, or feare that they will corrupt and putrifie. But that which surpasseth all other prudence, policie and wit, is their caution and prevention which they use, that their wheat or other come may not spurt and grow. For this is certaine, that dry it cannot continue alwaies nor found and uncorrupt, but it will in time waxe soft, resolve into a milkie juice, when it turneth and beginneth to swell and chit: for feare therefore that it become not a generative feed, and so by growing, loose the nature & property of food for their nourishment, they gnaw that end thereof or head, where it is wont to spurt and bud forth. For

For mine owne part, I do not admit or beleve all that which some do anatomize of their caves and holes: who give out that there is not one direct and straight way leading downe thereinto, nor the same easie and ready for any other creature to passe through; but there be certaine secret allies, blinde-pathes, crooked turnings, and hollow cranks, which meet all at the end in three holes or concavities; whereof the one forsooth is the common hall for them to meet all together: the second is their cellar or ambry for their victuals and provision; and the third a by-roome where they bestow their dead.

Well, I thinke it not amisse nor impertinent, if next after pismires, I bring forth upon the stage before you the elephants, to the end that we may know the nature of this art, and intelligence which now is in question, as well in the greatest beasts as the smallest creatures, and see how as it appeareth in the one, so it is not defective or wanting in the other. Other men I am sure doe make a wonder at that which the elephant learneth, and is taught, whose docilitie is exhibited unto us in the theaters, by his sundry sorts of gestures, and changes in dauncing, such as for their varietie and exquisite elegancie, it were very hard for men with all their memorie, perfection of witte, and exercise, to remember, to expresse, and performe accordingly: but I for my part, me thinks, doe see more cleerly and evidently the prudence and sagacitie of this beast, in the passions, affections, and motions which he hath of himselfe without teaching, as being more simple, sincere, and naturall; for not long since, at Rome there were a number of them trained and exercised against the solemnity of their games and plaies, in certaine strange 20 stations, intricate motions, and hard turnings round, to goe, to come, to stande, and wheele about in a trice: but among them, there was one more dull, blockish, grosse, and slowe, than the rest, both in conceiving, and also in reteining; by reason whereof, he being ever and anon reproched and rated with shamefull words, yea, and many times beaten well for his untowardnesse, was found otherwhiles alone by himselfe in the night, repeating as it were and conning his lessons by moone-shine, labouring hard for to expresse and attaine unto that which hee had beene taught. Agnon writeth, that before this time, in Syria there was an elephant kept and nourished in a private mans house, whose governour had allowed unto him from his master, a certaine measure of barley every day for his provender; but there was not a day went over his head, wherein he robbed and deceived him not of the one halfe: it fortuned, that one time above the rest, the master of the house would needs see the elephant served, then his governour powred out before him his full allowance, even the whole measure that was his due; but the elephant casting an unhappy and untoward eie at him, divided his barley with the snout of his trunk, and put a part the one moiety therof, shewing the best way he could devise unto his master, the wrong that the governour aforesaid had done unto him: He reporteth likewise of another, who seeing that his keeper blended earth and stones among his barley, to make the measure to seeme compleat; spied his time and came unto the potage pot standing over the fire, wherein was flesh a seething for dinner, and filled it up with ashes.

Another being provoked and misused at Rome, by certaine little boies, who with their bodkins and penknives used to pricke and punch his snout or trunk; caught up one of them by the 40 middle, and held him up in the aire, so as it was thought he would have crushed and squeezed the guttes out of his belly; they that saw the manner of it, tooke up a great cry incontinently for feare of the poore boy, but the elephant set him downe softly againe upon the ground, in the very place where he caught him up, and doing him no hurt at all passed by: judging it a sufficient chastisement for so little a childe, that he was onely put in a fright: Thus much of tame and trained elephants. As for those which are savage, and live in the wilde fields at their liberty, wonderfull things be reported of them, and namely as touching their passage over rivers; for the yongest and least of them all, exposing himselfe to hazard for the rest, leadeth the way, and wadeth first thorough; the other seeing him landed upon the banke on the other side, make this account, that if the least and lowest of their heard be tall enough to surmount the depth of 50 the chanell, they which are bigger and higher, have no cause to feare any thing, but that they also may get over in safetie.

And since I am fallen into this argument, and proceeded to farre into it, me thinks I should not forget one example of Reimar, for the affinitie and conformity it hath with this device last rehearsed: Those who have invented fabulous tales make report, that during the great deluge, Deucalion used to let forth a dove out of the arke, to know what weather it was like to be abroad; for if she returned soone againe, she brought newes of tempest and raine, but if she

backe, he would runne a front upon them snuffing, snorting and neighing, rising up all afore at them; and if they made not good haste to retire behind him and fly, hee would bee sure to have them under his feet and trample over them. I know full well that you thinke these examples are huddled together in a confused varietie: but surely it is no easie matter to find any action of these noble beasts, which representeth one bare vertue and no more: for together with their kindnesse and naturall love there is to be seene a certaine desire of honour: amid their generositie a man may perceive a kind of industrious sagacitie and wisdom; neither is their wit and subtiltie void of courage and magnanimitie: howbeit, if men be disposed to distinguish and separate one from another by themselves; the dogs do represent an example of a mild and gentle nature together with an haughtie courage and high mind, namely when they passe by and turne aside from those to that submit themselves before them, according to that which Homer saith in one place:

*The dogs ran forth with open mouth, they cried and bark't aaine:
ulysses wife his sife let fall,
and stirr'd not againe.*

For their manner is not to fight any longer against those who humbly fall downe prostrate, or shew any semblance of lowly supplants. Certes, the report goeth of a principall Indian dogge, who being for a singularity above all other, sent to fight a combat before king Alexander the Great, when there was let looke at him first a stag, then a wild boare, and afterwards a beare, made no reckoning of them, nor deigned once to stirre out of his place nor rise up: but when hee saw a lion presented unto him, then incontinently he stood upon his feet, and addressed himselfe to the combat; shewing evidently that he esteemed the lion alone worthie to fight with him, and disdained all the rest. As for those here among us which are wont to hunt hares, if they themselves chauce to kill them with faire play in the open field, they take pleasure to teare them in peeces; they like and lap their blood full willingly: but if the hare being out of heart and in despaire of her selfe, as many times it falleth out, employe all the force and strength that shee hath in one course for all, and run her selfe out of breath, so as her winde is now cleane gone, and shee dead withall: the hounds finding her so, will not once touch her, but they keepe a wagging of their tails round about her body, as if they would say, it is not for greedinesse of hares flesh, but an earnest desire to winne the prize in running, that we hunt thus as we do.

As touching the craft and subtiltie which is in beasts; forasmuch as there be infinit examples thereof, overpasse I will the wily pranks of foxes, wolves, cranes and jakes: for common they be and every man seeth them; onely produce I will the testimonie of wife Thales, the most ancient of the seven sages, who by report was not least admired for his skill and cunning, in that hee discovered right well the craftines in a beast, and went beyond it. There was a companie of mules that had salt a load, and were carrying it from one place to another; and as they passed through the foord of a river, one of them chanced to fall under his burden into the water: the salt in his sack by this meane taking wet, melted and resolved into water for the most part of it, in such sort as the mule having recovered himselfe upon all foure, found that he was well lightened of his load, and presently conceived what was the reason: which gave so deepe an impression in his memorie, that ever after, as often as he was to go thorow a river, hee would be sure to stoupe and couch his bodie low; first leaning of one side, and then of another, purposely and for the nonce to wet and drench the bags on his backe which had salt in them. Thales hearing of this unhappy and shrewd wit of the mule, commaunded the muliter to fill the sacks with the same weight of wooll and spunges, in stead of salt, to lay them upon his backe, and so to drive him with the rest. The mule left not his old wont; but when he perceived that he was overcharged now with water besides his ordinary load of wooll and spunges, he tooke himselfe in the maner, and found that his craft now stood him in small stead, but did him hurt: whereupon, ever after, he would go upright whensoever he waded, and was very carefull that none of his packs or carriages should once (though full against his will) touch the water.

Partridges have another kinde of subtiltie and craft by themselves, and the same proceedeth from a certaine naturall love and motherly affection to their yong birds, whom, when they are yet so feeble that they cannot flie & make shift for themselves being pursued, they teach to cast themselves on their backs, with their heeles and bellies upward, and to hold either a clot of earth or some Locke of straw or such like stuffe, to cover and shadow their bodies withall: meane while, the olde rowens turne those that follow in chase another way, drawing them toward themselves in flying to and fro just before them, even at their feet, seeming (as it were) by little and little to retire, retire, and making as though they were scarce able to arise from the earth, and as if they were ready to be taken, untill such time as they have trained the fowlers farre from their little ones.

The hares when they have kinked, and be affraied of the hunters, returne to their formes, and carrie their leverets, some one way and some another, so as many times there is an arpent or good acre of ground distance betweene them, to the end that if either hound or hunter should come upon them, they might not be all in danger at once to be taken; and they themselves runne up and downe backward and forward in divers places, crossing this way and that way, leaving their tracts very confused, and in the end take one great leape as farre as ever they can, from their foresaid footing, and spring unto their forme, where they rest and take their repose.

The beare being surpris'd with a certaine drowfie disease, called Pholia, before she be altogether so heavily benumbed and stupified therewith, that she can not well stirre, maketh cleane the cave into which she meaneth to retire herselfe: & when she is to go downe into it, all the way besides which is toward it, she treadeth very lightly, bearing herselfe (as it were) upon her tip-toes: and being come neere unto it, she turnes upon her backe, and so citcheth forward her bodie as well as she can into her den.

Ofted deere, the hynds commonly calve neere unto highway sides, where ravenous beasts, such as live by prey, doe not ordinarily haunt. The stags when they perceive themselves to be fat, well fleshed, and good venison, seeke blinde corners to hide themselves in, for the better security of their lives, as not trusting then to their heeles and swift running.

The land-urchins are so wise and wary in defending and saving themselves, that they have thereby given occasion of this proverbe:

*At thou and wiles and me, of craftie fox there are:
The urchin one doth know,
and that is singular.*

for when the urchin perceiveth Renard comming toward him,

*All of a lump, as round as bur or ball,
His bodie lies, with prickles beset withall:
No meane she hath, for thornie bristles thicke,
To bite, to pinch, or touch him to the quicke.*

and yet more ingenious is their forecast and providence for the feeding of their little ones; for in Autumne, a little before vintage time, you shall have an urchin or hedge-hogge get under a vine, and with his feet shake the stocke untill the grapes from their branches be fallen upon the ground, then he rouleth himselfe round like a foot-ball among them, and catcheth them up with his sharpe prickles; inasmuch as when we stood all of us sometime to behold the manner of it, it seemed as if a cluster of grapes had beene quicke, and so crept upon the ground; so befor went he and covered all over with grapes: then so soone as he is gotten into his hole or nest, he offereth them unto his yong ones to eat, to take from him and lay up for store. This hole hath two faces or prospects; the one regardeth the fourth, the other looketh into the north. When they foresee change & alteration of weather, like as skillful ship-masters turne their failes according to the time; even so, they shut up that hole or entrie which standeth in the wind, and let open the other: which when one of the citie Cyzicum had once observed and learned, he got a great name and reputation of a weather-wife-man, as if he foreknew of himselfe by some singular gift, and could foretell from which coast the wind would blow.

As touching social love and fidelitie, accompanied with wit and understanding, the elephants asking Juba writeth, shew unto us an evident example: for they that hunt them are wont to dig deepe trenches, and thatch them over with a thinne cote of light straw or some small brush. Now when one of the heard chanceth to fall into a trench, for many of them use to go and feed together, all the rest bring a mighty deale of stones, rammed wood, and whatsoever they can get, which they fling into the ditch for to fill it up, to the end that their fellow may have meane thereby to get up againe. The same writer recordeth also that elephants use to pray unto gods, to purifie themselves with the sea water, and to adore the sunne rising, by lifting up their trunked snout into the aire (as if it were their head) & all thus of their own accord & untaught. And to say a truth of all beasts the elephant is most devout & religious, as K. Ptolemæus Philopater hath well testified: for after he had defeated Antiochus, & was minded to render condign thanks unto the gods for so glorious a victorie, among many other beasts for sacrifice, he slew foure elephants: but afterwards being much disquieted and troubled in the night with fearefull dreames, and namely, that God was wroth and threatned him for such an uncouth and strange sacrifice; hee made meanes to appeale his ire by many other propitiatorie oblations, and among the rest, hee dedicated unto him fower elephants of brasse, in steed of those which were killed: no lesse is the forcible kindeesse and good nature which lions shew one unto another; for the younger sort which are more able and nimble of body, lead forth with them into the chace for to hunt and prey those that be elder and unweldd; who when they be weary, sit them downe and rest, waiting for the other; who being gone forward to hunt if they meet with game and speed, then they all set up a roaring note altogether, much like unto the bellowing of bulles, and thereby call their fellowes to them; which the old lions hearing, presently runne unto them, where they take their part, and devourt they prey in common.

To speake of the amorous affections of brute beasts, some are very savage and exceeding furious: others more milde, and not altogether unlike unto the courting and wooing used betwene man and woman, yea, & I may say to you, smelling somewhat of wanton and venericious behaviour: and such was the love of an elephant, a counterfuter or corivall with Aristophanes the grammarian, to a woman in Alexandria, that fold chaplets or garlands of flowers: neither did the elephant shew lesse affection to her than the man, for hee would bring her alwaies out of the fruit market, as he passed by, some apples, pears, or other fruit, and then he would stay long with her, yea, and otherwhiles put his snout, as it were his hand, within her bosome under her partler, and gently feele her soft pappes and white skinn about her faire brest.

A dragon also there was enamoured upon a young maiden of Aetolia: it would come to visit her by night, creepe along the very bare skinn of her body, yea, and winde about her without any harme in the world done unto her, either willingly or otherwise, and then would gently depart from her by the breake of day: now when this serpent had continued thus for certaine nights together ordinarily; at the last the friends of the young damosell remooved her, and sent her out of the way a good way off; but the dragon for three or fower nights together came not to the house, but wandred and sought up and downe heere and there as it should seem for the wench; in the end, with much ado, having found her out, he came and clasped her about, not in that milde and gentle manner as before time, but after a rougher sort; for having with other windings and knots bound her hands and armes fast unto her body, with the rest of his taile he flapped and beat her legges, shewing a gentle kinde of amorous displeasure and anger, yet so, as it might seeme he had more affection to pardon, than desire to punish her.

As for the goose in Aegypt which fell in love with a boy; and the goat that cast a fanste to Glauce the minstrell wench: because they are historioes so wel known, and in every mans mouth: for that also I suppose you are wearie already of so many tedious tales and narrations, I forbear to relate them before you: but the merles, crows, and perroquets or popinjays, which learne to prate, and yeeld their voice and breath to them that teach him, so pliable, so tractable and docible, for to forme and expresse a certaine number of letters and syllables as they would have them, me thinks they plead sufficiently, and are able to defend the cause of all other beasts, teaching us as I may say, by learning of us, that capable they be not onely of the inward discourse of reason, but also of the outward gift uttered by distinct words, and an articulate voice: were it not then a meere ridiculous mockerie, to compare these creatures with other dumbe beasts which have not so much voice in them, as will serve to houle withall, or to expresse a groane and complaint? but how great a grace and elegancie there is in the naturall voices and songs of these, which they resound of themselves, without learning of any masters, the best musicians and most sufficient poets that ever were do testifie, who compare their sweetest canticles and poems unto their songs of swannes and nightingals: now forasmuch as to teach, sheweth greater use of reason; than to learne we are to give credit unto Aristotle, who saith: that brute beasts are endued also with that gift, namely, that they teach one another: for hee writeth that the nightingale hath beene seene to traine up her young ones in singing; and this experience may serve to testifie on his behalfe, that those nightingales sing nothing so well, which are taken very young out of the nest, and were not fedde nor brought up by their dammes; for those that be nourished by them, learne withall, of them to sing, and that not for money and gaine, nor yet for glory, but because they take pleasure to sing well, and love the elegancie above the profit of the voice: and to this purpose report I will unto you a storie which I have heard of many, as well Greeks as Romans, who were present and eie witnesses: There was a barber within the city of Rome, who kept a shoppe over against the temple, called Grecosifis, or Forum Graecum, and there nourished a pie, which would so talke, prate, and chatte, as it was wonderfull, counting the speech of men and women, the voice of beasts, and found of muscicall instruments, and that voluntarily of her selfe without the constraint of any person, onely she accustomed her selfe so to doe, and tooke a certaine pride and glory in it, endeavouring all that she could to leave nothing unspoken, or not expressed: now it hapned that there were solemnized great funerals of one of the welthiest personages in the city, and the corps was caried forth in a great state, with the found of many trumpets that marched before; in which solemnitie, for that the manner was that the pompe and whole company should stand still and rest a time in that verie place, it fell out so, that the trumpeters who were right cunning and excellent in their arte, staid there, founding melodiously all the while: the morrow after this, the pie became mute and made no noise at all, nor uttered not so much as her naturall voice which she was wont to doe, for to expresse her ordinarie and necessarie passions; inso much, as they who before time wondered at her voice and prating, marvelled now much more at her silence, thinking it a very strange matter to passe by the shop and heare her say nothing; so as there grew some suspition of others professing the same art and trade, that they had given her some poison: howbeit, most men guessed that it was the violent found of the trumpets which had made her deafe, and that together with the sense of hearing, her voice also was utterly extinct: but it was neither the one nor the other; for the truth was this, as appeared afterwards: she was in a deepe studie, and through meditation retired within herselfe, whiles her minde was busie and did prepare her voice like an instrument of musick, for invitation; for at length her voice came againe and wakened (as it were) all on a sudden, uttering none of her olde notes nor that which she was accustomed before to prate and counterfeit; onely the found of trumpets she resembled, keeping the same periods, the same stops, pauses and straines; the same changes, the same reports, and the same times and measures: a thing, that confirmed more and more that which I have said before; namely, that there is more use of reason in teaching of themselves, than in learning by another. Yet can I not containe my selfe, but I must needs in this place recite unto you one lesson that I my selfe saw a dogge to take out, when I was at Rome: This dog served a plaier who professed to counterfeit many persons, and to represent sundry gestures; & among sundry other pretty tricks which his master taught him, answerable to divers passions, occasions and occurrences represented upon the stage, his master made an experiment on him with a drogue or medicine which was somniferous indeed and sleepe, but must be taken and supposed deadly; who tooke the piece of bread wherein the said drogue was mingled, and within a litle while after he had swallowed it downe, he began to make as though hee trembled, quaked, yea and staggered, as if he had beene astonished, in the end he stretched out himselfe, and lay as stiffe as one starke dead, suffering himselfe to be pulled, haled, and drawn from one place to another, like a very blocke, according as the present argument and matter of the place required; but afterwards, when hee understood by that which was said and done, that his time was come, and that he had caught his hint, then beganne he at the first to stirre gently by litle and litle, as if hee had newly revived or awakened, and started out of a dead sleepe, and lifting up his head, began to looke about him too and fro; at which object all the beholders wondered not a litle; afterwards he arose upon his feet, and went directly to him unto whom he was to goe, very jocund and mery: this pageant was performed so artificially, I cannot tell whether to say or naturally, that all those who were present, and the emperor himselfe (for Vespasian the father was there in person, within the theater of Marcellus) tooke exceeding great pleasure, and joied wonderfully to see it.

But peradventure we may deserve well to be mocked for our labour, praising beasts as we do so highly, for that they be so docible and apt to learne, seeing that Democritus theweth and proveth, that we our selves have beene apprentices and scholars to them in the principall things of this life; namely, to the spider, for spinning, weaving, darning, and drawing up a rent; to the swallow, for architecture and building; to the melodious swanne and shrill nightingale, for vocall musick, and all by way of imitation. As for the art of physicke, and the three kindes thereof, we may see in the nature of beasts, the greatest and most generous part of each of them: for they use not onely that, which ordained drogues and medicines to purge ill humours out of the body, seeing that the tortoises take origin; wezels, rue, when they have eaten a serpent; dogges also when they be troubled with choler of the gall, purge themselves with a certaine herbe, thereupon called dogges-grasse; the dragon likewise if he finde his ciesto to be dimme, cleneth, scoureth, and dispatcheth the cloudinesse thereof with fenell; and the beare so soone as she is gone out of her denne, seeketh out the first thing that she doth, the wilde herbe called Arum, that is to say, wake-robin, for the acrimonie and sharpnesse thereof openeth her bowels when they are grown together, yea, and at other times finding herselfe upon fullnesse, given to loth and distaste all food, she goes to finde out ants nests, where she fits her downe lilling out the tongue which is glibbe and soft, with a kinde of sweet and slimy humour, untill it be full of ants and their egges, then draweth she it againe, swalloweth them downe, and thereby cureth her loathing stomacke. Semblably it is said, that the Egyptians having observed their bird Ibis, which is the blacke storke, to give herselfe a chifter of sea water, by imitation of her did the like by themselves. Certaine it is, that their priests use to besprinkle, purifie, and hallow themselves with that water out of which she hath drunke; for let any water be venemous, or otherwise hurtfull and unholsome, the Ibis will none of it: but also some beasts there be, which feeling themselves ill at ease, are cured by diet and abstinence; as namely wooves and lions, when they have devoured too much flesh, and are cloied or glutted therewith, they lie me downe, take their ease, cherishing and keeping themselves warme.

It is reported likewise of the tygre, that when a yooing kiddie was given unto her, she fasted two daies, according to the diet which she useth, before she touched it, and the third day being very hungry, called for other food, ready to burst the cage wherein she was enclosed, and forbare to eat the said kid, supposing that now she was to keepe it with her, as a familiar & domestical companion. Nay that which more is, recorded it is, that elephants practise the feat of chirurgery; for standing by those that are wounded in a battell, they can skill of drawing out tron-chions of speares, javelin heads, arrows and darts out of their bodies, with such dexterity and ease, that they will neither teare and hurt their flesh, nor put them to any paine whatsoever. The goats of Candy when they be shotte into the body with arrowes or darts, fall to eat the herbe Dichamus, & thereby thrust them out, and make them fall off with facility, & by this means they have taught women with child that this herbe hath a propertie to cause abortive birth, and the child in their wombe to miscarrie: for the said goats are no sooner wounded, but they runne presently to this herbe, and never seeke after any other remedy. Woonderfull these things are (no doubt) howbeit lesse miraculous, when we consider the natures of beasts, how they be capable of arithmeticke, and have the knowledge of numbring and keeping account: as the kine and oxen about Susa, for appointed they be there to water the kings gardens, drawing up water in buckets with a device of wheels that they turne about in manner of a windles; and everie one of them for their part must draw up an hundred buckets in a day: so many they will do just, but more you that not get of them, neither by faire means nor foule; for no sooner have they performed their task, but presently they give over & impossible it is to force them any farther then their account: notwithstanding triall hath bene made; so justly and exactly they both know, and also keepe the reckoning, as Ctesimus the Guidian hath left in writing. As for the Libians they mocke the Egyptians, for reporting this of their beast called Oryx, as a great singularity, that hee setteth up a certaine crie that verie day and houre, when as the star named by them Sabe, and by us the Dog, or Antares doth arise: for they give out, that with them all their goats together, at the verie instant when the said starre mounteth up within their horizon with the sunne, will bee sure to turne and looke in o the east: and this they hold to be an infallible signe of the revolution of that starre, agreeing just with the rules and observations of the Mathematicians. But to close up and conclude at length this discourse, that it may come to an end, let us (as it were) take in hand the sacred anchor, and for a finall conclusion knit up all with a brieve speech of their divinitie and propheticall nature. For certaine it is, that one of the greatest, most noble and ancient parts of divination or soothsaying, is that which being drawn from the flight and singing of birds, they call Augurie: and in truth the nature of these birds being so quicke, so active, so spiritually, and in regard of that agilitie & nimblenesse verie pliable, and obsequent to all visions & fantasies presented, offereth it selfe unto God, as a proper instrument to be used & turned which way he will; one while to motion, another while into certaine voices, laies & tunes, yea & into divers & fundrie gestures: now to stop and stay, anon to drive and put forward, in manner of the winds; by means whereof he impeacheth and holdeth backe some actions and affections, but directeth others unto their end & accomplishment. And this no doubt is the reason that Euripides teatmeth al birds in generall the heralds and messengers of the gods: and particularly Socrates said, that he was become a fellow servitor with the swans: semblably, among the kings, Pyrrhus was well pleased when as men called him the Eagle, and Antiochus tooke as great pleasure to be called the Sacre or the Hauke. Whereas contrariwise, when we are disposed to mocke, to flout, or to reproch those that be be dull, indocible and blockish, wee call them fishes. To bee short, an hundred thousand things there be that God doth shew, foretell and prognosticate unto us by the meanes of beasts, as well those of the land beneath, as the fowles of the aire above. But who that shall plead in the behalfe of fishes or water-creatures, will not be able to alledge so much as one: for, deafe they be all and domb; * blind also for any fore-sight or providence that they have, as being cast into a balefull place and bottomlesse gulfe, where impious Atheists & rebellious Titans or giants against God are bestowed; where they have no sight of God, no more than in hell where damned soules are; where the reasonablenesse and intellectuall part of the soule is utterly extinct, and the rest that remaineth, drenched or rather drowned (as a man would say) in the most base and vile sensuall part, so as they seeme rather to pant then to live.

HERACLEON.

Plucke up your browes, good Phedimus, open your eyes, awake your spirits, and beslirre your selfe in the defense of us poore Ilanders and maritime inhabitants: for here we have heard not a discourse twis merrily devised to passe away the time, but a serious plea premeditate and laboured before hand, a verie Rhetoricall declamation which might beseme well to bee pronounced at the barre in judicciall court, or delivered from a pulpit and tribunall before a publicke audience.

PHÆDIMUS.

Now verily, good sir Heracleon, this is a meere surprize and a manifest ambush laid craftily of so fet purpose; for this brave oratour (as you see) being yet fasting and sober himselfe; and having studied his oration all night long hath set upon us at the disadvantage, and altogether unprovided, as being still heavy in the head, and drenched with the wine that we drunke yesterday. Howbeit we ought not now to draw backe and recule for all this: for being as I am an affectionate lover of the poet Pindarus, I would not for any good in the world, heare this sentence of his justly alledged against me.

*When games of strife and combats once are set,
Who shrinketh backe, and doth pretend some let,
In darkness his eyes and obscuritie,
His fame of vertue and activitie.*

so for at great leasure we are all, and not the dances onely be at repose, but also dogs and horses, cast-nets, drags, and all manner of nets besides: yea and this day there is a generall cessation given to all creatures as well on land as in sea, for to give eare unto this disputation. And as for you my masters here, have no doubt, nor be you affraid; for I will use my libertie in a meane, and not draw out an Apologie or counterplea in length, by alledging the opinions of philosophers; the fables of the Egyptians; the headlesse tales of the Indians or Libians, without prooffe of any testimonies; but quickly come to the point, and looke what examples be most manifest and evident to the eie, and such as shall bee testified and verified by all those mariners or travellers that are acquainted with the seas, some few of them I will produce. And yet verily in the prooffes and arguments drawn from creatures above the ground, there is nothing to impeach the sight, the view of them being so apparant and daily presented unto our eie, whereas the sea affoordeth us the fight of a few effects, within it & those hardly and with much adoe (as it were) by a glauce and glimmering light, hiding from us the most part of the breeding and feeding of fishes: the means also that they use, either to assaile one another or to defend themselves wherein I assure you there be actions of prudence, memory, societie, and equity not a few, which because they are not knownen, it cannot chuse but our discourse as touching this argument will be lesse enriched and enlarged with examples, and so by consequence the cause more hardly defended and maintained.

Over and besides, this advantage have land beasts, that by reason of their affinity as it were, and daily conversation with men, they get a tincture as it were from them, of their manners and fashions; and consequently enjoy a kinde of nurture, teaching, discipline, and apprentizing by imitation; which is able to dulce, allay, and mitigate all the bitterness and austerity of their nature, no lesse than fresh water mingled with the sea, maketh it more sweet and potable: likewise all the unfociable wildenesse, and heavy unwelldinesse therein, it stirreth up, when the same is once moved and set on foot by the motions that it learneth by conversing with men: whereas on the other side the life of sea-creatures being farre remote and divided by long and large confines from the frequentation of men, as having no helpe of any thing without, nor any thing to be taught it by use and custome, is altogether solitarie and by it selfe, as nature brought it fourth, so it continueth and goeth not abroad; neither mingled nor mixed with forren fathions, and all by reason of the place which they inhabit, and not occasioned by the quality of their owne nature, for surely their nature conceiving and retaining within it selfe as much discipline and knowledge as it is possible for to attaine unto and apprehend, exhibiteth unto us many tame and familiar eeles (which they call sacred) that use to come to hand; such as are among the rest, of those in the fountaine Archeusa, besides many other fishes in diuers places, which are very obsequant and obsequious when they be called by their names, as is reported of Marcus Crassus his lamprey, for which he wept when it was dead; and when Damius upon a time reproched him for it, by way of mockerie in this wise: Were not you the man who wept for your lamprey when it was dead; he came upon him presently in this manner: And were not you the kinde and sweet husband who having buried three wives never shed teare for the matter? the crocodiles not only know the voice of the priests when they call unto them, and endure to be handled and stroked by them, but also yawn and offer their teeth unto them to be picked and clenched with their hands, yea and to be skowred and rubbed all over with linen clothes. It is not long since that Philinus a right good man and well reputed, after his returne from his voiage out of Aegypt, where he had bin to see the country recounted unto us, that in the city of Antea he had seene an olde woman ly a sleepe on a little pallet together with a crocodile, who very decently and modestly couched close along by her side. And it is found in old records, that when one of the kings called Protolomai, called unto the sacred crocodile, it would not come nor obey the voice of the priests, notwithstanding they gently praised and intreated her; a signe thought to be a prognosticke and preface of his death, which soone after ensued: whereby it is plaine that the kind and generation of these water beasts, is neither incapable, nor deprived of that sacred and highly esteemed science of divination and foretelling future things; considering that even in the country of Lycia; betweene the cities of Phellus and Myrz, that is, a village called Sura, where I heare say, the inhabitants use to sit and behold the fishes swimming in the water, like as in other places they observe birds flying in the aire, marking their lying in wait and ambush, their scudding away and pursue after them; whereby according to a certeine skill that is among them, they can foretell future things to come. But this may suffice to shew and declare, that their nature is not altogether estranged from us, nor unfociable.

As touching their proper wit, and naturall prudence, wherein there is no mixture at all borrowed from other, this is ingenerall, a great argument thereof, that there is no creature that swimmeth or liveth in the waters, except those which sticke to stones, and cleave to rocks, that is so easie to be caught by man, or otherwise to be taken without trouble, as asses are by wolves; bees by the birds Meropes; grashoppers by swallowes; or serpents by flagges, who are so easily caught up by them; in Greeke they tooke the name εναγοι, not εναγεσμοι, that is to say, of lightnesse: but εναγοι, that is to say, of drawing up a serpent out of his hole. The sheepe calleth as it were the wolfe, by the foote; like as by report the leopard allureth unto him the most part of beasts, who are willing to approach him for the pleasure they take in his smell, and above all others the ape. But sea creatures generally all, have a certeine inbred sagacity, a wary perceivance before hand, which maketh them to be suspicious and circumspect, yea, and to stand upon their guard against all fore-laying; so that the arte of hunting and catching them is not a small piece of worke, and a simple cunning; but that which requireth a great number of engines of all sorts, and asketh wonderfull devices, and subtil sleights to compass and goe beyond them; and this appeereth by the experience of such things, as we have daily in our hands: For first and formost the cane or reed of which the angle rodde is made, fishers would not have to bee bigge and thicke, and yet they had need of such an one as is tough and strong, for to plucke up and hold the fishes, which commonly doe mightily sting and struggle when they be caught; but they chuse rather that which is small and slender, for feare lest if it cast abroad shadow, it might moove the doubt and suspicion that is naturally in fishes: moreover the line they make not with many water-knots, but desire to have it as plaine and even as possibly may be without any roughnesse, for that this giveth as it were some denuntiation unto them of fraud and deceit: they take order likewise that the haire which reach to the hooke, should seeme as white as possibly they can devise, for the whiter they be, the lesse are they seene in the water, for the conformity and likenesse in colour to it: as for that which the poet Homer saith;

Downe right to bottome of the sea, like plumbe of leade she went,

That

That peseth downe the fishers hooke, and holdes the line extant;
Which passing through transparent * borne,
that small oxes head bare,
To greedy fishes secretly brings death ere they be ware.

Some misundersanding these verses, would infer thereupon; that men in old time used the hairs of an ox to make there lines withal, saying that this word αγεσ, which commonly in Greeke is taken for an horne, signifieth in this place haire; & that hereupon αγεσ is derived, which betokeneth to sheere or cut haire; and αγεσ, that is to say, sheering or clipping; as also, that from hence it is that Archilochus tearmeth a daintie & wanton minion, who taketh delight in tricking and trimming the haire & wearing a peruke curiously fet, αγεσ. But surely, this their collection is not true, for they used as we do, the haire of horse tiales, to make their angle-lines withal, chusing those that grow either on stone-horses or geldings, and not of mares, for that ever & anon they wet their tiales with staling, and by that means the haire of them are tender and apt to breake. And Aristotle himselfe writeth, that in those verses above cited there is no deepe matter that requireth such an exquisit & curious scanning; for that (in truth) fishers use to overcast the line neere unto the hooke with a piece of horne, for feare lest fishes when they have swallowed down the hooke, should with their teeth bite or fret a two the line. And as for the hooke, they use those that be round, for to take mullets and the fishes amia, because they have narrow moulthes: for very wary they are to avoid the longer and freighter kind; yea, and many times the mullet suspecteth the round hooke, swimming round about it, and flurting with the taile the bait and meat that is upon it, and never linnes flapping, untill he have shaken it off, and then devourereth it; but say, he can not speed that way, he drawes his mouth together, and with the very edge and utmost brim of his lips he nibbleth about the bait, untill he have gnawed it off. The wide mouthed sea-pike, when he perceiveth that he is caught with the hooke, sheweth herein more valour and animositie than the elephant; for he plucketh not out of another the dart or arrow sticking the bodie; but maketh meanes to deliver himselfe from the said hooke, shaking his head and writhing it to and fro untill he have enlarged the wound and made it wider; enduring most stoutly and resolutely the dolour to be thus rent and torne, and never gives over, untill he have wrestled and wrung the hooke out of his bodie. The sea fox will not many times come neere unto an hooke, he reculeth backe and is afraid of some deceitfull guile; but say that he chance to be surprised quickly, he maketh shift to winde himselfe off againe: for such is his strength, agilitie and slipperie moisture withall, that he will turne himselfe upside downe with his taile upward, in such sort, that when by overturning his stomacke all within is come forth, it can not chuse but the hooke loofeth the hold which it had and falleth fourth.

These examples do shew a certeine intelligence, and withall a wittie and readie execution of that which is expedient for them, as need and occasion requireth. But other fishes there be, which besides this indoltrious sagacitie in shifting for themselves, do represent a sociable nature and loving affection one unto another; as for example, the anthia and cari: for when the caru hath swallowed downe an hooke, other of his fellowes come leaping about him, and gnaw the line asunder; and if peradventure there be any of them gotten within a net and entangled, their companions give them their tiales without, which they holde as fast as they can with their teeth, and the other lie pulling and haling of them untill they have drawn them forth. As for the anthia, they come to rescue and succour one of their owne kinde with more audacitie, for putting the line against their backe, they set to it the ridge bone, which is sharpe toothed in manner of a saw, and with it they endeavour to file and saw it in twaine. And verily, there is not a creature living on the land (as farre as we know) that hath the heart and courage to aid their fellows being in danger of life, neither beare, bore, lion, nor leopard. Well may those gather all together in heaps, which are of the same kind and run one with another round about the cirque or show-place with the Amphitheaters: but to rescue or succour one another neither know they the meanes how, nor have the courage to doe it: for they fly and leape backward as fast as ever they can possibly from one that is hurt or killed in their fight: as for that story my good friend that you alledge of the elephants, that they cast into the ditch or trench whereinto one of their company is fallen all that ever they can get & gather together, thereby to make a banke, that he may cast himselfe upon, & besides so get forth; it is very strange and farret: and because it cometh

it fourth, so it continueth and goeth not abroad; neither mingled nor mixed with forren fathions, and all by reason of the place which they inhabit, and not occasioned by the quality of their owne nature, for surely their nature conceiving and reteining within it selfe as much discipline and knowledge as it is possible for to attaine unto and apprehend, exhibiteth unto us many tame and familiar eeles (which they call sacred) that use to come to hand; such as are among the rest, of those in the fountaine Arctus, besides many other fishes in diuers places, which are very obsequant and obsequious when they be called by their names, as is reported of Marcus Crassus his lamprey, for which he wept when it was dead; and when Domitius upon a time reproched him for it, by way of mockerie in this wise: Were not you the man who wept for your lamprey when it was dead; he came upon him presently in this manner: And were not you the kinde and sweet husband who having buried three wives never shed teare for the matter? the crocodiles not only know the voice of the priests when they call unto them, and endure to be handled and stroked by them, but also yawne and offer their teeth unto them to be picked and clenched with their hands, yea and to be skowed and rubbed all over with linen clothes. Some misunderstanding these verses, would infer thereupon; that men in old time used the hairs of an ox to make there lines withal, saying that this word κερας, which commonly in Greeke is taken for an horne, signifieth in this place haire; & that hereupon κερας is derived, which betokeneth to sheere or cut haire; and κερας, that is to say, sheering or clipping; as also, that from hence it is that Archilochus termeth a daintie & wanton minion, who taketh delight in tricking and trimming the haire & wearing a peruke curiously fect, κεραμας. But surely, this their collection is not true, for they used as we do, the haire of horse tails, to make their angle-lines withal, chusing those that grow either on stone-horses or geldings, and not of mares, for that ever & anon they wet their tails with staling, and by that means the haire of them are tender and apt to breake. And Aristotle himselfe writeth, that in those verses above cited there is no deepe matter that requireth such an exquisit & curious scanning; for that (in truth) fishers use to overcast the line neere unto the hooke with a piece of horne, for feare lest fishes when they have swallowed down the hooke, should with their teeth bite or fret a two the line. meth out of the books of king Juba, it would seeme to command us (as it were) by a roiall edict, to give credit thereto. But say it were, true there be examples of sea-creatures enough to prove that for sociable kindnesse and prudence withall, there be many of them which give no place to the wisest of all those which the land affordeth: but as touching their communion and fellowship, we will treat thereof apart, and that anon.

To returne unto our fishers: perceiving as they doe, that the most part of fishes scorne the line and hooke as stale devices or such as be discovered, they beake themselves to fine force, and shut them up within great casting nets, like as the Persians use to serve their enemies in their warres, making this account, that if they be enclosed once within those nets, they are theirs sure enough, as if no discourse of reason in the world, no wit & policie whatsoever will serve them to escape: for with hoopnets or castnets are mullets caught, & the iulides, the marmyri also, the gar-ge, sea-gogoon, and the wide mouthed pikes: but such as plunge themselves downe to the bottome of the water, called thereupon scorpius, such as are the barbel, the gulleheads, and the scorpions of the sea, those they use to catch and draw up with great drags and sweepnets. And verily this kinde of net Homer calleth Panagra, which is as much to say, as catching and swooping all afore it. And yet as cunningly devised as these engins be, the sea-dogs have devices to avoid the same, as also the wide mouthed labrax; for when he perceiveth that the said sweepnet is a drawing along the bottome, he setteth all his strength to, scrapeth in the earth, and putteth it so, as he maketh an hole therein; and when he hath thus digged (as it were) as deepe a trench as will hide him against the incursion of the net, then he coucheth himselfe close within it, waiting untill the net be glided over him and past. The dolphin, if he be surprisid, and perceiveth that he is inclosed and claipeid within the armes (as one would say) of a net, endureth his fortune resolutely, and never dismayeth for the matter; nay, he is very well appeased and pleased; for he is glad in his heart, that he hath so many fishes about him caught in the same net, which hee may devour and make merrie with at his pleasure without paines taking: and when he sees that he is drawn up neere to the land, he makes no more ado but gnawes a great hole in the net, & away he goes. But say that he cannot dispatch this feat so quickly, but he comes into the fishers hands, yet hee dieth not for this at the first time; for they draw a rish or reed thorow the skinn along his crest, and so let him go: but if he suffer himselfe to be taken the second time, then they beat and cudgell him well; and know him they do by the feames or skars remaining of the forehead. Howbeit, this falleth out verie seldome; for the most part of them when they have beene once pardoned, do acknowledge what favour they have received, and beware for ever after how they do a fault and come into danger againe. But whereas there be infinit other examples of subtle flights and wittie wiles which fishes have invented, both to foresee and prevent a perill, & also to escape out of a danger, that of the cuttle is woorthie to be recited and would not be passed over in silence: for having about her necke a bladder or bag hanging, full of a blacke muddie liquor, which thereupon they call blow, that is to say, Inke: when she perceives herselfe beset & compassed about, so as she is ready to be taken, she casteth forth from her the said inke full craftily, that by troubling the water of the sea all about her, and making it looke thicke and blacke, she might avoid the sight of the fisher, and so make an escape unseene. Following heerein the gods in Homer, who many times with overspreading a back cloud with draw and steale away those whom they are minded to save: but enough of this.

Now as touching their craft and subtiltie in assailing and chafing others, there be many experiments and examples presented unto our sight: for the fish called the Starre, knowing full well, that whatsoever he toucheth wil melt and resolve, offreth and yeeldeth her body to be handled, suffering as many as passe by her, or approach neere to stroke him: and as for the cramp-fish Torpedo, you all know well enough her powerfull proprietie; not onely to benumme and stupifie those who touch her, but also to transmit a stupefactive qualitie, even along the maihes and cords of the net, to the verie hands of the fishers who have caught her. And some there be who report thus much more over, as having farther experience of her woonderfull nature, that in case she escape and get away alive, if men do baddle aloft in the water, or dash the same upon them, they shall feele the said passion running up to the verie hand, and benumbing their sense of feeling, as it should seeme, by reason of the water which before was altered and turned in that manner. This fish therefore having an imbred knowledge hereof by nature, never fighteth a front with any other; neither hazardeth himselfe openly: but fetching a compass about the prey which it hunteth after, shooteth forth from her these contagious influences like darts, infecting ting or charming rather the water first therewith, and afterwards by meanes thereof the fish that she laeth for; so that it can neither defend it selfe, nor flee and make an escape, but remaineth as it were arrested, and bound fast with chaines, or utterly astonied.

The sea-frog, called the Fisher, which name hee gar by a kind of fishing that he doth practise, is known well enough to many: and Aristotle saith, that the cuttle aforesaid useth likewise the same craft that he doth. His manner is to hang downe as it were an angle line, a certaine small string or gut from about his necke, which is of that nature, that hee can let out in length a great way when it is loose, and draw it in againe close together verie quickly when he list. Now when he perceiveth some small fish neere unto him, hee suffreth it to nibble the end thereof and bite it, and then by litle and litle privily plucketh and draweth it backe toward him, untill he can reach with his mouth the fish that hangeth to it.

As touching poulps or purpules, and how they change their colour, Pindarus hath ennobled them in these verses:

*His mind doth alter most mutable,
To poulpe the sea fish skinnes semblable,
Which changeth hue to all things suable,
To live in all worlds he is pliable.*

The poet Theognis likewise:

*Put on a mind like polyp fish,
and learne so to dissemble,
Which of the rocks where it sticks,
the colour doth resemble.*

True it is that the chameleon also effoone changeth colour, but it is not upon any craftie desaigne that he hath, nor yet for to hide himselfe, but only for that he is so timorous; for cowardly he is by nature, and feareth everie noise. Over and besides (as Theophrastus writeth) full he is of a deale of wind; and the bodie of this creature waiteth but a litle of being all lungs and lights; whereby it may be guessed that it standeth altogether upon ventositie and wind, and so consequently verie variable and subject to change: whereas that mutabilitie of the polype is a powerfull and settled action of his, and not a momentarie passion or infirmitie: for hee altereth his colour of a deliberate purpose, using it as a sleight or device, either to conceal himselfe from that whereof he is afraid; or else to catch that whereof hee feedeth: and by meanes of this deceifull wile, hee praeth upon the one that escapeth him not, & escapeth the other that passeth by & sees him not. But to say that he catcheth his owne cleies or long armes that he useth to stretch forth, is a loud lie; marie that he standeth in feare of the lampray and the conger, is verie true: for these fishes do him many throwd turnes, and he cannot requite them the like, so slipperie they be and so soone gone. Like as the lobster on the other side if they come within his clutches, holdeth them fast & squeezeeth them to death: for their glibby slicknesse serveth them in no stead against his rough cleies; and yet if the polype can get & entangle him once within his long laces, hee dies for it. See how nature hath given this circular vicissitude to avoid and chafe one another by 40 turnes, as a verie exercise and trial to make prooffe of their wit and sagacitie.

But Aristotimus hath alledged unto us the hedgehog, or land urchin, and stood much upon I wot not what foresight he hath of the winds: and a woondrous matter he hath made also of the triangular flight of cranes. As for me, I will not produce the sea urchins of this or that particular coast, so wit, either of Bizantine, or of Cyzicum, but generally all in what fase forever; namely, how against a tempest and storme, when they see that the sea will bee very much troubled, they charge and ballast themselves with little stones, for feare of being overturned or driven to and fro for their lightnesse, by the billowes and waves of the sea: and thus by the meanes of this weight, they remaine firme and fast upon the little rocks whereto they are settled. As for the cranes, who change their maner of flying according to the winde; I say, this is a skillfull quality, so not proper and peculiar to one kinde of fishes, but common unto them all; namely, to swimme evermore against the waves & the current; yea, and very warie they be, that the winde blow not their tiales, and raise their skales, and so hurt and offend their bodies laid bare and naked, yea and made rugged by that meanes. Hereupon they carie their snouts and muzzels alwaies into the winde, and so direct their course: and thus the sea being cut afront at their head, keepeth downe their finnes, and gliding smoothly over their body, laeth their scales even, so as none of them stand staring up. This is a thing, as I have said, common unto all fishes, except the Elops, whose nature is to swimme downe the winde and the water; neither feareth he that the winde will drive up his scales in so swimming, because they doe not lie toward his taile, but contrary to other fishes, toward his head.

Moreover, the tuny is so skillfull in the solstices and equinoxes, that he hath taught men to observe them without need of any astrological rules; for looke in what place or coast of the sea the winter tropicke or solstice findes him, there resteth he, and stirreth not untill the equinox in the spring. But a wonderfull wisedome (quoth he) there is in the crane, to hold a stone in his foot, that by the fall thereof he may quickly awaken. How much wiser then, my good friend Aristotimus, is the dolphin? who may not abide to lie still and cease stirring, for that by nature he is in continuall motion, and endeth his mooving and living together: but when he hath need of sleepe, he springeth up with his body to the toppe of the water, and turneth him upon his backe with the belly upward, and so suffreth it partly to flote and hull, and in part to be caried through the deepe, waving to and fro as it were in a hanging bedde, with the agitation of the sea, sleeping all the while, untill he settle downe to the bottom of the sea, and touch the ground: then wakeneth he, and mounting up with a jerke a second time, suffreth himselfe to be carried untill he be fetled downe againe; and thus hath he deviled to have his repose and rest intermingled with a kinde of motion. And it is said that the tunies doe the like, and upon the same cause.

And now forasmuch as we have shewed already the mathematicall and astrological foreknowledge that fishes have in the revolution and conversion of the sunne, which is confirmed likewise by the testimonie of Aristotle, listen what skill they have in arithmeticke; but first (be-<sup>10</sup> leave me) of the perspective sciences; whereof as it should seeme, the poet Aeschylus was not ignorant: for thus he saith in one place:

Like tuny fish he seemes to spie,
He doth so looke with his left eye.

For tunies in the other eye are thought to have a dimme and feeble sight: and therefore when they enter Mer major into the sea of Pomus, they coast along the land on the right side; but contrariwise when they come forth, wherein they doe very wisely and circumspectly, to commit the custody of the body alwaies to the better eye. Now for that they have need of arithmeticke, by reason of their societie (as it may be thought) and mutuall love wherein they delight; they are come to that height and perfection in this arte, that because they take a wondrous<sup>30</sup> pleasure to feed together, and to keepe one with another in sculles & troupes, they alwaies cast their company into a cubicke forme, in manner of a battailon, solid and square every way, close, and environed with six equall sides or faces; and arranged in this ordinance as it were of a quadrat battell doe they swim, as large before as behind, & of the one side as of the other, in such sort, as he that lieth in espiall to hunt these tunies, if he can but take the just number how many there be of that side or front that appeareth next unto him, may presently tell what the number is of the whole troupe, being assured that the depth is equall to the bredth, and the bredth even with the length.

The fish called in Greeke* Hamia, tooke that name, it may be thought, for their conversing in companies al together: and so I suppose came the Pelamides by their name. As for other fishes<sup>40</sup> that be sociable & love to live & are seene to converse in great companies together, no man is able to number the, they be so many. Come we rather therefore to some particular societies & inseparable fellowships that some have in living together: among which is that* Pinnotheres, which the philosopher Chrysippus so much inke in his description, for in all his books as wel of moral as naturall philosophie, he is ranged formost. As for the Spongotheres, I suppose he never<sup>50</sup> knew, for otherwise he would not have left it out. Well, this Pinnotheres is a little fish, as they say, of the crabs kind, which goeth & cometh evermore with the Naere, a big shell fish keeping still by it, and sits as it were a porter at his shell side, which he letteth continually to stand wide open, untill he spie some small fishes gotten within it, such as they are wont to take for their food: then doth he enter likewise into the Naeres shell, and seemeth to bite the fleshy substance thereof; whereupon presently the Naere shutteth the shell hard, and then they two together feed upon the bootie which they have gotten prisoners within this enclosure.

As touching the Spongotheres, a little creature it is, not like unto the crabbe fish as the other, but rather resembling a spider, & it seemeth to rule and governe the sponge, which is altogether without life, without bloud and sense; but as many other living creatures within the sea, cleaveth indeed heard to the rocks, and hath a peculiar motion of the owne, namely, to stretch out and draw in its selfe: but for to do this need, she hath of the direction and advertisement of another ther: for being of a rare, hollow, and soft constitution otherwise, and full of many concavities, void & so dull of sense besides, & idle withal, that it perceiveth not when there is any substance of good meat gotten within the said void and empty holes; this little animal at such a time giveth a kind of warning, and with it she gathereth in her body, holdeth it fast, and devoureth the same: but much more will this sponge draw in her selfe when a man comes neere and touches her; for then being better advertised and touched to the quick, she quaketh as it were for feare, and plucketh in her body so streight and so hard, that the divers, and such as seeke after them have no small adoe, but finde it to be a painfull matter for to get under and cut them from the rocks.

The purple fishes keepe in companies together, & make themselves a common cel, much like to the combs which bees doe frame, wherein by report, they do engender & breed: and looke what they have laid up for their store and provision of victuals, to wit, moffe, reits and such seaweeds, those they put forth out of their shells, & present them unto their fellows for to eat, banqueting ground as it were every one in their turne, and keeping their course to feast, one eating of anothers provision. But no great marvell it is to see such an amiable societie and loving fellowship among them, considering that the most unfociable, cruel and savage creature of all that live either in rivers or lakes or seas, I meane the crocodile, sheweth himselfe wonderfull fellow-like and gracious in that societie and dealing that is betwene him & the trochilus. For this trochilus is a little bird of the kinde of those which ordinarily doe haunt meres, marshes and rivers,<sup>10</sup> waiting and attending upon the crocodile as it were one of his guard: neither liveth this bird at her owne finding nor upon her owne provision, but of the reliques that the crocodile leaveth. The service that she doth for it is this: when the seeth the ichneumon, having plaitred his body as it were with a coat of mud baked hard in manner of a crust, and like unto a champion with his hands all dusty, ready to wrestle & prepared to take hold of his enemy, ly in wait for to surpris the crocodile asleepe, she awakeneth him partly with her voice, and partly by nebbing him with her bill. Now the crocodile is so gentle and familiar with her, that he will gape with his chawes wide open, and let her enter into his mouth, taking great pleasure that she should picke his teeth and pecke out the little morsels of flesh that stick betwene, with her pretty beake, & withal, to<sup>20</sup> scarifie his gummies. But when he hath had enough of this, & would flout and close his mouth againe, he letteth fall the upper chaw a little, which is a warning unto the bird for to get forth: but he never bringeth both jawes together, before he knowe that the trochilus is flown out.

There is a little fish called the guide, for quantity & proportion of shape, resembling the gudgeon, only without forth it seemeth like unto a bird, whose feathers for feare stand up; the scales stare so, and are so rough. This fish is ever in the company of one of these great whales, swimming before, and directing his course as if he were his pilot, for feare lest he should light upon some selves, runne upon the sands in the shallows, or otherwise shoot himselfe into some narrow creeke where he can hardly turne and get forth. The whale followeth hard after, willing to be guided, and directed by him, even as a shippe by the helme: and looke what other thing soever besides cometh within the chaos of this monsters mouth, be it beall, boar,<sup>40</sup> or stone, downe it goes all incontinently that foule great swallow of his, and perisheth in the bottomlesse gulfe of his panch: onely this little fish he knoweth from the rest, and receiveth into his mouth and no farther, as an anchor, for within it clepeth; and while the fish is at repose, the whale likewise resteth still, as if he ridde at anchor; no sooner is it gotten forth, but he followeth on a fresh, never leaving it by day nor by night, for otherwise hee would wander heere and there: and many of these whales there have beene lost in this manner, wanting their guide & pilot, which have runne themselves a land, for default of a good pilot. For we our selves have seene one of them to cast away not long since about the ile Anticira: and before time by report, there was another cast upon the sands, and not farre from the city Buna, which lay then stinking and purrified; whereupon by the infection of the aire, there ensued a pestilence<sup>50</sup> in those parts adjoining. What should one say? Is there any other example woorthy to be compared with these societies so streightly linked, & enteraled with mutuall benevolence? Aristotle indeed reporteth great friendship and amitie betwene foxes and serpents, joining and combining together against their common enemy the eagle; also betwene the Ottides and horses; for the bird otus delighteth in their company, and to be neere them, for that they may rake into their dung. For mine owne part, I cannot see that the very bees, or the pismires, are so industrious and carefull one for another. True it is, that they travell and labour in common for a publicke weale; but to aime at any particular good, or to respect the private benefit one vering and defending thew with their spawne and frie against the waves of the sea.

Dog-filthes get not place in any fort to the most tame and gentle beafts in the world, for kinde love and naturall affection to their yong: for first they engender spawne, and after that, a quicke frie; and that not without, but within, nourishing and carrying the fame within their owne bodies, after a kind of second generation; but when they are grown to any bignesse, they put them forth and teach them how to swim hard by them, and afterwards receive them by the mouth into their bodie, which serveth in stead of a place of abode, of nourishment and of refuge, untill such time as they be so big, that they can shift for themselves.
Moreover, the provident care of the tortoise in the generation, nourishment and preservation of yere yong, is wonderfull: for our the goeth of the sea, and laith her egges or calfeith her spawne upon the banke side; but being not able to cove or sit upon them, nor to remaine herselfe upon the land out of the sea any long time, the bestoweth them in the gravell, and afterwards covereth them with the lightest and finest sand that she can get: when the hath thus hidden them surely, some say, that with her feet she draweth raies or lines, or els imprinteth certeine pricks, which may serve for privy marks to herselfe, to finde out the place againe: others affirme, that the male turneth the females upon the backe, and so leaveth the print of their shell within the

The crocodiles deale much after this manner in all other points; but at what marks they aime in chusing or finding out the place where they breed, no morrall man is able to imagine or give a reason whereupon it is commonly said, that the foreknowledge of this beast in that respect, proceedeth not from any discourse of reason, but of some supernaturall divination: for going neither farther nor nerer than jult to that gage and height where 2 the river for that yeare 10 will rise and cover the earth, there laieith her eggcs: so that when the paifant or countrey man chanceth by fortune to hit upon a crocodiles nest, himselfe knoweth and telleth his neighbours how high the river will overflow that Summer following: so jult doth the measure the place that will be drowned with water, that herselfe may be sure not to be drenched while she sitteth and coveth: furthermore, when her young be newly hatched, if she see any one of them (so soone as ever it is out of the shell) not to catch with the mouth one thing or other coming next in the way, be it flie, pismire, gnar, earth-worme, straw or grasse, the damme taketh it betweene her teeth, teareth it and killeth it presently; but such as give some prooffe of animosities, audacitie and execution, those she loveth, those she cherisheth and maketh much of, bestowing her love as the wisest men judge it meet and reasonable, according to reason and discretion, and .. not with blinde affection.

But (oh fweet Neptune) what a foule fault and grosse error was I like to have committed ; how absurd and ridiculous should I have made my selfe, if being amused and busied to speake of these sea-calves and frogs, I had forgotten and overpatted the wisest creature, and that which the gods love best, of all those that do frequent and haue the sea? for what musicke of the nightingale is comparable to that of the halcyon? what * artificial building of the swallows, and martinetts ; what entier amitie & love of doves ; what skillfull cunning of the bees, deserveth to be put in balance with these sea-fowles halcyones? Of what living creatures have the gods and goddeses so much honored the breeding, travell and birth? for it is said that there was but one onely Iffe, to 40 wit Delos, that was so wel beloved, that it received the childbirth of Latona, when she was delivered of Apollo & Diana : which island floating before time, continued afterwards firme-land; whereas the pleasure of God is such, that all seas should be fill and calme without waves, winds or drop of raine falling upon them , all the while that the halcyon laiceth and coveth, which is just about the winter solstice, even when the daies bee shortest : which is the reason that there is no living creature that men love so well ; by whose meanes seven daies they have, and seven nights even in the verie heart of winter, during which time they may safely faile, having their voyage by sea for those daies space, more secure than their travell by land. Now if I must say somewhat likewise of each particular vertue that this bird hath: first and foremost the female is so loving to the male her mate, that the tariest not with him for one season only, but all the yeere long keepeth him com-50 pany; and that not for shamelesse lust & wantonnesse (for she never admitteth any other male to tread her) but onely upon a kind love and tender affection ; even like an honest wedded wife that keepeth only to her husband. And when the male groweth to be for age weak and unwelldie; in such sort as he cannot follow her, but with much ado, she beareth and feedeth him in his old age ; she never forsaketh nor leaveth him alone for any thing, but she taketh him upon her shoulders, carrieth him everie where about, tendeth him most tenderly, and is with him stil until his dying day. Now for the affection which she beareth to her young, and the care that she hath of them and their safetie: when the perceiveth once that she is with egges, presently she goeth about the building of her nest; not tempering mudde or cley for to make thereof mortar; not dawbing it upon the walles, and spreading it over the rouse as the swallows do; and yet employing her whole body or the most part thereof about her worke, as doth the bee, which entering in the honey-combe with her entier bodie; and working withall the six feet together, devideth the place in six angled cels: but the alcyon having but one instrument, one toole, one engine to worke withall, even her owne bill, without any thing else in the world to helpe her in her travell and operation; yet what workmanship she makes & what fabricks she frameth, like unto a master carpenter or shipwright, hard it were to beleieve, unlesse a man had seene it, being in deed such a fat-bricke and piece of worke, which onely of all other cannot bee overthrowen nor drenched with the sea: for first and formost shee goes and gathers a number of bones of the fish called 10 Belone, that is to say, a Needle, which shee joineeth and binderh together, interlacing them some long-wise, others overthwart, much like as the woofe is woven upon the warpe in a loome, winding, plaiting and twisting them up and downe one within another; so that in the end fashioned it is in forme round, yet extended out in length like unto a filthers weele or bow-net: after shee hath finished this frame, shee bringeth it to some creeke, and opposeth it against the waves, where the sea gently beating and dashing upon it, teacheth her to mend that was not well compact, and to fortifie it in such places where shee sees it gapeth, or is not united close by reason of the sea-water that hath undone the composition thereof: contrariwise, that which was well jointed, the sea doth so settle and drive together, that hardly a man is able to breake, dissolve or doe it injurie either with knocke of stone or dint of edged toole. But that which yet maketh it 20 for more admirable, is the proportion and forme of the concavities and hole within this vesseil; for framed it is & composed in such sort, that it will receive and admit no other thing, but the verie bird which made it, for nought else can enter into it, so close it is and shut up, no not so much as the very water of the sea. I am assured that there is not one of you all, but he hath many times seene this nest: but for mine owne part, who have both viewed, touched and handled it, and that verie often, I am ready to say and sing thus:

*The like at Delos once I weene,
Was in Apollos temple seene.*

I meane the altar made al of hornes, renowned amongst the seven wonders of the world; for that without solder, gliew, or any other matter to binde and holde the parcels together, made it was 30 and framed of hornes which grew on the right side of the head onely. But o that this god would be so good and gracious unto me, being in some sort muscical and an islander, like himselfe, as to pardon me if I sing the praise of that sirene and mer-maid so highly commended; as also gently to heare mee laugh at these demands and interrogatories that these propound, who in mockerie seeme to aske, Why Apollo is never called Korymbos, that is to say, the killer of conger, nor Diana his sister Tergelobos, that is to say, a striker of barbelles, knowing that even Pennu, borne as she was of the sea, and instituting her sacrifices neere unto it, taketh no pleasure that anything should be killed. And moreover, ye wot well enough, that in the city of Leptis, the priests of Neptune eat nothing; that cometh out of the sea, as also that in the citie Elexus, whose who are professed religious, and admitted to the holy mysteries of Ceres, honour the barbell; 40 yea, and in the city of Argos the priestesse of Diana upon a devout reverence forbeareth to feed with this creature; for that these barbelles doe kill and destroy all that ever they can, the sea-hare, which is so venomous and so deadly a poison to man: in regard of which benefit, reported they are friendly unto mankind, and preservers of their health, and therefore honoured they be, and kept as sacrosanct: and yet you shall see in many cities of Greece, both temples and altars dedicated unto Diana surnamed Delphinia, as one would say, affected unto fishers nets: like as to Apollo Delphinus: for certeine it is, that the place which he especially chose above all others for his abode, the posteritie descended from the Cretans came to inhabit and people, being conducted thither by the guidance of a dolphin: and not because himselfe (as some fabulous writers report) being transformed into a dolphin, swam before their fleet; but surely a dolphin 50 he sent to direct those men in their navigation, and so he brought them to the bay of Cirra.

Also written it is in histories, that those who were sent by king Ptolomeus surnamed Soter, to the city Sinope, for to carie the god Serapis, together with their captaine Dionysius, were by force of winde and tempest driven against their willes beyond the cape or promontorie Malea, where they had Peloponnesus on the right hand; and when they wandered and were tossed to and fro upon the seas, not knowing where they were, making account they were lost and cast away, there shewed himselfe before the prow of their ship, a dolphin, which seemed to call unto them, and who who guided them unto those coasts where there were many commodious havens and faire bates for ships to harbour and ride in with safetie; and thus he conducted and accompanied their ship from place to place, untill at length he brought it within the rode of Cirra; where after they had sacrificed for their safe arrivall and landing, they understood that of two images there, they were to have away that of Pluto, and carrie it with them, but the other of Proserpina to leave behinde them, when they had taken onely the mould and patterne thereof. Probable it is therefore, that the god Apollo carried an affection to this dolphin, for that it loveth musike so well: whereupon the poet Pindarus comparing himselfe unto the dolphin, saith that he was provoked 10 and stirred up to musike by the leaping and dauncing of this fish,

*Like as the dolphin swimmes apace Directly forward to that place
Whereas the pleasant swarms doe sound,
And whence their noise doth soone rebound:
What time both winds and waves doe lie
At sea, and let no harme be.*

or rather we are to thinke that the god is well affected unto him, because he is so kind and loving unto man: for the onely creature it is, that loveth man for his owne sake, and in regard that he is a man: whereas of land-beasts, some you shall have that love none at all; others, and those that be of the tamest kinde, make much of those onely, of whom they have some use and benefit; 20 namely, such as feed them or converse with them familiarly, as the dogge, the horse and the elephant: and as for swallows, received though they be into our houses, where they have entertainment, and whatsoever they need, to wit, shade, harbour and a necessary retreat for their safetie, yet they be afraid of man, and shun him as if he were some savage beast; whereas the dolphin alone of all other creatures in the world, by a certeine instinct of nature, carrieth that sincere affection unto man, which is so much sought for and desired by our best philosphers, even without any respect at all of commoditie: for having no need at all of mans helpe, yet is he neverthelesse friendly and courteous unto all, and hath succoured many in their distresse; as the storie of Arien will testifie, which is so famous, as no man is ignorant thereof: and even you Aristotimus your owne selfe, rehearsed to very good purpose the example of Hesiodus:

*But yet by your good leave, my friend,
Of that your tale you made no end.*

for when you reported unto us the fidelitie of his dogge, you should have proceeded farther, and told out all, not leaving out (as you did) the narration of the dolphins: for surely the notice that the dogge gave, by baying, barking, and running after the murderers with open mouth, was (I may tell you) but a blinde presumption, and no evident argument. About the citie Nemius, the dolphins meeting with the dead corps of a man floating up and downe upon the sea, tooke it up and laied it on their backs, shifting it from one to another by turnes, as any of them were wearie with the carriage, and very willingly, yea, and as it should seeme, with great affection, they conveyed it as farre as to the port Rhium, where they laied it downe upon the shore, and so made 40 it known that there was a man murdered. Myrtilus the Lesbian writeth, that Aenaeus the Acolian being fallen in fantasie with a daughter of Phineus, who according to the oracle of Amphirite, was by the daughters of Penthem cast downe headlong into the sea, threw himselfe after her; but there was a dolphin tooke him up, and brought him safe unto the ille Lesbos. Over and besides, the affection and good will which a dolphin bare unto a young lad of the citie Sagor, was so hot and vehement, in the highest degree, that if ever one creature was in love with another, it was he; for there was not a day went over his head, but he would disport, play and swimme with him, yea, and suffer himselfe to be handled and tickled by him upon his bare skinn; and if the boy were disposed to mount aloft upon his backe, he would not refuse, nor seeme to avoide him; nay hee was verie well content with such a carriage, turning what way soever 50 hee reined him, or seemed to encline: and thus would hee doe in the presence of the Iasiens, who oftentimes would all runne forth to the sea side of purpose to behold this sight. Well on a daie above the rest, when this ladde was upon the dolphins backe, there fell an exceeding great shower of raine, together with a monstrous storme of haile; by reason whereof the poore boy fell into the sea, and there died: but the dolphin tooke up his bodie dead as it was, and together with it shut himselfe upon the land; neither would he depart from the corps so long as there was any life in him, and so died, judging it great reason to take part with him of his death, who seemed partly to be the cause thereof. In remembrance of which memorable accident, cident, the Latians represent the historie thereof stamped and printed upon their coine, to wit, a boy riding upon a dolphin; which storie hath caused that the fable or tale that goeth of Ceramus is beleev'd for a truth: for this Ceramus, as they say, borne in Paros, chanced to be upon a time at Byzantium, where seeing a great draught of dolphins taken up in a casting-net by the fishers, whom they meant to kill and cut into pieces, bought them all alive, and let them go againe into the sea. Not long after, it hapned that he sailed homeward in a foist of fiftie oares, which had aboard (by report) a number of pyrates and rovers; but in the streights betwene Naxos and Paros the vessel was cast away, and swallowed up in a gulf: in which shipwracke, when all the rest perished, he onely was saved, by meanes as they say of a dolphin, which comming under his bodie as he was newly plunged into the sea, bare him up, tooke him upon his backe, and carried to him as farre as to a certaine cave about Zacynthus, and there landed him: which place is shewed for a monument at this day, and after his name, is called Ceranium. upon this occasion, Archilochus the poet, is said to have made these verses:

*Off sicke men by tempest drown'd,
And left in sea all dead behind:
Ceeran alone alive was found,
God Neptune was to him so kind,*

Afterwards the said Ceramus himselfe died: and when his kinsfolke & friends burned his corps nere to the sea side in a funerall fire, many dolphins were discovered along the coast hard by the shore, shewing (as it were) themselves how they were come to honour his obsequies; for depart they would not before the whole solemnitie of this last dutie was performed. That the scutcheon or shield of Ulysses had for the badge or ensigne, a dolphin, Stesichorus hath testified, but the occasion and cause thereof, the Zacynthians report in this manner, as Critemus the historian beareth witnesse. Telemachus his sonne being yet an infant, chanced to slip with his feet, as men say, to fall into a place of the sea, where it was very deep; but by the means of certaine dolphins who tooke him as he fell, saved he was and carried out of the water: whereupon his father in a thankfull regard and honour to this creature, engraved within the collet of his signet, wherewith hee sealed the portrait of a dolphin, & likewise carried it as his armes upon his shield. But forasmuch as I protested in the beginning that I would relate to you no fables, and yet (I wot not how) in speaking of dolphins, I am carried farther than I was aware, and fallen upon Ulysses and Ceramus, somewhat beyond the bounds of likelihood and probabilitie, I will set a fine upon mine owne head, and even here for amends lay a straw and make an end. You therefore my masters who are judges, may when it pleaseth you proceed to your verdict.

S O C L A R U S.

As for us, we were of mind a good while since to say according to the sentence of Sophocles:

Your talke ere while which seem'd so disagree, Will soone accord and joint-wise framed be.

for if you will, both of you conferre your arguments, proofes and reasons which you have alledged of the one side and the other, and lay them all together in common betwene you, it will be seene how mightily you shall confute and put downe those who would deprive bruite beasts of all understanding and discourse of reason.

WHETHER THE ATHE- NIANS WERE MORE RE- NOWMED FOR MARTIALI ARMES OR GOOD LETTERS.

The Summarie.

WE have here the fragments of a pleasant discourse written in the favour of Athenian warriors and great captaines; which at this day hath neither beginning nor end, and in the middle is altogether maimed and imperfect: but that which the infortunatize of the times hath left unto us is such yet, as therout we may gather some good, and the intention of Plutarch is therein sufficiently discovered unto us: for he sheweth that the Athenians were more famous and excellent in feats of armes than in the profession of learning. Which position may seeme to be a strange paradox, considering that Athens was reputed the habitation of the muses: and if there were ever any brave historians, singular poets, and notable orators in the world, we are to looke for them in this citie. Yet for all this, he taketh upon him to prove that the prowess of Athenian captaines was without all comparison more commendable and praiseworthy than all the dexteritie of others, who at their leisure have written in the shade and within house the occurrences and accidents of the times, or exhibited pleasures and pastimes to the people upon the stage or scaffold. And to effect this intended purpose of his, he considereth in the first place, historiographers, and adjoineeth thereto a brieve treatise of the art of painting: and by comparison of two persons, bringing newes of a field fought, whereof the one was onely a beholder and looker on; the other an actor himselfe, and a souldier fighting in the battell, he sheweth that noble captaines ought to be preferred before historians, who pen and set downe their desseignes and executions. From history he passeth on to poesie, both comick and tragick, which he reproveth and debaseth, notwithstanding the Athenians made exceeding account thereof; giving to understand, that their valor consisted rather in martiall exploits. In the last place he speaketh of orators, and by conference of their orations and other reasons, proveth that the great speakers deserve not that place, as to have their words weighed in ballance against the deeds of so many polinike and valiant warriors.

WHETHER THE ATHENIANS were more renowned for martiall armes or good letters.

WELL said this was (in truth) of him unto those great captaines and commanders who succeeded him, unto whom hee made way and gave entrance to the executions of those exploits which they performed afterwards, when himselfe had to their hands chased out of Greece the barbarous king Xerxes, and delivered the Greeks out of servitude: but aswell may the same be said also to those who are proud of their learning and stand highly upon their erudition. For if you take away men of action, you shall be sure to have no writers of them: take away the polinike government of Pericles at home; the navall victories and trophies achieved by Phormio, nere the promontorie of Rhum; the noble prowesses of Nicias about the isle Cythera, as also before the cities of Corinth and Megara; take away the sea-fight of Demosthenes before Pylos; the foure hundred captives and prisoners of Cleon; the worthy deeds of Tolmias who scowred all the coasts of Peloponnesus; the brave acts of Myronides, and the battell which he woon against the Boeotians in the place called Oenophyta; and withall, you blot out the whole historie of Thucydides; take away the valiant service of Alcibiades shewed in Helleſpont; the rare manhood of Thraſylus neere unto the ille Leibos; the happie ſuppreſſion and abolition of the tyrannicall oligarchie of the thirty uſurpers, by Themistocles; take away the valourous endeouers of Thraſylus and Archippus, together with the rare deſignes and enterpriſes executed by thoſe ſeven hundred, who from Phyla roſe up in armes and were ſo hardie and reſolute as to leuie a power and wage warre againſt the lordly potentates of Sparta; and laſt of all Conon, who cauſed the Athenians to go to ſea againe and maintaine the warres; and therewithall, take away Cratippus and all his Chronicles. For as touching Xenophon, he was the writer of his owne hitorie, keeping a booke and commentarie of thoſe occurrents and proceedings which paſſed under his happie conduct and direction: and (by report) he gave it out in writing, that Themistocles the Syracuſian compoſed the ſaid narration of his acts, to the end that Xenophon might win more credit and be the better beleued, writing as he did of himſelfe as of a ſtranger, and withall, gratifying another man by that meanes with the honour of eloquence in digeſting and penning the ſame. All other hitorians beſides, as theſe, Clinodemi and Diylli, Philochorus and Philarchus, may be counted as it were the actors of other mens plaies: who ſetting downe the acts of kings, princes and great captaines, ſhrowded cloſe under their memorials, to the end that themſelves might have ſome part with them of their light and ſplendor. For ſurely there is a certaine image of glorie, which by a kinde of reflexion, as in a mirrour, doth rebound from thoſe who have achieved noble acts, even unto them that commit the ſame to writing, when as the actions of other men are repreſented by their reports and records.

Certes this city of Athens hath bene the fruitfull mother and kinde nourse of many and ſundry arts, whereof ſome ſhe firſt invented and brought to light; others ſhe gave growth, ſtrength, honour and credit unto. And among the reſt, the ſkill of painters craft hath not bene leaſt advanced and adorned by her. For Apollodorus the painter, the firſt man who deviſed the mixture of colours, and the manner of darkning them by the ſhadow, was an Athenian: over whole works was ſet this epigram by his owne ſelfe.

Sooner will one ſee this carpe and rive;

Than doe the like or ſample it.

So were Euphranor and Nicias, Aſclepiodorus alſo, and Pliſtanes the brother of Phidias, whereof ſome portraied victorious captaines, others painted battels, and others drew to the liſe the worthies and demigods: like as Euphranor who painted noble Theſeus, and ſet this picture as a paragon in compariſon with another of Parhaſius making; ſaying that the Theſeus of Parhaſius had eaten roſes, but his Theſeus had bene fed with good oxe beefe: for to ſay a trueth, that picture of Parhaſius was daintily and delicately made, reſembling in ſome ſort that which Euphranor talketh of; but he that ſhould ſee this of *Euphranor*s doing, might ſay (not unſuly) theſe verses out of Homer:

The people of Erechtheus ſont, whom Pallas, daughter deare Of Jupiter that mighty god, ſometime diſſeed and reare.

Euphranor alſo depainted the battell of horſemen before the citie Mantineia, againſt Epaminondas, which ſeemeth not to be without ſome furious and divine inſtinct. The argument and ſubject matter whereof was this: Epaminondas the Theban, after the battell which he won before the towne Leuctra, puffd up with glory in this greatneſſe of his, determined reſolutely to inſult over Sparta, which now was already downe the winde, and at once to tread and trample under foot the high ſpirit and reputation of that city. Firſt therefore he invaded Laconia with a mightie power of threeſcore and ten thouſand fighting men, ſpoiling and harrowing the countrey as he went; whereby he withdrew all the neighbour-nations from their confederacie and alliance with the Lacedaemonians. After this, when they put themſelves in battell ray, and made head againſt him before Mantineia, hee challenged and provoked them to fight: which they neither would nor durſt accept, expecting aid that ſhould come unto them from Athens. Whereupon he brake up his campe, and diſlodging in the night ſeaſon ſecretly and contrary to all mens expectation, entred againe into Laconia, in which journey and expedition he went within a litle of purſuing the cite of Sparta and winning it, naked as it was and without defendants. But the allies and confederates having intelligence of his comming, came with all ſpeed to ſuccour the citie.

citie. Then Epaminondas made ſemblance that hee would turne and bend his forces to the waſting and ſpoiling of their territorie, as hee had done before. Thus having by this ſtratagem deluded his enemies, and lulled them aſleepe in ſecuritie, hee departed ſuddenly by night out of Laconia, having over-runne and deſtroied all before him with great celeritie, and preſented himſelfe with his whole armie before them of Mantineia, who looked for nothing leſſe than ſuch a gueſt, but were in conſultation ſo to ſend helpe to Lacedaemon: but he interrupting & breaking their counſels, immediatly commanded the Thebans to arme, who being brave & couragious ſouldiours, inveſted the city of Mantineia round about, ſtoke up the alarme and gave an aſſault. The Mantineans heereat aſtonied, ran up and downe the ſtreets, howling and wailing, as being not able to ſuſtaine, and much leſſe put backe ſo great a puiffance, which all at once in manner of a violent ſtreame, came running upon them; neither did they thinke of any aid or meanes to relieve themſelves in this diſtreſſe. But at the very point of this extremity, the Athenians were diſcovered, deſcending from the hilles downe into the plaines of Mantineia, who knowing nothing of this ſudden ſurpriſe and preſent danger wherein the citie ſtood, marched ſoſly, and tooke leiſure; but when they were advertiſed heereof by a vaine courtier who made meanes to get forth of the city; notwithstanding they were but a handfull in compariſon of the great multitude of their enemies, and withall ſomewhat wearie with their journey, and not ſeconded with any other of their allies and aſſociates; they advanced forward, and put themſelves in order of battell againſt their enemies, who were in number many for one: the horſemen alſo for their parts being likewiſe arranged, ſet ſpurs to their horſes, and rode hard to the gates and walles of the city, where they charged their enemies ſo hotly with their horſes, and gave them ſo cruell a battell, that they gat the upper hand, and reſcued Mantineia out of the danger of Epaminondas. Now had Euphranor painted this conflict moſt lively in a table, wherein a man might have ſcene the furious encounter, the couragious charge and bloudie fight, wherein both horſe and man ſeemed to puffe and blow againe for winde.

But I ſuppoſe you will not compare the wit or judgement of a painter, with the courage and policy of a captaine, nor endure thoſe, who preferre a painted table before a glorious trophie; or the vaine ſhadow before the reall ſubſtance and thing indeed: howſoever Simondes ſaid that picture was a dumbe poeſie, and poeſie a ſpeaking picture: for looke what things or actions painters doe ſhew as preſent and in manner as they were in doing, writings doe report and record as done and paſt; and if the one repreſent them in colours and figures, and the other exhibite the ſame in words and ſentences, they differ both in matter and alſo in manner of imitation, howbeit both the one and the other ſhoote at one end, and have the ſame intent and purpoſe. And hee is counted the beſt hitorian who hath the ſkill to ſet out a narration, as in a painted table with divers affections, and ſundry conditions of perſons, as with many images and portraictures. And verily this may appeere in Thucydides, who throughout his whole hitorie contendeth to attaine unto this diluciditie of ſtile, ſtriving to make the auditour of his wordes the ſpectatour as it were of the deeds therein contained, and deſirous to imprint in the readers the ſame paſſions of aſtoniſhment, wonder and agony, which the very things themſelves would worke when they are repreſented to the eie. For Demosthenes who put the Athenians in ordinance of battell, even upon the very ſands and ſhore within the creeke of Pylos; and Brasidas who haſtening the pilot of his galley to runne with the prow a land, walking along the hatches himſelfe, and being there wounded and ready to yeeld up his vitall breath, ſunke downe among the ſeats of the rowers; alſo the Lacedaemonians who fought a battell at ſea, as if they had bene on firme land: the Athenians likewiſe who upon the land embattailed themſelves, and fought as if they had bene within their gallies at ſea againe, in the Sicilian warre: the deſcription which he maketh of the two armies arranged on the land, hard by the ſea ſide, to behold their men fighting a navall battell, wherein the victory hung a long time in equall ballance, and inclined neither to the one ſide nor the other, by occasion of which doubtfull iſſue, they were in an intolerable agony, diſtreſſe, and perplexity, to behold the ſundry encounters and reciprocall charges and recharges, communicating their violence and heat of contention even to the very bodies of the beholders upon the ſtrond, who puffing, blowing, panting, and ſweating in as great paine and feare, as if they had bene perſonally in the very conflict: the orderly diſpoſition, the graphically deſcription and the lively narration which he maketh of all this, what is it but an evident representation of a picture? Now if it be not meet to compare painters with captaines, there is as litle reaſon to ſet hitorians in compariſon with them.

He who brought the newes of the battell and victorie at Marathon, as Heraclides of Pontus writeth, was one Thersippus of Eroe, or as most historians report, it was one Euclees, who came running in a great heat from the field in his armour as he was, and knocking at the gates of the principall mens houses of Athen, was able to say nothing else but this, ῥητορ, ἔρχομαι, that is to say, rejoyce yee, all is well with us, and therewith his breath failed, and so he gave up the ghost, and yet this man came and brought tidings of that battell wherein himselfe was an actour. But tell me I pray you; if there were some goat-herd or neat-herd, who from the toppes of an hill or an high banke, had beheld a farre off this great service, and indeed greater than any words can expresse, should have come into the city with newes thereof, not wounded himselfe, nor having lost one droppe of blood, and for his good tidings demaund afterwards to have the same honors and memorials which were graunted unto Cynegirus, to Callimachus, and Polyxetus, onely becaule forthwith he had made report of the doughty deeds, the wounds and death of these brave men; would you not thinke that he surpassed all the impudencie that can be imagined? considering especially, that the Lacedaemonians, by report, sent unto him who brought the first word of the victory at Mantineia, which Thucydides described in his story, a peece of flesh from one of their dinners, or hals, called Fichititia, for a recompence of his happy newes? And (to say a truth) what are historiographers else; but certeine messengers to relate and declare the acts of others, having a loud and audible voice, and who by their pleasant eloquence and significant phrases, are able to set forth the matter to the best, which they take in hand: unto whom they owe indeed the reward due for good tidings, who first doe light upon their compositions, and have the first reading of them: for surely, praised they bee onely when they make mention of such exploits, and read they be in regard of those singular persons whom they make knowne, as the authours and actours thereof. Neither are they the goodly words and fine phrases in histories that performe the deeds, or deserve so greatly to be heard: for even poetry hath a grace, and is esteemed, for that it describeth and relateth things as if they had beene done, and which carie a resemblance of truth: and according as Homer in one place saith:

*Many false tales how for to tell,
Much like to truthe, she knowes full well.*

And it is reported, that one of Alexanders familiar friends said unto him upon a time: Alexander, the Bacchanale feasts are at hand, and hast not thou yet done thy comedy? who returned him this answer: Yes iwis have I, so helpe me the gods, composed it I say, I have: for the matter thereof is laid forth, and the disposition digested already; there remaineth no more to be done, but onely to set thereto the verses that must go to it. So that you see that the poets themselves reputed the things and deeds more necessary and important than words and speech. The famous courtizan Corinna one day reprooved Pindarus, who then was a yoong man, and tooke a great pride in himselfe, for his learning and knowledge: Thou hast no skill at all Pindarus (quoth she) in poeetrie, for that thou doest not invent and devise fables, which is indeed the proper and peculiar worke of poeisie; as for thy tongue, it ministreth some rhetorically figures, catachrefes and metaphrases, songs, muscally measures and numbers, unto the matter and argument onely, as pleasant sauces to commend the fame. Pindarus pondering well these words and admonitions of hers, thought better of the matter, and thereupon out of his poetically veine, powred out this canticke:

*Imenus, or the lancee with staffe of gold,
Sir Cadmus, or that faerie race of old,
Which dragons teeth they say sometime did yeeld,
Of warriors brave, when fowen they were in field:
Or Hercules who was in such account,
And his maine force of body, so surmount, &c.*

Which when he had shewed to Corinna, she woman laughed a good, & said: That come should be sowne out of ones hand, and not immediately from out of the full sacke: for in truthe much so after this sort had Pindarus gathered and heaped up a miscellane deale of fables, and powred them forth all huddle together in this one canticke. But that poeisie consisteth much in the fine invention of fables, Plato himselfe hath written: and verily a fable or tale is a false narration, resembling that which is true, and therefore farre remote it is from the thing indeed, if it be so, that a narration is the image of an act done, & a fable the image or shadow of a narration. Whereupon this may be inferred, that they who devise and feigne fabulous deeds of armes, are so much inferiour to historiographers that make true reports, as historiographers who relate onely

onely such deeds come behinde the actours and authours themselves. Certes this city of Athen had never any excellent or renowned worke-men in the feat of poeetrie, no not so much as in the Lyrick part thereof, which professeth muscally odes and songs: for Cynestus seemeth to have made his dithyrambes or canticles in the honor of Bacchus, hardly and with much ado, and was himselfe barren and of no grace or gift at all; besides, he was so mocked and flouted by the comicall poets, that he grew to be of no reckoning and reputation, but incurred an ill and odious name: As for that part of poeetrie which dealeth in representation of personages in plaies upon a stage, so small account they made at Athen of the Comedians and their professions; nay they disdaind and scorned it so much, that a law there was enacted, forbidding expressely, that no senator of the counsell Areopagus, might make a comedy: contrariwise, the tragicke flourished, and was in much request, for delivering the best care-sport, and representing the most wonderfull spectacle that men in those daies could heare or behold; giving both unto fictions, & affections a deceivable power, which was of such a propertie, according to the saying of Gorgias: That he who deceived thereby, was more just than he who deceived not; and he who was deceived became wiser than he that was not deceived at all: the deceiver (I say) was more just, becaule he performed that which he promised, and the deceived person wiser; for that such as are not altogether grosse, doltish, and senselesse, are soonest caught with the pleasure and delight of words.

To come now to the maine point: what profit ever brought these excellent tragedies unto the citie of Athen, comparable unto that which the prudent policie of Themistocles effected in causing the walles of the citie to be built? or to the vigilant care and diligence of Pericles, who adorned the citie and citadell with so many beautifull buildings; or to the valour of Miltiades who delivered the citie from the danger of servitude; or to the brave minde of Cimon, who advanced that State to the soveraignie and command of all Greece? If the learning of Euipides, the eloquence of Sophocles, or the sweet and pleasant tongue of Aeschylus had freed them from any perils and extremities, or purchased and procured them any glory more than they had before, good reason peradventure it were, to compare poetically fictions and inventions with warlike triumphs and trophies; to set the theater against the generals pavilion and palace; and to oppose the schooling and teaching of plaies how to act comedies and tragedies, unto prowess and brave feats of armes. Will you that we bring in place the personages themselves? carrying with them the marks, badges & ensignes that testifie their deeds, and allow either of them entrance apart by themselves, and passage along by us. Then let there march on the one side poets with their flutes, harps, lutes and viols, singing and saying:

*Silence, my masters, or all words of good:
Depart be must, there is no remedy,
Our learning here who never under stood,
And hath no skill in play or tragedie:
Whose tongue is simple, or who in melody
And dance unexpressed that doth belong
To service of the sacred muses nine,
Or who is not possessed by the tongue
To Bacchus rites of bell-god Cratine.*

Let them bring with them their furniture, their vestments and players apparel, their masks, their altars, their rolling engins and devices to be turned and removed to & fro about the stage and scaffold, together with their trevets of gold the prizes of their victories. Let them be accompanied with their traine, of players and actours, to wit Nicofrates, Callipides, Meniscus, and Pollus, and such as they, attending upon a tragedie, to trick and trim her, or to beare up her traine, and carry her litter, as if she were some stately and sumptuous dame; or rather as enamellers, guilders, and painters of images following after. Let there be provision made I say of abilliments, of visours, of purple mantles & royall robes of estate, of fabricks & pageants deviled to stand and be employed upon the stage, of dancers, jelllers, of stage keepers, waiters & henchmen a troublesome sort and rable of grooms: and in one word let there be brought all the geere and implements belonging to such plaies exceeding costly & chargeable: such as when a Laconian saw upon a time and wisely beheld, brake out into this speech, and that to very good purpose: & how farre amisse and out of the way are the Athenians, to dispend so much mony, and employ such serious study in games and fooleries: surely they defray in the furniture and setting out of a theater, as much as would serve to set ashore a royall armada at sea, and mainteine a puissant army upon the land. For he that would set downe and cast account, how much every comædie cost them, shall find that the people of Athens spent more in exhibiting the tragedies of Bacche, Phenisse, of both the Oedipodes, &c. of Antigon, or in representing the calamities of Medea and Electra, than they disbursed in their wars against the Barbarians, either to win the soveraignty and dominion over them, or to defend their owne freedom and libertie: for many times their great captaines and commanders led forth their souldiers to battell, having made proclamation before, for to carrie with them such victuals as * required no fire for their dressing. This is certeine, that the captaines of galleies and war-ships, for their sailers, having provided no other cates and viands, but meale, onions and cheefe for their mariners, as well rowers as sailers, have to embarked them & gone to sea: whereas the wardens and Aediles who were to set forth plaies and dances have (to their great cost) fed their actors and plaiers with delicate eeles, with tender lectues, with cloves of garlick, and with good marrow-bones, feasting them a long time before, most deintilie, and whiles they did nought els but exercise their voice, scowle their throats and cleere their breasts, they made good cheere full merrily. And what good had these wastefull spenders of their goods (spent about such vanities) in the end? If their plaies sped nor well, but lost the victorie, they were well mocked, hissed and laughed at for all their paines and cost: but say they went away winners and having the better hand, what got they by it? surely not a trevet or threefooted stoole nor any other marke and monument of victorie, as Demetrius said, but to remaine a lamentable example of unthrifts, who have laied all they had upon toies and fooleries, and left behinde them their houses like emptic sepulchres and imaginarie toms. This is the end that commeth of such expensës about poetrie; and no greater honour is to be looked for.

Now on the other side, let us beholde likewise their brave captaines and warriours: and while these passe along,

*There should indeed be silence or good words:
They ought to void out of this company,
Whom live, and never drew their swords
In field, or serv'd with care and agonie
In common weale: whose heart would never stand
To such exploits, whose minds be like profane,
Who neither by Miltiades his hand,
That slew the Medes nor by the Persians bane, Themistocles, was ever institute,
And sworn to lawes of knight hood resolute,*

Yea marry, heere (me thinks) I see a martiall maske, and brave shew toward: set out with squadrons embattell'd on land, with fleetes arranged for to fight at sea, laden and heavily charged with rich spoiles and glorious trophæes:

*Alas! Alala, daughter deare,
Of bloody warre, come forth and heare.*

Behold and see a Forrest of pikes and launces in the fore-front, the very preamble and flourish<sup>40</sup> before the battell: me thinks I heare one of them refund: Embrace death most hardy knights, the best sacrifice and most sant oblations, that is, (for so saith Epaminondas the Thebane) fighting valiantly, and exposing your selves to the most honorable and bravest services that be in defence of countrey, of your auncestors tombes and sepulchres, and of your temples and religion: mee thinks also I see their victories, coming toward mee in solemne pompe and procession, not drawing or leading after them for their prize and reward, an ox or a goat; neither be the said victories crowned with ivie, or smelling strong of new wine in the lees, as the Bacchanales doe; but they have in their traine, whole cities, islands, continents, and firme lands, as well mediterranean as maritime sea-coasts, together with new colonies of ten thousand men a peece, to be planted heere and there; and withall, crowned they be and adorned on every side with trophæes, with triumphes, pillage and booty of all forts; the ensignes, badges, and armes that these victorious captaines give; the images also that they represent in shew, be their stately & beautiful temples, as the Parthenon, the Hecatompesos; their city walles on the south side, the arcenals to receive & lodge their ships; their beautiful porches and galleries; the province of the demy isle Chersonesus, & the city Amphipolis; as for the plaine of Marathon, it goeth before the laureat garland and victorie of Miltiades; Solanus accompanieth that of Themistocles, trampling under his feet, and going over the broken timber and shipwracke of a thousand vessels:

vessels: as for the victory of Cimon, it bringeth with it an hundred Phœnician great galleies, from the rivers Eurymedon: that of Demosthenes and Cleon, comes from Sphaetria, with the targe of captain Brasidas wonne in the field, and a number of his souldiers captive and bound in chaines: the victory of Conon, walled the city, and that of Thrasibulus reduced the people with victorie and liberty from Phyle: the sundry victories of Alcibiades set upright the State of the city, which by the infortunat overthrow in Sicilia, reeled, and was ready to fall to the ground; and by the battels fought by Nelem and Androclous in Lydia and Caria: Greece saw all Jona raised up againe and supported. And if a man demand of each one of the other victories, what benefit hath accrued unto the city by them? one will name the isle Lesbos, and another Samos: 10 one will speake of the Euxine sea, and another of five hundred galleies, and he shall have another talke of ten thousand talents; over and above the honour and glory of trophæes. These be the causes why this city doeth solemnize and celebrate so many festivall daies, and hereupon it is that it oftenth sacrifices as it doeth to the gods; not iwis for the victory of Aeschylus or Sophocles, nor for the prizes of poetry: no, nor when Carcinus lay with Aeolus or * Affidamus with Hæstor: But upon the sixth of May, even to this present day, the city holdeth festivall the memory of that victory, in the plaines of Marathon: and the sixth day of [ * another * ] moneth, maketh a solemne offering of wine unto the gods, in remembrance of that victorie which Chabrias obtained neere unto the isle Naxos: and upon the 12 day of the same moneth, there is another sacrifice likewise performed in the name of a thanks-giving to the gods, for their liberty recovered, because upon the same day those citizens which were prisoners and in bondage within Phyle, came downe and returned into the city: upon the third day of March they wonne the famous field of Plataea: and the sixteenth day of the said March, they consecrated to Diana; for on that day this goddesse shone bright, and it was full moone, to the victorious Greeks, before the isle of Salamu. The noble victory which they achieved before the citie of Marinea, made the twelfth day of September more holy, and with greater solemnity observed, for upon that day when all other their allies and associates were discomfited and put to flight, they onely by their valour wonne the field, and erected a trophæe over their enemies who were upon the point of victory. See what hath raised this city to such grandence! Lo what hath exalted it to so high a pitch of honor! and this was the cause that Pindarus called the city of Athens, the pillar that supported Greece; not for that by the tragedies of Phrynichus or Thespis, it set the fortune of the Greeks upright, but in regard of this, that as himselfe writeth in another place, along the coast of Artemisium:

*Where Athens youth as poet Pindar said,
Off freedom first the glorious ground worke laid.*

And afterwards at Salamis, at Mysale, and Plataea, having setled it firme and strong as upon a rocke of diamonds, they delivered it from hand to hand unto others.

But haply some man will say: True it is indeed, all that ever poets doe, are no better than sports and pastimes: But what say you to oratours, they seeme to have some prerogative and ought to be compared with martiall captaines: whereupon it may seeme, as Aeschines scoffing<sup>40</sup> merily, and quipping at Demosthenes said: That there is some reason why the barre or pulpit for publicke orations, may commence action and processe against the tribunall seat of generals, and their chaire of estate. Is it then meer and reasonable that the oration of Hyperides intitled Plataicus, should be preferred before the victory which Aristides wonne before the city Plataea? or the oration of Lysias against the thirty tyrants, goe before the massacre and execution of them performed by Thrasibulus and Archias? or that of Aeschines against Timarchus, being accused for keeping harlots, and a brothell house, before the aide that Phocion brought into the city of Byzantium, besieged? by which succour he impeached the Macedonians, and repressed their insolent villanies and outrages committed in abusing the children of the Athenian confederates? or shall we compare the oration of Demosthenes as touching the crowne, with<sup>50</sup> those publicke and honorable coronets which Themistocles received for setting Greece free? considering that the most excellent place of all the said oration, and fullest of eloquence is that wherein the said oratour conjureth the soules of those their auncestors, and citeth them for witness, who in the battell of Marathon exposed their lives with such resolution for the saffie of Greece? or shall we put in balance to weigh against woorthy warriours, these that in schooles teach young men rhetoricke, namely, such as Isocrates, Antiphon, and Isæus? But certeine it is, that this city honored those valiant captaines with publicke funerals, and with great devotion gathered up the reliques of their bodies; yea, and the same orator canonized them for gods in heaven, when he swore by them, although he followed not their steps: and Socrates who extolled and highly praised those who manfully fought & willing were to spend their hartbloud in the battell of Marathon, saying, that they made so little account of their lives, as if their owne and soules had bene else-where, & other mens in their bodies, magnifying this their resolution, and the small reckoning which they made of this life; yet when himselfe was very old, upon occasion that one asked him how he did: answered: I doe even as an aged man, (having above 90. yeeres upon my backe) may do; and who thinketh death to be the greatest misery in the world: piece of motion; not with bearing armes in the field; not by rowing in the gallies: but forsooth 10 with couching, knitting, and gluing as it were together rhetorical tropes and figures; to wit, his anatheta, consisting of contraries, his parisi, standing upon equall weight and measure of his syllables, his homoeoptata, precisely observing the like termination, and falling even of his clauses, polishing, smoothing, and perusing his periods and sentences, not with the rough hammer and pickaxe, but with the file and plainer most exactly. No marvell then, if the man could not abide the rustling of harness, and clattering of armour; no marvell (I say) if hee feared the 20 shock and encounter of two armies, who was afraid that one vowel should runne upon another, and leif he should pronounce a clause or number of a sentence which wanted one poore syllable: for the very morrow after that Miltiades had wonne that field upon the plaines of Marathon, he returned with his victorious armie into the citie of Athens: and Pericles having vanquished and subdued the Samians within the space of nine moneths, gloried more than Agamemnon did, who had much adoe to winne Troie, at the tenth yeeres end: whereas Socrates spent the time well neere of three, Olympiades in penning one oration which hee called Panegyricum: notwithstanding all that long time, he never served in the warres, nor went in any embassage: he built no city, nor was sent out as a captaine of a galley and warre-shipp, and yet that verie time brought forth infinit warres: But during the space that Timotheus delivered the 30 idle Eubæa out of bondage; all the while that Chabrias warred at sea about the island Naxos, and Iphicrates defeated and hewed in pieces one whole regiment of the Lacedæmonians, neere the port of Lechaum, and in which time the people of Athens having enfranchised all cities, subdued Greece throughout with the same libertie of giving voices in the generall assemblie of the States, as they had themselves, hee sat at home in his house poring at his booke, seeking out proper phrases and choise words for the said oration of his; in which space, Pericles raised great porches, and the goodly temple Hecatompedes; and yet the comickall poet Cratinus, scoffing even at this Pericles, for that he went but slowly about his works, speaketh thus as touching his 40 wal, halfe done and halfe undone:

*In words long since our Pericles, hath rear'd us up a wall,
But in effect and very deed, he doth nothing at all.*

Consider now I pray you a little, the base minde of this great professour of rhetoricke, who spent the ninth part of his life, in composing of one onely oration: but were it meet and reasonable to compare the orations of Demosthenes as he was an orator, with the martiall exploits of Demosthenes being a captaine; namely, that which he made against the considerate folly of Conon, with the trophees which himselfe erected before Pylus, or that which hee wrote against Anasthufus as concerning slaves, with his woorthy service, whereby hee brought the Lacedæmonians to be slaves: neither in this respect, for that he composed one oration for the granting of free bounges to those who were newly come to inhabit Athens, therefore hee deserved as much honour as Alcibiades did, who combined the Mantineans and Elians in one 50 league to be associates with the Athenians against the Lacedæmonians:

and yet this must needs be confessed, that his publicke orations deserved this praise, that in his Philippiques, he inciteth the Athenians to take armes, and commendeth the enterprife of Leptines.

WHETHER OF THE TWAINE IS MORE PROFITABLE, FIRE OR WATER.

The Summarie.

IN this Academicke declamation, Plutarch in the first places allegeth the reasons which ascribe more profit unto water. Secondly, he proposeth those that are in favor of the fire: whereunto hee seemeth the rather to incline, although hee resolveth not: wherein he followeth his owne manner of philosophizing upon naturall causes; namely, not to dispute either for or against ones thing: leaving unto the reader his owne libertie, to settle unto that which he shall see to be more probable.

WHETHER OF THE TWAINE is more profitable, Fire or Water.

HE water is of all things best,
And golde like fire is in request.
Thus said the poet Pindarus: whereby it appeareth evidently, that he gives the second place unto fire. And with him accordeth Hesiodus when he saith:
Chaos was the formost thing
In all the world that had being.
For this is certene, that the most part of ancient philosophers called water by the name of Chios, ἑὸν αἶμα, that is to say, for that it followeth so easily. But if we should stand onely upon testimonies about this question, the prooffe would be caried equally on both sides: for that there be in manner as many who thinke fire to be the primitive element and principle of all things, and the very 40 seed which as of it selfe it produceth all things, so it receiveth likewise all into it selfe, in that universall conflagration of the world. But leaving the testimonies of men, let us consider apart the reasons of the one and the other, and see to whether side they will rather draw us. First therefore, to begin withall, may not this be laied for a ground? that a thing is to be judged more profitable, whereof we have at all times and continually need, and that in more quantitie than another? as being a toole or necessarie instrument, and as it were a friend at all seasons and every house, and such as a man would say, presenteth it selfe evermore to doe us service? As for fire, certainly, it is not alwaies commodious unto us; nay, contrariwise, it otherwhiles doth molest and trouble us; and in that regard we withdraw our selves farre from it: whereas water serveth our turnes both in Winter and Summer, when wee are sicke, and when wee are whole, by 50 night and by day; neither is there any time or season, wherein a man standeth in no need of it. And this is the reason that they call the dead, ἄνεμους, as one would say ἀνεμωδῶς, that is to say, without juice, or wanting moisture, and so by consequence deprived of life. Moreover, without fire a man hath oft continued a long time, but without water never. And withall, that which hath bene from the first beginning and creation of man, is more profitable than that which was invented afterwards. And there is no question, but that nature hath given us the one, to wit, water, for our necessarie use; but the other (I meane fire) either fortune or industrie hath devised and found out as an appendant and accessorie. Neither can it be said, what time of the world 60

it was when as man had no water: nor ever read we in any records that one of the gods or demi-gods was the inventor thereof; for it was at the very instant with them: nay, what and we say that it gave them their being? But the use of fire was but yesterday or the other day, to speake of, it found out by Prometheus: so that the time was when as men lived without fire; but void of wa-found out by Prometheus: so that the time was when as men lived without fire; but void of water, our life never was. Now that this is no devised poetical fiction, this daily and present life of ours doth plainly testifie: for there be at this day in the world diyers nations that are mainteined our doth plainly testifie: for there be at this day in the world diyers nations that are mainteined without fire, without house, without hearth or chimney, diving abroad in the open wide aire,
 And Diogenes the Cynicke, feldome or never had any use of fire, inasmuch as having upon a without fire, without house, without hearth or chimney, diving abroad in the open wide aire, time swallowed downe a polype fish raw: Loc (quoth he) my masters, how for your sake we put our selves in jeopardie: howbeit, without water there was never any man thought that either we might live honestly and civilly, or that our nature would possibly endure it. But what need is there that I should particularize thus, and go so neere, as to search farre into the nature of man?
 considering that whereas there be so many, or rather so infinit kinds of living creatures, mankind onely in a maner knoweth the use of fire: whereas all the rest have their nourishment and food without the benefit of fire. Those that broue, feed, sic and creepe, get their living by eating herbes, roots, fruits and flesh, all without fire: but without water there is not one that can live, neither going or creeping on the land nor swimming in the sea, nor yet flying in the aire.
 True it is, I must needs say, that Aristotle writeth, how some beasts there be, even of those that devour flesh, which never drunke; but in very truth, nourished they be by some moisture.
 Well then, that is more profitable without which no maner of life can consist or endure. Proceed we farther, & passe from those living creatures which use to feed upon plants & fruits, even unto the same that are by us & them used for food: Some of them there be, which have no heat at all: others so little, as it can not be perceived. Contrariwise, moisture is that which causeth all kind of seeds to chur, to bud, to grow, and in the end to bring forth fruit: for what need I to alledge for this purpose either wine and oile, or other liquors which we draw, presse out, or milke forth out of beasts paps, which we do see daily before our eies: considering that even our wheat which seemeth to be a drie nutriment, is engendered by the transmutation, putrefaction and diffusion of moisture. Furthermore, that is to be held more profitable, which bringeth with it no hurt nor damage: but we all know that fire, if it breake forth, get head and be at libertie, is the most pernicious thing in the world: whereas the nature of water of it selfe doth never any harme.
 Againe, of two things, that is held to be more commodious which is the simpler, and without preparation can yeeld the profit which it hath: but fire requireth alwaies some succour and matter, which is the reason that the rich have more of it than the poore, and princes than private persons; whereas water is so kind and courteous, that it giveth it selfe indifferently to all sorts of people: it hath no need at all of tooles or instruments to prepare it for use; compleat and perfect it is in it selfe, without borrowing ought abroad of others. Over and besides, that which becomes multiplied as it were and augmented, loseth the utilitie and profit that it had, is by consequence lesse profitable: and such is fire, resembling herein a ravenous wild beast, which devoureth and consumeth all that it commeth neere; in so much as it were by the industrie and ar-tificiall meanes of him who knoweth how to use it with moderation, rather than of the owne nature, that it doth any good at all; whereas water is never to be feared. Againe, of two things, that which can do good being both alone, and also in the company of the other, is the more profitable of the twaine: but so it is, that fire willingly admitteth not the fellowship of water, nor by the participation thereof is any way commodious; whereas water is together with fire profitable, as we may see by the fountains of hot water how they be medicinable, and verie sensibly is their helpe perceived. Never shall a man meet with any fire moist; but water as well hot as colde is ever more profitable to man. Moreover, water being one of the foure elements hath produced as one may say, a fit, to wit the sea, and the same well neere as profitable as any one of the rest for many other causes besides, but principally in regard of commerce and trafficke. For whereas before time, mans life was savage, and they did not communicate one with another; this element hath conjoined and made it perfect, bringing societie and working amitie among men by mutuall succours and reciprocall retributions from one to the other. Heraclitus saith in one place: if there were no sunne, there had beene no night; and even as well may it be said; Were it not for the sea, man had beene the most savage creature; the most penurious and needie, yea and the least respected in all the world: whereas now this element of the sea hath brought the vine out of the Indians as farre as Greece; and from Greece hath transported it unto the farthest provinces: likewise from out of Phania, the use of letters for preservation of the memorie of things:

things: it hath brought wine: it hath conveyed fruits into these parts, and hath beene the cause that the greatest portion of the world was not buried in ignorance. How then can it bee otherwise, that water should not be more profitable, since it furnisheth us with another element?

But on the contrarie side, peradventure a man may begin hereupon to make instance oppositely in this manner: saying, that God, as a master-workman having the foure elements before him, for to frame the fabrick of this world withall; which being repugnant and refusing one another, earth and water were put beneath, as the matter to be formed and fashioned; receiving order and disposition, yea and a vegetative power to engender and breed such as is imparted unto it by the other two, aire and fire, which are they that give forme and fashion unto them, yea and excite the other twaine to generation, which otherwise had lien dead without any motion.
 But of these two, fire is the chiefe and hath dominion, which a man may evidently know by this induction. For the earth if it be not enchaied by some hot substance, is barren, & bringeth forth no fruit: but when as fire spreadeth it selfe upon it, it infuseth into it a certaine power, which causeth it to swell (as it were) and have an appetite to engender. For other cause there can bee none rendered why rocks, cliffs, and mountaines be barren and drie, but this, that they have either no fire at all, or else participate verie little the nature thereof: in summe, so farre off is water from being of it selfe sufficient for the owne preservation or generation of other things, that without the aide of fire it is the cause of the owne ruine and destruction. For heat it is that keepeth water in good estate, and preserveth it in her nature and proper substance, like as it doth all things besides: and looke where fire is away or wanteth, there water doth corrupt and putrifie; in such sort as the ruine and destruction of water, is the default of heat, as we may evidently see in pools, marshes, and standing waters, or whersoever water is kept within pits and holes without issue;
 for such waters in the end become putrified and stinke againe, because they have no motion, which having this propertie to stirre up the naturall heat which is in everie thing, keepeth those waters better which have a current and runne apace; in that this motion preserveth that kind heat which they have. And hereupon it is, that To live, in Greece is expressed by to, for that to sig-nifieth to boile. How then can it otherwise be, that of two things it should not be more profitable which giveth being and essence to the other, like as fire doth unto water? Furthermore, that thing, the utter departure whereof is the cause that a creature dieth, is the more profitable: for this is certaine and manifest, that the same without which a thing cannot bee, hath given the cause of being unto the same when it was with it. For we do see that in dead things there is a moisture, neither are they dried up altogether; for otherwise moist bodies would not putrifie, considering that putrefaction is the turning of that which is drie to be moist, or rather the corruption of humours in the flesh; and death is nothing else but an utter defect and extinction of heat: and therefore dead things be extreme cold, inasmuch as if a man should set unto them the very edge of rasours, they are enough to dull the same through excessive cold. And we may see plainly, that in the verie bodies of living creatures, those parts which participate least of the nature of fire, are more senselesse than any other, as bones and haire, and such as be farthest removed from the heart: and in manner all the difference that is betwene great and small creatures, proceedeth from the presence of fire; more or lesse: for humiditie simply it is not, that bringeth forth plants and fruits; but warme humiditie is it that doth the deed: whereas cold waters be either barren altogether, or not verie fruitful and fertile; and yet if water were of the owne nature fructuous, it must needs follow, that it selfe alone and at all times should be able to produce fruit: whereas we see it is cleane contrarie; namely, that it is rather hurtfull to fruits.

And now to reason from another head and go another way to worke, to make use of fire as it is fire, need we have not of water; nay, it hurteth rather, for it quencheth and putteth it out cleane: on the other side many there be who cannot tell what to doe with water without fire, for being made hot it is more profitable, and otherwise in the owne kinde hurtfull. Of two things so therefore, that which can do good of it selfe without need of the others helpe, is better and more profitable. Moreover water yeeldeth commodity but after one sort onely, to wit, by touching, as when we seele it or wash and bathe with it: whereas fire serveth all the five senses & doth them good: for it is felt both neere at hand and also fenee afare of: so that among other meanes that it hath of profitting, no man may account the multiplicity of the uses that it affordeth: for that a man should be at any time without fire it is impossible: nay he cannot have his first generation without it: and yet there is a difference in this kinde, as in all other things. The very sea it selfe is made more commodious by heat, so as it doth heat more by the agitation and current that

that it hath, than any other waters: for of it selfe otherwise it differeth not. Also for such as have no need of outward fire, we may not say that they stand in need of none at all; but the reason is because they have plenty and store of naturall heat within them; so that in this very point, the commodity of fire ought to be esteemed the more. And as for water, it is never in that good state, but some need it hath of helpe without: whereas the excellencie of fire is such, as it is content with it selfe, and requirerh not the aid of the other. Like as therefore, that capitaine is to be repured more excellent, who knowes to order and furnish a citie so as it hath no need of forren allies; so we are to thinke that among elements, that is the woorthier, which may often times consist without the succour and aide of another. And even as much may be said of living creatures, which have least need of others helpe. And yet haply it may be replied contrariwise, that the thing is more profitable which we use alone by it selfe, namely, when by discourefe of reason we are able to chuse the better. For what is more commodious and profitable to men than reason? and yet there is none at all in brute beasts. And what followeth hereupon? Shall we inferre therefore that it is lesse profitable, as invented by the providence of a better nature, which is god? But since we are fallen into this argument: What is more profitable to mans life than is god? But there is no art which fire devised not, or at least wise doth not maintaine: And hereupon it is, that we make Vulcan the prince and master of all arts. Furthermore, whereas the time and space of life is very short that is given unto man, as short as it is, yet sleepe as, Ariston saith, like unto a false baily or publicane, taketh the halfe thereof for it selfe. True it is, that a man may lie awake, and not sleepe all night long; but I may aswell say that his waking would serve him in small stead, were it not that fire presented unto him the commodities of the day, and put a difference betweene the darkenesse of the night and the light of the day. If then there be nothing more profitable unto man than life, why should we not judge fire to be the best thing in the world, since it doth augment and multiply our life? Over and besides, that of which the five senses participate most, is more profitable: but evident it is, that there is not one of the said senses makeh use of the nature of water apart and by it selfe, unlesse some aire or fire be tempered with it: whereas every sense findeth benefit of fire as of a vivificant power and quickening vertue: and principally our sight above the rest, which is the quickest of all the senses in the bodie, as being the very flame of fire, a thing that conformeth us in our faith and beliefe of the gods: and as Plato saith, by the meanes of our sight we are able to conforme our soule to the motions of celestiall bodies.

OF THE PRIMITIVE OR FIRST COLD.

The Summarie.

WE have here another declaration of Plutarch, wherein he examineth and discusseth after the manner of the Academicke philosophers, without deciding or determining any thing, a naturall question as touching Primitive colde. And in the very first entrie thereof reseruteth those who are of opinion that this first colde is the privation of heat: viewing on the contrary side, that it is meere opposie unto heat as one substance to another, and not as privation unto habitude. Then proceedeth he to dispute of the essence, nature, and fountaine of this colde: for the clearing of which point, he examineth at large three opinions: the first, of the Stoicks, who attribute the primitive colde unto aire: the second, of Empedocles and Chrysippus, who ascribe the cause thereof unto water. Unto all their reasons and arguments he maketh answer, and inclineth to a third opinion; namely, that earth is that primitive colde. Which position he confirmeth by divers arguments, yet resolvethe he not, but leaveth it to the discretion of Phavorinus, unto whom he writeth, for to conserve all the reasons of the one part and the other, without resting in any particular opinion, supposing that to suspend and hold his judgement in matters obscure and uncertaint.

is the wiser part of a philosopher, than to yeeld and grant his consent either to one part or the other. Wherein we may see, that in regard of naturall philosophie, our author was of the Academicke sect: but as touching the morall part, we have seene before, and specially in divers treatises of the former tome, that he followeth of all the ancient philosophers, those who were least impure and corrupt, such I meane, as in all their discourses had no other light to direct them, but Nature.

OF THE PRIMITIVE OR first colde.

IS there then (o Phavorinus) a certaine primitive power and substance of cold, like as fire is of heat, by the prelence and participation whereof, each one of the other things is said to be cold? or rather are we to hold and say, that cold is the privation of heat, like as darknes of light, and station of mooving; and namely, considering that cold is stationarie and heat motive? and the cooling of things which were hot, is not done by the entrance of any cold power, but by the departure of heat? for as soone as it is once gone, that which remaineth is altogether cooled; and the verie vapour and steim which seething waters doe yeeld, passeth away together with the heat, which is the reason that refrigeration diminisheth the quantitie thereof, in as much as it chafeth that heat which was, without the entrance of any other thing into the place? Or rather, may not this opinion be suspected? first and formost for that it overthroweth and taketh away many powers and puissances, as if they were not qualities and habitudes really subsisting, but onely the privations and extinctions of qualities and habitudes: as for example, heaviness of lightnesse, hardness of softnesse, blacke of white, bitter of sweete, and so of other semblable things, according as each one is in puissance contrarie unto an other and not as privation is opposite unto habit? Moreover, for as much as everie privation is idle and wholly without action, as blindness, deafnesse, silence and death, for that these bee the departures of formes, and the aboliutions of substances, and not certaine natures nor real substances apart by themselves. We see that cold after it be entred and imprinted (as it were) within the bodie, breedeth no fewer nor lesse accidents & alterations than doth heat; considering that many things become stiffe and congealed by cold, many things I say, are staied, retained and thickened by the meanes thereof: which consistence and stabilitie unapt to stirre and hard to be moved, is not therefore idle, but it is weightie and firme, having a force and power to arrest and to hold in. And therefore privation is a defect and departure of a contrarie power; whereas many things be cooled, although they have plenty of heat within: and some things there be, which cold doth constrain and confituate so much the more, as it findeth them hotter, like as we may observe in iron red hot, when by quenching it becommeth the harder. And the stoicke philosophers doe hold that the naturall spirits enclosed within the bodies of young infants lying in the wombe, by the cold of the ambient aire environing them about is hardened (as it were) and refined, and so changing the nature becommeth a soule. But this is a nice point and verie disputable; yet considering that we see cold to be the efficient cause of many other effects, there is no reason to thinke that it is a privation. Furthermore, privation is not capable of more or lesse; for so of twaine that see not at all, the one is not more blind than the other: and of two who cannot speake, one is not more dumble than another; neither of twaine who live not, is one more dead than the other: but among cold things we may well admit more & lesse: overmuch and not overmuch, and generally, intensions and remissions like as in those things that are hot, and therefore each matter according as it suffreth more or lesse, by contrarie puissances produceth of it selfe some substances, cold and hot, more or lesse than others, for mixture and composition: so on there can be none of habitude with privation; neither is there any power which receiveth or admitteth the contrary unto it, to bring a privation, nor ever maketh it her companion, but yeeldeth and giveth place unto it. But contrariwise, cold continueth very well, as it is mixed with heat, unto a certaine degree; like as blacke with white colours; bale notes with small and shrill; sweet favours, with tart & austere; and by this affociation, mixture & accord of colours, sounds, drogues, favours, and tastes; there are produced many compositions exceeding pleasant and delectable: for the opposition which is betweene habitude and privation, is alwaies an odde and enmity, without any meanes of reconciliation, considering that the essence and being ing of the one, is the destruction of the other: whereas that fight which is occasioned by contrary powers, if it meet with fit time and season, serveth oftentimes in good stead unto arts, and to nature much more, as well in other productions and procreations, as in changes and alterations of the aire: for in the orderly governance and rule whereof, God who dispen-seth and disposeth them, is called Harmonicall and Musically; not in regard that he maketh a friendly accord betwene base and treble, or a loving medly of white and blacke, but for that by his providence he ordereth so well the accord and discord of the elementary heat & cold of the world, that in a certaine moderation, and without excesse they strive, and yet are reconciled againe, by taking from the one and the other that which was excessive and reducing them both in such a temperature and estate as apperteineth. Semblably, a man may sensibly feele cold as well as hee doth heat; whereas you shall never see, heare, or touch, nor by any other sense perceive a privation, for it need to have some substance with it that doth affect the senses, and where there appeareth no substance, there we must suppose a privation, which is as it were the deniall of substance, like as blindness is the negation of sight; silence, of voice; void emptinesse, of a body: for never shall one perceive voidnesse by the sense of feeling; but where there is not a body to be touched, there we must suppose it vacuity: neither doe we heare silence, but when we heare no noise at all, then we understand there is silence: the like we are to say of those who are blinde, of the naked and disarmed, there is no sense of such privations, but rather a bare and negative of sense: and even so, we should have no feeling and perceivance of cold, but only where there wanted heat; there we should have imagined cold to be, in case it were nothing else but a deprivation of heat; but if it be so, that like as heat is felt by the warmth of the skinned, and dilatation of the flesh; even so is cold also by the striction & condensation thereof, therefore it appeareth evidently, that it hath a proper, principle, and particular source, as well as heat: over and besides, in every kind, privation is one and simple, but substances have many differences, and as many powers and faculties, for silence is never but after one sort, whereas the voice is divers, one while troublesome, another while delightfull. Senses, colours, and figures sensibly have like differences, which dispose and affect diversly the subject which they approach unto, but that which is not palpable, not coloured, and generally not qualified with any quality, hath no diversitie, but is ever alike. Now then, doth this cold resemble these privatives in such sort, as it worketh no diversitie in the accidents thereof? Or rather is it cleane otherwise? for as sometimes there come unto bodies great and profitable pleasures by cold, so contrariwise it findeth as much hurt, as great displeasure, trouble, and encombrance thereby: by the offensive qualities whereof, the naturall heat of the body is not alwaies chased quite forth and cleane gone, but oftentimes being pent and restrained within the body, it fighteth and maketh resistance, which combat of two contraries, is called horrow, quaking or trembling; but when the said heat is altogether vanquished, there must needs ensue a benumbing and congelation of the body, but if heat get the victorie, it bringeth a certaine warmth and dilatation with pleasure, which Homer by a proper termine calleth εὐπείρα: whereby it appeareth evidently unto every man, and as much by these accidents it is manifest, or rather more, than by any other arguments, that cold is opposit unto heat, as one substance to another, or as a passion to passion; but not as privation to habitude, or negation to affirmation: and that it is not the corruption or utter destruction of heat, but a nature and puissance active by it selfe and powerfull, to corrupt and destroy: for if it were not so, wee must not have winter to bee one of the lower seasons of the yeere; nor the north winde one of the lower windes; as if the one were but a privation of the hotte season, and the other of the south winde, and we shall be driven to say, that they have no proper source and peculiar principle: howbeit there being in the universall world lower principall bodies, which in regard of their pluralitie, simple nature and puissance, most men call the elements, and suppose them to be the principles of all other bodies, to wit, fire, water, aire, and earth, it followeth by necessary consequence, that there be also lower primitive and simple qualities: and which be they, if they be not heat, cold, moisture, and drinesse? by the means whereof, the said elements, both doe and suffer all things interchangeably? And like as in the elements and principles of Grammar, which be the letters, there be briefes and longs; like as also in musicke notes, there is high and lowe, base, and treble, and one of these is not the privation of the other; even so we are to thinke, that in these naturall bodies of the elements, there be contrarieties of moisture against drinesse, and of colde against heat, if we will beleeve either reason or outward sense: or else we must say as old Anaximenes was of opinion; that there is nothing hot or colde absolutely in substance; but wee must confidently thinke that these be common passions of the matter comming, and occasioned after mutations: for he affirmeth that the thing which is pent, constrict, and thickened in any matter, the same is colde, and that which openeth & relaxeth it selfe, for so he useth this proper termine μακρύνει, is hot; and therefore it is not without some reason, that we commonly say, that a man bloweth both hot and cold out of his mouth; for the breath is cooled when it is pressed close betweene the lippes, but issuing forth of the mouth all open, it is hot by reason of the raritie and laxity thereof: howbeit, Aristotle saith; that it was meere ignorance in him thus to say: For that when we breath with our mouthes wide open, wee let forth the hot aire that is within us, but when we make a blast with our lippes together, we blow not out the breath that ariseth from our selves, but drive that aire from us that is before our mouth, which is cold, & felt before the other that commeth out of us. Seeing then that upon necessitie enforced by so many reasons, we must admit a substance of colde and heat, proceed we and continue our first intent to search what is the substance, nature, and fountaine of the foresaid primitive colde? They then who say that starknesse and stiffnesse for colde, trembling and quaking of the body, and the staying and standing of haire upright, and such like accidents and passions, are occasioned by certaine triangular formes with unequal sides which are within our bodies, although they faile and misse the marke in particularity: yet so it is, that they fetch the beginning from whence they should, for surely the foundation and original of this inquisition ought to be drawn as it were from the goddess Vesta, after the common proverbe, even from the universall nature of all things. And herein it seemeth, that a philosopher moit of all differeth from an empiricke physician, a husbandman, a minstrell, and other such particular artificers, whom it sufficeth to know and understand the last and conjunct causes. For so it be, that a physician doe comprehend the necesse and next cause of his patients malady, for example, of an ague, that it is a shooting or falling of the blood out of the veines into the arteries; and the husbandman conceive that the cause of blasting or Maying his corne, is an hot gleame of the sunne after a shower of raine: and the plaier upon the flutes comprise the reason of the base sound, is the bending downward of his instrument, or the bringing of them one neere unto another: it is sufficient for any of these to proceed to their proper worke and operation: But a naturall philosopher who searcheth into the truth of things, onely for meere knowledge and speculation, maketh not the knowledge of these last causes the end, but rather taketh from them his beginning, and ariseth from them to the primitive and highest causes. And therefore well did Plato and Democritus, who searching into the causes of heat and of heavinesse, staid not the course of their inquisition, when they came to fire and earth, but referring and reducing things sensible unto intelligible principles, proceeded forward, and never staid until they came unto the least parcels as it were to the smallest seeds and principles thereof. Howbeit, better it were first to handle and discusse these sensible things, wherein Empedocles, Straton, and the Stoicks do repose the essences of all powers: the Stoicks attributing the primitive colde unto aire, but Empedocles and Straton unto water: and another peradventure would suppose the earth rather to be the substantiall subject of cold. But first let us examine the opinions of these before named. Considering then that fire is both hot and shining; it must needs be that the nature of that which is contrarie unto it, should be colde and darke: for obscuritie is opposit unto brightnesse, like as cold to heat: and like as darknesse and obscuritie doth confound and trouble the sight; even so doth colde the sense of feeling: whereas heat doth dilate the sense of him that toucheth it, like as cleerenesse the sight of him that seeth it: and therefore we must needs say, that the thing which is principally darke and mistie, is likewise colde in nature. But that the aire above all things els is dimme and darke, the very poets were not ignorant: for the aire they call darknesse, as appeareth by these verses of Homer:

For why, the aire stood thicke the ships about,
And no moone shine from heaven shewed through out.

And in another place:

The aire anon be gone dispatcht,
And mist did drive away:
With this, the sunne shone out full bright,
And battell did display.

And hereupon it is, that men call the aire wanting light, ἀέρας, as one would say, vacuus aëres, that is to say, void of light: and the grosse aire which is gathered thicke together, νεφελή, by way of privation of all light. Aire also is called ἀέρας and καίμας, that is to say, a mist: and looke what things

And Homer in a certaine battell oppoled Vulcane to the river, and with Neptunne matched Apollon, not so much by way of fabulous fiction, as by physicall and naturall reason: and as for Pholoebus, a wicked woman, who meant cleane contrary to that which she said and shewed, wrote elegantly in this wise:

And among the Persians the most effectuall maner of supplication and that which might in no wife be rejected and denied, was, if the suppliant with fire in his hand entred into a river, & there menaced to fling it into the water, if he might not have his request granted: & then he obtained verily his petition, but afterwards punished he was for that threatening which he used, as being wicked, wretched & unnatural. And what proverbe is there readier in every mans mouth than to say, when we would signify an impossible thing, This is to mingle fire and water together? which testifieth thus much, that water is the mortall enemy unto fire, warring with it, punishing & quenching it, and not the aire, which receiveth & entertaineth fire, & into the substance whereof it is transmuted: for if that into which a thing is turned when it perissheth, were contrary unto it, then fire should be more contrary to aire than water is. For aire when it doth gather and thicken is converted into water, but when it is made more subtil it resolveth into fire: as also in like case, water by rarefaction is resolved into aire and by condensation becommeth earth, not upon any enmity or contrariety that it hath to these both, as I take it, but rather by reason of some amity and kindred that is betweene them. Well, whether way of these two it is that these philosophers will take, they overthrow still their intent and purpose. But to say that it is the aire which causeth water to freeze and become yce, it is without all sense and most absurd: for we see that the very aire it selfe is never congelate nor frozen, nor hardened, considering that mists, fogs and clouds are no congelations, but onely gatherings and thickenings of a moist and vaporous aire: for the true aire indeed which hath no vapour at all and is altogether drie, admitteth no such refrigeration as may alter it to that degree and height. And certaine mountaines there be which are not subiect either to clouds, mists, or dewes, for that their heads reach up to that region of the aire which is pure and exempt from all humidity: wherby it is apparent, that these gatherings and thickenings which are scene in the aire beneath, proceed from cold and moisture, which is mingled therewith & runneth from els where. As for the bottoms of great rivers which be never frozen to yce; great reason there is of it: for that the upper part being glazed over with ice, sufficeth not the exhalation which riseth from beneath to passe thorow, but keepeth it enclosed & striketh it downward, wherby is engendered a certaine heat in the water that runneth in the bottome. And henceof we may see a faire demonstration in this, that when the yce is broken, the water riseth up, and there mounteth withall a great quantity of vapours and exhalations; which is the reason also that the bellies and other concavities within the bodies of living creatures, are alwaies hotter in winter, for that they hold and containe the heat, which the coldnesse of the circumstant aire driveth inward. As for the drawing & flinging up of water into the aire, it taketh not onely the heat away from waters but also their cold, and therefore they that desire to have their snow or the liquor expressed out of it exceeding cold, move it as little as they can, for this stirring chafeth away the colde both of the one and the other. But that it is the inward power of the water and not of the aire that doth it, a man may thus discourse and begin againe: First and formost, it is not probable that the aire being so neere as it is to the elementary fire, touching also as it doth that ardent revolution, and being touched of it againe, hath a contrary nature and power unto it: neither is it possible that it should be so, considering that their two extremities are contiguous, yea, and continue one to the other: neither foundeth it and is conformable to reason, that nature hath fastened with one tenon (as they say) and placed so neere together the killer and that which is killed, the consumer and that which is consumed; as if the were not the mediators betweene them of peace, unitie and accord, but rather the workmistrresse of warre, debate and discord. For surely her order and custome is not to joine front to front, substances that be altogether contrarie, and open enemies one to the other; but to place betweene them such as participate with the one and the other, which are so seated, disposed and interlaced in the middle, as that they tend not to the destruction, but to the association of two contraries. Such a situation and region hath the aire in the world, being spread under the fire, and before the water, for to accommodate and frame it selfe both to the one and the other, and to conjoine and linke them both together, being of it selfe neither hot nor colde, but as it were a medley and temperature of them both; not (I say) a pernicious mixture, but a gracious, cious, which gently entertaineth and receiveth these contrarie extremities. Furthermore, the aire is alwaies equall, and yet the Winter is not evermore colde a little: but some parts of the world be cold and exceeding moist; others colde and as dry, and that not callally and by fortune, but for that one and the same substance is susceptible both of heat and colde. For the greater part of Affricke is hot and dry, altogether without water. And those who have travelled through Scythia, Thracia and Pontus, doe report that there be exceeding great lakes therein, and that those kingdoms be watered with many mighty deepe rivers; also that the countiees in the midst betweene, and those parts which adjoyne upon those huges, meres, and fens be extreme colde, by reason of the vapours that arise from them. As for Papilionus when he saith that the cause of that moisture is this, that the fenny and morish aire is ever fresh and moist, he hath not solved the question which was probable, but made it more doubtfull and without probability; for the aire seemed not alwaies so much colder as it is more fresh, in case cold be not engendred of moisture: and therefore Homer said much better:

*The winde from river, if that it hold,

as if he pointed with his very finger to the source and fountaine of colde. Moreover, our sense doth oftentimes beguile and deceive us, as namely, when wee touch wooll or clothes that be colde, for we thinke that they be moist and wet, for that there is one substance common to both these qualities, and both these natures be neighbours and familiar. Also in those climates of the world where the winter is extreme hard and rough, the colde many times cracketh and breaketh vessels of brasle and of earth; not any I meane that is voide and empiric, but all full, by reason that the water by the coldnesse thereof doth violence unto them: howsoever Theophrastus thinketh, that it is the aire that bursteth such vessels; using colde as it were a spike or great nail to doe the feat. But take heed that this be not rather a pretty & elegant speech of his, than founding to truth; for if aire were the cause, then should vessels full of pitch or milke, sooner burst than other. More likely it is therefore, that water is colde of it selfe and primitive-ly, for contrary it is to the heat of fire, in regard of that coldnesse, like as to the drinnesse thereof, in respect of humidity. To be brieve, the property of fire ingenerall, is to dissipate, divide, and segregate; but contrariwise, of water to joine, conglutinate, unite, and binde, knitting and closing together by the vertue of moisture. And this makes me thinke that Empedocles upon this occasion, ever and anon calleth fire a pernicious debate, but water a fast anity; for so well and good of fire, is that which turneth into fire, and every thing turneth which is moist proper and familiar; as for that which is contrary, the same is hardly to be turned, as water which of it selfe it is impossible to burne, causing both greene or wet herbs, as also moist or drenched wood hardly to take fire, and so in the end with much a doe, they kinde and catch fire, although the same be not light and cleere, but darke, dimme, and weake, because the viridity or greenenesse by the means of colde, fighteth against the heat, as his naturall enemy.

Peising now and weighing these reasons, conferre them with the others. But for that Chrysippus esteeming the aire to be the primitive colde, in that it is dimme and darke, hath made mention of those onely who say, that water is more distant and farther remote from the elementary fire, than the aire, and being desirous to say somewhat against them: By the same reason (quoth he) may a man as well affirme that the earth is the said primitive cold; for that it is farthest from the elementary fire, rejecting this argument and reason as false, and altogether absurd. Me thinks that I can well shew that the earth it selfe wanteth no probable proofes, laying my foundation even upon that which Chrysippus hath taken for the aire: And what is that? namely, because it is principally and above all things els obscure & darke; for if he taking two contraries of powers, thinketh of necessitie the one must follow upon the other; certes, there be infinite oppositions and repugnances betweene the earth and the aire, for the earth is not opposit unto the aire, as heavy unto light, nor as that which benderh downward unto that which tendeth upward onely; nor as massive, unto rare; or slow and steadfast unto quick and moveable; but as most heavy unto most light; most massive unto most rare; and finally, as immoveable in it selfe, unto that which moveth of it selfe; or as that which holdeth still the center in the mids, unto that which turneth continually round. Were it not then very absurd to say; that upon so many, and those so great oppositions, this also of heat and cold did not likewise jointly follow? Yes verily: but fire is cleere and bright, and earth darke: nay rather it is the darkelt of all things in the world, and most without light; for aire is that which holdeth still that participate of the first light & brightnesse, which sooneft of all other burneth: being also once full thereof, it distributeth that light every where, exhibiting it selfe as the very body of light: for as one of the Dithyrambick poets said:

*No sooner doth the sunne appeere
In our horizon faire and cleere,
But with his light the pallace grent
Of aire and winde is all replent.*

And then anon it descendeth lower, and imparreth one portion thereof to the lakes and to the sea; the very bottomes of the rivers doe rejoyce and laugh for joy, so farre soorth as the aire pierceth and entreth into them: the earth onely, of all other bodies, is evermore destitute of light, and not penetrable with the radiant beames of sunne and moone; well may it be warmed a little, and present it selfe to be fomented with the heat of the sunne, which entrench a little way into it, but surely the solidity of it will not admit the resplendent light thereof; onely it is superficially illuminated by the sunne, for all the bowels and inward parts of it be called Orphne, Chaos, and Ades, that is to say, darknesse, confusion, and hell it selfe: and as for Erebus, it is nothing else, to say a truth, but terrestriall obscurity, and mirke darknesse within the earth. The poets feigne the night to be the daughter of the earth; and the mathematicians by reason and demonstration, prove, that it is no other thing than the shadow of the earth, opposed against the sunne: for the aire as it is full of darknesse from the earth, so it is replenished with light from the sunne; and looke how much of the aire is not lightned nor illuminate, to wit, all the shadow that the earth casteth, so long is the night, more or lesse; and therefore both man and beast make much use of the aire without their houses, although it be night season: and as for beasts, many of them goe to reliefe and pasturage in the night, because the aire hath yet some reliques and traces left of light, and a certaine influence of brightnesse, dispersed here and there: but he that is enclosed within house, and covered with the roofe thereof, is as it were blinde and full of darknesse, as one environed round about within the earth: and verily the hides and hornes of beasts, so long as they bee hole and found, transmit no light through them: let them be cut, sawed, pared, and scraped, they become transparent, because aire is admitted into them. And I thinke truly that the poets chisoomes heereupon call the earth blacke, meaning thereby darke and without light, so that the most important and principall opposition, between cleere and darke, is found rather in the earth than in the aire: But this is impertinent to our question in hand; for we have shewed already that there be many cleere things which are known to be cold, and as many browne and darke which be hot.

But there be other qualities and pussions more proper unto colde, namely, ponderositie, steadinesse, soliditie, & immutability, of which the aire hath not so much as one, but the earth in part hath them all more than the water. Furthermore, it may be saide, that colde is that which most sensibly is hard, as making things stiffe and hard: for Theophrastus writeth, that those fishes which be frozen with extreme rigour of colde, if they be let fall upon the ground, breake and knap in pieces, no lesse than glasses or earthen vessels: and your selfe have heard at Delphi, of those who passed over the hill Parnassus, to succour and relieve the women called Rachee, who were surprized with a sharpe pinching winde and drifts of snow; that their clothes and mantels through extremity of colde, were as sturke and stiffe as pieces of wood, in so much as they brake and rent into tatters, so soone as they went about to stretch them out. To say yet more, excessive colde causeth the sinewes to be so stiffe, as hardly they will bend: the tongue likewise looke, that it will not stirre or utter any voice, congealing the moist, soft, and tender parts of the body; which being seene by daily experience, they proceed to gather this consequence: Every power and facultie which getteth the maistrise, is wont to turne and convert into it selfe, that over which it is predominant: whatsoever is overcome by heat, becommeth fire; that which is conquered by spirit or winde, changeth into aire; what falleth into water, if it get not forth againe, dissolveth, and in the end runneth to water. Then must it needs follow, that such things as are exceeding colde, degenerate into that primitive colde whereof we speake: now excessive colde is first; and the greatest alteration that can be devised by colde, is when a thing is congealed & made an ice, which congelation altereth the nature of the thing so much, that in the end it becommeth as hard as a stone; namely, when the cold is so predominant, as well all the moisture of it is congealed, as the heat that it had driven out perforce. Heereupon it is that the earth toward her center, and in the bottom thereof, is frozen altogether, and in manner nothing else but ice, for that the excessive colde which never will yield and relent, there dwelleth and abideth continually, as being thrust and driven into that corner, farthest farthest off from the elementary fire. As touching those rocks, craggies, and cliffes, which we see to appeere out of the earth: Empedocles is of opinion, that they were there let, driven up, sustained, & supported by the violence of a certaine boiling and swelling fire within the bowels of the earth: but it should seeme rather, that those things out of which all the heat is evaporate and flown away, be congealed and congelat to hard by the meanes of colde: and this is the cause that such craggies be named in Greeke πύρι, as one would say, congealed: toward the head and toppe whereof, a man shall see in them many places blacke againe, namely, whereas the heat flew out when the time was, so as to see to, one would imagine that they had heerebefore beene burnt; for the nature of colde is to congeale all things, but some more, others lesse; but above all, those in which it is naturally at the first inherent: for like as the property of fire is to alleviate, it cannot otherwise be, but the hotter that a thing is, the more light also it is: and so the nature of moisture is to soften; in so much as the moister any thing is, the softer also it is found to be: sensibly, given it is to colde, to astringe and congeale: it followeth therefore of necessity, that whatsoever is most astringe and congealed, as is the earth, is likewise the coldest; and looke what is colde in the highest degree, the same must be principally and naturally that colde, whereof we are in question. And thereupon we must conclude, that the earth is both by nature colde, and also that primitive colde; a thing apparent and evident to our very senses; for dirt and clay is colder than water: and when a man would quickly suffocate and put out a fire, he throweth earth upon it. Blacke smithies also, and such as forge iron, when they see it redde hot, and at the point to melt, they strew upon it small powder, or grit of marble or other stones that have fallen from them, when they were squared and wrought, for to keepe it from resolving too much, and to coole the excessive heat: the very dust also that is used to be thrown upon the bodies of wrestlers, doth coole them and represseth their sweats. Moreover, to speake of the commodity that causeth us every yeere to remove and change our lodgings, what is the meaning of it? winter maketh us to seeke for high lofts, and such chambers as be farre from the earth; contrariwise, summer bringeth us downe to the halles and parlours beneath, driving us to seeke retiring rooms, and willingly we lower to live in vaults within the bowels of the earth: doe we not thus thinke you, directed by the instinct of nature, to seeke out & acknowledge that which is naturally the primitive colde? and therefore when winter comes, we lay for houses and habitations neere the sea side, that is to say, we flee from the earth as much as we can; because of colde, and we compass our selves with the aire of the sea, for that it is hot: contrariwise, in summer time, by reason of immoderate heat, we cover mediterranean places farther within the land, and farre removed from the sea, nor for that the aire of it selfe is colde, but because it seemeth to spring and budde as it were out of the primitive colde, and to have a tincture as I may so say, after the manner of iron from the power which is in the earth: and verily among running waters, those that arise out of rocks, and descend from mountaines, are evermore coldest: but if welles and pittes, such as be deepest yeeld the coldest waters: for by reason of their profunditie, the aire from without is not mingled with these; and the others passe thorough pure and sincere earth, without the mixture of aire among.

As for example, such is the water neere the cape of Tenarus, which they call Stryx, destilling by little and little out of the rocke, and so gathered unto an head: which water is so extreme colde, that there is no vessell in the world will holde it, but onely that which is made of an asses hoofe; for put it into any other, it cleaveth and breaketh it. Moreover, we heare physicians say, that to speake generally, all kinds of earth do restrain and coole: and they reckon unto us a number of minerals drawn out of entrails of the earth, which in the use of physike yeeld unto them an astringent and binding power: for the very element it selfe from whence they come, is nothing incisive, nor hath the vertue for to stirre and extenuate; it is not active and quick, nor emollient, nor apt to spread; but firme, steadfast and permanent, as a square cube or die, and not to be removed: whereupon, being masse and ponderous as it is, the colde also thereof having a power to condense, congregate and to expresse forth all humors, procureth by the asperity and inequality of the parts, shakings, horrors and quakings in our bodies: and if it prevaile more and be predominant, so that the heat be driven out quite and extinct, it imprinteth an habitude of congelation and dead stupefaction. And hereupon it is, that the earth either will not burne at all, or els hardly and by little and little: whereas the aire many times of it selfe sendeth forth flaming fire, it thoreteth and floweth, yea, and seemeth as inflamed, to lighten and flash: and the humiditie which it hath, serveth to feed and nourish the heat thereof. For it is not the solide part of wood that burneth, but the oleous moisture thereof; which if it be once evaporate and spent, the solide substance remaineth drie, and is nothing els but ashes. As for those who labour and endeavour to shew by demonstration, that the same also is changed and consumed, for which purpose they sprinkle it eftsometimes with oile, or temper it with greace, and so put it into the fire againe, prevaile nothing at all: for when the fatie and unctuous substance is burnt, there remaine still evermore behinde, the terrestriall parts. And therefore earth being not onely immoveable in respect of situation, but also immutable in regard of the very substance, the ancient called isa, that is to say, vestra, standing as it were sure and stedfast within the habitation of the gods: of which steadinesse and congelation, the bond and linke is cold, as Archiloehus the Naturallist said: And nothing is there able to relax or mollifie it, after it hath once bene baked in the fire or hardened against the Sun. As touching those who say that they feele very sensibly the winde and the water colde, but the earth not so well; surely these do consider this earth here, which is next unto us, and is no other thing in truth, than a mixture and composition of aire, water, sunne and heat; and we thinke this is all one, as if a man should say, that the elementarie fire is not the primitive and originall heat, but rather scalding water, or an iron red hot in the fire; for that in truth there is no touching of these or comming nere unto them; as also that of the said pure and celestiall fire, they have no sensible experience nor knowledge by feeling, no more than they have of the earth which is about the center, which we may imagine to be true, pure and naturall earth, as most remote and farthest separate from all other: howbeit, wee may have some guesse and token thereof by these rockes heere with us, which from their profunditie send forth a vehement colde, which is in manner intolerable. And they likewise who desire to drinke their water passing colde, use to throw pibble stones into it, which thereby commeth to be more colde, sharpe and piercing, by occasion of the great and fresh colde that ariseth from the said stones. And therefore we ought thus to thinke, that when our ancestors, those deepe clearks and great scholars I meane, thought there could be no mixture of earthly things with heavenly, they never looked to places high or low, as if they hung in the scales of a ballance, but unto the difference and diversitie of their powers; attributing the qualities of heat, cleerenesse, agilitie, celeritie and lightnesse, unto that immortal and eternall nature: but colde, darknesse and tarditie, they assigned as the unhappie lot and wretched portion of those infernall wights that are dead and perished. For the very bodie of a creature, all while that it doth breathe and flourish in verdure as the Poets say, hath life and heat, but so soone as it is destitute of these, and left in the onely portion and possession of the earth, it presently becometh stiffe and colde, as if heat were in any other body naturally, rather than in that which is terrestrial.

Compare now good sir Phavorinus, these arguments with the reasons of other men, and if you finde that they neither yeeld in probability, nor over-way them much, bid all opinions and the stiffe mainteining of them farewell, and thinke that to forbear resolution and to holde off in matters obscure and uncerteine, is the part of the wisest philosopher, rather than to settle his judgement and assent to one or other.

NATVRALL QVESTIONS.

What is the cause that sea water nourisheth no trees?

Is it for the same reason, that it nourisheth no land-creatures? For that a plant according to the opinions of Plato, Anaxagoras and Democritus, is a living creature of the land. For say that it serves for food to plants growing within the sea, as also to fishes, and is to them their drinke, yet we must not inferre thereupon, that it feedeth trees that be without the sea and upon the land: for neither can it pierce downe to their rootes, it is so grosse, nor rise up in the nature of fappte, it is so heavy. That it is grosse, heavy, and terrestriall, appeareth by many other reasons, and by this especially, for that it beareth up and susteineth both vessels and swimmers more than any other.

Or is it principally for this, that whereas nothing is more offensive and hurtfull to trees than drinnesse, the water of the sea is very defecative? which is the reason that salt withstandeth putrefaction so much as it doth, and why the bodies of those who are washed in the sea, have incontinently their skin exceeding dry and rugged.

Or rather may it not be, for that oile is naturally an enemy to all plants, causing as many of them as are rubbed or anointed therewith to die? Now the sea water standeth much upon a kinde of fattinesse, and is very unctuous, in such sort that it will both kinde and also increase fire: and therefore we give warning and forbid to throw sea water into flaming fire.

Or is it because the water of the sea is bitter and not potable, by reason (as Aristotle saith) of the burnt earth that is mixed with it? like as lie, which is made by casting fresh water aloft upon ashes: for the running and passing through the said ashes marreth that sweet and potable quality of the water: as also within our bodies, the unnatural heats of an ague turne humors into cholar. As for those plants, woods or trees, which are said to grow within the red sea, if they doe, certainly they beare no fruit; but nourished they are by the fresh rivers, which bring in with them a deale of mud; an argument heereof is this: for that such grow not farre within the sea but nere unto the land.

What might the reason be, that trees and seeds are nourished better with raine, than any other water that they can be watered withall?

Is it for that raine as it falleth, by the dint that it maketh, openeth the ground and causeth little holes, whereby it pierceth to the rootes, as Latius saith?

Or is this untrue? and Latius was ignorant heereof, namely that morish plants and such as grow in pooles, as the reed mace, canes and rushes, will not thrive if they want their kinde raine in due season? But true is that which Aristotle saith: That the raine water is all fresh and new made, whereas that of meeres and lakes is old and stale.

Or haply, this carrieth more shew and probability, with it than truth, for certeine it is, that the water of fountaines, brookes, and rivers, come as new and fresh as they: for as Heraclitus saith: It is impossible for a man to enter into one and the same river twice, because new water commeth still, and runneth away continually, and yet these nourish lesse than raine waters.

Is this therefore the reason, because the water from heaven is light, subtile, aireous, and mixed with a kinde of spirit, which by that subtiltie, entrench soone, and is easily caried to the root of plants: and heereupon in the fall it raiseth little bubbles, because of the aire and spirit enclosed within.

Or doth raine water nourish more in this regard, that it is sooner altered and overcome by that which it nourisheth; for this is it that we call concoction properly: contrariwise, cruditie and indigestion, when things are so strong and hard that they will not suffer; for such as be thinne, simple, and unfavory, are most easily and soonest altered: of which kinde is raine water, for being engendred as it is in the aire and the winde, it falleth pure and cleane; whereas springing waters, are like to the earth, out of which they issue, or the places through which they passe, gathering gathering thereby many qualities, which cause them unwilling to be digested, and more slow to be reduced by concoction, into the substance of that which is to be nourished thereby: on the other side, that raine waters be easie to be changed and transmuted, it appeareth by this; that more subiect they are to corruption and putrefaction, than those either of rivers, or of pities and welles: and concoction seemeth to be a kinde of putrefaction: as Empedocles beareth witness saying:

*When in vine-wood the water purifies,
It turnes to wine, whiles under barks it lies.*

Or rather the truest and readiest reason that can be alledged, is the sweetnesse and holsonnesse of raine waters, falling as they doe so presently, so soone as the winde sends them downe: and hereupon it is that beasts desire to drinke thereof before any other: yea, and the frogges and paddocks expecting a raine, for joy sing more thrill and merily, ready to receive and entertaine that which will season the dead and dormant waters of standing lakes, as being the very seed of all their sweetnesse: for Aristo reckoneth this also for one of the signes of a shewer toward, writing thus:

*When wretched brood,
The adders food,
from out of standing lake,
(The ad-pole fires,
I meane) de fires fresh raine, and loud doth * coake.*

* Coavent, Lat.
Pest-poles, dead fires, Aristophan has.

What might be the cause that shepherds and other herdsmen give salt unto their sheepe and cattell which they feed?

Is it as most men doe thinke, to the end that they should fall the better to their meate, and so consequently feed fatter the sooner? because the acrimony of salt provoketh appetite, and opening the pores, maketh way unto the nourishment for to be digested and distributed more easily throughout the whole body: in regard whereof the physician Apollonius, the sonne of Herophilus, gave counsell and prescribed leane folke and such as thrived not in their flesh; not grosse sweet wine, thicke gruell, and frumentie, but salt fish out of the pickle, anchoves, powdered meats, and such as were condite in brine: the subtil acrimonie whereof might in maner of setting a peruke for want of haire, serve to apply nutriment through the pores of the body into those parts that need it.

Or rather may it not be for health-sake? in which regard they use their cattell to little salt, thereby to take downe their ranke feeding, and restraine their grossnesse and corpulencie: for such as grow exceeding fatter, are subiect to breed diseases: but salt consumeth and dispatcheth this fatter; and by this meanes also when they be killed, they are sooner and with greater expedition flaid, because the fatter which knit and bound the skinned flesh to the flesh, is now become more thinn, gentle, and pliable through the acrimony of the salt: besides, the bloud also of such as be ever licking of salt, becometh more liquid; and nothing there is within, that will gather and grow together, in case there be salt mingled therewith.

It may be moreover, that they doe it for to make them more fruitfull and apter for generation; for we see that salt bitches which have bene fed with salt meats, are more hot, apter to goe proud, and sooner with whelpes. And for this cause, those keeles and barges that transport salt, breed greater store of mice, for that they engender the oftener.

*How cometh it to passe, that of raine waters, such as fall with thunder and lightning, which thereupon be called * as gemas, are better for to water seeds or yong plants, than any other?*

May it not be, because they be full of winde and ventositie, by reason of the trouble and confused agitation of the aire? And the nature of wind and spirit is to stirre the humiditie; and by that meanes doth lend it forth and distribute it the better?

Or is it not rather, that heat fighting against colde, is the cause of thunder and lightning in the aire? which is the reason that seldom there is any thunder in winter: but contrariwise, very often often in the Spring and Autumne, for the inconstant and unequall dittemperature of the aire: which being supposed, the heat concocting the humiditie, causeth it to be more pleasant and profitable unto the plants of the earth.

Or why may it not be, because it thundreth and lightneth especially and more often in the Spring, than in any other season of the yeere, for the reason before alledged: now the Spring showers and raines are most necessarie for seeds and herbs, against the Summer time: whereupon those countries wherein there be many good ground showers in the Spring, as the idle Sicilie, bring forth plentie of good fruits.

*How is it, that there being eight kind of * favours, there is no more but only one of them, to wit, saltish, that can not be found naturally in fruits? For as touching the bitter favour, the olive hath it at first; and the grape is soure at the beginning: but as these fruits begin to change and grow to their ripenesse, the bitternesse of the olive turneth into a fatie and unctuous favour, and the sharpe verdure of the grape into a smacke of wine: semblably, the harshnesse in the unripe dates, as also the austere and unpleasant shar pnesse in pomegranats changeth into sweetnesse. As for pomegranats, some there be, as also other apples, which are simply soure, and never have o'ther taste. And as for the sharpe and biting favour, it is ordinarie in many roots and seeds.*

Is it for that the salt favor is not primitive nor engendred originally, but is rather the corruption of other primitive favours; and in that regard can not serve to nourish any creature, living with grasse or graine? but it is to some in stead of a sauce, because it is a meanes that they should not upon fullnesse either lothe or distaste that which they feed upon.

Or because, that like as they who boile sea water, rid it from that salt, brackish and biting quality that it hath: so, in those that are hot by nature, the salt favour is dulled and mortified by heat?

Or rather, for that a favour or smacke, according as Plato saith, is a water or juice passing thorow the stem or stalk of a plant: but we see that the sea water running as thorow a streiner, loseth the saltnesse, being the terrestriall and grossest part that is in it. And hereupon it is, that when as men digge along by the sea side, they meet with springs of fresh and potable water. And many there be, who draw out of the very sea, fresh water and good to be drunke; namely, when it hath runne thorow certaine vessels of wax, by reason that the terrestriall and saltish parts thereof be streined out. In one word, * clay or marle also, yea, and the carrying of sea water in long conduct pipes, causeth the same when it is so streined, to be potable, for that there are kept still in them the terrestriall parts, and are not suffered to passe thorow. Which being so, very probable it is that plants neither receive from without forth any salt favour, nor if haply any such qualitie breed in them, doe they transuse the same into their fruits; for that the conducts of their pores being very small and streight, there can not be transmited thorow them any grosse or terrestriall substance.

Or els we must say, that saltnesse is in some sort a kinde of bitternesse, according as Homer signifieth in these verses:

*Bitter salt-water at mouth he cast againe,
And all therewith his head did drop amaine.*

And Plato affirmeth, that both the one and the other favour is absterfve and liquefactive; but the saltish, lesse of the twaine, as that which is not rough: and so it will seeme that bitter differeth from salt in excessse of drinesse, for that the salt favour is also a great drier.

What is the cause, that if folke use ordinarily and continually to goe among yong trees or shrubs full of dew, those parts of their bodies which do touch the twigs of the said plants, are wont to have a scurfe or mange rise upon their skin?

Is it (as Lerus saith) for that the dew by the subtiltie thereof doth fret and pierce the skin? Or rather, because like as the blast and mil-dew is incident to those seeds or plants that take wet and be drenched; even so, when the smoothe and tender superficiall parts of the skinned are fretted, scanfied, and dissolved a little with the dew, there ariseth a certeine humour, and filth the fretted place with a smart and angry scurfe: for lighting upon those parts which have but little bloud, such as be the smalles of the legs and the feet, it biteth & gnaweth the superficies of

Now that there is in dew a certaine inordinate qualitie, it appeareth by this, that it maketh those who are grosse and corpulent, to be leaner and more spare of bodie: wittnesse our women who are given to be fat, and would be fine, who gather dew with linnen clothes, or els with locks or fleeces of wooll, thinking therewith to take downe and spend their fogginesse, and make themselves more gant and slender.

What is the cause that barges and other vessels in Winter time, go more slowly upon the rivers than at other seasons; but they do not so upon the sea?

What say you to this? May it not be, for that the aire of rivers being alwaies grosse and heavy, in Winter is more inspitiate by reason of the circumstant cold, and so is an hindrance to the course of ships?

Or haply this accident is to be imputed to the water of rivers, rather than to the aire about them; for colde driving in and restraining the water, maketh it more heavy and grosse; as we may perceive in water houre-glasses, for the water runneth out of them more leasurly and slowly in winter then in summer. And Theophrastus writeth that in Thracia, neere unto the mount called Pangæon, there is a fountaine, the water whereof is twice as much heave in winter than it is in summer, waigh it in one & the same vessell full. That the thicknesse of water maketh a vessell to passe more sluggishly, it may appeare by this, that the barges of the river carry greater fraights by farre, in winter than in summer: because the water being thicke, is stronger and able to beare more. As for the sea water it cannot be made more thicke in winter, by reason of the owne heat, which is the cause that it congealeth not, and if it gather any thickening, it seemeth to be very slender and little.

What is the reason that we observe, all other waters, if they be mooved and troubled, are the colder, but the sea the more surging and waving, the hotter it is?

It is because, if there be any heat in other waters, the same is a stranger unto it, and coming from without, and so the motion and agitation thereof doth dissipate and drive the same forth againe: but that heat of the sea which is proper and naturall to it, the windes doe stirre up and augment. That the sea is naturally hot, may evidently be proved by this, that it is so transparent and shining; as also for that it is not ordinarily frozen, heavy though it be and terrestriall.

What should be the cause that in winter the sea water is lesse bitter and brackish in taste?

For so (by report) writeth Dionysius the great conuair of conduicts, who in a treatise of that argument, saith that the bitternesse of the sea water is not without some sweetnesse, seeing that the sea receiveth so many and so great rivers: for admit that the sunne doe draw up that which is fresh and potable out of it, because it is light and subtill; that is but from the upper part onely: and withall, it doth more in Summer than in any other season, by reason that in Winter his beames are not so strong to strike, for that his heat likewise is but faint and feeble: and so a good portion of the sweetnesse remaining behinde, doth delay that excessive bitternesse and brackithnesse, like a medicine that it hath. And the same befalleth unto river waters, and all other that be potable: for even such in Summer time become worfe and more offensive to the taste than in Winter, by how much the heat of the sunne doth resolve and dissipate the light and sweet parts thereof: but in Winter it runneth alwaies new and fresh; whereof the sea cannot chuse but have a good part, as well because it is evermore in motion, as also for that the rivers running into it, be great and impart their fresh water unto it.

What is the reason, that men are wont to powre sea water into their wine vessels, among the wine?

And the common report goeth that there were sometime certaine mariners and fisher-men who brought with them an oracle, commanding to plunge and dip Bacchus in the sea: And such as dwell farre from the sea, instead of sea water, put in baked plaster of Lacynthus?

It is to this end, that the heat thereof (should helpe to resist the colde, that it take not away the heart of the wine? Or rather cleane contrary, doth it not weaken the headinesse of wine, by extinguishing the power and strength thereof?

Or

Or it may be, that seeing wine is much subiect to alteration, and will quickly turne, the terrestriall matter which is cast into it, having a naturall property to retrain, to binde and to stoppe, doth in some sort condensare and stay the waterish and spirituall substance of it. Now the salt together with the sea water, coming to subtilitate and confound that which is superfluous, and naught in the wine, and not the proper substance thereof, keepeth it so, as it will not suffer any strong & evill smell or corruption to be ingendered therein: Besides all the grosse and terrestriall parts of the wine, sticking and cleaving to that which sealeth to the bottom, and being drawn downward with it, maketh a residence of the lees and dregges, and by consequence leaveth the rest more cleere, pure, and neat.

What is the cause that those who saile upon the sea, are more sicke in the stomacke, than they that saile upon rivers, yea, though the weather be faire and the water calme?

It is for that of all the senses, smelling, and of all passions, feare, causeth men most to be stomacke sicke: for so soone as the apprehension of any perill seith upon a man, he trembleth and quaketh for feare, his haire stareth and standeth upright, yea and his belly groweth to be loose. Whereas there is none of all this that troubleth those who saile or row upon the river: for why, the smell is acquainted with all fresh and potable water, neither is the sailing so perillous: whereas upon the sea men are offended with strange and unusuall smells, yea, and be effected soone as affraid, how faire soever the season be, not trusting upon that which they see present, but misdoubting that which may fall out. And therefore little or nothing serveth the calme without, when the minde within is tossed, troubled, and vexed, partly with feare, and in part with distrust, drawing the body into the fellowship of like passions and perturbations.

What is the reason that if the sea be sprinkled with oile, there is to be seene a cleere transparenence, together with a calme and tranquility within?

Whether it is (as Aristotle saith) because the winde gliding and glauncing over oile which is smooth and even, hath no power to stirre it, or to make any agitation.

30 Or, this reason may well carie with it some probability as touching the outward part, and upmost superficies of the sea: but seeing that they also by report, who plunge and dive to the bottom thereof, holding oile within their mouthes, if they spurt the same forth when they are in the bottome, have a light all about them, and are able to see cleere in the deepe; a man cannot attribute the cause thereof unto the gliding over of the wind. See therefore if it may not rather be, for that the oile by the soliditie and thicknesse that it hath, doth drive before it, cut, and open the sea water first, being terrestriall and unequall; which after being returned and drawn together againe into it selfe, there be left still in the mids betweene, certaine little holes which yeeld unto the eyes a through-light and transparenence.

Or rather is it, for that the aire mingled within the sea, is by reason of heat, naturally lighter and more peripicuous; but when it is troubled and stirred, becommeth unequall and shadowy: when as the oile therefore by meanes of soliditie commeth to pollish and smooth the said inequality, it resumeth againe the owne plainnesse and perpicuity.

What is the reason that fisher mens nets doe rot in Winter rather than in Summer, notwithstanding that all other things putrifie more in Summer than in Winter?

It is because (as Theophrastus supposeth) the heat then beset round about with the circumstant colde, giveth place thereto, and therefore causeth the bottome of the sea as well as of the earth, to be the hotter? which is the reason that spring waters be warmer, yea and both lakes and rivers doe teike and smooke more in Winter than in Summer, because the heat is kept downe, and driven to the bottome by the colde, which is predominant over it?

Or rather are we to say, that the nets rot not at all, but whensoever they be stiffe congealed with colde which drieth them up, soone broken afterwards they are with the violence of the waves, and so seeme as if they were rotten and putrified indeed; for in more danger they are in colde and frosty weather; and like as strings and sinewes over-stretched doe breake, seeing especially that the sea in Winter most commonly is troubled, which is the reason that they use to retrain restreine and thicken them with certaine tinctures, for feare they should be overmuch relaxed and resolved; for otherwife, if it were not for that doubt, being not so died and besmeared all over, they would sooner deceive fishes, because they could not perceive them so soone; for that the colour naturally of the lines and threads resembling the aire, is very meet to deceive within the sea.

*What is the reason that the * Dorians * pray for to have ill inuing of their hey?*

IS not this the cause, because hey is not well inued wet, or having taken a shewre? for mowen downe it is not dry, but while it is greene and full of sappe; and if it take wet withall, it rotte incontinently and is marred: whereas contrariwise if standing corne be moistened with raine a little before haruest, it taketh much good against hot southerne windes, which will not suffer the corne to gather and knit in the eare, but cause it to be loofe that it cannot eare well by means of heat, were it not by the drenching and watering of the ground, the moisture did coole and mollifie the earth.

What is the reason that a fat, strong, and heavy clay ground, beareth wheat best: but contrariwise a light and sandy soile, is better for barley?

May not this be a reason, that of all corne, that which is more strong and solide, requireth larger food, and the weaker lesse, and more slender nourishment? now it is well known that barley is a more feeble and hollow graine than wheat is: in which regard it will not abide and beare plentifull nouriture and strong. An argument and testimonie hereof we may have of that kinde of wheat which is called three-moneth wheat, for that in drier grounds it liketh better, and commeth up in greater plenty: the reason is, because it is not so firme and solid as others, and therefore requireth lesse nutriment: in regard whereof, also it commeth sooner to ripeness and perfection.

How commeth this common proverbe: Sow wheat in dust, and barley in dust?

IS it not as I said before, because wheat is able to overcome more nourishment, but barley can not endure much moisture to drench and drowne it?

Or in this respect, that wheat being a stiffe and hard kinde of graine, resembling the nature of wood, doth sooner come and chit within the ground, in case it be well foked and softened with moisture, and therefore liketh better of a wet ground; whereas the drier soile at the first sowing agreeth better with barley, and is more commodious for it, being as it is, a more loofe and spongy kind of graine.

Or because such a temperature of the ground in regard of the heat, is more proportionable and lesse hurtfull unto barley, being as it is the colder graine?

Or rather, husbandmen are afraid to * thrash their wheat upon a dry and sandy floore, because of * ants; for soone will they take to that kind of graine in such a place. As for barley, they use lesse to beare it, because the cornes thereof be hard to be caried and recatied from one place to another, they are so bigge.

What is the cause that silvers chuse the haire of stone-horse tiales rather than of mares, to make their angling lines?

IS it because the male, as in all other parts, so in haire also, is more strong than the female? Or rather, for that they thinke the haire of mares tiales, drenched and wet as it is ever and anon with their staling, is more brittle and woofe than the other?

*What is the reason that when the * Calamacie fish is seene in the sea, it is a signe of a great tempest?*

IS it because all soft and unscaley fishes are very impatient of colde and of foule weather, they be so bare and naked, and have withall their flesh exceeding tender, as being covered, neither with shell nor thicke skinn, ne yet scale; but contrariwise, having their hardy, gristly, and bony substance substance within? which is the reason that all such fishes be called Malacia, as one would say, Soft and tender. For which cause naturally they soone foresee a tempest, and feele colde commings, for that it is offensive unto them: and therefore likewise, when the Poulpe or Polyp runneth to land, and catcheth holde of some little rocks, it is a token that there is great winde toward. And for the Calamacie, he leapeth forth for to avoid the colde and the trouble or agitation of the water in the bottome of the sea: for of other soft fishes, his flesh is most tender and apt to be pierced and hurt.

Why doth the Polyp change his colour?

IS it according to the opinon of Theophrastus, because it is a fearefull and timorous creature by nature; and therefore when he is troubled or amazed as his spirit trimeth, so he altereth withall his colour, even as we men do? whereupon we say in the common proverbe:

*The coward, in view
Soone changeth brow.*

Or may this be a good probable conjecture of the change, but not sufficient, for the resemblance? considering that he changeth so, as here resembleth the rocks which he seeketh upon. Unto which properitie, Pindarus alluded in these verses:

*His munde doth alter most mutable,
To Poulpe the sea-fish skin semblable;
Which changeth hue to exhibiting futable:
To live in all worlds he is pliable.*

And Theognis:

*Put on a minde like Polype fish,
and learne so to dissemble:
Which of the rocks where to it sticks,
the colour doth resemble.*

Also, men usually say, such as surpasse others for cunning and cautelous dealing, studie and practise this: that for to save themselves, and not to be seene or known of those about them, they alwaies will be like unto the poulpe, and change their colours, that is to say, their maners and behaviour.

Or do they thinke such an one to make use of his colour readily, as of a garment, to change and put on another whensoever he will?

Well then, the poulpe fish himselfe, by his feare may haply give the occasion and beginning of this change and passion; but the principall point of the cause consisteth in something els. And therefore weigh and consider what Empedocles writeth:

*Wot well, all mortal things that be,
Defluxions have in some degree.*

For there passe away continually, many defluxions, not onely from living creatures, plants, earth and sea, but also from stones, brasse and iron: for all things perish and yeeld a smell, in that there runneth something alwaies from them, and they weare continually: insomuch as it is thought that by these defluxions are all attractions and insulations: and some suppose their embracings and connexions; others, their smiling: some their impulsions, and I wot not what circumplexions and environments, to be attributed unto such defluxions; and especially from rocks and stones along the sea continually, washed and dashed with the waves, there be decisions passe of some parcels and small fragments, the which do cleave unto other bodies, and cling about those which have their pores more strict and close, or els passe thorow such as have the same over rare and open. As for the flesh of the Polype, it is to fee to, fistulous and spongy, like unto hony-combs, apt to receive all such defluxions and decisions from other bodies, when as then he is afraid, his winde goeth and commeth, and withall, shutteth up his bodie, and bringeth it together, that he may receive and retene in the superficies of his skin, the defluxions that come from that which is next it: for the rivels and wrinkles of his soft skin, which are knit with feare, are in stead of crooke and bending cleies fit to entertaine the defluxions and parcels lighting upon them, which scatter not heere and there, but gathering upon the skin, make the superficies thereof to be of semblable colour. And that this is a true cause, it may appeare by one great argument, namely, that neither the Polyp doth resemble in colour all that which is

neere unto it, nor the Chameleon the white colour; but both the one & the other, such things onely, as the defluxions whereof are proportionate unto their pores and small passages,

What is the cause that the teares of wilde boares be sweet, but of staggas and hinds, saltish and unpleasant to the taste?

Heat and colde are the cause of both; for the stagge is colde of nature, but the bore exceeding hot and fierie: whereupon it is, that the one fleeth away, the other maketh head, and stands to it when he is assaulted, and then is it most of all that he sheddeth teares, upon a fell heart: for when plentie of heat (as I said before) mounteth up unto his eies,

*His bristles stare and stand upright,

and so the humour that distilleth from his eies, is sweet. Others say, that these teares are pressed and wrong out from the blood being troubled, like as whey from milke: and of this opinion was Empedocles. And forasmuch as the blood of the wilde bore is blacke and thicke in regard of heat, but that of stags and hinds, thin and waterish, great reason there is that the teares which passe from the one in anger, and the other in feare, should be such as is afore said.

What is the reason, that tame swine doe farrow often in one yeere, some at one time, and some at another; whereas the wilde of that kinde, bring forth pigs but once in the yeere, and all of them in a manner upon the same daies, and those are in the beginning of Summer: whereupon we say in our vulgar proverbe:

*The night once past, of wilde sowes farrowing:
T will raine no more be sure, for any thing.*

Is it (thinke you) for the plentie they have of meat; as in trueth, fulnesse brings wantonnesse, and of full feeding comes lust of breeding: for abundance of food causeth superfluitie of seed, as well in living creatures as in plants. As for the wilde swine, they seeke their victuals themselves, and that with travell and feare: whereas the tame have alwaies store thereof, either naturally growing for them, or els provided by mans indoltry.

Or is the cause of this difference to be attributed unto the idle life of the one, and the painful labour of the other: for the domestickall and tame are sluggish, and never wander farre from their swineherds: but the other range and rove abroad among the forrests and mountains, running to and fro, dispatching quickly all the food they can get, and spending it every whit upon the subsistence of their bodies, leaving no superfluities, expedient for geniture or seed.

Or may it not be, that tame sowes doe keepe company, feed and goe in heards together with their bores, which provoketh their lust, and kindleth the desire to engender: according as Empedocles hath written of men in these verses:

*The sight of eie, doth kindle lust in brest,
Of looking, liking, then loving and hereft.*

Whereas the wilde, because they live apart, and pasture not together, have no such desire and lust one to another; for their naturall appetite that way is dulled and quenched.

Or rather, that is true which Aristotle saith, namely, that Homer calleth a wilde bore χελων, as having but one genetoric, for that the most part of them, in rubbing themselves against the trunks and stocks of trees, doe crush and breake their stones.

What is the reason of this usuall speech: that beares have a most sweet hand, and that their flesh is so most pleasant to be eaten?

Because those parts of the body which doe best concoct and digest nourishment, yeeld their flesh most delicate: now that concocteth and digesteth best, which stirreth most, and doth greatest exercise: like as the beare moveth most this part, for his forepawes he useth as feet to goe and runne withall, he maketh use also of them as of hands to apprehend and catch any thing.

What is the cause that in the spring time wilde beasts are hardly hunted by the sent, and followed by the trace?

Is it for that hounds, as Empedocles saith,
By sent of nostrils, when they trace Wilde beast, to finde their resting place.

doe take hold of those vapours and defluxions which the said beasts leave behind them in the wood as they passe: but in the spring time these are confounded or utterly extingished by many other smells of plants and shrubs, which as then be in their flower, and coming upon the aire that the beasts made, and intermingled therewith, do trouble and deceive the sent of the hounds, whereby they are put out and at default, that they cannot truly hunt after them by their trace; which is the reason, (men say) that upon the mountaine Aetna, in Scitie, there is never any hunting with hounds, for that all the yeere long there is such abundance of flowers, both in hills and dales, growing as it were in a meadow or garden, whereof the place smelleth all over so sweet, that it will not suffer the hounds to catch the sent of the beasts: And verily, there geeth a tale, that Pluto ravished Proserpina as she was gathering flowers there: in which regard the inhabitants honouring the place with great reverence and devotion, never put up or hunt the beasts that pasture about that mountaine.

What is the reason, that when the moone is at the full, it is very hard for hounds to meet with wilde beasts by the trace or sent of the footing?

Is it not for the same cause before alledged, for that about the full moone there is engendered store of dew: whereupon it is that the poet Alexander calleth dew the daughter of Jupiter, and the moone in these verses:

*Dame Dew is nowise, whom of god Jupiter
And lady Moone, men call the daughter.*

For the dew is nothing else but a weake and feeble raine: and why? because the heat of the moone is but infirme: whereof it commeth to passe, that she draweth up vapours indeed from the earth, as doeth the sunne, but not able to fetch them up aloft, nor there to comprehend them, lette them fall againe.

What is the cause that in a white or hoarie frost, wilde beasts are hardly traced?

Whether is it for that they being loth for very colde to range farre from their dennes, leave not many marks of their footings upon the ground: which is thereason that at other times they make spare of that prey which is neere unto them, for feare of danger if they should be forced to range farre abroad in Winter, and because they would have ready at hand about them at such an hard season to feed upon.

Or else is it requisite that the place where men doe hunt, have not onely the tracks of the beast to be seene, but also of force to affect the sent of the hounds, and to set their nostrils a worke; but then doe they moove this sense of theirs, when as they are gently dissolved and dilated as it were by heat: whereas the aire if it be extreme colde, congealing as it were the smells, will not suffer them to spread and be diffused abroad, thereby to move the sense: and hereupon it is (as folke say) that perfumes, ointments, and wines be lesse fragrant and odoriferous in Winter, or in cold weather, than at other times, for the aire being it selfe bound and shut close, doth likewise stay within it all scents, and will not suffer them to passe forth.

What is the cause that brute beasts, so often as they are sicke, or feele themselves amisse, seeke after divers medicinable meanes for remedie, and using the same, finde many times helpe? as for example: dogges when they be stomacke sicke, fall to eat a kinde of quitch grasse, because they would cast and vomit cholere; hogges search for crafsikes of the river, for by feeding upon them they cure their headach; the sortow likewise having eaten the flesh of a viper, eateth upon it the herbe origan; and the beare when she is full in the stomacke and doth loath all victuals, licketh up pissures with her tongue, which she no sooner hath swallowed downe, but she is wrightened, and yet none of all this were they taught, either by experience, or some casuall occasion?

It is then the fmel that mooveth them to seeke these remedies, and like as the hony combs by the odor stirre up the bee: and the flesh of dead carions the vultures, drawing and alluring them a farre of: so the crafishes invite unto them swine, origan the tortoise, and pimires the beare, by certaine fents and fluxions which are accomodate and familiar unto them, without any sense leading them thereto by discourse of reason, and teaching them what is good and profitable?

Or rather be they the temperatures of the bodies disposed unto sicknesse, that bring unto these creatures such appetites, engendring divers ceremonies, sweetnesses, or other strange & unusual qualities: as we see it ordinary in great bellied women, who during the time that they go with a childe fall to eat grit & earth with greedinesse: in so much as expert phisicians fore-know by the sundry appetites of their patients, whether they shall live or die, for so Mnesibemus the phisician doth report, that in the beginning of the Pneumonie or inflammation of the lungs, one patient of his, longing for to eat onions escaped that maladie; and another whose appetite stood to figgs, died for it, of the same disease: for that the appetites follow the temperatures, and the temperatures are proportionate to the diseases.

It standeth therefore to great reason that beasts likewise, such as are not surprisid with mortal maladies, nor sicke to death, have that disposition and temperature, whereby their appetites doe moove and provoke each one to that which is good and holsome, yea and expedient to the cure of their sicknesse.

What is the cause that must or new wine, continued sweet a long time, in case the vessel wherein it is kept be colde round about it?

It is because the alteration of this sweet favour into the naturall taste of wine, is the very concoction of the wine; and colde hindereth the said concoction, which proceedeth from heat.

Or contrariwise, because the proper joice and naturall favour of the grape is sweet, for we say that then the grape beginneth to ripen, when it waxeth sweet. Now colde not suffring new wine to exhale, but keeping the kinde heat thereof within, preserveth the said sweetness still. And this is the very cause that those who make their vintage in a rainy constitution of the weather, doe finde that their new wine will not worke so well in the vault, because that such ebullition proceedeth of heat, and the colde doth reffraine and refresh the said heat.

What is the cause that of all savage beasts, the beare doth never lightly gnaw the net and toile with her teeth, whereas wolves and foxes use ordinarily to cate the same?

It is for that her teeth grow farre within her mouth, in such sort that she cannot get within the cords of the nets, having besides so great and thicke lippes betwene, that they hinder her for catching hold with her said fangs.

Or rather because she having more force in her fore-feet, which she useth in stead of hands, therewith she doth teare and breake the cords; or else having use both of her pawes and also of her mouth: she imployeth those to the bursting of the nets, and with her teeth fighteth, and maketh her part good against the hunters. Besides the tumbling and rolling of her body that she doth practise, serveth her in as good stead as any thing else. And therefore seeing her selfe in danger to be taken within the toile many times, casteth her selfe round upon her head, and endeavoureth that way to escape, rather than either by pawes or fangs to burst the toile.

What is the reason that we wonder not to see any sources or springs of colder water, like as we doe of hot? notwithstanding it is evident that as heat is the cause of these, so is colde of the other.

For we must not say as some holde opinion, that heat indeed is an habitude of it selfe, but colde nothing else but the privation of heat: for it were in truth more wonderfull how that which hath no subsistence, should be the cause of that which hath a being. But it seemeth that nature would have us to wonder heereof, onely for the rare sight heereof; and because it is not often seene, therefore we should enquire for some secret cause, and demand how that may be, which is but seldom observed.

But

*But seest thou this starry firmament,
So high above and infinitely vast,
In bosom moist of water element,
The earth beneath how it enloseth fast,*

How many strange and wonderfull sights doth it represent unto us in the night season, and what beauty sheweth it unto us in the day time? and the common people wonder at the nature of these things * * As also at the rainebowes, and the divers tinctures formes and pictures of the clouds appeering by day: and how they be adorned with sundry shapies, breaking out of them in maner of bubbles.

What is the cause that when vines or other young plants, which be ranke of leaves, and otherwise fruitlesse, are laid to rest?

It is because that goats in Greeke mezei, which are exceeding fat, be lesse apt to engender, and hardly for their farnesse can leape the females. For generative seed is the superfluous excrement of that nourishment which is conglutinate to the substantiall parts of the body. Now when as any living creature or plant is in very good plight and grown grosse, it is an evident signe, that the nouriture is imployed and spent altogether in the maintenance of it selfe, leaving no excrement at all, or the same very small, and not good for generation.

What is the reason, that if a vine be sprinkled and drenched with wine, especially that which came of the owne grape, it drieth and withereth away?

It is there not the same reason heereof as of the baldnesse in great drinkers, when as the wine by means of heat, causeth the moisture to evaporate which should feed the haire of their head? Or is it not rather, because the very liquor of wine commeth in some sort of putrefaction, according to the verses of Empedocles:

*When in wine wood the water putrefies,
It turnes to wine, whiles under burke it lies.*

When as then a wine commeth to be wet with wine outwardly, it is as much as if fire were put into it, which doth corrupt the naturall temperature of that humour which should nourish it?

Or rather, pure wine, being of an alstringent nature, soketh and pierceeth to the very root, where shutting up and enclosing the pores, it empeacheth the entrance of that sap (by vertue whereof, the vine is wont to bud, burgeen, and flourish) that it can not runne to the stocke?

Or may it not be, it is cleane contrary to the nature of a vine, that the liquor which once went out of it, should returne againe into it? for a liquor or humour whiles it is within the plant in the nature of a sap, may well have power to feed the same; but that being departed once from 40 thence, it should joine thereto againe, or become a part thereof, I cannot see how it is possible.

Why doth the date tree onely of all others arise archwise, and bend upward, when a weight is laid thereupon?

Whether may it not be that the fire and spiritual power which it hath and is predominant in it, being once provoked, and as it were angered, putteth forth it selfe so much the more, and mounteth upward?

<sup>50</sup> Or because the poise or weight aforesaid forcing the boughes suddenly, oppresseth and keepeth downe the airie substance which they have, and driveth all of it inward: but the same afterwards having resumed strength againe, maketh head afresh, and more eagerly withstandeth the weight?

Or lastly, the softer and more tender branches not able to susteine the violence at first, so soone as the burden resteth quiet, by little and little lift up themselves, and make a shew as if they rose up against it.

What

* I finde no more of these questions in the Greeke original, or the French translation, but in one Latine translation it followeth on in this wise,

33
What is the reason that pit-water is lesse nutritive than either that which ariseth out of springs, or fallett downe from heaven?

IS it because it is more colde, and withall hath lesse aire in it?
 Or, for that it containeth much salt therein, by reason of such store of earth mingled therewith: now it is well knownen, that salt above all other things causeth leanness.
 Or because standing as it doeth still, and not exercised with running and stirring, it getteth a certaine malignant quality, which is hurtfull and offensive to all living creatures drinking thereof; for by occasion of that hurtfull qualitie, neither is it well concocted, nor yet can it feed or nourish any thing. And verily the same is the very cause that all dead waters of pooles and meares be unholmesome, for that they cannot digest and dispatch those harmefull qualities which they borrow of the evil propertie, either of aire or of earth.

*Why is the west wind held commonly to be of all other the swiftest, according to this verse of Homer:
 Let us likewise bestir our feet,
 As fast as the sterne winds do fleet.*

IS it not thinke you, because this winde is wont to blow when the skie is very well clenfed, and the aire exceeding cleere and without all clouds; for the thickenesse and impuritie of the aire, doth not (I may say to you) a litle impeach and interrupt the course of the winds.
 Or rather, because the sunne with his beames striking through a cold winde, is the cause that it passeth the faster away; for whatsoever is drawn in by the refrigerative force of the windes, the same if it be overcome by heat as his enemy, we must thinke is driven and set forward both farther, and also with greater celeritie.

What should be the cause that bees cannot abide smoke?

WHether is it because the pores and passages of their vitall spirits be exceeding streight, and if it chance that smoke be gotten into them and there kept in and intercepted, it is enough to stop the poore bees breath, yea and to strangle them quite?

Or is it not the acrimony and bitterness (thinke you) of the smoke in cause? for bees are delighted with sweet things, and in very truth they have no other nourishment; and therefore no marvell if they detest and abhorre smoke, as a thing for the bitterness most adverse and contrary unto them: and therefore hony masters when they make a smoke for to drive away bees, are wont to burne bitter herbes, as hemlock, centaury, &c.

What might be the reason that bees will sooner sting those who newly before have committed whoredome?

IS it not because it is a creature that woonderfully delighteth in puritie, cleanness and elegance? and withall she hath a marvellous quick sense of smelling: because therefore such unclean dealings betweene man and woman in regard of fleshly and beastly lust, immoderately performed, are wont to leave behind in the parties much filthinesse and impurity; the bees both sooner finde them out, and also conceive the greater hatred against them: heereupon it is that in Theophrastus the shepherd after a merry and pleasant manner, sendeth Venus away into Archis to be well fitting with bees, for her adultery; as appeareth by these verses:

Now go thy waie to Ida mount, go to Anchises now, Where mightie oaks, where banks along of square Cypres grow, Where hives and hollow trunks of trees,
 with hony sweet abound,
 Where all the place with humming noise of busie bees resound.

And

And Pindarus:

*Thou painfull bee, thou pretie creature,
 Who hony-combs six-angled, as they be,
 With feet dost frame, false Rhoeceus and impure,
 With sting hast prickt for his leaud villaine.*

What is the cause that dogges follow after a stone that is throwen at them, and biteth it, letting the man alone who slung it?

IS it because he can apprehend nothing by imagination, nor call a thing to minde: which are gifts and vertues proper to man alone? and therefore, seeing he can not discern nor conceive the partie indeed that offered him injurie, he supposeth that to be his enemy which seemeth in his eie to threaten him, and of it he goes about to be revenged?

Or thinking the stone while it runnes along the ground, to be some wilde beast, according to his nature he intendeth to catch it first: but afterwards, when he seeth himselfe deceived and put besides his reckoning, he setteth upon the man?

Or rather, doth he not hate the stone and man both alike; but pursueth that onely which is next unto him?

What is the reason that at a certaine time of the yeere, shee wolues doe all whelp within the compassse of twelve daies?

A Ntipater in his booke containing the historie of living creatures, affirmeth, that shee wolves exclude fourth their yong ones about the time that malt-trees doe shed their blossomes; for upon the taste thereof their wombs open: but if there be none of such blowmes to be had, then their yong die within the bodie, and never come to light. He saith moreover, that those countries which bring not fourth oaks and malt, are never troubled nor spoiled with wolves. Some there be who attribute all this to a tale that goes of Latona; who being with childe, and finding no abiding place of rest and safetie by reason of Juno, for the space of twelve daies; during which time, she went to Delos, being transmuted by Jupiter into a wolfe, obtained at his hands, that all wolves for ever after might within that time be delivered of their yong.

How cometh it, that water seeming white aloft, sheweth to be blacke in the bottome?

IS it, for that depth is the mother of darkenesse, as being that which doth dimme and marre the sunne beames before they can descend so low as it: as for the uppermost superficies of the water, because it is immediatly affected by the sunne, it must needs receive the white brightness of the light; the which Empedocles verily approveth in these verses:

*A river in the bottome seemes,
 by shade of colour blacke;
 The like is scene in caves and holes, by depth, where light they lacke.*

Or many times the bottome of the sea and great rivers being full of mud, doth by the reflexion of the sunne beames represent the like colour that the said mud hath?

Or is not more probable, that the water toward the bottome is not pure and sincere, but corrupted with an earthly qualitie, as continually carying with it somewhat of that, by which it runneth and wherewith it is stirred; and the same feeling once to the bottome, causeth it to be more troubled and lesse transparent?

PLATO.

PLATONIQUE QUESTIONS.

The Summarie.

In these gatherings, Plutarch expoundeth the sense of divers hard places, which are found in the disputations of Socrates, contained in the Dialogues of Plato his disciple, but especially in Timæus; which may serve to allure young students to the reading of that great philosopher, who under the burke of words, hath delivered grave and pleasant matters.

PLATONIQUE QUESTIONS.

I

What is the reason, that God other-whiles commanded Socrates to do the part of a Midwife in helping others to be delivered of child-birth, but for bad himselfe in any wise to procreate children? according as it is written in a treatise entitled Theætetus. For we ought not to thinke that if he had bene disposed to cavill, jostle or to speake ironically in this place, he would have abused the name of God. Besides, in this selfe same treatise he attributes many other high and magnificall speeches unto Socrates, & namely this among many others: Certes (saith he) there be many men (right good for) who carry this minde to me-ward, that they are disposed plainly to carpe and bite me, in case at any time I seeme to give them of any foolish opinion that they have, neither thinke they thus I do it of good will and meaning well unto them; shewing themselves herein far stoures of this doctrine. That no God beareth evill will to men: no more verily do I this unto them upon any malice: but surely I can not otherwise chuse, neither doe I thinke it lawfull for me either to smooth her up and pardon a lie, or to dissemble and suppress a truth.

So it for that he tearmeth his owne nature, as being more judicious and inventive, by the name of God? like as Menander doth, saying:

*This minde, is his owne intelligence,
In truth is of divine essence.*

40

And Heraclitus:

*Mans nature we must needs confesse,
Is heavenly and a god doubtlesse.*

Or rather in very truth, there was some divine and celestiall cause, which suggested and inspired into Socrates this manner of philosophy; whereby lifting as hee did continually, and exami- ning others, he cured them of all swelling pride, of vaine error, of presumptuous arrogance, likewise of being odious, first to themselves, and afterwards to those about them of their company: for it fortun'd about his time, that a number of these sophisters swarmed over all Greece, unto whom young gentlemen resorting & paying good summes of money for their salary, were filled with a great weening and opinion of themselves, with a vaine persuasion of their owne learning and zelous love to good letters, spending their time in idle disputations, and frivolous contentions, without doing any thing in the world, that was either good, honest, or profitable. Socrates therefore, who had a speciall gift by his manner of speech and discourse, as it were by some purgative medicine, to argue and convince, was of greater authority and credit when he

he

he confuted others, in that he never affirmed nor pronounced resolutely any thing of his owne; yea, and he pierced deeper into the soules and hearts of his hearers, by how much he seemed to seeke out the truth in common, and never to favorize and mainteine any opinion of his owne: for this begetting of a mans owne fanics, mightily impeacheth the facultie and power to judge another, for evermore the lover is blinded in the behalfe of that which he loveth: and verily there is nothing in the world that loveth so much the owne, as a man doth the opinions and reason whereof himselfe was the father; for surely that distribution and partition among children which is commonly said to be most and equall, is in this case of opinions and reasons most unjust; for in the former every one must take his owne, but in this hee ought to chuse the better, yea, though it were another mans: and therefore once againe, he that fathereth somewhat of his owne, becommeth the worse judge of other mens: And like as there was sometime a sophister or great learned man, who said: That the Elians would be the better umpires and judges of the sacred Olympick games, in case there were never any Elian came in place to performe his prizes, even so, he that would be a good president to sit and determine of divers sentences and opinions; no reason there is in the world that he should desire to have his owne sentence crowned, no nor to be one of the parties contending, and who in truth are to be judged by him. The Grecian captaines after they had defeated the Barbarians, being assembled in counsell to give their voices unto those whom they deemed worthy of reward and honour, for their prowesse; judged themselves all to have done the best service, and to be the most valorous warriors. And of philosophers I assure you there is not one but he would doe as much, unlesse it were Socrates and such as he, who confesse that they neither have, nor know ought of their owne: for these in truth be they who onely shew themselves to be uncorrupt, and competent judges of the truth, and such as cannot be challenged: for like as the aite within our eates if it be not firme and steady, nor cleere without any voice of the owne, but full of singing founds, and ringing noises, cannot exactly comprehend that which is said unto us; even so, that which isto judge of reasons in philosophie, if it meet with any thing that refoundeth and keepeth an hammering within, hardly will it be able to understand that which shall be delivered without forth: for the owne particular opinion which is domesticall and dwelleth at home, of what matter soever it be that is treated of, will alwaies be the philosopher that hitteth the marke, and toucheth the truth best; whereas all the rest shall be thought but to opine probably the truth. Moreover, if it be true that a man is not able perfectly to comprise or know any thing, by good right and reason then did God forbid him to call forth these false conceptions as it were of untrue and unconstant opinions, and forced him to reprove and detect those who ever had such: for no small profit, but right great commoditie comes by such a speech as is able to deliver men from the greatest evil that is, even the spirit of error, of illusion and vanitie in opinion:

So great a gift as God of speciall grace, Gave never to Alcibiades his race,

For the physicke of Socrates was not to heale the body, but to cleanse and purifie the soule, festering inwardly and corrupt. Contrariwise, if it be so that the truth may be knowne, and that there be but one truth, he who learned it of him that found it not out, hath no lesse than the inveter himselfe; yea, & better receiveth it he, who is not perswaded that he hath it: nay, he receiveth that which is simply best of all: much like as hee who having no naturall children of his owne body begotten, taketh the best that he can chuse, for to make his adopted child. But consider heere with me, whether other kinds of learning deserve nor haply to have much study imployed in them, as namely, Poetry, Mathematicks, the art of Eloquence, and the opinions of Sophisters and great clearks: Therefore God of that divine power whatsoever, forbid Socrates to engender them; but as touching that which Socrates esteemed to be the onely wisdom, to wit, the knowledge of God and spirituall things, which hee himselfe calleth the amorous science; there be no men that beget or invent it, but call the same onely to remembrance: whereupon Socrates himselfe never taught any thing, but proposing onely unto young men certaine beginning of difficulties and doubts, as it were the fore-throws of child-birth, stirred up, awakened, and drew forth their owne naturall wits, and inbred intelligences: and this was it that he called the midwives art, which brought nothing into them from without, as others would make them beleieve, who conferred with them, that they infused reason and understanding, but shewed onely and taught them, that they had already within themselves a minde and understanding understanding of their owne, and the same sufficient to nourish, though it were confuted and imperfect.

What is thereon that in some places be called the soveraigne God, father and maker of all things?

Was it for that he is in truth the father of gods, such as were ingendred, and also of men, as Homer calleth him, like as the maker of those creatures which have neither reason nor soule? for according as Chrysippe saith, we use not to call him the father of the secondine where in the infant is inwapped within the wombe, who conferred genetall seed, although the said secondine be made of the seed.

Or usest he not a metaphor, as his manner is, when figuratively he termeth him Father of the world, who is the efficient cause, according to his usuall manner of speaking; as namely, in the Dialogue entituled Symposium, where he maketh Phaedrus the father of amorous discourses, Dialogue entituled Symposium, where he maketh Phaedrus the father of amorous discourses, for that he it was, who propoed and set abroad the same: like as he named Callipides in a dialogue bearing his name, The father of philosophical discourses, for that there passed many beautifull speeches in philosophy, whereof he ministred the occasion and beginning?

Or rather was it not, because there is a difference betweene father and maker, as also betweene generation and creation? for whatsoever is ingendred, is made, but not de converso; whatsoever is made, is likewise ingendred: sensibly, who hath begotten, hath also made; for generation is the making of a living creature: but if we consider a workman, to wit, either a mason or carpenter, a weaver, a lute maker, or imager; certes, the worke is distinct and separate from the maker: whereas the moving principle, and the puffsance of him who begetteth, is infused into that which is begotten; it containeth his nature, being as it were a parcell distracted from the very substance of him who ingendred it. Forasmuch then, as the world doth not resemble a conjunction of many pieces, set, joined, fastened and glued together; but hath in it a great portion of the animal life, yea, and of divinity, which God hath infused and mingled in the matter, as derived both the father and maker of the world, being a living creature as it is. These points being very conformable and proportionate to the opinion of Plato, consider withall a little, if this also which I shall deliver, be not likewise accordant thereto; namely, that the world being composed of two parts, to wit, of body and of soule: the one, which is the body, God hath not ingendred; but having the matter thereof exhibited unto him, he hath formed, shaped and fitted it, binding and limning it according to the infinitie thereof, with termes, bounds and figures proportioning thereto: but the soule having a portion of understanding discourse of reason, order and harmony: is not onely the worke, but also a part of God, not by him, but even of him, and issuing from his owne proper substance. In his booke therefore of Politiques or Common wealth, he subdivideth the whole world, as it were a line into two segments or sections unequal, he subdivideth either section into other twaine, after the same proportion: for two generally kinds he maketh of all things; the one sensible and visible, the other intelligible: unto the intelligible kinde he attributeth in the first degree the primitive formes and Idees; in the second degree, all solide Mathematics: and as for the sensible kinde, he attributeth thereto in the first ranke, all solide bodies; and in the second place, the images and figures of them. Also to every one of these four members of his said division, he giveth his owne proper judge: to the first of Ideas, understanding; to the Mathematics, imagination; to the solide bodies, faith and beleefe; to the images and figures, conjecture. To what end then, and upon what intention hath he divided the whole world into two sections, and the same unequal? and of those two sections, whether is the greater, that of sensible objects, or that of intelligible? As for himselfe, he hath not shewed and declared it: but presently it will appeare, that the portion of sensible things is the greater: for the indivisible substance is of things intellectuall, being evermore of one sort, and resting upon the same subject in one state, and reduced to very short and narrow roomes, and the same pure and neat: whereas the other being spread and wandering upon bodies, is that section of sensible things. Moreover, the propertie of that which is incorporall, is to be definite and determinate. And a bodie as touching the matter thereof, is indefinite and undeterminate; becoming sensible, when by participation of the intelligible it is made finite and limitable. Over and besides, like as every sensible thing hath many images, many shadowes, and many figures, and generally, out of one onely pattern there may be drawn many copies and examples, imitated atwell by art as by nature; so it can not chuse; but the things that here be sensible, should be more in number than they above, which are intelligible, according to the opinion of Plato, supposing this, that things sensible be as it were the images and examples of the original patterns, to wit, the intelligible Idea. Furthermore, the intelligence of these Ideas and formes by subtraction, deduction and division of bodies, is ranged answerable to the order of the Mathematicks, arising from Arithmetick which is the science of Numbers, into Geometry, to wit, the skill of measures; then afterwards to Astrologie, which is the knowledge of the stars, & in the highest place above all the rest, setteth Harmonie, which is the skill of sounds and accords: for the subject of Geometry is this, when as to quantity in general, there is adjoined magnitude in length & breadth: of Stereometrie, when to the magnitude of length and breadth, there is added depth or profunditie.

Likewise, the proper subject of Astrologie is this, when to the solid magnitude there cometh motion. The subject of harmony or musick, when to a bodie moving, there is adjoined sound or voice. If we subtract then and take away, from moving bodies, voice; from solide bodies, motion; from superficies, depth and profundity; and from quantities, magnitude; we shall come by this time to the intelligible Idea which have no difference among them, in regard of one and sole thing: for unitie maketh no number, unless it come once to touch binarie or two, which is infinite: but in this wise having produced a number, it proceedeth to points and pricks, from pricks to lines, and so forth from lines to superficies, from superficies to profundities; from thence to bodies, and so forward to the qualities of bodies subject to passions and alterations. Moreover, of intellectuall things, there is no other judge but the understanding or the mind; for cogitation or intelligence, is no other thing but the understanding, so long as it is applied unto Mathematics, wherein things intellectuall appeare as within mirrours; whereas, for the knowledge of bodies, by reason of their great number, nature hath given unto us five powers and faculties of severall and different senses for to judge withall: and yet sufficient they are not to discover all objects; for many there be of them so small, that they can not be perceived by the senses. And like as, although every one of us being composed of soule and bodie, yet that principall part, which is our spirit and understanding, is a very small thing, hidden and enclosed within a great masse of flesh; even so, very like it is, that there is the same proportion within the universall world, betweene things sensible and intellectuall: for the intellectuall are the beginning of corpall: now that which proceedeth from a beginning, is alwaies in number more, and in magnitude greater, than the said beginning.

But on the contrary, a man may reason thus and say: First and formost, that in comparing sensible and corpall things with intellectuall, we doe in some sort make mortall things equal with divine, for God is to be reckened among intellectuall. Now this is to be granted, that the content is alwaies lesse then the continent; but the nature of the universall world, within the intellectuall, comprehendeth the sensible. For God having set the soule in the midst, hath spread and stretched it through all within, and yet without forth hath covered all bodies with it. As for the soule it is invisible, yea and imperceptible to all the naturall senses, according as he hath writen in his booke of lawes: and therefore every one of us is corruptible; but the world shall never perishe: for that in each of us that which is mortall and subject to dissolution, containeth within it the power which is vitall; but in the world it is cleane contrary, for the principall puffsance and nature, which is ever after one sort immutable, and doth alwaies preserve the corporall part, which it containeth and embraceth within it selfe. Besides, in a bodily nature and corporall, a thing is called individual and importible for the smallnesse thereof, to wit, when it is so little that it cannot be divided, but in the spirituall and incorporall, it is so called for the simplicity, sincerity & purity thereof, as being exempt from all multiplicity & diversity: for otherwise folly it were to cast a guesse at spirituall things by corporall. Furthermore the very present time which we call Now, is said to be inpartible and indivisible: howbeit, instant to paffions, all it is every where, neither is their any part of this habitable world without it: but all paffions, all actions, all corruptions & generations throughout the world are comprised in this very present Now. Now the onely instrument to judge of things intellectuall is the understanding, like as the eye, of light; which for simplicity is uniforme, & every way like unto it selfe: but bodies having many diversities & differences, are comprehended by divers instruments, & judged some by this, and others by that. And yet some there be who unworthily disesteeme and contemne the intellectuall puffsance and spirituall which is in us: for in truth, being goodly and great, it surmounteth every sensible thing and reacheth up as farre as to the gods. But that which of all others is most, himselfe in his booke entituled Symposium, teaching how to use love and love matters, matters, in withdrawing the soule from the affection of beauties corporall, and applying the same to those which are intellectuall, exhorteth us not to subject and intrall our selves into the lovely beauty of any body, nor of one study and science, but by erecting and lifting up our mindes aloft from such base objects, to turne unto that vast ocean indeed of pulcritude and beauty, which is vertue.

How commeth it to passe, that considering he affirmeth evermore the soule to be more ancient than the body, as the very cause of the generation of it, and the beginning likewise thereof, yet contrariwise he saith, that the soule was never without the bodie, nor the understanding without the soule, and that of necessity the soule must be within the bodie, and the understanding in the soule? for it seemeth that here in there is some contradiction; namely, that the body both is, and is not, in case it be true, that it is together with the soule, and yet nevertheless ingendred by the soule?

It is because that is true which we oftentimes doe say? namely, that the soule without understanding and the body without forme have alwaies bene together, & neither the one nor the other had ever commeniment of being nor beginning of generation; but when the soule came to have participation of understanding and of harmonic, and became to be wise by the meanes of conformance and accord, then caused she mutation in matter, and being more powerfull and strong in her owne motions, drew and turned into her the motions of the other? and even so the bodies of the world had the first generation from the soule, whereby it was shaped and made uniforme. For the soule of her selfe, brought not forth the nature of a body, nor created it of nothing, but of a body without all order and forme whatsoever, he made it orderly and very obseisant: as if one said that the force of a feed or kernell is alwaies with the bodie, but yet nevertheless the body of the fig tree or olive tree is engendred of the feed or kernell, he should not speake contrarieties: for the very body it selfe being mooved and altered by the feed, springeth and groweth to be such: seembly the matter void of forme and indeterminate, having once bene shapen by the soule, which was within, received such a forme and disposition.

What is the reason, that whereas there be bodies and figures some consisting of right lines and others of circular, he hath taken for the foundation and beginning of those which stand of right lines, the triangle isosceles, with two equal sides, and scalenum, with three sides all unequal. Of which, the triangle with two even legs composed: he cube or square bodie, which is the element and principle of the earth: and the triangle with three unequal legs made the pyramidall body, as also octaedron with eight faces, and coaedron with twenty faces whereof the first is the element and seed of fire, the second of aire, and the third of water: and yet he hath ever passed quite all bodies and figures circular: notwithstanding that he made mention of the sphericall figure or round body when he said, that every one of those figures above named is apt to divide a globe or sphericall body into equall parts?

It is as some doe imagine and suppose, because he attributed the Dodecaedron, that is to say, the body with twelve faces unto the globe or round sphere, in saying that God made use of this forme and figure, in the framing of the world? for in regard of the multitude of elements, and bluntnesse of angles, it is farthest off from direct and right lines, whereby it is flexible, and by stretching forth round in maner of a ball made of twelve pieces of leather, it approacheth nearest unto roundnesse, and in that regard is of greatest capacitie; for it contained twenty angles solid, and every one of them is comprized and environed within three flatte obtuse or blunt angles, considering that every of them is composed of one right and fift part: moreover compact it is and composed of twelve pentagones, that is to say, bodies with five angles, having their angles and sides equal; of which every one of thirty principall triangles, with three unequal legges: by reason whereof, it seemeth that he followed the degrees of the Zodiacke, and the daies of the yeere together, in that division of their parts so equal and just in number.

Or may not this be the reason, that by nature the right goeth before the round? or rather, to speake more truly, that a circular line seemeth to be some vicious passion or faulty qualitie of the right, for we use ordinarily to say, that the right line doth bow or bend; and a circle is drawn and

and described by the center, and the distance from it to the circumference, which is the verie place of the right line, by which it is measured out; for the circumference is on every side equally distant from the center. Moreover, the Conus, which is a round pyramys; and the Cylindre, which is as it were a round colonne or pillar of equal compasse, are both made of figures with direct lines, the one, to wit, the Conus, by a triangle, whereof one side remaineth firme, and the other with the base goeth round about it: the Cylindre, when the same befalleth to a parallell. Moreover, that which is lesse, commeth nearest unto the beginning, and resembleth it most: but the least and simplest of all lines is the right; for of the round line that part which is within, doth crooke and curve hollow, the other without doth bume and bunch. Over and besides, numbers are before figures, for unity is before a pricke; seeing that a pricke is in position and situation an unity, but an unity is triangular, for that every number triangular, eight times repeated or multiplied, by addition of an unity becometh quadrangular, and the same also befalleth to unity; and therefore a triangle is before a circle, which being so, the right line goeth before the circular. Moreover, an element is never divided into that which is composed of it: but contrariwise, every thing else is divided and resolved into the owne elements whereof it doth consist. If then the triangle is not resolved into any thing circular; but contrariwise, two diametres crossing one another, part a circle just into fower parts; then we must needs inferre the figure consisting of right lines, went before those which are circular: now that the right line goeth first, and the circular doth succeed and follow after, Plato himselfe hath shewed by demonstration, namely when hee saith, that the earth is composed of many cubes or square solid bodies, whereof every one is enclosed, and contained with right lined superficies, in such maner disposed, as yet the whole body and masse of the earth seemeth round like a globe, so that we need not to make any proper element thereof round; if it be so that bodies with right lines, conjoined and set in some fort one to another, bringeth forth this forme: Over and besides the direct line, be it little or be it great, keepeth alwaies the same rectitude: whereas contrariwise we see the circumferences of circles if they be small, are more coping, bending, and contracted in their outward curvature: contrariwise, if they be great, they are more extant, lax, and spread, inso much as they that stand by the outward circumference of circles, lying upon a flat superficies, touch the same underneath, partly by a pricke if they be small, and in part by a line if they be large; so as a man may very well conjecture, that many right lines joined one to another taile to taile by piece-meale, produce the circumference of a circle. But consider whether there be none of these our circular or sphericall figures, exquisitely and exactly perfect; but in regard of the extensions and circumflections of right lines, or by reason of the exile and finalnesse of the parts, there can be perceived no difference, and thereupon there sheweth a circular and round figure: And therefore it is, that there is not a bodie here, that by by nature doth moove circularly, but all according to the right line; so that the round and sphericall figure is not the element of a sensible body, but of the soule and understanding, unto which he attributeth likewise the circular motion as belonging unto them naturally.

*In what sense and meaning delivered he this speech in his booke entituled Phædrus, that the nature of a wing, whereby that which is heavy and ponderous, is carried up aloft, of all other things that belong unto a body, hath a certaine communion and participation with God?*

It is because he discoureteth there of love; and love is occupied about the beauty of the body, and this beauty for the resemblance that it hath to divinity, doth moove the minde, and excite the reminiscence thereof?

Or rather are we to take it simply without curious searching farther into any mystery thereof: namely, that the soule being within the body, hath many faculties & powers, whereof that which is the discourse of reason and understanding, doth participate with the deitie, which hee so not improperly and impertinently teareth a wing, because it lifteth up the soule from things base and mortall, unto the consideration of heavenly and celestiall matters.

*How is it that Plato in some places saith, the Antiperistasis of motion, that is to say, the constant contrariety debarring a body to moove, in regard that there is no voidnesse or vacuity in nature, is the cause of those effects which wee see in physicians ventoses and cupping glasses of swallowing downe our viands, of throwing of mussy waights, of the course and contrivance of vases*

ters of the fall of lightnings, of the attraction that amber maketh of the drawing of the lode-stone, and of the accord and consonance of voices? For it seemeth against all reason to yeld one's cause, for so many effects so divers and so different in kinde. First, as touching the respiration in living creatures, by the antiperistasis of the aire, he hath elsewhere sufficiently declared, but of the other effects, which seeme as he saith to be miracles, and wonders in nature, and are nothing, for that they be nought else but bodies reciprocally and by alternative course, driving one another out of place round about, and mutually succeeding in their roomes, he hath left for to be discussed by us, how each of them particularly is done?

First and formost for ventoses and cupping glasse thus it is. The aire that is contained within the ventose, striking as it doth into the flesh, being inflamed with heat, and being now more fine and subtil than the holes of the brasse (box or glasse) whereof the ventose is made, getteth forth, not into a void place, for that is impossible, but into that other aire which is round about the said ventose without forth, and driveth the same from it; and that forceth other before it, and thus as it were from hand to hand, whiles the one giveth place, and the other driveth continually, and so entrench into the vacant place which the first left, it commeth at length to fall upon the flesh which the ventose sticketh fast unto, and by heating and inchafing, it expresth the humor that is within, into the ventose or cupping vessell.

The swallowing of our victuals is after the same manner, for the cavities as well of the mouth as of the stomacke, be alwaies full of aire: when as then the meat is driven within the passage or gullet of the throat, partly by the tongue and partly by the glandulous parts or kernelles called tonsells, and the muscles which now are stretched, the aire being pressed and strained by the said meat, followeth it hard as it giveth place, and sticking close, it is a meane to helpe for to drive it downward.

Sensibly the waighy things that be flung, as bigge stones and such like, cut the aire and divide it, by reason that they were sent out and levelled with a violent force; then the aire all about behind, according to the nature thereof, which is to follow where a place is left vacant and to fill it up, pursueth the masse or waight afore said that is lanced or discharged forcibly, and fetcheth forward the motion thereof.

The shooting and ejaculation of lightening is much what after the manner of these waights: thrown in manner afore said, for being enflamed and set on a light fire, it flatheth out of a cloud by the violence of a stroke, into the aire, which being once open and broken, giveth place unto it, and then closing up together above it, driveth it downe forcibly against the owne nature.

As for amber, we must not thinke that it draweth anything to it of that which is presented before it, no more than doth the lode stone; neither that any thing comming nere to the one or the other, leapeth thereupon. But first, as touching the said stone; it sendeth from it I wot not what strong and flatuous fluxions, by which the aire next adjoining giving backe, driveth that which is before it; and the same turning round and reentring againe into the void place, doth thrust from it and withall carry with it the yron to the stone. And for amber it hath likewise a certaine flagrant and flatulent spirit, which when the out-side thereof is rubbed, it putteth forth by reason that the pores thereof are by that meane opened. And verily that which issueth out of it, worketh in some measure the like effect that the Magnet or lode stone did: and drawn there are unto it such matters neere at hand as be most light and dry, by reason that the substance comming thereof is but slender and weak: neither is it selfe strong nor hath sufficient waight and force, for to chafe and drive before it a great deale of aire, by means whereof it might overcome greater things, as the lode stone doth. But how is it that this aire driveth and sendeth before it neither wood nor stone, but yron onely, and so bringeth it to the Magnet? This is a doubt and difficulty that much troubleth all those who suppose that this meeting and cleaving of two bodies together, is either by the attraction of the stone, or by the naturall motion of the yron. Yron is neither so hollow and spongeous as is wood, nor so fast and close, as is gold or stone, but it hath small holes, passages and rough aspects, which in regard of the inequality are well proportionate and fortible to the aire, in such wise, as it runneth not easily through, but hath certaine staies by the way to catch hold of, so as it may stand steady and take such sure footing, as to be able to force and drive before it the yron untill it have brought it to kisse the lode stone. And thus much for the causes and reasons that may be rendred of these effects.

As considering the running of water above ground, by what manner of compression and condensation round about, it should be performed it is not so easy either to be perceived or declared.

But

But thus much we are to learne, that for waters of lakes, which stirre not but continue alwaies in one place, it is because the aire, spread all about, and keeping them in on every side, moveth not nor leaveth unto them any vacant place. For even so the upper face of the water, as well in lakes as in the sea, riseth up into waves and billowes, according to the agitation of the aire; for the water still followeth the motion of the aire, and floweth or is troubled with it, by reason of the inequalities. For the stroke of the aire downward maketh the hollow dent of the wave: but as the same is driven upward it causeth the swelling and surging tumor of the wave untill such time as all the place above containing the water be settled and laied, for then the waves also doe cease, and the water likewise is still and quiet. But now for the course of waters which glide and run continually above the face of the ground: the cause thereof is because they alwaies follow hard after the aire that giveth way and yet are chafed by those behinde by compression and driving forward, and so by that meane maintaine a continuall streame that never resteth: which is the reason also that great rivers when they are full and doe overflow the banks, run with a more swift and violent streame: and contrariwise when there is but a little water in the chanell, they glide more slowly, because the aire before doth nothing so much give place, for that they are more feeble: neither is there so great an antiperistasis to urge and presse them forward; and even so the spring waters must of necessity boile and rise upward, for that the outward aire entering closely into the void hollow places within the ground sendeth up againe the water forth.

The paved floore of a darke close house, containing in it a great deale of still aire, without any winde from without entering into it, if a man doe cast water upon it, engendreth presently a winde and colde vapour; by reason that the aire is displaced and removed out of his seat, by the water which fell, and is thereby beaten, and receiveth the stroke and dint thereof. For this is the nature of them, to drive one another, and likewise to give place one to the other interchangeably, admitting in no wise any emprinse, wherein the one of them should be so settled, as that it did not reciprocally feele the change and alteration of the other.

To come now unto the above named symphonie and consonance, himselfe hath declared how it is that that founds and voices do accord: for the small and treble is quicke and swift; whereas the bigge and base is heave and flow. And thereupon it is, that small and shrill founds do move the sense of hearing before others: but if when these begin to fall and decay, the flow and base begin to succede and receive then the mixture and temperature of them both, by a kind of conformitie yeeldeth a delight and pleasure to the eare, which they call a symphonie or accord. And that hereof the aire is the instrument, it may evidently appeare by that which we have said already: for voice is a stroke or percussion by the aire of that which the eare doth heare; for as the aire is smitten by motion, so it striketh againe the auditive organ forcibly, if the motion be quicke; and gently, if the same be slow: and that which is stricken forcibly with a violence, commeth first into the sense of hearing, but afterwards, turning about and meeting with that which is more slow, it followeth and accompanieth the sense.

What is the meaning of Timæus, when he saith: That the soules are dispersed and sown (as it were) upon the ground, the moone and all other instruments of time whatsoeuer.

It is because he was of opinion, that the earth did move like unto the sunne, moone and other five planets, which he calleth the instruments of time, because of their conversions; and he held besides, that we ought not to imagine the earth so framed, as if it were firme and immoveable, fast fixed and perpetually to the axletree or pole that passeth thorow the world; but that it turneth round in manner of a wheele: like as afterwards Aristarchus and Seleucus have shewed; the one supposing it onely, the other affirming so much flatly. To say nothing of that which Theophrastus wrote; namely, how Plato toward the latter end of his daies, repented that he had assigned unto the earth the center and middle of the world, a place twise unfit and unmeet for it?

Or rather, because this is directly repugnant unto many sentences which this philosopher undoubtedly held, we ought therefore to change the writing of this place of Timæus, by putting the dative case in stead of the genitive, to wit, χρησιν for γενειν. yea, and to understand by the instruments of time, not the planets or starres, but the bodies of living creatures; according as Aristotle hath defined the soule, to be a continuall act of a bodie, Naturall, Organicall, having life potentially: so that the sentence in the foresaid place should be read thus: The soules have bene disseminated and sown by time in organicall bodies, meet and agreeable for them. And yet even

even this also is contrary unto his own opinion : for that not in one onely place, but in many, he hath called the starres, instruments of time, considering that he affirmeth that the very sunne was made to distinguish and keepe the number of time with other planets. The best way is therefore to understand, That the earth is the instrument of time, not because it moveth as doe the starres; but for that so continuing as it doeth, alwaies firme and steady in it selfe, it giveth meanes unto the starres moving round about it, to rise and to fall; whereby are limited the day and the night, which are the first measures of time: and therefore himselfe hath called it the Guardian, yea, the A-tizan in deed and right truly of night and day: for the Gnomons in Sundials, not moving with the shadowes, but standing still and keeping their place, are the instruments and measures of time, representing the obstacle of the earth opposite unto the Sun moving round about it; like as Empedocles saith:

*The earth set just twixt Sun beames and our sight,
Shuts up the day and bringeth in the night.*

And thus much for the enodation of this knot.

But haply this a man may doubt to be a strange and absurd speech, to say that the Sun, together with the Moone & the planets, were made for distinction of times; for otherwise by it selfe, great is the dignitie of the Sun; and Plato himselfe in his books of Common-wealth, calleth him the king and lord of all the sensible world, like as Good he pronounceth to be the sovereign of the intelligible world. And the Sun (saith he) is the very issue extract from that Good, giving unto things visible, together with their apparance, being also, & subsistence; like as Good, giving unto intelligible things this gift, both to have a being, and also to be known. Now, that God having such puissance and so great, should be the instrument of time, and an evident rule and measure of the difference that is of swiftnesse or of slownesse among the eight heavenly spheres, seemeth not very decent; no nor any consonant to reason. It remaineth therefore thus much to say, those who trouble themselves about these points, for very ignorance are deceived, supposing that time according to the definition of Aristotle, is the measure of motion, and the number in regard of prioritie and posteriority: or the quantity in motion after the opinion of Speusippus: or else the distance of motion, and no other thing, as the Stoicks describe it, defining forsooth one accident; but never comming neere unto the substance and power thereof, which as it should seeme, the poet Pindarus imagined and conceived not amiss when he said:

*In right of age, time hath thus odds,
That is surpasseth all the gods.*

Pythagoras also, who being asked what time was? answered: The soule of the heaven: for time be it what it will be, is not some accident or passion of any motion, but it is the cause, the puissance and the principle of that proportion, and order that containeth and holdeth together all things, according to which, the nature of the world, and this whole universality, which also is animate, doth move, or rather the very same proportion it selfe and order which doth move, is the thing that we call time:

*For walke it doth with silent pace,
In way whereas no noise is made:
Conducting justly to their place,
All mortall things that passe and fade.*

And verily according to the minde of auncient philosophers, the substance of the soule was defined to be a number moving it selfe; which is the reason why Plato said: That time and heaven were made together; but motion was before heaven, at what time as there was no heaven at all; for why, there was no order nor measure whatsoever, no nor any distinction, but an undeterminate motion, like as the matter was rude without forme & figure: but after that nature once had cast this matter into a colour, and had shaped it with forme and figure, and then determined motion with periodical revolutions, she made withall, both the world and time both at once; which two are the very images of God: to wit, the world of his substance, and time of his eternitie; for God in that he moveth, is time, and in that he hath being, is the world. This is the reason why he saith: That both of them comming together, shall likewise both be dissolved together, in case that ever there will be any dissolution of them. For that which had a beginning and generation, cannot be without time, no more than that which is intelligible without eternitie; in case the one is to continue for ever, and the other being once made, shall never perish and be dissolved. Time then being so necessarily linked and interlaced with the heaven, is not simply a motion, but as we have said already, a motion ordeined by order, which hath a just measure, set limits and bonds, yea and certaine revolutions; of all which, the sunne being superintendant, governour and directour, for to dispose, limit, and digest all; for to discover, set out and shew, the alterations and seasons the which bring forth all things, as Heraclitus saith: confessed it must be, that he is a workeman cooperant with that chiefe and soveraigne God, the prince of all, not in petie, base, and frivolous things, but in the greatest and most principall works that be.

Plato in his books of common-wealth, having excellently well compared the symphony of the three faculties & powers of the soule, to wit, the reasonable, the irascible & concupiscible, unto the muscical harmony of the notes, Mese, Hypate, and Nete, hath given occasion for a man to doubt, whether hee set the irascible or reasonable part, correspondent to the meane; seeing that he shewed not his meaning in this present place; for according to the situation of the parts of the body, wherein these faculties are seated, surely the courageous and irascible is placed in the middes, and answered to the region of Mese the meane: but the reasonable is ranged into the place of Hypate: for that which is aloft, first and principall our aunccestours used to call Hypaton: according to which sense Xenocrates calleth Jupiter or the aire (that I meane which converteth above where all things continue the same, and after one sort) Hypatos; like as that which is under the moone, Neatos. And before him Homer speaking of the soveraigne God and prince of princes, saith thus: Zeus pater, that is to say, our soveraigne and supreme of all rulers. And in truth, nature hath by very good right given unto the best part of the soule, the highest place in lodging the discourse of reason, as the governour of the rest within the head; but hath remooved farre from thence to the base and inferior members, the concupiscible: for the low situation is called Neate, according as appeareth by the denomination of the dead, who are termed Nepheci and Erebi; that is to say, inferior or infernall: and for this cause, some there be who say, that the winde which bloweth from beneath, and out of places unseene, that is to say, from the pole Antarctick, is called Nepheci, that is to say, the fourth. Since then it is so, that there is the same proportion of contrariety betwene concupiscible and reasonable parts of the soule, as there is betwene lowest and highest, last and first; it is not possible, that reason should be the highest and principall, and not withall, correspondent to Hypate, but to some other note in musick: for they who attribute unto her as unto the principall faculty and power Mese, that is to say, the meane, see not (ignorant as they be) how they take from her that which is more principall, to wit, Hypate, which cannot fit well either with ire or lust, for both these, the one and the other are made for to follow, and be commanded by reason, and not to command or goe before reason. Moreover, it should seeme by nature, that anger ought to have the meane and middle place, considering that naturally reason is to command; and anger both to command and be commanded, as being on the one side subject to the discourse of reason, and on the other side, commanding lust, yea, and punishing it, when the is disobedient to reason. And like as in grammar, those letters which wee call semivowels, be of a middle nature, betwene mute consonants and vowels: for that as they found more than the one, so they found lesse than the other: even so in the soule of man, wrath is not simply a meere passion, but hath many times an appearance of duty and honestly mixed with desire of revenge. And Plato himselfe comparing the substance of the soule unto a couple of horses drawing a chariot, and guided by a charioteer, who driveth them, and understandeth by the driver & guide, as every man well knowes the discourse of reason: now of the two steeds, that of lusts and pleasures is frampold, skittish, flinging, winfling, unruly altogether, and unbroken, stiffnecked, deafe, hardly caring either for whip or spur; where as the other of ire, is for the most part tractable, and obeisant to the bridle of reason, yea, and ready to joine with it in execution of good things. And like as in a chariot with two horses; the driver or charioteer is not in vertue and puissance the middle, but rather one of the horses, which is worse than the charioteer, and better than his fellows that draweth with him: even so likewise hath not been given the middle place unto that part which doth rule and governe in the soule, but unto that wherein there is lesse passion than in the first, and more reason than in the third: for this order and disposition observeth the proportion of the irascible to the reasonable part, as is of Dia-tesaron to Hypate; and to the concupiscible, as Dapente to Nete: also of the reasonable part to the concupiscible, as Hypate to Nete, which is Dia-palon: But if we draw reason and the discourse thereof to the meane, anger shall be farther off from lust and concupiscence, which

some of the philosophers held to be one and the selfe same thing, for the great similitude and resemblance between them.

Or rather, it is but a ridiculous thing to attribute unto the places, first, middlest, and last, seeing (as we do) how in a harpe, lute, or stringed instrument, Hypate hath the first and highest place; but in flutes and pipes the lowest & the last; furthermore, the mean in what place soever of the harpe or lute you let it, you shall find it soundeth alwaies the same note still, to wit, smaller than Hypate, & bigger than Nete: for the very eie it selfe hath not the same situation in all creatures, but in any creature, and in what place soever it is set according to nature, alwaies it is ordained and made for to see. Like as therefore the pædagogus or governour of youth, who ordinarily commeth behinde, and goeth not before his children, is notwithstanding said to lead 10 and guide them: And the captaine of the Trojanes in Homer:

*Who with his foremost in the front,
Sometimes appear' d in sight,
And in the rearward others whiles, his men stri' d up to fight.*

As well in the one part as the other, was alwaies the chiefe, and had the principall power: even so we ought not to force the parts of the soule to any places or names, but to examine and search the power and proportion of them; for that the discourse of reason in situation should be set in the first and principall place of mans body, falleth out accidentally: but the first and principall power it hath, as being Mese or the mean, in regard of Hypate, the concupiscible 20 part; and Nete the irascible, by letting downe and setting up, by making consonance and accord, by taking from the one and the other that which is excessive; and againe, by not suffering them either to be let loose and slacke altogether, or to lie asleepe: for mediocrity and a competent temperature, is limited by a mean; or rather to speake more properly, a principall piece of worke this is, and a singular gift and puissance of reason, to make and imprint in passions, meanes and mediocrities, if we may so say, which are called holy and sacred, consisting in a temperature of two extremities with reason, yea and betweene them both by the meanes of reason: for the teeme of two flects hath not for the mean & in the middlest, that of two which is better: neither are we to imagine, that the government of them is one of the extremities; but rather we ought to thinke, that it is the middes and mediocritie betwixt the immoderate 30 celeritie or slownesse of the two flects; like as the power of reason which holdeth in the passions when they stirre without measure and reason, and by composing and framing them unto her in measurable proportion, setteth downe a mediocritie and mean betweene too much, and over little, betweene excess (I say) and defect.

What is the reason that Plato saith: Our speech is tempered and composed of nownes and of verbes? for he seemeth to make no account of all other parts of speech besides these two: and to thinke that Homer in a gallant youthfull humour to shew his fresh wit affected to thrust them all eight 40 into this one verse:

For heere you have a Pronoun, a Participle, a Nowne, a Verbe, a Preposition, an Article, a Conjunction, and an Adverbe for the Participle, it, is put in stead of the Preposition in, that is to say, to: and ἐλάλει, that is to say, to thyself, is after the manner of ἀλάλει, that is to say, to Athens: But what shall we answer in the behalfe of Plato.

* The sense of this is altogether unperfect, depending of the precedent and subsequent verses, but serving the tune as it stands, it requieth not to be done in to English.

ISit for that in olde time they called that πρῶτον λεγόν, that is to say, the first speech, which then was named πρόπαις, that is to say, a proposition, and now they teame ἀρχή, that is to say, dignitie: which when they utter first, they either lie or speake trueth. And this proposition is compounded of a Nowne and a verbe, whereof the one is called by the Logicians, ῥήμας, that is to say, 50 the case; the other, κατηγορούμενον, that is to say, the predicable or prædicatum. For when we heare one say, Socrates teacheth; and againe, Socrates is turned; we say the one is true, and the other is false: and we require no more words. For it is probable that men at the first had need of speech and voice articulate, when they were desirous to explaine and signifie one unto another the actions and the persons and the doers thereof: like as the passions and the persons who suffer the same. Forasmuch then, as by the Verbe we expresse sufficiently the actions and passions; and

and by the Nowne, the persons doing or suffering according as he himselfe saith; it seemeth that these be the two parts of speech that he meaneth: as for the rest, a man may well and truly say, that they signifie nothing, no more than doe the groanes, sighes and lamentations of plaiers in a tragœdie, yea, and many times iwis, a smile, a reticence or keeping silence, which otherwhiles may well expresse a speech, and make it more emphaticall; but surely, no necessarie and significative power have they to declare ought, like as the Verbe & the Nowne hath: onely they serve as accessory adjuncts, to vary, illustrate & beautifie the speech; like as they also diversifie the very letters, who put to their spirits and aspirations, their accents also to some, whereby they make them long & short, and reckon them for elements & letters indeed, whereas they be 10 passions, accidents, & diversifications of elements, rather than distinct elements by themselves; as it appeareth manifestly by this, that our ancients contented themselves sufficiently to speake and write with sixteene letters and no more. Moreover, consider and see whether we doe not take the words of Plato otherwise than he delivered them; when he saith that the speech is tempered of these two parts, and not by them. Take heed (I say) we commit not the same error as he doth, who should cavill and finde fault with one for saying, that such an ointment or salve was made of wax and galbanum, alledging against him for so saying, that he left out fire and the vessell, without which a man knoweth not how to temper the said simples or drogues: for even so, if we should reprove him because he omitted the naming of Conjunctions, Prepositions and other parts of speech, we were likewise to be blamed: for in trueth, a speech or sentence is 20 not compounded of these parts, but by them and not without them. For like as he, who should pronounce simply these Verbs, To beat, or To be beaten; or otherwise these bare Nownes, Socrates or Pythagoras; giveth some light (such as it is) of a thing to be conceived & understood: but he that should come out with these odde words, For, or Of, and say no more, a man can not imagine what he meaneth thereby, nor gather any conception either of action or of body; for if there be not some other words pronounced with them or about them, they resemble naked sounds and vaine noises without any significations at all: for that neither by themselves alone, nor one with another, it is possible that they should betoken any thing. Nay, admit that we should conjoin, mingle and interlace together Conjunctions, Articles and Prepositions all in one, minding to make one entire bodie of them all, we shall seeme rather to creake than speake: 30 but so soone as a Verbe is joined to a Nowne, that which resuleth thereupon is immediately a sentence and significant speech. And therefore not without good reason some doe thinke that these two (to speake properly) be the onely parts of speech. And peradventure Homer had some such meaning, and gave us so much to understand, by saying in so many places,

*He spake the word, and with the same,
Immediately out came the name.*

For by this, that is to say, the word; his manner is to signifie a Verbe: as namely in this other verse,

ἡ γυνὴ δὲ καλὰ καὶ τὸ ἐπὶ τοῖς θυμολογίοις ἔειπεν.

*Now surely woman, much to blame thou art,
This word to speake, it strikes so to my hart.*

40 As also elsewhere:

καὶ πρὸς τὸν δ' ἔειπε, ὅπως δ' ἐν ἄσπετον δαίμων ἀνδρῶν, ἀσπρὸν τὸ φῶς ἐν ἀσπρῶν ἀσπρῶν ἀνδρῶν.

Alas good Father; guest and friend

Farewell: And if some word unkind

Has bene let fall, I wish it may

By winds and stormes be caught away.

For surely it is neither Conjunction, Article, nor Preposition, that can be said either unkind or to touch the heart, but some Verbe signifying a shamefull deed, proceeding from an undue 50 cent and dishonest passion. And therefore you see how we are wont to praise poets and historiographers, or otherwise to blame and dispraise them, saying in this wise: Such a poet hath used Atticke Nownes and elegant Verbs: and contrariwise, Such an historiographer hath used triviall and base Nownes and Verbs. And no man will say that either Euripides or Thucydides wrote a stile consisting of Articles that were homely and base, or otherwise elegant and Atticke.

How then (may some one say) serve these parts to no purpose in our speech? Yes iwis say I, even as much as salt in our meats, or water for our bread and gruell. Euenus was wont to say that fire also was an excellent kinde of sauce: and even so be these parts of speech the seasoning of our our language, like as fire and salt of our broths and viands, without the which we can not well do: and yet our speech doth not alwaies of necessity stand in need of them: for so me thinks I may very well affirme of the Romane language, that all the world I see in maner useth at this day: for the Romans take away all Prepositions, except a very few; and as for those that be called Articles, they admit not so much as one, but use their Nownes plaine, and as one would say, without skirts and borders. Whereat we may wonder the lesse, considering that Homer, who for trimme and beautifull verses surpasse all other poets, set to very few Nownes any Articles as eares unto cups and other vessels, for to take hold by, or as pennaches and crests upon morions: and therefore looke in what verses he useth so to doe, be sure they were of speciall marke, or els suppositions and suspected to be none of his making. As for example:

ἀνὰ τὸ μέγιστον δόξα: ἐνὶ θυμῷ ὅτι οὐκ
τὸ τελευτῶν ἐστιν.

This speech the courage most of all excited then anon,

Of Ajax, him I meane, who was the sonne of Telamon.

Againc:

πῶς οὐκ ἐπεὶ τὸν ἄνθρωπον ἀλλοιοῦ.

This did he that, by flying thus apace,

He might escape the whale that was in chace.

And a few others besides these. But in the rest which are innumerable, although there be no Article, yet the phrase of speech is thereby nothing diminished or hurt either in beautie or perspicuitie. And thus we see, that neither living creature, if it be maimed or dismembred, nor instrument, nor armour, nor any thing in the world whatsoever, by the want and defect of any proper part belonging thereto, is the more beautifull or active thereby, neither more pleasant than it was therefore: whereas a speech or sentence, when all the Conjunctions be taken quite away, is many times more emphaticall, yea, and carrieth a power and efficacie more patheticall and apter to move and affect, as this:

One found, unhurt, the catching fast,
another wounded new,
Alive she held, anot her dead,
in fight by heeles she drew.

Also this place of Demosthenes his oration against Midias: For many things may he doe who striketh, whereof some the party who suffereth, can not declare unto another, by iesture, his port, by regard, his eie, in his voice, when he wrongeth insolently in a bravery, when he offereth injurie as an enemy, when with the clutched fist, when upon the cheeke, when upon the eare: this mooveth, this is that remooveth, that transporteth men beside themselves, who are notwithstanding quainted with outrages, who have not bene used to beare such abuses. And againe another place afterwards. But it is not Midias. He from this day is a speaker, he maketh orations, he railleth, exclaimeth, he passeth somewhat by his voice: Is there any election? Midias the Anagyrhian is propounded, he is nominated. Midias interteineeth Plutarch in the name of the city, he knoweth all secrets; the city is not sufficient to hold him. This is the reason that they who write of rhetorical figures, so highly praise Asyndeton: whereas those who are so precise, so religious, and too observant of Grammar, that they dare not leave out one Conjunction otherwise than they were accustomed to doe: The said rhetoricians thinke blameworthy and to be reprooved, as making the stile dull, enervate, without affection, tedious and inkome, by reason that it runnes alwaies after one sort, without change and variety.

Now whereas logicians have more need than any other professours in learning of Conjunctions copulatives, for to knit and connex their propositions or disjunctives, to disioine and distinguish them; like as waine-men or carters have need of yokes or geeres; or as Ulysses had of osiers in Cyclops his cave to binde his sheepe together: This doth not argue, nor prove that the Conjunction is a substantiall member or part of speech; but a prety instrument and meanes to binde and conioine according as the very name of it doth import, and to keepe and hold together not all words or sentences indifferently, but such alone as are not simply spoken: unlesse men will say, that the coard or girt wherewith a packe or fardell is bound, is a part of the said packe, or the paste and glue a part of the booke; or donatives and largesses, a part of politike government; like as Demades was wont to say: That the dole of mony distributed by the poll to the citizens in the theaters for to see the plaies, was the very glew of the popular State. And tell me what conjunction is that which will make of many propositions one, by couching and knitting them together, as the marble doth unite the iron that is cast and melted with it by the fire; and yet I trow no man will say; that the marble for all that is part of the iron, or so to be called. Howbeit, such things verily as enter into a composition, and which be liequied together with the drogues mingled therewith, are wont after a sort to doe and suffer reciprocally from the ingredients. But as for these conjunctions, there be who deny that they doe unite any one thing, saying: That this maner of speaking with conjunctions is no other but a certeine enumeration, as if a man should reckon in order all our magistrates, or count the daies of a moneth.

Moreover, of all other parts of speech, it is very evident, that the Pronoun is a kinde of Noun, not onely in this respect, that it is declined with cases, as the Noun is; but also for that some of them being pronounced and uttered of things and persons determinate, doe make a most proper demonstration of them accordant to their nature: neither can I see, how he who hath expressly named Socrates, hath declared his person more, than hee who said: This man here.

To come now unto that which they tearme a Participle, surely it is a very medly and mixture of a Noun and a Verbe, and not a part of speech subsisting alone of it selfe, no more than those Nounes or names which are common to Masculine and Feminine; and these Participles are ranged with them both; with Nounes in respect of their cases, and with Verbes in regard of tenses: and verily the logicians call such, tearmes reflected, as for example, εὐνοῦν, ἀπὸ τοῦ εὖνους, that is to say, wisely foreseeing; is a reflexion of a wife foreseer: and σοφροῦν, ἀπὸ τοῦ σοφους, that is to say, minding sobriety, is a reflexion of a sober minded person, that is to say, as if they had the nature and power of Nounes and appellations.

As touching Prepositions, a man may liken them very well to pennaches, crests, or such like ornaments above morions or head attires, or else to bales, predistals, and footsteps under statues and pillars: foras much as they are not so much parts of speech, as busie and conversant about them: but see I pray you whether they may not be compared to truncheons, pieces, and fragments of words, like as those who when they write a running hand in haste, doe not alwaies make out the letters full, but use pricks, minims and dashes. For these two Verbes εἰσελθῆναι, and ἐκτελθῆναι, be both of them manifest clippings of the full and compleat words εἰσὶν εἰσελθῶν, and ἐκτελθῶν, whereof the one signifieth to enter in, the other to goe forth. Likewise σπερμῶν, is a plaine abbreviation of σπερματι γινώσκω, that is to say, to be borne, or have being before. Also ῥῥῖον, of ῥῥῖον ῥῥῖον, that is to say, to sit downe, or cause one to sit downe. Semblable ἀποβαλεῖν, and παραρριπτεῖν men are disposed to say for ἀποβαλεῖν, and παραρριπτεῖν, that is to say to sling stones, and to digge through walles, when they are disposed to make haste to speake short. And therefore a man may well say, that every one of these, excepting Noun and Verbe, doe some good in our speech, and helpe well in a sentence, but for all that, they cannot be called either elements of speech: for there is none but the Noun and the Verbe, as it hath bene said before, that maketh this composition, containing verity and falsity, which some tearme proposition, others axiome, and Plato nameth speech or oration.

A COMMENTARIE OF THE CREATION OF THE SOULE, WHICH PLATO DE- SCRIBETH IN HIS BOOKE TIMAEUS.

The Summarie.

Among those discourses which may exercise the wittes, and busie the braines of most curious spirits, those of Plato may be ranged, which in diuers places of his dialogues, but especially in his Timaeus he hath deliuered, and namely, where he treateth of nature metaphysically, intermingling with a certaine deepe and profound manner of doctrine (as a man may perceiue by his writings) his resolutions as I may say irrefragable, proceeding all from the ignorance of the sacred story and the true sense of Moyses. As for example, that which he saith as touching the soule of the world: an absurd and fantastical opinion, if it be handled and expounded aright. Our author being minded in this treatise to dispute philosophically upon the creation of the said soule, runneth thorow numbers, tones, tunes and harmonies, as well terrestrial as celestially, for to declare the meaning of Plato: but with such breuities in many places, that a man had need to reade with both his eyes, and so haue his minde wholly intentiue and amused upon his words, for the understanding of him. Meane while, this would be considered, seeing that in such matters we haue (God be thanked) sufficient to resolve us in the word of God, and in the good books of the doctors of the church, all this present discourse should be read, as coming out of the hands of a man walking in darkenesse, and so speake in one word, of one blinde himselfe and following a blinde guide: to the end that in stead of highly admiring these subtilties of Plato, as some in these daies doe, whose heads are not staied and well settled, we might know that the higher that man in his wisdome mounteth with his pen, farre from Gods schoole, the lesse he is to be receiued and accepted of.

The father to his two sonnes AUTOBULUS and PLUTARCH, Greeting.

Oras much as ye are of this minde, that whatsoever I haue heere and there said and written in diuers places by way of exposition touching that which I supposed in mine opinion Plato held, thought and understood concerning the soule, ought to be reduced & brought together into one, and that I should doe well to declare the same at large in a speciall treatise apart by it selfe, because it is not a matter which otherwise is easie to be handled and managed; as also for that seeming as it doth, somewhat contrary to most of the Platonicke philosophers themselves: in which regard it had need to be well mollified. I will therefore in the first place set downe the very text of Plato in his owne proper termes, word for word, as I finde them written in his booke entitled Timaeus.

Of

Of that indiuisible substance which alwaies continueth about the same things; as also of that which is diuisible by many bodies, he composed a third kinde of substance in the mids of them both, holding partly of the nature of The same, and in part of The other: and thus he ordeined and set in the mids betweene the indiuisible substance conuersant about the same things, and the other which is diuisible by bodies. Then taking these three natures or substances, he mixed them altogether into one forme or idea, and fitted perforce the nature of The other, which was untoward to be mixed, to that nature of The same. Having thus mingled them with Substance, and of three made one, he diuided this whole againe into such portions, as were fit and conuenient: each one of them being mingled with The same, with The other, and with Substance. And to this diuision of his he began in this maner, &c.

To begin withall if I should discourse unto you at this present what a number of disputations and contentious debates, these wordes haue ministred unto those who tooke upon them to expound the same, it were for my selfe a peece of worke endlesse, and for you who haue read the most part of them together with me, a labour needlesse. But seeing that of the most principall and excellent professors, Xenocrates hath drawn some unto his opinion, in defining the substance of the soule to be a number moouing it selfe: and others haue ranged them selves to Crantor of Soli, who affirmed the soule to be tempered of the nature intellectuall & of the other which is opinatiue about objects sensible; I suppose that these two sentences being well dispached and opened will make the way and give you an easie entrance to the understanding and finding of that which we seeke for and is in question. And verily there need not many words for the exposition of them both. For * the one sort of them thinke that Plato meant nothing else but the generation of number, by the said mixture of indiuisible with diuisible: for that unity is indiuisible, and plurality diuisible: of which twaine is engendred and produced number, whiles unity doth determine plurality, and limit out an end to that which is infinit, to wit, the binary or two indeterminate: which is the reason that Zaratas the master of Pythagoras called two the mother, and one the father of numbers: as also for that the better numbers be those which resembled unity: and yet for all that this number is not the soule, because that both the motor and the moovable is wanting: but when The same and The other were mingled together, of which the one is the beginning of motion and mutation, the other of rest and station, then cometh the soule to haue a being, which is as well the principall, to staie and to be staied, as it is to mooue and to be mooued.

But Crantor and his followers supposing that the proper and principall operation of the soule was to judge things intelligible and sensible, together with the similitudes and dissimilitudes which they haue, as well them selves, as one in respect of another, affirme, that the soule is composed of All, to the end that the may judge of all. The which All afore said standeth upon fouer principall kindes: the first is a nature intelligible, which is alwaies one and euermore after the same sort: the second a nature passible and mutable concerning bodies: the third the nature of the same: and the fourth the nature of the other: for the two first participate in some sort both of the same and also of the other. But all these doe jointly and equally holde, that the soule was never after a certaine time, nor ever engendred, but hath many powers and faculties, into which Plato resolving for speculative disputation sake, the substance of her, supposeth in word onely, that she was engendred mixed and tempered, saying moreover that he thought as much of the world: for full well he knew, that eternal it was and ingenerable, but seeing it was not easie to comprehend how, and in what order it was found, composed, governed and administered, for those who at the first presupposed not the creation and generation neither of it selfe, or of such things as concurred thereto, he therefore tooke the course to speake in such sort.

This much you see in sum what they both doe say: which when Eudorus well considered, he thought there was good probability both in the one and the other of their opinions, but for mine owne part, perswaded verily I am, that neither of them twaine hath touched the point, or come neere unto the minde and meaning of Plato.

If we will use the rule of probability & verifimitude indeed, not fully building our owne proper opinions, but be willing for to say something agreeable & accordant thereto; for that mixture of the substance intelligible and sensible which they speake of, giueth not us to understand thereby, that it is the generation of the soule, more than of any other thing whatsoever that a man may name. For the very world and every part thereof is compounded of a substance intelligible or spirituall, and of a substance sensible or corporall: whereof the one hath furnished the thing that is made and engendred with forme and shape, the other with subject matter. And as much much of the matter as is forme by participation or resemblance of the intelligible, becometh incontinently palpable and visible : but the soule is not perceptible by any sense. Neither was it ever found that Plato called the soule number, but alwaies a motion mooving of it selfe, yea the very fountain & beginning of motion. True it is, I confesse that embellished he hath adorned the substance thereof with number, proportion, accord & harmony, which he hath bestowed therein as in a subject capable & susceptible of the most beautifull forme that can be imprinted therein, by those qualities before said. And I suppose it is not all one to say that the soule is composed by number, and that the substance thereof is number : for certaine it is that it hath the subsistence and composition by harmony, but harmonie it is none, according as himselfe hath shewed in his treatise of the soule. Moreover altogether ignorant they are, what Plato meant, by the same and the other : for they say, that the same conferreth to the generation of the soule, the power or faculty of station and rest : the other, of motion : whereas Plato himselfe in his booke entitled, The Sophist, putteth downe, that which is, the same, the other, motion and station, as five distinct things differing the one from the other, severing them a part, as having nothing to doe in common one with another ; which they all with one accord, yea and many more even of those who lived and conversed with Plato, fearing and being mightily troubled with, doe devise and imagin all that they can, bestir themselves wresting forcibly, heaving and shoving and turning every waie, as in case of some abominable thing and not to be named, supposing that they ought either altogether, for his honour and credit to denie, or at least wife to cover and conceale that which he had delivered, as touching the generation or creation of the world, and of the soule thereof, as if the same had not bene from all eternity, nor had time out of minde their essence : whereof we have particularly spoken a part else where ; and for this present suffice it shall to say by the way, that the arguing and contestation, which Plato confesseth himselfe to have used with more vehemencie than his age would well beare, against Atheists : the same I say they confound and shuffle up, or to speake more truly abolish altogether. For if it be so, that the world be eternall and was never created, the reason of Plato falleth to the ground, namely that the soule being more ancient than the bodie, and the cause and principall author of all motion and mutation, the chiefe governour also and head Architect, as he himselfe hath said, is placed and bestowed therein. But what, and whereof the soule is, and how it is said and to be understood, that it is more ancient than the body and before it in time, the progresse of our discourse hereafter shall declare : for this point being either unknown or not well understood, brings great difficulty as I thinke in the well conceiving, and hinderance in believing the opinion of the truth.

In the first place therefore I will shew what mine owne conceit is, proving and fortifying my sentence, and withall, mollifying the same (because at the first sight it seemeth a strange paradox) with as probable reasons as I can devise : which done, both this interpretation and proofe also of mine, I will lay unto the words of the text out of Plato, and reconcile the one unto the other. For thus (in mine opinion) stands the case.

This world (quoth Heraclitus) there was never any god or man that made : as if in so saying he feared, that if we disavow God for creatour, we must of necessity confesse that man was the architect and maker thereof. But much better it were therefore, that we subscribe unto Plato, and both say and sing aloud, that the world was created by God : for as the one is the goodliest piece of worke that ever was made, so the other the most excellent workman and greatest cause that is. Now the substance and matter whereof it was created, was never made or engendered, but was for ever, time out of minde and from all eternitie, subject unto the workman for to dispose and order it, yea and to make as like as possible was to himselfe. For of nothing and that which had no being, there could not possibly be made ought : but of that which was not well made nor as it ought to bee, there may be made somewhat that is good ; to wit, an house, a garment, or an image and statue. But before the creation of the world, there was nothing but a chaos, that is to say, all things in confusion and disorder : and yet was not the same without a bodie, without motion, or without soule : howbeit, that bodie which it had, was without forme and consistence ; and that mooving that it had, was altogether rash, without reason and understanding : which was no other but a disorder of the soule not guided by reason. For God created not that bodie which was incorporall, nor a soule which was inanimate ; like as we say that the musician maketh not a voice, nor the dancer motion ; but the one maketh the voice sweet, accordant and harmonious ; and the other, the motion to keepe measure, time, and compass with a good grace. And even so, God created not that palpable soliditie of a bodie, nor that moving and imaginative puissance of the soule ; but finding these two principles, the one dark and obscure, the other turbulent, foolish and senselesse : both imperfect, disordered and indeterminate, he so digested and disposed them, that he composed of them the most goodly, beautiful and absolute living creature that is. The substance then of the bodie, which is a certaine nature that he calleth susceptible of all things, the very feat, the nourfe also of all things engendered, is no other thing than this. But as touching the substance of the soule, he treateth it in his booke entitled Philebus, Infinite, that is to say, the privation of all number and proportion, having in it neither end, limit, nor measure, neither excess nor defect, neither similitude nor dissimilitude. And that which he delivereth in Timæus, namely, that it is mingled with the indivisible nature, & is become divisible in bodies, we must not understand this to be either multitude in unities, or length and breadth in points or prickes, which things agree unto bodies, and belong rather to bodies than to soules : but that mooving principle, disordinate, indefinite, and mooving of it selfe, which he calleth in many places Necessitie, the same in his books of lawes he treateth directly, a disorderly soule, wicked and evil doing. This is the soule simply, and of it selfe it is so called ; which afterwards was made to participate understanding, and discourse of reason, yea, & wise proportion, to the end that it might become the soule of the world. Semblably, this material principle, capable of all, had in it a certaine magnitude, distance, and place : beauty, forme, proportionate figure, and measure it had none ; but all these it gat afterwards, to the end that being thus digested and brought into decent order, it might afford the bodies and organs of the earth, the sea, the heavens, the flares, the plants and living creatures, of all sorts. But as for them who attribute & give that which he calleth in Timæus, necessity ; and in his treatise Philebus, infinity and immensity of excess & defect of too much and too little ; unto matter, and not unto the soule : how are they able to maintain that it is the cause of evil, considering that he supposeth alwaies that the said matter is without forme or figure whatsoever, destitute of all qualities and faculties proper unto it, comparing it unto those oiles, which having no smell of their owne, perfumers use in the composition of their odors and precious ointments : for impossible it is that Plato should suppose the thing which of it selfe is idle, without active qualitie, without mooving and inclination to any thing, to be the cause and beginning of evil, or name it an infinity, wicked & evil doing ; nor likewise a necessity, which in many things repugneth against God, as being rebellious, and refusing to obey him : for as touching that necessity, which overthroweth heaven, as he saith in his Politiques, and turneth it cleane contrary ; that inbred concupiscence and confusion of the first and auncient nature, wherein there was no order at all, before it was ranged to that beautifull disposition of the world as now it is ; how came it among things, if the subject, which is matter, was without all qualities, and void of that efficacy which is in causes ? and considering that the Creatour himselfe being of his owne nature all good, desired as much as might be, to make all things like unto himselfe : for a third, besides these two principles, there is none. And if we will bring evil into the world, without a precedent cause & principle to beget it, we shall run and fall into the difficult perplexities of the Stoicks ; for of those two principles which are, it cannot be that either the good, or that which is altogether without forme and quality whatsoever, should give being or beginning to that which is naught. Neither hath Plato done as some that came after him, who for want of seeing and understanding a third principle and cause, betwene God and matter, have runne on end, and tumbled into the most absurd and falsest reasons that is, devising forsooth I wot not how, that the nature of evil should come without forth casually and by accident, or rather of the owne accord : forasmuch as they will not graunt unto Epicurus that the least atome that is, should turne never so little or decline a side, saying, that he bringeth in a rash and inconsiderate motion, without any cause precedent ; whereas they themselves the meane while affirme that sin, vice, wickednesse and ten thousand other deformities and imperfections of the body, come by consequence without any cause efficient in the principles. But Plato saith not so, for he hiding matter from all different quality, and removing farre from God all cause of evil, thus hath hee written as touching the world in his Politiques : The world (quoth he) received all good things from the first author who created it ; but what evil thing soever there is, what wickednesse, what injustice in heaven, the same it selfe hath from the exterior habitude, which was before, and the same it doth transmit, & give to the creatures beneath. And a little after he proceedeth thus : In tract of time (quoth he) as oblivion tooke holde and set sure footing, the passion and imperfection of the old disorder came in place and got the upper hand more and more; and great danger there is, least growing to dissolution, it be plunged againe into the vast gulfe, and bottomlesse pit of confused dissimilitude.

Stiff

But dissimilitude there can be none in matter, by reason that it is without qualitie, and void of all difference: whereof Euendem among others being ignorant, mocked Plato for not putting that to be the cause, source, and first originall of evil things, which in many places he calleth mother and nurse: for Plato indeed tearmeth matter, mother and nurse: but he saith likewise: That the cause of evil is the motive puissance reliant in the said matter, which is in bodies become divisible, to wit, a reasonlesse and disorderly motion; howbeit, for all that, not without soule, which plainly and expressly in his books of lawes, he tearmeth a soule, contrary and repugnant to that which is the cause of all good; for that the soule may well be the cause and principle of motion; but understanding is the cause of order and harmony in motion: for God made not the matter idle, but hath kept it from being any more disquieted & troubled with a foolish and rash cause: neither hath he given unto nature the beginnings and principles of mutations and passions, but being as it was enwrapped and enfolded with all sorts of passions and inordinate mutations, hee cleared it of all enormities, disorders, and errors whatsoever, using as proper instruments to bring about all this, numbers, measures, and proportions; the effect whereof, is not to give unto things, by mooving and mutation the passions and differences of the other and of diversitie, but rather to make them infallible, firme, and stable, yea and like unto those things which are alwaies of one sort, and evermore resemble themselves.

This is in my judgement the minde and sentence of Plato, whereof my principall prooffe and argument is this: that by this interpretation is salved that contrariety which men say, and seemeth indeed to be in his writings: for a man would not attribute unto a drunken sopbister, much lesse than unto Plato, so great unconfidence and repugnance of words, as to ascribe one and the same nature to be created, and uncreated; and namely in his booke entituled Phaedrus, that the soule is eternall, and uncreated: but in Timaeus, that it was created and engendred. Now as touching those words of his in the treatise Phaedrus, they are well neere in every mans mouth verie ripe; whereby he prooveth that the soule can not perish, because it was never engendred: and semblably he prooveth, that generation it had none, because it mooveth it selfe. Again, in the booke entituled Timaeus, God (quoth he) hath not made the soule to be younger than the body, according as now in this place we purpose to say, that it commeth after it, for never would he have permitted that the elder being coupled and linked with the younger should be commanded by it. But we standing much (I wot not how) upon inconsiderate rashnesse and vanity, use to speake in some sort accordingly: for certaine it is, that God hath with the bodie joined the soule, as precedent both in creation and also in power and vertue, like as the dame or mistress with her subject, for to rule and command. Again, when he had said that the soule being turned upon her selfe, began to live a wife and eternall life, The body of the heaven (quoth he) was made visible, but the soule invisible, participating the discourse of reason and of harmony, engendred by the best of things intellectuall and eternall, being likewise it selfe the best of things engendred and temporall. Where it is to be noted that in this place expressly calling God the best of all eternall things, and the soule the best of things created and temporall, by this most evident antithesis and contrariety, he taketh from the soule that eternitie which is without beginning and procreation.

And what other solution or reconciliation is there, of these contradictions, but that which himself giveth to those who are willing to receive it; for he pronounceth that soule to be ingenerable and not procreated, which mooved all things rashly and disorderly before the constitution of the world: but contrariwise he calleth that, procreated and engendred, which God framed and composed of the first, and of a permanent, eternall, and perfect good substance, namely by creating it wife and well ordered, and by putting and conferring even from himselfe unto sense, understandings; and order unto motion: which when he had thus made, he ordained and appointed it to be the governor and regent of the whole world. And even after the same manner he pronounceth; that the body of the world is in one sort eternall, to wit, not created, nor engendred; and after a nother sort both created and engendred. For when he saith that whatsoever is visible, was never at rest, but mooved rashly and without all order: and that God tooke the same, disposed and ranged it in good order: as also when he saith that the fower generall elements, fire, water, earth, and aire, before the whole world was of them framed and ordered decently cently made a woonderfull trouble & trembling as it were in the matter, and were mightily shaken by it, such was their deformity and inequality. It appeareth plainly that he maketh these bodies in some sort to have a being and subsistence before the creation of the world. Contrariwise when he saith that the body is younger than the soule, and that the world was made and created in as much as the same is visible and palpable, as having a body, and that all things appear so as they are, when they were once made and created, manifest it is, and every man may see, that he attributeth a kinde of nativity to the nature of the body; and yet for all that saith he off, from being contradictory and repugnant to himselfe so notoriously, and that in the most maine points. For it is not the same body nor of the same sort, which he saith was created by God, and to have bene before it was; for that were directly the case of some mount-banke or juggling enchanter; but himselfe sheweth unto us, what we are to understand by this, generation or creation: For before time (quoth he) all that is in the world, was without order, measure and proportion: but after that the universall world began to be fashioned, and brought into some decent forme, whereas he found the fire first, the water, the earth and the aire pell-mell in the same places, and yet having some shew and token what they were, but confusedly huddled every where, (as a man may well thinke that every thing must needs be so, where God is absent) in this case as they were then, God I say finding them, first brought the same into frame and fashion, by the meanes of formes and numbers. Furthermore, having said before that it was the worke not of one only proportion, but of twaine, to joine and frame together the fabrick of the world, a solid masse as it was and carying a depth and thickeesse with it: and declared moreover, that God after he had bestowed water and aire, betweene fire and earth, conjoined withall and framed the heaven, together with them. Of these things (quoth he) such as they were, and fower in number, the body of the world was in engendred; agreeable in proportion and entertaining amity by that meanes: Inasmuch as being once thus united and compact, there is nothing that can make disunion or dissolution, but he alone who first limited and brought all together; teaching us hereby most plainly that God was the father and author, not of the body simply, nor of the frame, fabrick and matter onely of the world, but also of that proportion, measure, beauty and similitude which is in the body thereof: semblably thus much we are to thinke of the soule, as if one were not created by God, nor the soule of the world, but a certaine power of motion, so fantastickally, turbulent, subject unto opinion, stirring and moving of it selfe, and alwaies, but without any order, measure, or reason whatsoever. The other, when God had adorned it with numbers & proportions convenient, he ordained to be the regent & governesse of the world created like as it selfe was also created. Now that this is the true sentence & meaning of Plato, and not by a fantastickall manner of speculation and inquisition, as touching the creation or generation, as well of the world as of the soule: this besides many others, may be an argument, that of the soule, he saith it was created and not created; of the world alwaies, that it was engendred and created, but never eternall and not created. To proove this, we need not for to cite testimonies out of the booke Timaeus, considering that the said booke throughout, from the one end to the other, treateth of nothing else, but of the generation or creation of the world. And of other books, in his Atlantick Timaeus making his praies, nameth him who beforetime was by his worke, and now by his word, God. And in his Politique, his Parmenidian guest saith, that the world being framed and made by God, became partaker of many good things: and in case there be any evil thing in it, the same is a remnant mingled within the first habitude and estate where-in it was at first, before the constitution thereof, all irregular and disorderly. And in his bookes of Common-wealth, speaking of that number, which some call the Mariage, Socrates began to discourse and say thus: The God (quoth he) who is created and engendred, hath his period and conversation, which the perfect number doth comprise. In which place, what can he call the God created and engendred, but the world. * * * *

The first copulation is of one and two, the second of three and foure, the third of five and six; of which there is not one that maketh a quadrate number either by it selfe or by others: the fourth is of seven and eight, which being joined to the first, make in all the square quadrate number six and thirte.

But

But of those numbers which Plato hath set downe the quaternarie, hath a more perfect and absolute generation; namely, when even numbers are multiplied by even intervals, and uneven numbers likewise by odde intervals: for first it containeth unitie as the very common stocke of all numbers as well even as odde and of those under it; two and three be the first flat and plaine numbers, and after them foure and nine are the first squares, then follow eight and seven and twentie, the first cubique numbers, putting the unitie out of this account. By which it appeareth that his will was not, that these numbers should be all set one above another directly in a right line; but apart, one after another alternatively, the even of the one side and the odde of the other, according to the description above made. Thus shall the files or conjugations also be of like with like, and make the notable numbers, as well by composition or addition as by multiplication of one with another: by composition, thus, Two and three make five; foure & nine make thirteene; eight and seven and twentie arise to five and thirtie. For of these numbers the Pythagoreans call five, pentade, as much to say, as a found, supposing that of the spaces and intervals of Tone, the fifth, was the first that spake or founded: thirteene they tearmed trigade, that is to say, the Remanent or Defect, like as Plato did; despairing to divide a Tone in two equal portions: and five and thirtie they tearmed Harmonie, for that it is composed of the first numbers cubique, proceeding from even and od of the foure numbers, to wit, six, eight, nine and twelve, containing an Arithmetical and Harmonical proportion. But this will appeare more evidently by this figure here described and represented to the eyes. Suppose then there be a figure set downe in forme of a tile, called Parallelogrammen, with right angles, A. B. C. D.

whereof the one side (to wit, the lesse) A. B. is of five; the other, and namely, the longer, A. D. is of seven parts: let the lesse side be divided into unequal sections, to wit, into three and three, unto E. and the greater into other two unequal sections, three and four to F. Then draw lines from the sections, crossing directly one another, by E. G. H. and F. G. I. So A. E. G. F. shall be six, A. B. I. G. nine, G. H. D. F. eight, and G. I. C. H. twelve. This tile-forme figure called Parallelogrammen, being more long than broad, composed of five and thirtie parts, containeth in it all the proportions of the first accords and consonances of Musicke in the numbers of the spaces into which it is divided. For six and eight have the proportion Epitritos, to wit, the whole and one third part; wherein consisteth the symphonie Diatessaron, that is to say, a fourth. Six and nine cary the proportion Hemiolion, to wit, the whole and halfe; and therein consisteth consisteth Diapente, that is to say, a fifth. Betweene six and twelve there is the double proportion, & therein consisteth Diapason, that is to say, an eighth. There is also the proportion of Tone sesquialtera, in nine and eight, which is the reason that the number five and thirtie containing the proportions of tones, the consonances also and accords, they call Harmonie, which being multiplied by six, ariseth to two hundred and tenne, the very iust number of daies wherein seven moneth children have their perfection in the wombe, and are ready to be borne. Item, goe to worke another way, and begin by multiplication in this wise: Twice three make six, and foure times nine come to six and thirtie, and seven and twentie multiplied by eight, ariseth to two hundred and sixteene. Now the perfect number is six, for that it standeth of equal parts, and in regard of the copulation of even and odde it is called the Mariage. Again, that which is more, it consisteth of the beginning and foundation of number, to wit, unitie or One, of the first even number which is two, and of the first and odde number that is three. Moreover, six and thirtie is the first number both foure-square and also triangular. Foure-square, if it arise from the basis, six, and triangular, from eight: for it ariseth by multiplication of two quadrate numbers, to wit, of foure, multiplying nine; and by addition of three cubes, one, eight, and seven and twentie, which being put together, make up sixe and thirtie, the number before described. Furthermore, it may be drawn out in forme of a tile, more one way than another from the two sides, and ariseth by multiplying twelve by three, or nine by foure. Now if a man take the numbers of the sides in those figures before described, to wit, six of the foure-square, and eight of the triangle; nine of one of Parallelograms, and twelve of the other; he shall finde that they will make the proportions of all the symphonies or accords in Musicke. For twelve compared with nine, will be Diatessaron or the fourth, which is the proportion that Nete hath to Mese; but compared with eight, it is Diapente or a fifth, the proportion of Mese to the Meane to Hypate; with twelve, it will be Diapason or a just eighth, which is the proportion between Nete and Hypate. As for the number of two hundred and sixteene, it is a cubique, arising from six, as the basis, and is equal to the owne compasse or circuit. These numbers propoed, having such vertues and properties, yet the last seven and twentie hath this peculiar qualitie by it selfe, that it is equal unto all the other before it, being put together; namely, one, two, three, foure, eight, and nine. Moreover, it containeth the iust number of the daies of the moones revolution, 30 The Pythagoreans also doe place the Tone of distances & intervals of sounds in this very number, which is the reason that they call it trigade; as one would say, the default, for that it wanteth one of being the halfe of twenty seven. Moreover, that these numbers containe the proportions of all the consonances & accords in musike, it is easie to be understood; for there is the proportion double of two to one, & therein consisteth Diapason; the Hemiolion or one and halfe of three & two, wherein is Diapente; likewise Epitritos, of foure to three, and therein consisteth Diatessaron: also the triple of nine and three, wherein you shall finde Diapason and Diapente, to wit, a fifth above a duple. Item, the quadruple of eight and two wherein is Disdiapason. There is besides, the sesquialtera, of eight to nine, wherein is Tonation. If then a man count the unitie which is common unto the numbers as well even as odde unto foure, the whole yeeldeth ten: and the even numbers betweene it and ten, with the unitie being put together make sixteene, a number triangular, arising from the basis five: as for the odde numbers, to wit, one, three, nine, and twenty seven, arise to forty, if they be summed together, and this number of forty is composed of thirteene and twenty seven, by which the mathematicians doe precisely measure the intervals of musike and melody in song, calling the one Diess, and the other Tonos: and the said number of forty ariseth by way of multiplication, by the vertue of quaternary; for if you multiply foure times every one of the foure; first, whereas by themselves to wit, one, two, three, foure, there will arise foure, eight, twelve, and sixteene, which being all summed together, make forty; which number containeth besides, all the proportions of consonances and accords: for compare sixteene with twelve, you shall have the proportion Epitritos, that is to say, one and the third part, with eight duple, with foure quadruple: also twelve compared to eight, hath the proportion Hemiolion, that is to say, one and a halfe, to foure triple, which comprehend the proportions iust of Diatessaron, Diapente, Diapason, and Disdiapason: Over and besides, the foresaid number of forty, is equal to the first two quadrats, and the two first cubique numbers taken together, for the two first squares or quadrats be one and foure, the cubicks eight and twenty seven, which if they be put together, amount to forty: So that the quaternary of Plato is in the disposition thereof more ample, of greater variety and perfection than that quaternary of Pythagoras.

But forasmuch as the numbers proposed, afford not places for the medieties which are inferred; necessary it was to extend the numbers to larger tearmes and bondes, reteining still the same proportions: in regard whereof, we must say somewhat what they be, and treat first of these medieties. The former then, is that which both surmounting, & being also surmounted in equall number, is called in these daies Arithmetical: the other which surmounteth, and is surmounted by the same part of their extremities, is named Hypenantia, that is to say, subcontrary; as for example: The two limits or extremities and the mids of the arithmetical, be six, nine and twelve: for nine which is in the middes, surmounteth fixe just as much in number as it is surmounted of twelve, that is to say, by three: but of the subcontrary, these be the extremities and the mids, six, eight, and twelve, for eight which is the mids, surmounteth fix by two, and is surmounted of twelve by foure, which foure is the third part of twelve, like as two is the third part of sixe. Thus it falleth out in the medietie Arithmetical, the middes surmounteth the one of these extremities, and is surmounted of the other, equally by the same part of the owne, but in the subcontrary by the same part, not of the owne, but of the extremities out gone of the one, and outgoing the other: and hereupon it is called subcontrary, and the same they likewise call harmonically, because it affordeth to the extremities the first resonances, to wit, betwene the greatest and the least Diapason, that is to say, an eight betwene the greatest and the mids, Diapente, that is to say, a five; & betwene the mids and the least, Diatesseron, that is to say, a fourth: for the greatest tearme or extremity being set upon the note or string Nete, and the least upon Hypate, the middes will be found just upon Mese, that is to say, the meane, which maketh in regard of the greatest Diapente, and of the least Diatesseron: so that by this reason, eight shall be upon the meane, twelve upon Nete, and six upon Hypate: but how to knowe easily and readily these medieties aforesaid, Endorus hath shewed the maner plainly and simply: And first and formost in the Arithmetical, consider thus much: for if you take the two extremities, and put them together, and then the moitie of the entire sum, the same will fall out to be the medietie Arithmetical: or take the moitie of each one of the extremities, & addethem one to the other, that which ariseth thereof shall be medietie arithmetical, in duplex & triples alike: but in the subcontrary, or harmonically, if the two extremities be one to the other in proportion duple, take the halfe of the greater, and the third part of the lesse, and the number arising of those two shall be the medietie Harmonical: but in case the two extremities be in proportion triple, then contrariwise a man ought to take the moitie of the lesse, and the third part of the greater, for then the summe will be the medietie that he looketh for: as for example, let the lesse extremity be in triple proportion fix, and the greater eightene, if you take the halfe of fix which is three, and the third part of eightene which is six, you shall come to nine, for the medietie which doth surmount, and is surmounted by the same part of the two extremities, that is to say, the one halfe. Thus you see how the medieties are taken: now the same must be interjected and placed betwene, for to fill and make up the places or intervals double and triple; but of the number proposed, some have no place of the middle, others, not sufficient; and therefore the maner is to augment and set them out, in reteining alwaies still the same proportions, and so by that meanes make places and receptacles sufficient for to receive the said medieties or mediocrities: First therefore, for the lesse end or extremity, in stead of one they put six, because of all numbers it is the first that hath a halfe and a third part, and multiply all the numbers under by six, as it is written underneath, for to receive both the medieties in duple intervals:

48.	8.		27.	162.

And for that Plato hath said, the intervals being made sesquialterall, sesquitercia, and sesquioctaves, out of these links in the precedent distances, he filled all the epitrites, with the intervall of sesquioctave, leaving one part of each, and this distance of this part being left number to 50 number, having for the tearmes & extremities, two hundred fifty six, and two hundred forty three, &c. upon these words of the text, forced they were to reduce these numbers, and make them greater, for by order two ought to have sesquioctave proportion, seeing that six of it selfe could not have proportion sesquioctave, & if it were divided by cutting the units peece-meale, the intelligence and doctrine thereof would be very intricate and hard to be conceived, therefore he called this operation in some sort multiplication, like as in the harmonical mutation, where if you extend and augment the first number, necessarily the discription of all the other

notes must be stretched out and enlarged likewise. And therefore Endorus following herein Crantor, taketh for the first number three hundred foure-score and foure, which ariseth by multiplying three-score and foure, by six: and these were induced to do by the number three-score and foure, having for the sesquioctave, eight, which is the proportion betwene three-score and foure and three-score and twelve. But it agreeth better with the text, and the wordes of Plato, to suppose a moitie. For the default which they call λίσσας, will have the sesquioctave proportion in the numbers which Plato hath set downe, two hundred six and fiftie, and two hundred three and fortie, having put for the first one hundred foure-score and twelve: and if the double of it be supposed for the first, the λίσσας shall be of the same proportion, but in number double, which five hundred and twelve hath to foure hundred eighty foure: for two hundred fiftie & six are in epitrite or sesquiterciall proportion to one hundred foure-score and twelve, and five hundred and twelve to foure hundred foure-score and foure. And verily, the reduction to this number was not without reason and proportion, but yielded a probable reason to Crantor: for the number of three-score and foure is a cube, proceeding from the first quadrate, and a quadrate likewise, arising from the first cube, and being multiplied by three, the first odde number: the first triangular number, the first perfect number and sesquialter, make one hundred foure-score and twelve, which number also (as we will shew) hath his sesquioctave. But first of all you shall understand better what is λίσσας, as also what is the meaning of Plato, if you call to minde a little, that which is usually taught and delivered in the Pythagoreans schooles: for Diastema, that is to say, intervals or space in matter of song, is whatsoever is betwene two sounds different in Tenour or Tenison. Of these intervals, one is called Tonus, to wit, that whereof the harmonic Diapente surmounteth Diatessaron. Of this entier Tone, as Musicians do holde, cut in twaine, by the moitie are made two intervals, and both of them, the one as well as the other, goe under the name Hemitonionum. But the Pythagoreans do not thinke that it can be equally divided: whereas therefore the two sections be unequal, they call the lesse λίσσας, that is to say, the default, because it is somewhat lesse than the one halfe. And therefore some masters of Musike there be, who make the accord Diatesseron, of two Tones and a Demi-tone or Hemitonion: others againe of two Tones and a λίσσας. So as it seemeth that the testimonie of hearing accordeth with the harmonical Musicians; and of demonstration with the Mathematicians: and their proofe of demonstration goeth in this maner. This is put downe by them for certene, and approved by their instruments, that Diapason hath a double proportion, Diapente a sesquialterall, Diatessaron a sesquiterciall, and a Tone a sesquioctave. And the truth hereof, a man may trie presently by an experiment, namely, by hanging two weights double, unto two strings that be equal, or by making two concavities in pipes, the one twice as long as the other, otherwise equal: for the shawme or hautboies, which is the longer, will sound more base and loud, as Hypate in regard of Nete: and of the two strings, that which was stretched by the heavier weight will sound higher & smaller as Nete in comparison of Hypate: and this is the very consonance Diapason. Semblably, three compared unto twaine, be it in length or in weight, will make Diapente; and foure to three, Diatessaron: for the one hath the proportion epitrite, and the other hemiolion. And if the unequalitie of the foresaid lengths or weights be in proportion hemioctave, that is to say, of seven to eight, it will make the intervall Tonion, not altogether an harmonical accord, howbeit (as one would say) somewhat musically and melodious; for that these sounds, if one strike, touch or sound one after another, make a pleasant noise and delectable to the eares; but if altogether, the noise will be troublesome and offensive: whereas contrariwise, in consonances and accords, howsoever one touch them, either together, or one after another, the eare receiveth the consent and accord with great delight. And yet this may moreover be shewed by reason, for the harmonic Diapason is composed of Diapente and of Diatessaron, like as in number the double is composed of Hemiolion and Epitritos; for twelve is in proportion of Epitritos to nine, and Hemiolion to eight, and double to six: so that the double proportion is compounded of the sesquialterall and the sesquiterciall, like as Diapason of Diapente and Diatessaron: but as there Diapente is greater than Diatessaron by a Tone, so here in numbers, Hemiolion is greater than Epitritos by a sesquioctave. This being thus proved by demonstration, let us see now, whether our sesquioctave may be divided into two equal sections; for if it can not, no more then, can the Tone: and for that eight and nine make the first proportion sesquioctave, and have no intervall betwene; both the one and the other being doubled, the number falling out betwene, maketh two intervals; so that it appeareth, that if the two intervals be equal, the sesquioctave may bee equally divided in twaine. Now the double

of nine is eightene, and of eight, sixteene, which admit betweene them, seventeene. So it falleth out that one of the intervals is greater, and the other lesse; for the former is of eightene to seventeene, and the other of seventeene to sixteene. Then the sesquioctave proportion is divided into portions and sections unequal, and so consequently the tone also: and therefore this division being made, none of the sections is properly a Demytone, but one of them by good right hath beene termed by the mathematicians σίζυγα: and this is it that Plato said: God when he filled the epitrites with sesquioctaves, left a portion of ech: whereof there is the same reason and proportion, that two hundred fiftie six have unto two hundred forty three; for take a Diatessaron in two numbers, which have betweene them a proportion Epitritos, as two hundred fifty and six, to one hundred ninnie two; of which let, the lesse number, one hundred ninnie two beset upon the base note of a tetracord, and the greater, to wit, two hundred fiftie and six upon the highest note: It must be shewed, that if this be filled with two sesquioctaves, there remaineth an intervall as great as is betweene two hundred fiftie six and two hundred forty three. For if the base sound be stretched one tone; which is the proportion sesquioctave it maketh two hundred and sixteene: and againe if it be stretched another tone, it becommeth two hundred forty three, which surmounteth two hundred & sixteene, by twenty & seven, and two hundred and sixteene surmounteth one hundred fourecore & twelve by foure and twenty, of which, the seven and twenty is the sesquioctave of two hundred and sixteene, and foure and twenty, of one hundred fourecore and twelve: and therefore of these three numbers, the greatest sesquioctave is of the middle, and the middle of the least; and the distance or intervall, from the least to the greatest, to wit, from one hundred fourecore and twelve unto two hundred fortie and three, two tones filled with two sesquioctaves: which intervall being taken away, there remaineth the intervall of the whole, which is betweene two hundred fortie and three, and two hundred fiftie and sixe, and that is thirteene: and that is the reason why they called that number αὐτάρκεια, that is to say, a default or residue.

For mine owne part, I thinke verily, that the sense of Plato is most cleerely expounded and declared in these numbers. Others having put downe the ends and termes of Diatessaron, for the treble two hundred eighty eight, and for the base, two hundred sixteene; goe through with the rest proportionably, save onely that they take the two defaults or remnants, betweene the two extremities: for the base being set up one tone or note, maketh two hundred fortie three: 30 and the treble being let downe another note, becommeth two hundred fiftie six: for these be sesquioctaves, two hundred forty three, and two hundred sixteene; likewise two hundred eighty eight, and two hundred fiftie six; so that either of the intervals is Toniazon: and there remaineth that which is betweene two hundred forty three, and two hundred fiftie six, which is not a Demytone, but lesse: for two hundred eighty eight, is more than two hundred fiftie six, by thirty two; and two hundred forty three, more than two hundred sixteene, by twenty seven;
 and two hundred fiftie sixe more than two hundred forty three, by 13: and both these are lesse than the advantages or surplussages by halfe: and therefore Diatessaron is found to be of two tones and a σίζυγα, and not of two and a halfe. And thus you see the demonstration of this:
 and so it is no hard matter to understand by that which we have delivered: what is the reason why Plato having said, that intervals sesquialterall, sesquitercian and sesquioctaves are made by filling the sesquitercians with sesquioctaves; made no mention of the sesquialterons, but hath left them behind, namely, for that the sesquialter is filled, when one putteth a sesquioctave to a sesquialterall, or rather a sesquiterciance to a sesquioctave.

These things thus shewed in some sort by way of demonstration: now to fill the intervals, and to intersect the Medieties if none before had shewed the meanes and maner how, I would leave you to do it for your exercise: but the same having beene done already by many worthy personages, and principally by Cranor, Clearchus, and Theodorus, all borne in the city Soli: It will not be impertinent to deliver somewhat as touching the difference betweene them; for Theodorus maketh not two files of numbers as the other doe, but rangeth them all in the same line directly one after another, to wit, the duple and the triple: and principally he groundeth and fortifieth himselfe by this position (which they so call) of the substance drawn out in length, making two branches as it were from one trunk, and not foure of twaine: then he saith, that the interpositions of the Medieties ought so to take place; for otherwise there would be a trouble and confusion: and anon passeth immediately from the first duple to the first triple, when they should be that which ought to fulfill the one and the other. On the other side, there maketh for Cranor, the position and situation of plaine numbers with plaine, squares with squares

squares, and cubes with cubes, which are set one against another in opposite files, not according to their range, but alternatively, which is of one sort as Idea or forme: but that which is divided by bodies, is the subject and the matter; and the mixture of them both in common, is that which is complete and perfect.

As touching then the substance indivisible, which is alwaies one and of the same sort; wee are not thus to thinke, that it admitteth no division for the smallness thereof, like to those little bodies called Atomi: but that of it which is simple, pure, and most subject to any passion or alteration whatsoever, alwaies like it selfe, and after one maner, is said to be indivisible, and to have no parts by which simplicity, when it cometh to touch in some sort, such things as be compounded, divisible, and caried to and fro, it causeth that diversitie to cease, restraineth that multitude, and by meanes of similitude, reduceth them to one and the same habitude. And if a man be disposed to call that which is divisible by bodies, matter, as subject unto it, and participating the nature thereof, using a certaine homonymy or equivocation, it mattereth not much, neither skilleth it as touching the thing in question: but those who would have the corporall matter to be mixed with the indivisible substance, be in a great error: first, because Plato hath not now used any names thereof, for that he hath evermore used to call it a receptacle to receive all, and a nurse, not divisible by bodies, but rather a body divided into individu-all particulars. Again, what difference would there be, betweene the generation of the world, and of the soule, if the constitution of the one and the other, did consist of matter and things intelligible?

Certes, Plato himselfe as one who would in no wise admit the soule to be engendered of the body, saith: That God put all that which was corporall within her; and then, that without forth the same was enclosed round about with it. In sum, when he had framed and finished the soule according to proportion, he inferreth and annexeth afterwards a treatise of matter, which before when he handled the creation of the soule, he never required nor called for, because created it was without the helpe of matter.

The like to this may be said by way of confutation against Posidonius and his sectaries; for very farre they went not from matter; but imagining that the substance of termes and extremities, was that which he called divisible by bodies, and joining with the intelligible, they affirmed and pronounced, that the soule is the Idea of that which is distant every way, and in all the dimensions, according to the number which containeth harmony, which is very erroneous: For the Mathematicks (quoth he) are situate betweene the first intelligible and sensible things: but the soule having of intelligible things an eternall essence, and of sensible objects, a passible nature: therefore meet it is that it should have a middle substance between both. But he was not ware, that God after he had made and finished the soule, used the bounds & termes of the body, for to give a forme to the matter, determining the substance thereof dispersed, and not linked or contained within any limits, by environing it with superficies, composed of triangles, all joined together. And yet more absurd than that it is, to make the soule an Idea, for that the soule is alwaies in motion; but the Idea is immovable, neither can the Idea be mixed with that which is sensible, but the soule is alwaies linked fast with the body: besides, God did imitate Idea as one who followed his patterne; but he wrought the soule as his piece of worke: And that Plato held the soule not to be a number, but rather a thing ordained by number, we have already shewed and declared before.

But against both these opinions and their patrons, this may be opposed in common: That neither in numbers nor in termes and limits of bodies, is there any apparence or shew of that puissance, whereby the soule judgeth of that which is sensible; for the intelligence and facultie that it hath, was drawn from the participation and societie of the intelligible principle: But opinions, beliefs, assents, imaginations, alto to be passive and sensitive of qualities inherent in bodies, there is no man will thinke that they can proceed from unities, prickes, lines, or super-ficies: and yet not onely the soules of mortall men have the power to judge of all the exterior qualities perceptible by the senses; but also the very soule of the world, as Plato saith, when it returneth circularly into her selfe, and toucheth any thing that hath a substance dissippable and apt to be dispersed; as also when it meeteth with ought that is indivisible, by moving her selfe totally, the telleth in what respect any thing is the same, and in what regard divers and different; whereto principally ech thing is meet, either to doe or to suffer, where, when, and how it is affected, as well in such as are engendered, as in those that are alwaies the same. Moreover, making

making a certaine description with all of the ten predicaments, hee declareth the same more cleerely afterwards: True reason (quoth he) when it meeteth with that which is sensible, and if there with the circle of the other goeth directly to report the same, throughout the whole soule thereof, then there be engendered opinions and believes that be firme and true: but when it is conversant about that which is intelligible and discoursing by reason, and the circle likewise of the same, turning roundly with facility, doth shew the same, then of necessity there is bred perfect and accomplishe science; and in whatsoever these two things be infused, if a man call it otherwise than soule, he saith any thing rather than the truth: whence cometh it then that the soule had this motion opinative, which comprehendeth that which is sensible, divers and different from the other intellectuall that endeth in science? Hard it were to set this downe, unless a man firmly presuppose that in this place, and at this present, he composeth not the soule simply, but the soule of the world, with the parts above mentioned, of a better substance, which is indivisible; and of a woofe that he calleth divisible by bodies; which is nothing else, but an imaginative & opinionative motion, affected & accordant to that which is sensible, not engendered, but as the other of an eternall substance: for nature having the intellectuall vertue, had also the facultie opinionative: but the intellectuall power is unmoveable, impassible, founded & set upon that substance, which abideth alwaies in one sort: whereas the other is divisible and wandering, in as much as it toucheth a matter that is alwaies floting, carried to and fro and dissippable. For the matter sensible had before time no order at all, but was without all forme, bound or limitation whatsoever, and the faculty therein had neither expresse opinions articulate and distinct, nor her motions all certaine and composed in order: but for the most part resembling turbulent and vaine dreames, troubling that which was corporall, unless haply they fell upon any thing that was better. For betwene two it was, having a nature conformable, and accordant to the one and the other: chalinging matter by that which is sensitive, and by the judicciall part those things which are intelligible. And this declareth he himselfe in these proper termes: By my reckoning (quoth he) let this be the summe of the whole account that these three things had their being three waies before the heaven was, to wit, essence, space, and generation. As for space or place, he calleth matter by that name, as it were the seat, and otherwhiles a receptacle: the essence, that which is intelligible; and the generation of the world as yet not made, can be no other thing but a substance subject to motions and alterations, situate betwene that which imprinteth a forme and which is imprinted, dispensing and distributing the images from thence hither: which is the reason it was called divisible, for that of necessity both the sensitive must be divided and goe with the sensible, and also the imaginative with the imaginable. For the sensitive motion being proper unto the soule mooveth toward the sensible without: but the intelligence & understanding was of it selfe, stable, firme and immovable: howbeit being infused once into the soule and become master and lord thereof, it rolleth and turneth upon it selfe, and accomplisheth a round & circular motion, about that which is alwaies permanent, and touching that principally which is, and hath being. And therefore hard was the mixtion and affociation which mingled the divisible with the indivisible, that which is every way moovable, with that which never mooveth, and forcing in one word the other to meet and joine with the same. So the other was not motion, no more than the same was station; but the beginning both of Diversity and also of Identity or The samenesse: for the one and the other descend from divers principles, to wit, the same from unity, and the other, from binary, and were at the first mingled confusedly here in the soule; as tied by numbers, proportions and medieties harmonically: and the other being imprinted into the same, maketh difference: but the same infused into the other, causeth order; as it appeareth manifestly in the first powers of the soule, to wit, the faculties of moving and of judging. As for motion, it sheweth incontinently about the heaven, diversity in identity by the revolution of the planets, and identity in diversity by the seiled order & situation of the fixed starrs: for in these, the same beareth sway and is more predominant; but contrariwise, the other, in those that be neerer to the earth. But judgement hath two principles, to wit, understanding, from the same, for judging of things universall; and sense, from the other, to judge of particulars. Now reason is mingled of them both, being intelligence in things generall and intelligible; but opinion onely in matters sensible, using for instruments, both the fancies and imaginations betwene, and also the memories; whereof the former make the other in the same; but the latter, the same in the other. For intelligence is the motion of the intelligent about that which is stable and permanent; but opinion is the mansion of the sensitive about that which moveth. As for imagination or fancies, being a connexion of opinion to the sense, the same, same placeth it in memorie; and contrariwise, the other stirreth it in the difference and distinction of that which is past, and that which is present, touching both identity and diversitie together.

Now the better to understand the proportion therewith he made the soule, we must take a patterne and example, from the constitution of the bodie of the world: for whereas the two extremes, to wit, pure fire and earth, were by nature hard to be tempered one with another; or, to say more truly, impossible to be mixed and incorporate together: he placed in the middle betwene, aire before fire, and water before earth: and so contempered first these two mean elements, and afterwards by their helpe, the other extremes also, which he fitted and framed together, both with the said meanes, and also with themselves one with another. And heere againe, the same and the other, being contrary puissances and extremities, fighting one against the other as meere enemies, he brought together, not immediately by themselves, but by putting betwene other substances, to wit, the indivisible, before the same, and the divisible before the other, according as in some sort the one had affinity and congruency with the other: afterwards when these were mixed together, he contempered likewise the extremes, and so warped and wove, as one would say, the whole forme of the soule, making as farre as it was possible, of things unlike, sensible, and of many one. But some there bee who give out, that it was not well said of Plato: That the nature of the other, was hard to be mixed and tempered; considering (say they) that it is not altogether insusceptible of mutation, but a friend to it, and rather the nature of the same, being firme and hard to be turned and remooved, admitteth not easily any mixture, but stieeth and rejecteth it, to the end that it may remaine simple, pure, and without alteration: but they who reprove this, are ignorant that the same, is the Idea of such things as be alwaies of one sort; and the other, the Idea of those that change. Alas that the effect of this, is evermore to divide, separate, and alter that which it toucheth; and in a word, to make many of one: but the effect of that is, to conjoine and unite by similitude, many things thereby into one forme and puissance. Thus you see what be the powers and faculties of the soule of this universality, which entering into the fraile, mortall, and passible instruments of bodies, however they be in themselves incorruptible, impatible and the same; yet in them now appeareth more the forme of an indeterminate duality: but that forme of the simple unitie, sheweth it selfe more obscurely, as deeply setled within: howbeit for all that, hardly shall one see and perceive in a man, either passion altogether void of reason, or motion without understanding, wherein there is no lust, no ambition, no joy or griefe: and therefore some philosphers there be, who would have the perturbations of the mind to be reasons; as if forsooth, all disire, sorrow, and anger, were judgements. Others also doe hold, that all vertues be passions: for in valour (say they) there is foure, intemperance, pleasure, injustice, lucre. Howbeit, the soule being both contemplative, and also active at once, as it doth contemplate universal thing; so it practiseth particulars, seeming to conceive the one by intelligence, and to perceive the other by sense: common reason meeting alwaies the same, in the other, and likewise, the other, in the same, endeavoureth verily to sever by divers bonds and partitions, one from many; and the indivisible from the divisible, but it can not bring it so about, as to be purely in the one or the other, for that the principles be so enterlaced one within another, and hudled pell-mell together.

In which regard, God hath appointed a certaine receptacle for the same, and the other, of a divisible, and indivisible substance, to the end, that in diversity there should be order; for this was as much as to be engendered. Seeing that without this, the same should have had no diversitie, and consequently no motion nor generation; neither should the other have had order, and so by consequence also, neither consistence nor generation: for if it should happen to the same, to be divers from the other, and againe, to the other, to be all one with the same; such a communion and participation, would bring forth of it selfe nothing generative, but require some third matter to receive them, and to be digested and disposed by them. And this is that which God ordained and composed first, in defining and limiting the infinity of nature, mooving about bodies, by the firme steadinesse of things intellectuall. And like as there is one kinde of brutish voice, not articulate nor distinct, and therefore not significant; whereas speech consisteth in voice, that giveth to understand what is in the minde: and as harmony doeth consist of many sounds and intervals; the found being simple and the same, but the intervall a difference and diversitie of sounds, which when they be mixed and tempered together, make song and melody: Even so the passible part of the soule, was infinit, unstable, and disordinate; but afterwards became determinate, when teames and limits were set to it, and a certaine forme expell'd to that diuifible and variable diuersity of motion. Thus having conceived and comprised the same, and the other, by the similitudes and dissimilitudes of numbers, making accord of difference: thereof the life of the universall world became wife and prudent, the harmony consonant, and reason drawing with her necessitie, tempered with grace and perswasion, which the common fort call fallall destiny; Empedocles named concord and discord together, Heracitus the opposite tension and harmony of the world, as of a bow or harpe, wherein both ends bend one against an other: Parmenides, light and darknesse: Anaxagoras, understanding and infinitie: Zoroastes, God, and the devill; rearing the one Oromasdes, and the other Arimanius: But Euripides did not well to use the disjunctive for the copulative, in this verse,

Jupiter, natures necessity,
Or humane minde, whether he be?

For in truth, that puissance which pierceth and reacheth through all things, is both necessitie, and also a minde. And this is it which the Egyptians would covertly give us to understand, under the vail of their mytticall fables, that when Horus was condemned and dismembered, his spirit and bloud was given and awarded to his father, but his flesh and grease to his mother: But of the soule there is nothing that remaineth pure and sincere, nothing unmixed and apart from others; for as Heracitus was wont to say: Hidden harmony, is better than the apparant: for that therein, God who tempered it, hath bestowed secretly and concealed, differences and diversities: and yet there appeareth in the unreasonable part, turbulent perturbations, in the reasonable settled order: in sense's necessitie and constraint; in the understanding full power and entier libertie: but the terminant and defining power, loveth the universall and indivisible, by reason of their conjunctions and consanguinity. Contrariwise, the dividing puissance, inclineth and cleaveth to particulars by the diuifible. The totall universalitie joeth in a settled order, by the meanes of the same, and againe, so farre forth as need is, in a mutation by the meanes of the other: but the difference of inclinations to honesty or dishonesty, to pleasure, or displeasure; the ravishments and transportations of the spirit in amorous persons, the combats in them, of honour against voluptuous wantonnesse; doe evidently shew, and nothing so much, the commixion of the nature divine and impassible with the mortall and passible part in bodily things; of which himselfe calleth the one the concupiscence of pleasure ingenerate and inbred in us, the other an opinion induced from without, desirous of the soveraigne good: for the soule of it selfe produceth and yeeldeth passibility; but the participation of understanding cometh to it without forth, infused by the best principle and cause, which is God: so the very nature of heaven is not exempt from this double societie and communion; but that a man may see how otherwhiles it doth incline and bend another way, by the revolution of the the same which is more predominant, and so doth governe the world: and a portion of time will come, like as it hath bene often heretofore, when as the wisdom thereof shall be dyled and dazeled, yea and laid asleepe, being filled with the oblivion of that which is meet and decent for it: and that which from the beginnings is familiar and conformable to the body, shall draw, weigh downe, and turne backe the way and course of the whole universality on the right hand: but breake and undoe the forme thereof quite it shall not be able, but reduce it againe to the better, and have a regard unto the first pattern of God, who helpeth the endeavours thereof, and is ready to reforme and direct the same.

Thus it is shewed unto us in many places, that the soule is not altogether the worke of God; but having a portion of evill inbred in her, she hath bene brought into order and good dispose by him who hath limited infinity by unity; to the end that it should become a substance bounded within the owne tearmes: and hath set by the meanes of the same and the other, order, change, difference, and similitude: and hath contracted and wrought a societie, alliance and amity of all things one with another, as farre as possible it was, by the meanes of numbers and proportions. Of which point, albeit you have heard much speech, and read many books and writings; yet I shall not doe amisse, but greatly to the purpose, if briefly I discourse thereof. First setting downe the words of Plato. God (quoth he) deducted first from the universall world, one part; and then double so much: afterwards a third portion, to wit, the one, and halfe of the second, and the triple of the first: Soone after a fourth, to wit, the double of the second: & anon a fift, namely the triple of the third: After that a sixt, to wit, the octuple of the first, and a seventh, which was the first eleven twenty fold. This done he filled the double and triple intervals; cutting from them also certaine parcels from thence, which he interjected betwene these: in such sort as in every intervall there were two medieties: the one surmounting, and surmounted by the same

portion of the extremities: the other, surmounting by equal number, one of the extremities and surmounted of another by the like. But seeing the intervals carry the proportions sesquialterally, sesquitercian and sesquioctave: of these ligaments in the first precedent distances, he filled up all the sesquiterces with the intervall of the sesquioctave, leaving of each of them one part: And this distance of the part or number being left of number to number, it had for the tearmes and bonds thereof in proportion to that which is betwene, two hundred fiftie six, and two hundred forty three. Here first and formost a question is mooved as touching the quantity of these numbers: and secondly, concerning the order: and thirdly, of their power. For the quantity and sum: what they be which he taketh in the duple intervals? For the order, to wit, whether they ought to be set and disposed all in one range, as Theodorus did? or rather as Cranter in the figure of the letter lamda. A, setting upon the point or top thereof unity or the first, & then in one file apart, the duples, and the triples in another, for the use and power, namely what they conferre to the constitution and composition of the soule. As concerning the first, we will reject those who say, that it sufficeth in these proportions to consider of what nature be the intervals, and of what the medieties which fill them up, in what numbers soever a man may suppose that they have places capable betwene of the proportions aforesaid: for that the doctrine goeth after the same maner. And albeit that which they say, were true, yet the prooffe and demonstration thereof is but slender without examples, and hindreth another speculation, wherein there is contained a pleasant kinde of learning and philosophy. If then, beginning at unity, we put apart by them selves the numbers duple and the triple as he himselfe teacheth us, there will be of the one side two, foure, and eight, on the other, three, nine, and twenty seven; which are in all seven, taking the unity as common, and proceeding forward in multiplication unto foure. For it is not in this place onely, but also in many others, where the consent and agreement is very evident, that is betwene the quaternary and the septenary. And as for that quaternary of the Pythagoreans so much voiced and so highly by them celebrated, it is of thirty six, which hath this admirable matter in it above all others, that it is compounded of the foure first even numbers, & of the foure first odd numbers: and it ariseth by the fourth couple or conjugation of number, ranged in order one after the other.

For the first is of one and two: the second of one and three which be odd. For setting one in the first place, as indifferent and common to both; then taketh he eight, and twenty seven, shewing and as it were pointing with the finger, what place he giveth to the one and the other kinde.

But to treat hereof after a more exact and exquisite maner, appertaineth unto others: But that which remaineth is proper to the subject matter in hand. For it was not upon any ostentation of skill and sufficiency in the Mathematicall arts that Plato hath inserted within a treatise of naturall philosophy, this Arithmetical and harmonical medieties, but as a discourse verie meet and fit to serve for the composition and constitution of the soule; howsoever there be some who seeke for these proportions in the swiftnesse more or lesse of the wandring spheres; others rather in their distances; some in the magnitudes of the starres; and others againe, after a more curious maner, in the Diameters of the Epicycles, as if that creatour had in regard thereof, and for this cause applied and fitted the soule distributed into seven parts, unto the celestiall bodies. Many there be moreover who bring hither and accomodate to this matter the Pythagoreans inventions, tripling the distances of bodies from the middle: which they doe after this maner, setting upon fire unity; and upon the earth opposit unto ours, three; upon the earth nine; upon the Moone twenty seven; upon Mercurie foure score and one; upon Venus two hundred forty three; and upon the Sun himselfe 729. for that it is both quadrat and cube: which is the reason that they call the sun also one while quadrat and another while cube: and after the same sort they reduce the other starres by way of triplation. But these philosophers doe miscount greatly, and stray farre from reason and proportion indeed, if so be that Geometrical demonstrations do avale ought: yet in comparison of them, well fare they who goe to worke another way; and albeit they prove not their positions exactly, yet (I say) they come neerer to the marke, who give out, that the Diameter of the sunne, compared to the Diameter of the earth, is in the same proportion that twelve is to one: that the Diameter or Dimetient line of the earth is triple to that of the moone: and the least fixed starre that is to be seene, hath no lesse a Diameter, than the third part of the Diameter of the earth: also that the totall globe of the earth, compared with the sphere of the moone, carrieth the proportion of twentie

seven to one: The Diameters of Venus and the earth, are in double proportion, but their globes or spheres beare octuple proportion, to wit, eight for one. Semblably, the intervall of the celestoy, and the shadow which causeth the eclipse, is triple to the Diameter of the moone. Also the latitude of the moones declination from the Zodiacke on either side, is one twelfth part: likewise that the habitudes and aspects of her to the sunne, in distances triquetter, or quadrangular, take the formes and figurations either of the halfe moone, at the first quarter, or else when she swelleth and beareth out on both sides: but after she hath passed fixe signes of the Zodiacke, she maketh a full compasse, and resembleth a certeine harmonically symphonie of Diapason in Hexatonos. And forasmuch as the sunne about the solstices or tropicks, as well of summer as winter mooveth least, & most slowly; but contrariwise, about the two equinoxes to in Spring and Autumne, most swiftly, and exceeding much: the proportion of that which he taketh from the day, and putteth to the night, or contrariwise, is after this manner in the first thirty daies; for in that space after the solstice in winter, hee addeth to the day the first part of that exuperance, whereby the longest night surmounteth the shortest day: and in another thirtie daies following after that, a third part, and so forward in the rest of the daies one halfe, until you come to the equinox, in sextuple and triple intervals, to make even the inequality of the times. But the Chaldeans say, that Spring in regard of Autumne carrieth proportion Diatessaron, in respect of winter Diapente, and in comparison of summer Diapason: But if Euipides hath well limited the foure quarters of the yeere when he said:

For summer hot, foure moneths or deined be,

For winter colde likewise are other foure:

Shorter is rich Autumne by one moitie,

And pleasant Spring while it remains in floure,

then the seasons doe change after the proportion Diapason. Some attribute to the earth, the place of the musically note Proslambanomenos: unto the moone Hypate: unto Mercurie and Lucifer Diatonos and Lichanos: the sunne they set upon Mese (they say) containing Diapason in the middes, distant from the earth one fifth or Diapente, and from the sphere of the fixed starres a fourth, or Diatesseron. But neither the pretty conceited imagination of these toucheth the truth any way, nor the reckoning and account of those other, commeth precisely to the point. Well, those who affirm that these devices agree not to the mirde of Plato, are yet of opinion, that those other agree very well to the propositions described in the Tablature of musicians, which consisteth of five tetrachords, to wit, the first Hypaton, as one would say, of base notes; the second, Mese, that is to say, of meanes; the third, Synemmenon that is to say, of conjuncts; the fourth, Diezeugmenon, that is to say, of disjuncts; & the fifth, Hyperbolon, to wit, of the high and excellent notes: semblably, say they: The planets be set in five distances, whereof the one is from the moone unto the sunne, and those which have the same revolution with him, as Mercurie and Venus; a second, from these three unto the fire planet Mars; the third, from thence to Jupiter; the fourth, from him to Saturne; and the fifth reacheth unto the starry skie: so that the sounds and notes which determine the five tetrachords, answer to the proportion of the planets or wandering starres. Moreover, we know very well, that the ancient musicians, did set downe no more notes but two Hypates, three Netes, one Mese, and one Parame: so as their musically notes were equal in number to the planets: but our moderne masters of musick, have added that which is called Proslambanomenos, namely, lower by one note than Hypate, and inclining to the base: and so the whole composition they made Diapason; not keeping and observing the order of the consonances according to nature, for Diapente is before Diatesseron, by adding one note or tone to Hypate toward the base; whereas it is certeine that Plato tooke one note to it toward the treble; for hee saith in his books of Common-wealth: That every one of the eight spheres hath a sirene sitting upon it, causing the same to turne about, and that each one of them hath a severall and proper voice of their owne: but of altogether there is tempered a certeine harmonie: these sirenes being disposed to solace themselves, sing for their pleasure divine and heavenly tunes, dauncing with a sacred daunce, under the melodious consent of eight strings: as also there were eight principall tearmes at first of proportions double and triple; counting for one of these tearmes or limits untie to either part: but the more auncient fort have given unto us nine muses, to wit, eight as Plato himselfe saith, about the celestiall bodies, and the ninth about the terrestriall, called forth from the rest to dulce and set them in repose, in stead of error, trouble, and inequality. Consider now I pray you, whether the soule being become most just and most wise, doth not manage the heaven and celestiall things by the accords and motions therein? And thus ended she is by proportions harmonically; the images whereof are imprinted upon the bodies and visible parts of the world which are scene: but the first and principall power is visibly interred in the soule which sheweth herselfe accordant & obeisant to the better & more divine part, all the rest consenting likewise thereto. For the soveraigne creatour, finding a disorder and confusion in the motions of this disordinate and foolish soule, being evermore at discord with herselfe, divided and separated some; reconciled and reunited others; using thereto numbers and proportions; by meanes whereof, the most deafe bodies, as blocks and stones, wood, barks of trees, and the very rennets and mawes of beasts, their guts, their galls and sinewes, being framed, tempered, and mixed together in proportion, exhibite into us the figures of statues wonderfull to see to, and drogues and medicines most effectually, yea and sounds of musically instruments right admirable. And therefore Zeno the Citiean, called fourth yong men to see and beholde minstrels playing upon flutes and hautboies: That they might heare (quoth he) and learne, what sweet sounds and melodious noises, hornes, pieces of wood, canes and reeds do yeeld, yea and whatsoever matters els musically instruments be made of, when they meet with proportions and accords. As for that which the Pythagoreans were wont to say and affirme, namely, that all things resembled number, it would aske a long discourse for to declare it. But that all the gods who were before at discord and debate, by reason of their dissimilitude, and whatsoever els jarred, grew to accord and consonance one with another, whereof the cause was the temperature, moderation and order of number and harmonie, the very Poets were not ignorant of, who use to call such things as be friendly, amiable and pleasing, ἀσπαστα: but adversaries and enemies they terme ἀσπαστα, as if discord and enmitie were nothing els but disproportion: and verily that Poet whoever he was, that made a funerrall dittie for Pindarus, when he said thus of him,

To strangers kinde he was and affable,

To citizens friendly and pliable.

shewed very well, that he held it for a singular vertue to be sociable, and to know how to fort and agree with others: like as the same Pindarus himselfe,

When God did call, he gave attendance,

And never brags of all his valiance,

meaning and signifying Cadmus. The olde Theologians and Divines, who of all Philosophers are most ancient, have put into the hands of the images of the gods, musically instruments, minding nothing lesse thereby, than to make this god or that a minstrell, either to play on lute or to found the flute, but because they thought there was no greater piece of worke than accord and harmonically symphonie could beseme the gods. Like as therefore, hee that would seeke for sesquitercian, sesquialterall or double proportions of Musick, in the necke or bridge, in the belly or backe of a lute, or in the pegs and pinnes thereof, were a ridiculous fooles (for howsoever these parts ought to have a symmetricke and proportion one to another in regard of length and thickeesse; yet the harmonie whereof we speake, is to be considered in the sounds onely.) Even so, probable it is, and standeth with great reason, that the bodies of the starres, the distances and intervals of spheres, the celeritie also of their courses and revolutions, should be proportionate one unto the other, yea and unto the whole world, as instruments of musick well set and tuned, albeit the just quantitie of the measure be unknowne unto. But this we are to thinke, that the principall effect and efficacie of these numbers and proportions, which that great and soveraigne Creatour used, is the consonance, accord, and agreement of the soule in it selfe; with which she being endowed, she hath replenished both the heaven it selfe, when she was seiled thereupon, with an infinite number of good things; and also disposed and ordered all things upon the earth, by seasons, by changes and mutations, tempered and measured most excellently well and with surpassing wisdom, as well for the production and generation of all things, as for the preservation and safety of them, when they were created and made.

AN EPITOME OR BREVIARIE of a Treatise as touching the creation of the Soule, according to Plato in Timæus.

THis Treatise, entituled, Of the creation of the soule, as it is described in the booke of of Plato named Timæus, declareth all that Plato, and the Platoniques have written of that argument; and inferreth certeine proportions and similitudes Geometricall, which he supposeth pertinent to the speculation and intelligence of the nature of the soule: as also certeine Musickal and Arithmetickal Theoremes. His meaning and saying is, that the first matter was brought into forme and shape by the soule. Hee attributeth to the universall world a soule; and likewise to every living creature a soule of the owne by it selfe, which ruleth and governeth it. He bringeth in the said soule in some sort not engendered, and yet after a sort subject to generation. But hee affirmeth that eternall matter to have bene formed by God; that evil and vice is an impe springing from the said matter, To the end (quoth he) that it might never come into mans thought, That God was the authour or cause of evil.

All the rest of this Breviarie, is word for word in the Treatise it selfe, therefore may be well spared in this place, and not rehearsed a second time.

OF FATALL NECESSITY.

This little Treatise is so pitiously torne, maimed, and dismembred thorowout, that a man may sooner divine and guesse thereat (as I have done) than translate it. I beseech the readers therefore, to holde me excused, in case I neither please my selfe, nor content them, in that which I have written.

Endeavour I will, and addresse my selfe to write unto you (most deere and loving friend Pisio, as plainly and compendiously as possible I can) mine opinion as touching Fatall destinie, for to satisfie your request: albeit you know full well how wary and precise I am in my writing. First and formost therefore, thus much you must understand, That this terme of Fatall destinie is spoken and understood two manner of waies: the one, as it is an action, and the other, as it is a substance. In the first place, Plato hath figuratively drawen it forth, & under a type described it as an action, both in his dialogue entituled Phædrus, in these words: It is an Adrastian law or inevitable ordinance, which alwaies followeth and accompanieth God. And also in his treatise called Timæus, after this manner: The lawes which God hath pronounced and published to the immortall soules, in the procreation of the universall world. Likewise, in his booke of Commonwealth, he saith, That Fatall necessitie is the reason and speech of Lachesis the daughter of Necessitie. By which places he giveth us to understand, not tragically, but after a theologicall manner, what his minde and opinion is. Now if a man (taking the said places already cited & quoted) would expound the same more familiarly in other words, he may declare the former description in Phædrus after this sort, namely, that Fatall destinie is a divine reason or sentence intrinsically inflexible and inevitable, proceeding from a cause that cannot be diverted nor impeached. And according to that which he delivereth in Timæus, it is a law consequently ensuing upon the nature and creation of the world, by the rule whereof all things passe and are dispenced, that be done. For this is it that Lachesis worketh & effecteth, who is in truth the daughter of Necessitie, as we have both already said, & also shall better understand by that which we are to deliver hereafter in this and other treatises at our leisure. Thus you see what Destinie is, as it goeth for an action; but being taken for a substance, it seemeth to be the universall soule of the whole world, and admirerth a tripartite division. The first Destinie is that which erreth not; the second seemeth to erre; and the third is under heaven & conversant about the earth: of which three, the highest is called Clotho; that next under it is named Atropos; and the lowest, Lachesis; and she receiveth the influences of her two celestiall sisters, transmitting and fastening the same upon terrestriall things, which are under her government. Thus have we shewed summarily, what is to be thought & said as touching Destinie, being taken as a substance; namely, What it is; what parts it hath; after what sort it is; how it is ordeined; and in what manner it standeth, both in respect of it selfe, and also in regard of us: but as concerning the particularities of all these points, there is another fable in the Politiques of Plato, which covertly in some sort giveth us intelligence thereof; and the same have we assaied to expaine & unfold unto you, as well as possibly we can. But to returne unto our Destinie as it is an action, let us discourse thereof, forasmuch as many questions, naturall, morall and rationall depend thereupon. Now for that we have in some sort sufficiently defined already, what it is, we are to consider consequently in order, the qualitie and manner thereof; howsoever there be many that thinke it very strange and absurd to learch thereinto. I say therefore, that Destinie is not infinite, but finite and determinate, however it comprehend as it were within a circle the infinitie of all things that are, and have bene time out of minde, yea and shall be worlds without end: for, neither law, nor reason, nor any divine thing whatsoever, can be infinite. And this shall you the better learne and understand, if you consider the totall revolution and the universall time, when as the eight sphæres, as Timæus saith, having performed their swift courses, shall returne to the same head and point againe, being measured by the circle of The same, which goeth alwaies after one manner: for in this definite and determinate reason, all things aswell in heaven as in earth, which doe consist by the necessitie of that above, be reduced to the same situation, and brought againe to their first head and beginning. The onely habitude therefore of heaven, which standeth ordeined in all points, aswell in regard of it selfe, as of the earth, and all terrestriall matters, after certeine long revolutions, shall one day returne, yea and that which consequently followeth after, and those which are linked in a continuity together, bring ech one by consequence that which it hath by necessity. For to make this matter more plaine, let us suppose that all those things which are in and about us, be wrought and brought to passe by the course of the heavens and celestiall influences, all being the very efficient cause both of that which I write now, and also of that which you are doing at this present, yea and in that sort as you do the same: so that hereafter, when the same cause shall turne about and come againe, we shall do the very same that now we do, yea and after the same manner; yea we shall become againe the very same men. And even so it shall be with all other men: and looke whatsoever shall follow in a course or traine, shall likewise happen by a consequent and dependant cause: and in one word, whatsoever shall befall in any of the universall revolutions; shall become the same againe. Thus apparent it is, as hath already bene said, That Destinie being in some sort infinite, is neverthelesse determinate and not infinite; as also, that according as we have shewed before, it is evident that it is in manner of a circle: for like as the motion of a circle in a circle, and the time that measureth it is also a circle; even so the reason of those things which are done and happen in a circle, by good right may be esteemed and said to be a circle.

This therefore, if nought els there were, sheweth unto us, in a manner sufficiently, what is destinie in generality, but not in particular, nor in ech severall respect: What then is it? It is the general, in the same kinde of reason, so as a man may compare it with civill law: For first and formost, it commaundeth the most part of things, if not all, at leastwise by way of supposition, and then it compriseth as much as is possible all matters appertaining to a city or publike state, generally: and that we may better understand both the one and the other, let us exemplifie and consider the same in specialty: The civill or politike law speaketh and ordeineth generally of a valiant man, as also of a run-away coward, and so consequently of others: howbeit, this is not to make a law of this or that particular person; but to provide ingenerall principally, and then of particulars by consequence, as comprised under the said generall; for we may very well say, that to remunerate and recompense this or that man for his valour is lawfull; as also to punish a particular person for his cowardise, and forsaking his colours; for that the law potentially and in effect, hath comprized as much, although not in expresse words: like as the law (if I may so say) of Physicians, and of masters of bodily exercises, comprehendeth speciall and particular points within the generall: and even so doth the law of nature, which first and principally doth determine generall matters; and then particulars secondarily & by consequence. Semblably, may particular and individuall things in some sort be said to be defined, for that they be so by consequence with the generals. But haply some one of those who search and enquire more curiously and exactly into these matters will hold the contrary, and say; that of particular & individuall things, proceed the composition of the generals, and that the generall is ordeined and gathered for the particular. Now that for which another thing is, goeth alwaies before that which is for it; but this is not the proper place to speake of these quiddities; for wee are to referre them to some other: howbeit, that destiny doth not comprehend all things purely and exprefly, but onely such as be universall and generall, is resolved upon for this present, and leaveth for that which we have to say hereafter, yea, and agreeth also to that which hath bene delivered somewhat before; for that which is finite and determinate, properly agreeable to divine providence, is more seene in universall and generall things, than in particular; of this nature is the law of God, and such is likewise the civill law, whereas infinity consisteth in particulars.

After this we are to declare, what meaneth this tearme, By supposition: for surely destiny is to be thought such a thing. We have then called, By supposition, that which is not let downe of it selfe, nor by it selfe, but supposed and joined after another; and this signifieth a suite and consequence: This is the law or ordinance of Adrastia, that is to say, a decree inevitable; unto which, if any soule can associate it selfe, the same shall be able to see by consequence, all that will ensue, even unto another generall revolution, and be exempt from all evils; which if it may be able alwaies to doe, it shall neither suiteine any damage nor doe harme. Thus you see what it is that we call, By supposition & in generall. Now that Fatall destiny is of this kind evidently appeereth, as well by the substance as the name thereof; for it is called in Greek ἀναγκη, as if one would say anankē, that is as much as dependant and linked, and a law it is and ordinance, for that things therein be ordeined and disposed consequently, and in manner of those which are done civilly.

Heereunto is to be annexed a treatise of relation, that is to say, what reference and respect hath Fatall destiny unto divine providence, as also unto fortune: likewise, what is that which is in us; what is contingent; and such like things. Moreover, we are to decide, wherein and how it is false; wherein also, and how it is true; that all things happen and come to passe by Fatall destiny: for if it import and imply thus much, That all things are comprised and contained in Fatall destiny, we must grant this proposition to be true: and say one put thereto all things done among men, upon the earth, and in the very heaven, and place them within Fatall destiny, let us grant as much for the present. But if we understand that this word Fatall (as it rather seemeth) doth import not all things, but that onely which followeth and is dependant, then wee may not grant and say, that all things be comprehended in Fatall destiny; considering all that which the law doeth comprehend, and whereof it speaketh, is not lawfull, nor according to law: for why? it compriseth treason; it treateth of cowardise; of running away from ones colours and place in battell; of adultery and many things fensibable: of which we cannot say, any one is lawfull: forasmuch as, even to performe valorous service in the wars, to kill tyrants, or to exploit any vertuous deed, I would not tearme lawfull, because properly that is lawfull, which is commanded by the law; and if the law did command those things, how can they avoid to be rebellious and transgressors of the law, who have not done valiant exploits in armes, have not killed tyrants, nor performed any other notable acts of vertue? and in case they be offenders of the law, why are they not punished accordingly? But if to punish such, be neither just nor reasonable, then confesse we must, that these matters be not legall, nor according to law; for legall and according to law is that, which is namely prescribed, set downe, and exprefly commanded by the law, in any action whatsoever. Semblably, those things onely be Fatall and according to destiny, which are done by a divine disposition proceeding, so that Fatall destiny may well comprise all things: howbeit many of those which be comprised therein, and in manner all that went before, before, to speake properly, cannot be pronounced Fatall, nor according to Fatall destiny, which being so, we ought to declare now in order consequently, how that which is in our owne power, to wit, free will, how fortune, possible, contingent, and other such like things, which be ranged and placed among the premises, may subsist safely with fatall destiny; and how fatall destiny may stand with them: for fatall destiny comprehendeth all, as it seemeth: and yet these things happen not by any necessity, but every of them according to there owne nature. The nature of possible is to have a presubstistence as the gender, and to goe before the contingent, and the contingent as the subject matter ought to be presupposed before the things which are in our power: for that which is in us, as a lord and master useth the contingent. And fortune is of this nature, to intercurrere betweene our free will and what is in us, by the property of contingencie enclining to the one side and to the other, which you may more easily apprehend and understand, if you consider, how every thing that is produced forth, yea and the production it selfe and generation, is not without a certaine puissance: and no puissance or power there is without a subsistence: as for example the generation of man, and that which is produced and engendered, is not without a power, and the same is about the man, but man himselfe is the substance. Of the puissance or power being betweene, cometh the substance which is the puissant: but the production and that which is produced, be both things possible. There being therefore these three, puissance, puissant, and possible: before puissance can be, of necessity there must be presupposed a puissant, as the subject thereof: and even so it must needs be that puissance also subsist before that which is possible. By this deduction then, in some sort is declared, what is that which we call possible; so as we may after a grosse manner define it to be, that which puissance is able to produce: and to speake more properly of the same, by adjoining thereto thus much, provided alwaies that nothing without forth doe impeach or hinder it. But among possible things, some there be that never can be hindred, as namely in heaven, the rising and setting of the stars, and such like: others may be impeached, as the most part of humane affaires, yea and many meteors in the aire. As for the former, as things hapning by necessity, they be called necessarie; the other for that they fall out sometime contrariwise, we tearme contingent; and in this sort may they be described. Necessary is that possible thing, which is opposit to impossible: contingent is that possible, whereof possible also is the contrary. For that the sun should go downe, is a thing both necessary & possible, as being contrary unto this impossibility, namely, that the sun should not set at all: but that when the sun is set, there should come raine or not raine, are both of them possible and contingent. Again of things contingent, some there be which happen oftentimes and for the most part; others rare and seldom; some fall out indifferently, as well one waie as another, even as it hapneth. And plaine it is, that these be opposit and repugnant to themselves: as for those which happen usually and very often, contrary they be to such things as chance but seldom: and these indeed for the most part are subject to nature: but that which chanceth equally, one way as well as another, lieth in us and our will: for examples sake, that under the Dog starre it should be hot and colde; the one commonly and for the most part, the other very seldom, are things both, submitted to nature: but to walke or not to walke and such things whereof the one and the other be subject to the free will of man, are said to be in us and touching this tearme, To be in us, it is to be understood two manner of waies, and thereof are two kinds, the one proceedeth from passion as namely from anger or concupience; the other from discourse of reason or judgement and understanding, which a man may properly say, to be in our election. And some reason there is that this possible contingent which is named to be in us, and to proceed from our appetite and will, should be called so, not in the same regard, but for divers: for in respect of future time it is called possible and contingent; but in regard of present it is named, In us and in our free will: so as a man may thus define and distinguish of these things: Contingent is that which both it selfe and the contrary whereof is possible: that which in us, is the one part of contingent, to wit, that which presently is in doing according to our appetite. Thus have we in manner declared, that by nature possible goeth before contingent, and contingent subsisteth before that which in us; also, what each of them is, and whereupon they are so called, yea and what be the qualities adjoining thereto: it remaineth now, that we should treat of Fortune and casual adventure, and of whatsoever besides, that requireth discourse and consideration. First, this is certaine, that Fortune is a kinde of cause: but among causes, some are of themselves, others by accident: as for example, of an house or ship, the proper causes and of themselves, be the Mason, Carpenter or Shipwright; but by accident, the

Musician

Musician and Geometrician, yea, and whatsoever incident to the mason, carpenter, or shipwright, either in regard of body or minde, or outward things: whereby it appeareth, that the essentiall cause which is by it selfe, must needs be determinate, certaine in one; whereas the accidentall causes are not alwaies one and the same, but infinit, and indeterminate; for many accidents in number infinit, and in nature different one from another, may be together in one and the same subject. This cause then by accident, when it is found not onely in such things which are done for some end, but also in those wherein our election and will taketh place, is called fortune: as namely, to find treasure when a man diggeth a hole or grave to plant a tree in, or to do and suffer any extraordinary thing, in flying, pursuing, or otherwise going and marching, or onely in retiring: provided alwaies, that he doeth it not to that end which ensueth thereupon, but upon some other intention. And hereupon it is, that some of the ancient philosophers have defined fortune, to be a cause unknown, and not foreseene by mans reason: But according to the Platoniques, who come neerer unto it in reason, it is defined thus: Fortune is an accidentall cause in those things that are done for some end, and which are in our election; and afterwards they adjoine morcover, not foreseene nor known by the discourse of humane reason; although that which is rare and strange, by the same meanes, appeareth also in this kinde of cause by accident. But what this is, if it appeere not manifestly by the oppositions and contradictory disputations, yet at leastwise it will be declared most evidently, by that which is writtē in a treatise of Plato, entituled Phædon, where these words are found. VVhat Have you not heard how & in what maner the judgement passed? Yes iwis: For one there was, who 20 came and told us of it: whereat we marvelled very much, that seeing the sentence of judgement was pronounced long before, he died a good while after. And what might be the cause thereof, ô Phædon? Surely, there hapned unto him, ô Echeerates, a certaine fortune: For it chanced that the day before the judgement, the prow of the galley which the Athenians sent to ille Delos was crowned: In which words it is to be noted, that by this tearme; There hapned, you must not understand, There was; but rather, it so befell, upon a concourse and meeting of many causes together, one after another. For the priest adorned the ship with coronets for another end and intention, and not for the love of Socrates; yea, and the judges had condemned him also for some other cause: but the event it selfe was so strange & admirable, as if it had hapned by some providence, or by an humane creature, or rather indeed by some superior nature. And 30 thus much may suffice as touching fortune, and the definition thereof: as also, that necessarily it ought to be sublied together with some one contingent thing of those which are meant to some end; whereupon it tooke the * name: yea, and there must be some subject before of such things which are in us and in our election.

But casual adventure reacheth and extendeth farther than fortune: for it compriseth both it, and also many other things which may chance aswell one way as another: and according as the very etymologic and derivation of the word adventurus, sheweth it is that which hapneth for and in stead of another, namely, when that which was ordinary fell not out, but another thing in lieu thereof: as namely, when it chanceth to be colde weather in the Dog daies; for sometimes it falleth out to be then colde: and not without cause. In summe, like as that which is in us and 40 arbitrary, is part of contingent; even so is fortune a part of casual or accidental adventure: and both these events are conjunct and dependant one of another; to wit, casual adventure liangeth upon contingent, and fortune upon that which is in us and arbitrarie; and yet not simply and in generally, but of that onely which is in our election, according as hath beene before said. And hereupon it is, that this casual adventure is common aswell to things which have no life, as to those which are animate; whereas fortune is proper to man onely, who is able to performe voluntarie actions. An argument whereof is this, that to be fortunate, happie and blessed, are thought to be all one; for blessed happinesse is a kinde of well doing; and to doe well, properly belongeth to a man and him that is perfect. Thus you see what things are comprised within fatall destiny, namely, contingent, possible, election, that which is within us, fortune, casual accident or chance & adventure, together with their circumstant adjuncts, signified by these words, haply, peradventure or perchance: howbeit, we are not to inferre, that because they be contained within destiny, therefore they be fatall.

It remaineth now to discourse of divine providence, considering that it selfe comprehendeth fatall destiny. This supream and first providence therefore, is the intelligence and will of the soveraigne god, doing good unto all that is in the world; whereby all divine things universally and thorowout, have bene most excellently and wisely ordeined and disposed. The second providence, is the intelligence and will of the second gods who have their course thorow the heaven; by which, temporall and mortall things are engendred regularly and in order; as also whatsoever pertaineth to the preservation and continuance of every kinde of thing. The third, by all probability and likelihood may well be called the providence and prospicience of the Demons or angels, as many as be placed and ordeined about the earth as superintendents, for to observe, make and governe mens actions. Now albeit there be seene this threefold providence, yet properly and principally that first and supream is named Providence: so as we may be bolde, and never doubt to say, howsoever herein we seeme to contradiēt some Philosophers, That all things are done by fatall destiny, and by providence, but not likewise by nature: howbeit, some by providence; and that after divers sorts, these by one, and those by another: yea and some also by fatall destiny. As for fatall destiny, it is altogether by providence; but providence in no wise by fatall destiny: where, by the way, this is to be noted, that in this present place I understand the principall and soveraigne providence. Now whatsoever is done by another (be it what it will) is evermore after that which causeth or maketh it; even as that which is erected by law is after the law; like as what is done by nature, must needs succeed and come after nature. Semblably, what is done by fatall destiny, is after fatall destiny, & of necessity must be more new & moderne: and therefore the supreme providence is the ancientest of all, excepting him alone, whose intelligence it is or wil, or both twaine together, to wit, the soveraigne author, creator, maker and father of all things.

20 And for what cause it is, I saith Timæus, that he hath made & framed this fabricke of the world: as for that he is all good, and in him being all good, there can not be imprinted or engendred any envie: but seeing he is altogether void and free from it, his will was, that as much as possibly might be, all things should resemble himselfe. He then who shall receive and admit this for the most principall and proper originall of the generation and creation of the world, such as 30 women have delivered unto us by writing, is in the right way, and doeth very well. For God willing that all things should be good, and nothing at all (to his power) evill, tooke all that was visible, restless as it was, and moving still rashly, confusedly, irregularly and without order, which he brought out of confusion, and ranged into order, judging this to be every way farre better than the other: for neither it was, nor is convenient and meet, for him who is himselfe 40 right good, to make any thing that should not be most excellent and beautifull. Thus therefore we are to esteeme that providence (I meane that which is principall and soveraigne) hath constituted and ordeined these things first, and then in order such as ensue and depend thereof, even as farre as to the soules of men. Afterwards having thus created the universall world, hee 50 ordeined eight spheres, answering in number to so many principall starres; and distributed to every one of them a severall soule; all which he set, each one (as it were) within a chariot over the nature of the whole, shewing unto them the lawes and ordinances of Fatall destiny * * * What is he then who will not beleeeve, that by these words he plainly sheweth and declareth Fatall destiny, and the same to be (as one would say) a tribunall, yea, & a politicke constitution of civill lawes, meet and agreeable to the soules of men? whereof afterwards he rendreth a reason. 40 And as touching the second providence, he doeth after a fort expressly signifie the same in these words, saying: Having therefore prescribed all these lawes unto them, to the end that if afterwards there should be any default, he might be exempted from all cause of evill: he spread and sowed some upon the earth, others about the moone, and some againe upon other organs and instruments of time: after which distribution, he gave commandement and charge to the young gods for to frame and create mortall bodies, as also to make up and finish that which remained and was wanting in mans soule; and when they had made perfect all that was adherent and consequent thereto, then to rule and governe after the best and wisest maner possible, this mortall creature, to the end that it selfe should not be the cause of the owne evils and miseries: for in these words where it is said: That he might be exempt, and not the cause of any evill ensuing afterwards, he sheweth cleerly and evidently to every one the cause of Fatall destiny. The order also and office of these petie-gods declareth unto us the second providence, yea, and it seemeth that in some sort it toucheth by the way, the third providence, in case it be so, that for this purpose these lawes and ordinances were established, because he might not be blamed or accused as the author of any evill in any one afterwards: for God himselfe being cleere & exempt from all evill, neither hath need of lawes, nor requirerh any Fatall destiny: but each one of these petie-gods, led and haled by the providence of him who hath engendred them, doth their owne devoir and office, belonging unto them. That this is true, and the very minde and opinion opinion of Plato, appeareth manifestly in my conceit, by the testimonie of those words which are reported by the law-giver in his books of lawes in this maner: If there were any man (quoth he) so by nature sufficient, or by divine fortune so happily borne, that he could be able to comprehend this, he should require no lawes to command him: for no law there is, nor ordinance of more worth and puissance, than is knowledge and science: neither can he possibly be a servile slave or subject to any, who is truly and indeed free by nature, but he ought to command all. For mine owne part thus I understand and interpret the sentence of Plato: For whereas there is a triple providence: the first, as that which hath engendred Fatall destiny, in some sort comprehendeth it: the second being engendred with it, is likewise wholly comprised in it: the third engendred after Fatall destiny, is comprised under it, in that maner, as, That which is in us, and fortune, as we have already said: for those whom the assistance of the power of our Dæmon doth aid (according as Socrates saith) expounding unto Theages what is the inevitable ordinance of Adrastia, these (I say) are those whom you understand well enough; for they grow and come forward quickly with speed, so as, where it is said, that a Dæmon or angell doth favour any, it must be referred to the third providence; but that suddenly they grow and come to proofe, it is by the power of Fatall destiny: And to be short, it is very plaine and evident, that even this also is a kinde of destiny. And peradventure it may seeme much more probable, that even the second providence is comprehended under destiny; yea, and in summe, all things whatsoever be made or done, considering that destiny according to the substance thereof, hath bene rightly divided by us into three parts. And verily that speech as touching the chaine and concatenation, comprehendeth the revolutions of the heavens, in the number and ranage of those things which happen by supposition: but verily of these points I will not debate much, to wit, whether we are to call them, Hapning by supposition, or rather conjunct unto destiny; considering that the precedent cause and commander of destiny it selfe, is also fatall. And thus to speake summarily, and by way of abridgement, is our opinion: but the contrary sentence unto this, orderineth all things to be not onely under destiny, but also according to destiny, and by it. Now all things accord unto the other, and that which accordeth to another, the same must be granted to be the other: according then to this opinion, contingent is said to be the first; that which is in us the second; fortune the third; accident or casual chance and adventure the fourth, together with all that dependeth thereupon, to wit, praise, blame, and those of the same kinde; the fifth and last of all, may be said to be the prayers unto the gods, together with their services and ceremonies. Moreover, as touching those which are called idle, and harvest arguments, as also that which is named beside or against destiny, they are no better than cavils and sophistries according to this opinion; but according to the contrary sentence, the first and principall conclusion is, that nothing is done without cause, but all thing depend upon precedent causes: the second, that the world is governed by nature, which conspireth and is compatible with it selfe; the third may seeme rather to be testimonies unto these; whereof the first is divination, approved by all nations, as being really and truly in God; the second the æquanimity and patience of wise men, taking and bearing well all accidents and occurrences whatsoever, as comming by divine ordinance; the third, which is so common a speech, and divulged in every mans mouth, namely, that every proposition is either true or false. Thus have we drawn this discourse into a small number of short articles, to the end that we might remember and comprise in few words, the whole matter and argument of Destinie. All which points, both of the one and the other opinion, are to be discussed and examined with more diligent inquisition, whereof particularly we will treat afterwards.

A COMPENDIOUS REVIEW AND DISCOURSE, THAT THE STOICKS DELIVER MORE STRANGE OPINIONS, THAN DO THE POETS.

The Summarie.

A Petie declaration this is against the sect of the Stoicks, which briefly and in a word is maker odious; growing out in plaine rearmes, that such persons be the loudest liars in the world; and that their opinion as touching the change and alteration of that party who rangeth himselfe unto them, is so monstrous and ridiculous, that the discovery only thereof is a sufficient refutation.

A COMPENDIOUS REVIEW and discourse, That the Stoicks deliver more strange opinions, than do the Poets.

Pindarus was reprovved, for that after a strange maner, and without all sense and probabilitie hee fained Cænem one of the Lapithe, to have had a bodie so hard, as it could not be pierced by any weapon of iron and Steele, but that he remained unhurt, and so afterwards
*Went under earth with his iron wound,
 When with stiffe foot he leste the ground.*
 But this Lapith of the Stoicks, to wit, their imagined wise man, being forged by them of impassibilitie, as of a metall harder than the diamond, is not such an one as is not otherwhiles wounded, diseased and assailed with paine: howbeit, as they say, he abideth still fearelesse and without sorrow and heavinesse; he continueth invincible, he susteineth no force nor violence, howsoever he be wounded, what paine soever he suffereth, he be put to all tortures, or see his native countrey sacked and destroyed before his face, or what calamities els beside be presented to his eies. And verily, that Cænem whom Pindarus describeth, notwithstanding hee were smitten, and bare many stroakes, yet was unwounded for all that: but the wise man whom the Stoicks imagine, although he be kept enclosed in prison, yet is not restrained of libertie; say he be pitched downe from the top of a rocke, yet susteineth no violence; is he put to the strapado, to the racke or wheele, yet for all that is he not tormented; and albeit he fire in the fire, yet he hath no harm; nay, if in wrestling he be foiled and take a fall, yet he persisteth unconquered; when he is environed within a wall, yet is he not besieged; and being sold in port sale by the enemies, yet is he no captive, but remaineth impregnable; resembling most properly for all the world, those ships which have these goodly inscriptions in their pousps, Happy voyage, Luckie navigation, Saving providence, and Remedy against all dangers: and yet the same nevertheless be tossed in the seas, split upon the rocks, cast away and drowned. Iolus, as the Poet Euripides hath fained, by a certeine praiser that he made unto the gods, of a feeble and decrepit olde man, became all of a sudden a yong and lustie gallant, ready for to fight a battell: but the Stoicks wise man, who longer agoe than yesterday, was most hateful, wretched and wicked, all at once to day is changed into a good and vertuous person; he is of a rivelled, pale, leane and poore fillie aged man, and as the Poet Aeschylus saith,

*Who suffereth pangs in flanke, in reines and backe,
With painfull cramps, stretcht as upon a racke.*

become, a lovely, faire, beautifull, and personable youth, pleasant both to God and man. Menerua in Homer tid Ulysses from his wrinkles, his baldnesse, and ill favoured deformity, that he might appeare full of favour and amiable: but this wise man of there making, albeit withered olde age leave not his body, but contrariwise increase still and grow more and more with all the discommodities that follow it, continuing still for example facke bunch backt, if he were to be fore, one eied, and toothlesse, yet forsooth is not for all this, foule, deformed and ill favoured, 10 For like as by report the bettills fly from good and sweet odors, seeking after stinking fents, even so the Stoicks love (converting with the most foule ill favoured and deformed, after that by their sapience and widome they be turned into all beauty and favor) departeth and goeth from them. With these Stoicks he who in the morning haply was most wicked, will proove in the evening a right honest man: & who went to bed foolishly, ignorant, injurious, outrageous, intemperate, yea a very slave, a poore & needy begger, will rise the morrow morning, a king, rich, happie, chaste, just, firme and constant, nothing at all subject to variety of opinions: not for that he hath all on a suddaine put forth a beard, or become under grown, as in a yoong and tender body: but rather engendered in a weake, soft, effeminate and inconstant foule, a perfect minde, perfect understanding, soveraine prudence, a divine disposition, comparable to the gods, a settled and assured science, not wandering in opinions and an immutable and stedfast habitude: neither went that leawd wickednesse of his away by little & little, but all at once (I may well neere say) he was transmuted from a most vile beast into a deny god, a demon, or a very god indeed. For so soone once as a man hath learned vertue in the Stoicks schoole, he may say thus unto himselfe:

*Wish what thou wilt, and what thou list to crave,
All shall be done, & doe thou but aske and have.*

This vertue brings riches, this carth with it royalty, this giveth good fortune, this makes men happie, standing in need of nothing, contented in themselves, although they have not in all the world so much as a single drachme of silver, or one grey goate. Yet are the fables of Poets devised with more probability and likelihood of reason: for never doe they leave Hercules altogether destitute of necessaries: but it seemeth that he hath with him alwaies one living source or other, out of which there runneth evermore foison and plenty for himselfe and the company about him. But he who hath once gotten the goat Amalthea by the head, and that plentifull horne of abundance which the Stoicks talke of, he is rich incontinently, and yet beggeth his bread and victuals of others; he is a king, although for a peece of mony he teacheth how to resolve syllogismes: he onely possesseth all things, albeit he pay rent for his house, buyeth his meale and meat with the silver that many times he taketh up of the usurer, or else craveth at their hands who have just nothing of their owne to give. True it is indeed, that Ulysses the king of Ithaca begged almes, but it was because he would not be knownen; counterfaising all that he could 40

*To make himselfe a begger poore,
Like one that went from doore to doore.*

whereas he that is come out of the Stoicks schoole, crying aloud with open mouth, I onely am a king, I am rich and none but I, is scene oftentimes at other mens doores standing, with this note,

*Give Hipponax a cloke, his naked corps to folde,
For that I quake and shiver much for colde.*

THE CONTRADICTIONS OF STOICK PHILOSOPHERS.

The Summarie.

Lutarch being of the Academique sect, directly contrary to the Stoicks, examined in this treatise the opinions of those his adversaries, and sheweth by proper testimonies out of their owne writings, and namely of Chrysippus their principall doctor, that there is nothing firme and certaine in all their doctrine: perusing and sifting to this end the chiefe points of all the parts of philosophie, not binding himselfe precisely to any speciall order, but proposing matters according as they come into his remembrance, or were presented to his eies. Moreover, in the recitall of then repugnancies and contradictions, he intermingleth certaine expositions, to aggravate the absurdity of this sect of his adversaries, and to withdraw the reader from them: which is a very proper and singular manner of declaiming and disputing against moderate errors and such as have a great name in the world: for in shewing that these who are reputed most able and sufficient to teach and maintaine them, know not what they say, and do confound themselves, as much as to reproch every man who doth adhere unto them, with this imputation, that he is deprived of common sense, in receiving that for a certaine verity, wherein their very masters are not well resolved, or admitting that which they praise, otherwise than they say. 30

THE CONTRADICTIONS of Stoicke philosophers.

If above all things, I would have to be scene a conformitie and accord betwene the opinions of men and their lives: for it is not so necessary, that the oratour, according as Lysias saith, and the law, should sound the same note, as requisite that the life of a philosopher should be conformable and consonant to his words and doctrine: for the speech of a philosopher is a voluntary and particular law which hee imposeth upon himselfe, if it be so as men esteeme, that philosophie is (as no doubt it is) the profession of that which is serious, grave, and of weighty importance, and not a gamesome sport, or vaine and toyish prating, devised onely for to gaine glory. Now we see, that Zeno himselfe hath written much by way of disputation and discourse; Cleanthes likewise, and Chrysippus most of all, concerning the politike government of common-wealth, touching rule and obedience, of judgement also and pleading at the barre: and yet looke into all their lives throughout, you shall not finde that every any of them were captains and commanders, neither law-givers, nor senators, & counsellors of State, ne yet orators or advocates pleading judicially in court before the judges; nay, they were not so much as employed in any warre, bearing armes, and performing martiall service for the defence of their countries: you shall not finde (I say) that any of them was ever sent in embassage, or bestowed any publicke largesse or donative to the people; but remained all the time of their life (and that was not thort, but very long) in a strange and foren country, feeding upon rest and repose, as if they had tasted of the herbe Lotus in Homer, and forgotten their native soile, where they spent their time in writing books, in holding discourses, and in walking up and downe. Heereby it manifestly manifestly appeareth, that they lived rather according to the sayings and writings of other, than answerable to that which themselves judge and confesse to be their duty, having passed the whole course of their life in that quiet repose, which Epicurus and Hieronymus so highly praise and commend. And verily to prove this to be a trueth, Chrysippus himselfe in his fourth booke entituled, Of Lives, is of opinion, and so hath put downe in writing, that a scholasticall life, to wit, that of idle students, differeth not from the life of voluptuous persons. And to this purpose I thinke it not amisse to alledge the mans speech word for word: They (quoth he) who thinke that this scholasticall and idle life of students even from the first beginning, is most of all befitting and agreeable to philosophers, in my conceit, seeme much deceived weening as they do, that they are to philosophize for their pastime or recreation, and so to draw out in length the whole course of their life at their booke in their studies, which is as much to say in plaine termes, as to live at ease and in pleasure. Neither is this opinion of theirs to be hidden and dissembled; for many of them give out as much openly, howsoever others, and those not a few deliver the same more obscurely; and yet where is he who grew old and aged more in this idle scholasticall life, than Chrysippus, Cleanthes, Diogenes, Zeno and Antipater? who forsooke and abandoned even their native countries, having no cause or occasion in the world to complaine of or to be discontent; only to this end, that they might lead their lives more sweetly at their pleasure, studying and disputing with ease, and letting out their girdle slacke as they list themselves. To approve this that I say, Aristocreon the disciple of Chrysippus, and one of his familiar friends, having caused a statue of brasse to be erected for him, set over it these elegant 20 verses in manner of an epigram:

This image, Aristocreon erected fiesh and new For Chrylip, Academicke knots who like an ax did hew

Lo, what manner of person was Chrysippus, an aged man, a philosopher, one who praised the life of kings, and of those who are conversant in weale publike, and he who thought there was no difference between the idle scholasticall life, and the voluptuous. And yet others among them as many I meane as deal in state affaires, are found to be more repugnant and contradictory to the resolutions of their owne sect: for they beare rule as chiefe magistrates, they are judges, they be Senators and set in counsell, they ordaine and publish lawes, they punish malefactors, they honour and reward those that doe well; as if they were cities indeed wherein they governe and manage the state; as if those were senators, counsellors and judges, who yeerely alwaies are by lot created or otherwise to such places; captaines and commanders who are elected by the suffrages and voices of citizens; and as if those were to be held good lawes which Clisthenes, Lycurgus & Solon made: and yet the same men they avow and maintaine to have bene witlesse fooles, and leawd persons. Thus you see how albeit they administer the common weale, yet they be repugnant to their owne doctrine.

In like maner Antipater, in his booke of the dissention, betweene Cleanthes, and Chrysippus reporteth, that Zeno and Cleanthes would never be made citizens of Athens, for teare forsooth lest they might be thought to offer injurie to their owne country. Now if they herein did well, let Chrysippus goe, and say wee nothing of him that he did amisse, in causing himselfe to be enrolled and immatriculated in the number of Athenian citizens; for I will not stand much upon this point: onely this I holde, that there is a strange and wonderfull repugnance in their deeds and actions, who reserve still the bare names of their native countries, and yet bereave the same of their very persons and their lives, converting so farre off in forraigne lands: much like as if a man who hath cast off and put a way his lawfull wedded wife, should dwell, live and lie ordinarily with another as his concubine, yea and beget children of her body, and yet will in no wise espouse her and contract marriage with her, lest forsooth he might seeme to doe wrong and injurie to the former. Furthermore Chrysippus in his treatise that he made of Rhetoricke writing thus, that 50 a wife man will in such sort plead, make orations to the people, and deal in state matters, as if riches reputation and health were simply good things, testifieth hereby and confesseth that his precepts and resolutions induce men not to goe forth of doores nor to intermeddle in politicke and civill affaires, and so by consequence that their doctrines and precepts cannot sort well with practise, nor be agreeable unto the actions of this life.

Moreover, this is one of Zenos quodlibets or positions: that we ought not to build temples to the honour of the gods; for that a temple is no such holy thing, nor so highly to be esteemed med considering it is the workmanship of malons, carpenters and other artificers: neither can any worke of such artisans be prised at any worth. And yet even they who avow and approve this as a wife speech of his, are themselves professed in the religious mysteries of those churches; they mount up to the castle and frequent there the sacred temple of Minerva; they adore the shrines and images of the gods; they adorne the temples with chaplets and garlands, notwithstanding they be the workes of malons, carpenters and such like mechanical persons. And will these men seeme indeed to reprove the Epicureans as contrary to themselves, who denying that the gods be occupied or imployed in the government of the world, yet offer sacrifice unto them, when as they checke and refute themselves much more in sacrificing unto the gods 10 within their temples and upon their altars, which they maintaine that they ought not to stand at all, nor once to have bene built?

Zeno putteth downe & admitteth many vertues according to their severall differences, like as Plato doth, to wit, prudence, fortitude, temperance & justice; saying that they be all in very deed and in nature inseparable nor distinct a funder: howbeit in reason divers and different one from another. And againe when he would seeme to define them severally one after another, he saith That fortitude is prudence in the execution of matters: justice is prudence in the distribution of things, &c. as if there were no more but one sole vertue, which according to divers relations, unto affaires and actions, seemeth to differ and admit distinction. So you see, that not Zeno alone seemeth to be repugnant unto himselfe in these matters, but Chrysippus also, who 20 reproveth Ariston for saying, that all vertues are nothing else but the divers habitudes and relations of one and the same, and yet defendeth Zeno when he defineth each vertue in this wise by it selfe.

As for Clearches in his commentaries of nature, having set this downe, that the vigour and similitude of things, is the illusion and smiting of fire, which if it be in the soule so sufficient, that it is able to performe the duties presented unto it, is called strength and power, he annexeth afterward these words: And this very power and strength (quoth he) when as it is employed in such objects wherein a man is to persist, and which he ought to containe, is called Continency; if in things to be endured and supported, then it is named Fortitude; if in estimation of worthinesse and desert, beareth the denomination of justice; if in choises or refusals, it carrieth 30 the name of Temperance. Against him who was the authour of this sentence,

Forbeare thy sentence for to passe, and judgement see thou stay, Until such time as thou hast heard what parties both can say.

Zeno alledged such a reason as this on the contrary side. Whether the plaintife who spake in the first place hath plainly proved his cause or no, there is no need at all to heare the second, for the matter is at an end already, and the question determined: or whether he hath not proved it, all is one; for it is even the same case, whether he that is cited be so stubburne as not to appeare for to be heard, or if he appeare, doe nothing els but cavill and wrangle: so that proove he or 40 proove he not his cause, needlesse it is to heare the second plead. And yet even he who made this Dilemma, and wrote against the books of Politie and common weale that Plato composed, taught his scholars how to affoile and avoid such Sophisticall arguments, yea and exhorted them to learne Logicke with all diligence, as being the art which iteweth them how to performe the same. Howbeit a man might come upon him by way of objection in this maner: Certes, Plato hath either proved or els not proved those points which he handled in his Politicks: but whether he did or no, there was no necessitie at all to write against him as you did; for it was altogether vaine, needlesse and superfluous. And even the same may be said of Sophisticall arguments and cavillations.

Chrysippus is of opinion, that yong scholars and students should first learne those arts which 50 concerne speech, as Grammar, Logicke and Rhetoricke; in the second place, morall sciences; in the third, naturall philosophie; and after all these, in the last place, to heare the doctrine as touching religion and the gods: which Being delivered by him in many passages of his writings, it shall be sufficient to alledge that onely which he hath written thus word for word in the third booke of his Lives. First and formost (quoth he) it seemeth unto mee, according to the doctrine of our ancients, that of Philosophicall speculations there be three kinds; Logically, as touching speech; Ethicall, concerning maners; and Physicall, belonging to the nature of things: of which, that which is respective unto speech ought to precede and be ranged first; secondly, condly, that which treateth of maners; thirdly, that which handleth naturall causes. Now of these Physicks and naturall arguments, the last is that which treateth of God: and this is the reason that the precepts and traditions of divine matters and of religion, they called THESES, as one would say, the very last and coming in the end. Howbeit, this treatise of the gods, which by his saying ought to be set last, himselfe in the very same booke, rangeth above maners, and setteth before all other morall questions. For neither seemeth he to speake of the ends, nor of justice, nor of good and evill things, nor of marriage, nor of the nouriture and education of children, ne yet of law nor of the government of the Common-wealth in any sort; but as they who propose and publish decrees unto cities and States, make some preamble before of good lucke or happie fortune; so he useth the preface of Jupiter, of Fatall destinie, of Divine providence: also, that there being but one world, the same doth consist and is maintained by one mightie power. Which points, no man doth firmly beleeve nor can be resolutely perswaded in, unless he wade deeply into the profoundest secrets and discourses of naturall Philosophie. But hearken I beseech you, a little, to that which he saith of these matters, in his third booke of the gods: It is not possible (quoth he) to finde out any other fountaine and original beginning of justice, than from Jupiter and common nature: for from hence it must needs be, that every such thing is derived, if that we meane to discourse of good things and evill. Again, in his Treatise of naturall positions, there is no other way, or at leastwise not a better, of proceeding to the discourse of good things and bad, nor of of vertues, nor of of foveraigne felicity, than from common nature, and the administration of the world. Moreover, as he goeth forward in another place, We are to annex and adjoine hereunto (quoth he) a treatise of good and evill things, considering there is not a better beginning thereof, nor yet a reference and relation more proper: neither is the speculation and science of nature in any other respect requisite or necessarie to be learned, but only for to know the difference of good and evill. And therefore according to Chrysippus, this naturall science both goeth before and also followeth after morall things; or to say a trueth at once in more expresse termes, it were a strange and difficult inversion of order, to holde, that it is to be placed after them, considering that without it it were impossible to comprehend any of the other: and a very manifest repugnance it were to affirme, that science naturall is the beginning of morall, which treateth of good and evill, and yet ordeine nevertheless, that it should be taught not before, but after it. Now if any man say unto me, that Chrysippus in his booke entituled, The use of speech, hath written, that he who first learneth Logicks, I meane the knowledge and philosophie concerning words, ought not altogether for to forbear the learning of other parts, but that he ought to take a taste of them, according as he hath meanes thereto, well may he speake a trueth, but withall, confirme he shall my accusation full of his fault: for he fighteth with himselfe, in ordering one while that a man should learne in the last place and after all, the science that treateth of God, as if that were the reason why it was called THESES, which is as much as THE LAST, that is to say, Finall; and another while teaching cleane contrarie, that the same is to be learned even with the very first, and at the beginning: for then farewell all order for ever, and welcome confusion, if we must learne all things huddled together at all times. But yet this is not the worst, for having set this downe for a resolution: That the doctrine as touching good things and evill, ought to begin and proceed from the knowledge of God; yet, he will not have them who settle themselves and enter into the studie of morall philosophie, to take their beginning there: but that in learning this, to catch somewhat of that by the way, even as much as they have easie meanes to come by; and afterwards to repasse from morall philosophy unto Theologie, without which (he saith) there can bee neither entrance nor progresse in the knowledge of maners.

Moreover (he saith) that, To dispute of one and the same question, pro & contra, to and fro, he disalloweth not simply and in generality: but his advise is, to use the same so warily and with such discretion, as otherwhiles orators doe in pleading, when they alledge the reasons of their adversaries, not to uphold and maintaine the same, but onely for to refute and disprove that so likelihood and probabilitie which they pretend: For otherwise (quoth he) thus to doe, is the manner of those Skepticks, who be alwaies doubtfull, and withhold their consent in every thing: a meere shift that serveth their turne, for whatsoever they hold: but as for those who would worke and establish in mens hearts, a certaine science, according to which they might undoubtedly guide and conduct themselves, they ought to sound and search the contrary, and from point to point by stepmeale, to direct their novices newly entred, even from the beginning to the very end: wherein there falleth out otherwhiles fit opportunity to make mention of of contrary sentences and opinions, for to refute and resolve that which might seeme to have apparence of trueth; as the manner is in pleading before judges: for these be the very words and proper termes that he useth. Now what an absurd and impertinent a thing it is, that philosophers should thinke they were to put downe the contrary opinions of other philosophers, and not withall, their reasons and arguments, but onely as advocates pleading at the barre to disable and weaken their proofes, and so to weary their adversaries; as if disputation were onely to win the honour of victory, and not to finde out a trueth: we have elsewhere discoursed against him sufficiently. But that himselfe not heere and there in his disputations, but oftentimes and in many places hath confirmed with might and maine, yea, and with too great asseveration and contention, contrary resolutions, unto his owne opinions, that it were a right hard matter for any man to discern, which of them he approoveth most, they themselves in some sort doe say, who admire the subtilty of the man, and the vivacity of his spirit, who also both thinke and sticke not to affirme, that Carmenes spake nothing of his owne invention, but by the helpe and meanes of which arguments Chrysippus used to proove his owne assertions, hee returned the same contrariwise upon himselfe to confute his precepts, inasmuch as estoones in disputation he would, alluding to a verse in Homer, cry our aloud in this manner:

Unhappy man, thus for to doe,

as if he lay open and ministred great advantages and meanes against himselfe, to those who went about for to infringe and calumniate his opinions. But as touching those treatises and discourses which he hath put forth and set out against ordinary custome, his followers do so gloriously boast and joy, that they give out, if all the books of the Academies that ever lived, were laid together, they deserved not to be compared with that which Chrysippus wrote in calumniation of the senses: an evident signe either of their ignorance who say so, or els of their owne blinde selfe-love. Howbeit, certene it is, that afterwards being desirous to defend custome and the senses, he was found much inferior to himselfe, and the latter treatise came farre short of the former, and was nothing at all so pithy; in such sort as he is contradictorie and repugnant to himselfe: whiles he alwaies prescribeth and willet to conferre and oppose contrary sentences, not as one patronizing any, but making an ostentation that they be false: and afterwards sheweth himselfe to be a more vehement accuser, than a defender of his owne proper sentences; and counselling others to take heed of repugnant and contrary disputations, as those which distract and impeach their perception, himselfe is more studious and diligent to addresse such proofes as overthrow perception, than those which are to establish and confirme the same: and yet that he feared no lesse, hee declareth plainly in the fourth booke of his lives, where he writeth thus: We are not rashly nor without good respect and adviement to admit and allow repugnant disputations and contrary opinions to be proposed, nor to answer those probable arguments which are brought against true sentences: but heerein we must warily goe to worke, and cary our selves so, as fearing alwaies lest the hearers being thereby distracted and diverted, let goe this apprehension and conception, and be not of sufficient capacity to comprehend their solutions, but after such a feeble sort, as that their comprehensions be ready to falter and shake, considering that even they who customably comprehend sensible objects and other things which depend of senses, quickly forgo the same, being distracted as well by Megarian interrogatories, as by others more forcible, and in greater number. Now would I gladly demand of these Stoicks whether they thinke these Megarian interrogatories more pugnant than those which Chrysippus hath written in fixe bookes; or rather Chrysippus himselfe would be asked the question. For marke I pray you, what he hath written of the Megarian disputation in his booke entituled; The use of speech, after this manner: Such a thing as befell in the disputation betweene Stilpo and Menedemus, both renowned personages for their learning and wisdom; and yet the whole manner of their arguing is now turned to their reproch and plain mockery, as if their arguments were either very grosse, or else too captious & lophistical: and yet good fir these arguments which it pleaseth you to scorne and reame the reproach of those who make such interrogatories, as containing in them notorious leawdnesse, you feare lest they should divert any from perception: And even your owne selfe writting so many bookes as you doe against custome whereunto you have adjoined whatsoever you could devise and invent, labouring to surmount and surpass Arcesilaeus; did you never expect and looke to scare and terrifie any of the readers that should light upon them? For Chrysippus verily useth not onely slender and naked arguments in disputing against custome, but as if he were an advocate pleading at the barre, mooveth affections being passionate and affectionate himselfe, breaking out into teares into these tearmes of giving the foole, and imputing vanity and sottishnesse; and to the end that he might leave no place for contradiction at all, but that he delivereth repugnances and speaketh contraries, thus hath he written in his Positions naturall. A man may very well, when he hath once perfectly comprised a thing, argue a little on the contrary side, and apply that defence which the matter it selfe doth afford: yea and otherwhiles, when he doth comprehend neither the one nor the other, discourse of either of them pro & contra, as much as the cause will yeeld. Also in that treatise of his concerning the use of speech, after he had said, we ought not to use the power and faculty of disputation, no more than armes or weapons, in things that tend to no purpose, and when the case requireth it not, he addeth soon after these words: For we ought to imploy the gift of reason and speech to the finding out of truth, and such things as resemble it: and not contrariwise; howsoever many there be that are wont so to doe. And peradventer by these Many, he meaneth those Academicks, who ever doubt and give no assent to any thing: and they verily, for that they comprehend neither the one nor the other, doe argue on both parts to and fro, that it is perceptible: as if by this onely or especiall meanes the truth yeelded a certaine comprehension of it selfe, if there were nothing in the world comprehensible. But you who accuse and blame them, writing the contrary to that which you conceive as touching custome, and exhorting others to doe the same, and that with an affectionate defence, doe plainly confesse, that you use the force of speech and eloquence, in things not onely unprofitable, but also hurtfull, upon a vaine ambitious humor of shewing your ready wit, like to some young scholar.

These Stoicks affirme, that a good deed, is the commandment of the law, and sin the prohibition of the law: and therefore it is that the law forbiddeth fooles and leawd folke to do many things, but prescribeth them nothing; for that indeed they are not able to doe ought well. And who seeth not that impossible it is for him who can doe no vertuous act, to keepe himselfe from sin and transgression? Therefore they make the law repugnant to it selfe, if it command that which to performe is impossible, and forbid that which men are not able to avoid. For he that is not able to live honestly, cannot chuse but beare himselfe dishonestly; and whosoever he be, that cannot be wife, must of necessity become a foole: and even them selves doe holde that those lawes which are prohibitive, say the same thing, when they forbid one, and command like to wife another. For that which faith thou shalt not steale, faith verily the same, to wit, Steale not, but it forbiddeth withall to steale; and therefore the law forbiddeth fooles and leawd persons nothing, for otherwise it should command them somewhat. And thus they say that the Physician biddeth his apprentise or Chyrurgian to cut or to cauterize, without adding thereto these words, handsomly, moderately, and in good time. The Musician likewise commandeth his scholar to sing or play upon the harpe a lesson, without putting thereto, in tune, accord and good measure. Howbeit they punish and chastice those that doe amisse and contrary to the rules of art, for that they were willed and enjoined to doe the thing well, but they did it ill. And even so a wife man commanding his servant to say or doe a thing, if he punish him for doing it unworwardly, out of season, and not as he ought, certene it is that he commanded him to performe a good duty, and not a meane and indifferent action. Now if wife men command fooles and lewd persons to doe things indifferent, what should hinder them but that the commandments of the lawes may be fsemblable?

Moreover, that instinct or naturall motion which is called appetitus, according to him, is nothing els but the reason of man, inciting him to do a thing, as himself hath written in his treatise of the law, ergo, that diversion, contrariwise called aversus, can be nothing els but reason withdrawing a man from the doing of a thing: and therefore that inclination is a reasonable inclination: and this wary caution, is as much as the reason of a wife man, forbidding him to doe a thing: for to beware, and to take heed, is the part and property of wife men and not of fooles. If then the reason of a wife man be one thing, and the law another, wife men have this wary caution repugnant unto the law: but in case law, and the reason of a wife man be both one, it will be found that the law forbiddeth wife men to doe those things, which they doubt and be afraid of. To foolish and wicked persons (quoth Chrysippus) there is nothing profitable, neither hath such an one, use or need of ought. Having delivered this sentence in his first booke of perfect duties or offices, he commeth afterwards and faith, that utility or commodiousnesse and grace pertaine and reach unto meane and indifferent things, whereof according to the Stoicks doctrine there is not one profitable: and more than that, he faith there is nothing proper, nothing meet and convenient for for a foolish leawd man: and so by consequence it followeth upon these words; there is nothing stranger, nothing unfitness for a wife and honest man, like as nothing fit and familiar for a leawd foole: for as goodnesse is proper to the one, so is leawdnesse to the other. How cometh it then to passe that he maketh our heads to ake againe, with telling us so often in all his bookes as well of naturall philosophy as morall, that presently from our nativity and birth, we be affectionate to our selves, to our proper members, and to the issue descending from us? And in the first booke of Justice he faith, that even wilde beasts are propense and affected unto their young according as their need and necessity requires, all save fishes: for their young fry are nourished by themselves. But there is no sense; where is no sensible object, nor appropriation, where nothing is proper and familiar: for surely this appropriation seemeth to be the sense and perception of that which is familiar. And this opinion is conformable to their principles.

Moreover, Chrysippus, albeit in divers places he write many things contrarily, yet he accordeth to this sentence manifestly, that there is no one vice greater, nor sinne more grievous than another; as also reciprocally, there is not one vertue more excellent, nor one vertuous deed (which they call perfect ductie) better than another, considering that he hath this in the first booke of Nature: that like as it becometh Jupiter well, to magnifie and glorifie himselfe and his life, as also if we may so say, to beare his head aloft, highly to esteeme his owne greatnesse, and to speake big, considering he leadeth a life woorthy of grandeloquence and haucie speech: even so it becometh and becometh all honest men to do the like, considering that in no respect they be inferior to Jupiter. And yet himselfe againe in the third booke of Justice faith, that those who affirme Pleasure to be the end and soveraigne good of man, overthrow Justice; but whosoever say it is simply good, do not destroy Justice. And the very words which he useth, be these: Peradventure (quoth he) it may be, that if we leave unto Pleasure this attribute, To be simply and onely good, although it be not the end of all good things, and that honesty and vertue is of the kinde of those things which be eligible for themselves: haply, by this meanes we may save Justice, in esteeming Honesty and Justice to be a more perfect and absolute good thing than is Pleasure: but in case it be so, that the thing onely which is honesty is good, he erreth much who affirmeth that pleasure is good; howbeit, lesse than he who should say that it is the end of all goodthings; for that as the one doth abolish and destroy utterly all Justice, the other doth so preserve and mainteine it: for according to the latter of the twaine, all humane societie perisheth, whereas the former reserveth yet some place for bountie and civill humanitie. I let passe to relate what he faith in the booke entituled, Of Jupiter, namely, that vertues grow, that they also passe; because I would not be thought to lie at vantage, and to catch at words; howsoever Chrysippus himselfe in this kind of reprehension dealeth bitterly with Plato and other Philosophers, for taking holde of words: but whereas he forbiddeth to praise all that is done vertuously, he giveth us to understand, that there is some difference in duties and offices. Now this is the verie text in his treatise of Jupiter. For albeit vertuous acts be commendable, yet we are not to infer thereupon and say, that we ought to commend all that seemeth to proceed from vertue, as namely, to praise for a valiant act, the stifte stretching out of the finger; or for temperance and continencie, the abstinence from an old trot, who hath one foot already in her grave; or for prudence, to understand aright and without error, that three will not make foure: for he that went in hand to praise and commend a man for such things as these, should shew himselfe to be very bold and absurd even in the highest degree. And as much as this in a manner writeth he in the third booke of the gods: For I thinke verily (quoth he) that the praises of such matters be impertinent and absurd, although they seeme to depend of vertue, as namely, to forbear an old trot now at the pits brincke, or to abide a flie-biting. What other accuser should hee look for then of his opinions, but himselfe: for if it be so, that hee is absurd who commendeth these things, then must he be thought much more absurd, who supposeth each one of these vertuous deeds to be not onely great, but also most magnificent. For if it be a valiant act to endure the biting of a flie; and likewise the part of a chaste and continent person, to abstaine from carnall dealing with an olde woman ready to drop into her grave; then it makes no matter, but it is all one, to praise an honest man at well for one thing as another. Moreover, in his second booke of Friendship, whenas he giveth a precept, that we ought not to dissolve amities for every fault or defect, he useth these very tearmes: For there be faults (quoth he) which we must overpasse quite, and make no stay at them; others there be againe, whereat we should a little stand, and take offence; and others besides, which require more chastisement; but some there are, which we must thinke sufficient to breake friendship for ever. And more than all this, in the same booke booke he saith, that we ought to conuerse and be acquainted with some more, and with others lesse, according as they be our friends more or lesse: which difference and diuersitie extendeth very far, inasmuch as some are worthy of such an amitie, others of a greater; some deserve thus much trust and confidence, others more than it: and so it is in other matters semblable. And what other is his drift in all these places, but to put a great difference betweene those things, for which friendships are engendered? And yet in his booke of Honestie, to shew that there is nothing good but that which is honest, he delivereth these words: A good thing is eligible and to be desired: that which is eligible and desirable, is also acceptable: that which is acceptable, is likewise commendable: and that which is commendable, is honest withall. Again, a good thing is ioyous and acceptable: ioyous is venerable, and venerable is honest. But these speeches are repugnant to himselfe: for be it, that all that is good were laudable (and then chastly to forbear for to touch an olde riveled woman, were a commendable thing) or say that every good thing were neither venerable nor ioyous and acceptable; yet his reason falleth to the ground: for how can it be that others should be thought frivolous and absurd in praising any for such things, and himselfe not worthy to be mocked and laughed at, for taking joy and pleasing himselfe in such ridiculous toies as these?

Thus you see how he sheweth himselfe in most part of his writings; and yet in his disputations which he holdeth against others, he is much more carelesse to be contrary and repugnant to himselfe: for in his treatise which he made as touching exhortation, reproving Plato for saying, that it was not expedient for him to live at all, who is not taught, nor knoweth not how to live, he writeth in these very termes: This speech of his (quoth he) is both contradictory & repugnant to it selfe, and besides, hath no force nor efficacy at all to exhort: for first and foremost in shewing us that it were expedient for us, not to live at all, and giving us at it were counsell to die, he exhorteth us to any thing rather than to the practise or studie of philosophie, because it is not possible for a man to philosophize, unless he live: nether can he become wise, survive he never so long, if he lead an evil and ignorant life. And a little after hee saith farther: That it is as meet and convenient also even for leaue and wicked persons to remaine alive. But I care not much to set downe his very words: First of all, like as vertue barely in it selfe considered, hath nothing in it, for which we should desire to live: even so vice hath as little, for which we ought to leave this life. What need we now turne over other books of Chrysippus: and drip lease by lease, to proove how contrary and repugnant he is to himselfe: fore in these which now we cite and alledge, he commeth out otherwhiles with this saying of Antisthenes, for which he commendeth him, namely, that a man is to be provided either of wit to understand, or else of a with to under-hang himselfe: as also this other verse of Tyrtam:

*The bounds of vertue first come nie,
Or else make choise before to die.*

And what other meaning is there of these words but this, that it is more expedient for foolish and lewd persons to be out of the world, than to live: and in one passage, seeming to correct Theognis: He should not (quoth he) have said καὶ μὴ τιμῆς ἐλπίσιν &c.

*A man from poverty to flee,
(O Cynus) ought himselfe so fast Headlong from rocks most steepe and hie,
Or into sea as deepe and vast.*

But rather thus, καὶ ἀπὸ πτωχείας ἐλπίσιν &c.

A man from sinne and vice to flee &c.

What other things else seemeth he to doe, than to condemne and scrape out of other mens writings, the same things, propositions and sentences, which himselfe hath inserted in his own books? For he reprooveth Plato when he prooveth and sheweth, that it is better not to live at all, than to lead a life in wickednesse or ignorance: and in one breath hee giveth counsell to Theognis to set downe in his poeie; That a man ought to fling himselfe downe headlong into the deepe sea, or to brake his necke from some high rocke for to avoid sinne and wickednesse. And praising as hee did Antisthenes for sending fooles and witlesse folke, to an halter wherewith to hang themselves; he blamed him nevertheless who said, that vice was not a sufficient cause, wherefore we should shorten our lives. Moreover, in those books against Plato himselfe, concerning justice, he leapech directly at the very first into a discourse as touching the gods, and saith: That Cephalus did not divert men well from evill dooing, by the feare of the gods: affirming moreover, that the discourse which he made as touching divine vengeance, might might easily be infringed and refuted, for that of it selfe it ministrerh many arguments and probable reasons on the contrary side; as if the same rembeled for all the world the fabulous tales of Aescor and Alphio, wherewith women are wont to scare their little children, and to keepe them from doing shrewd turnes. Thus deriding, traducing, and backbiting Plato, hee praileth elsewhere, and in many places else alledgeth these verses out of Enripides:

*Well, well, though some this doctrine doe deride,
Be sure, in heaven with other gods beside,
Sits Jupiter, the deeds of men who see,
And will in time revenged surely bee.*

10 Semblably, in the first booke of Justice, when he had alledged these verses heere out of Hesiodus,

*Then Saturnes sonne, god Jupiter, great plagues from heaven did send,
Even dearth and death, both which, of all the people made an end.*

he saith, that the gods proceed in this wise, to the end that when the wicked be thus punished, others also advertised and taught by their example, might beware how they commit the like, or at leastwise sinne lesse.

What should I say moreover, how in this treatise of Justice, having affirmed, that those who hold pleasure to be good, but not the soveraigne end of good, may in some sort withall preserve & maintaine justice, for, so much he hath put downe in these very termes: For haply, admitting pleasure to be good although not the supreme good or the end: and honestly to be of the kind of those things, which are eligible and to be desired for their owne sake, wee may by that meanes save justice, while we permit and allow that which is honest and just to be a greater good than pleasure. Having (I say) delivered the same also in his books of pleasure: yet in his treatise against Plato, reprooving him for raunging health in the number of good things, he affirmeth, that not onely justice, but also magnanimity, temperance, and all other vertues are abolished and perish, in case we hold that either pleasure, or health, or any other thing whatsoever, can be numbered and reputed among good things, unless the same be honest. Now as touching the 30 apologic or answer that may be made in defence of Plato, I have elsewhere written against Chrysippus: but even in this very place there is manifestly to be seene a repugnancy and contradiction against himselfe: considering that one while hee saith, that justice may stand well enough, if a man suppose pleasure joined with honesty to be good; and another while contrariwise, he findeth fault with all those, who repute any thing else to be good, but onely that which is honest; as if thereby they abolished and overthrow all vertues. And because he would leave no meanes at all to save and save his contradictions, writing of justice against Aristotle, he challengeth him for untrueth, in that hee affirmeth, that if pleasure were granted to be the soveraigne good, both Justice were overthrowen, and therewith also every vertue besides: For this is certaine (quoth he) that those who are of this opinion, doe indeede abolish Justice;

40 howbeit I see no let why other vertues may not stand, if not those which be of them selves expetible, yet such at leastwise as be good and vertuous really. And thereupon he proceedeth presently to name them every one severally. But it were not a misse to recite his ownel words as he delivered them: For suppose (quoth he) that by this discourse and reason, Pleasure seeme the very end of all good things, yet we are not to inferre hereupon, that all is comprised under it: and therefore we must say, that neither any vertue is to be desired, nor vice to be elchued for it selfe, but all these things are to be referred unto a scope and make proposed: and yet in the meane time what should hinder, but that fortitude, prudence, continence, patience, and other such vertues, may be good and expetible, like as their contraries bad and to be avoided. What man therefore was there ever in his speeches and disputations more rash and audacious than he? 50 considering that he charged the two princes of Philosophers with imputations: the one for abolishing all vertue, in that he confessed not that onely to be good which is honest: and the other, in that if pleasure were supposed and set downe to be the end of good things, he thought not that all vertues except onely justice might subsist and be maintained: what a woondertull liberty, and monstrous licentiousnesse rather is this, in discoursing of one and the same subject matter, to tax and reprove that in Aristotle, which he setteth downe himselfe: and afterwards in accusing Plato, to subvert and undo the very same? And yet in his demonstrations, as touching Justice, he affirmeth expressly that every perfect duty, is a lawfull deed and a just action,

Now,

Now, whatsoever is performed by continence, by patience, by prudence, or by fortitude is a perfect duty, ergo, it followeth, that it is likewise a lawfull action. How chanceth it then that he leaveth not justice for them, in whom he admitteth prudence, continence, and valour, considering that all the acts which they perform according to these virtues, be perfect duties, and by consequence just and lawfull operations?

Whereas Plato, in a certaine place hath written, that injustice being a certaine intestine sedition and corruption of the soule, never casteth off and loseth her power even in those who have it within them: for the cause a wicked man to fight with himselfe, she troubleth, vexeth, and tormenteth him. Chrysippus reproving this assertion of his, saith, that it was falsely and absurdly spoken, that any one could doe wrong or injurie to himselfe: For (quoth he) all injurie and outrage must needs be to another: but afterwards forgetting himselfe and what he had said, in that treatise of his intituled, The demonstrations of justice, he affirmeth, that whosoever doth injustice, wrongeth himselfe, and in offering injurie to another, doth himselfe wrong, in that he is the very cause why himselfe transgresseth the lawes: wherein unworthily he hurteth and woundeth his owne person. Lo what he said against Plato, discouraging that injustice could not be against a mans selfe, but against another: For to be particularly and privately unjust, there must be taken as if it were amongst many that are in such fort injuriously affected one to another: whereas no such matter can properly and fully agree to one alone, but in as much as he is disposed and affected to another. But contrary to all this, in his demonstrations he argueth and reasoneth thus, to prove that the unjust man doth wrong and injurie to himselfe: The law (quoth he) followeth expressly, to be the author or cause of transgression; but to commit injustice is a transgression: he therefore who causeth himselfe to doe injurie, transgresseth the law of himselfe. Now he that trespasseth against any one, doth him wrong and injurie: he therefore who wrongeth any other whomsoever, doth injurie to himselfe. Again, sinne is of the kinde of hums and damages that are done; but every man that sinneth, offendeth and sinneth against himselfe: and therefore, whosoever sinneth, hurteth also and endamageth himselfe unworthily; and if he doe so, then by consequence he must needs wrong himselfe. Furthermore, thus also hee reasoneth: Hee that suffereth hurt and damage by another, woundeth and offendeth himselfe withall unworthily: and what is that else but to doe wrong and injurie? he therefore that receiveth injurie of any other whatsoever, wrongeth his owne selfe. That the doctrine of good things and evill (which himselfe bringeth in and approoveth) he saith, is most accordant unto mans life, yea and connexed as much as any thing else with those prenotions and anticipations which by nature are inbred and ingenerate in us: for, so much hath he delivered in his third booke of Exhortations: but in the first booke he affirmeth quite contrary, that this doctrine doth divert and withdraw a man from all things else, as if they were of no moment nor helpfull and effectfull any jot to the attaining of happinesse & soveraign felicity. See how he accordeth herein with himselfe, when he affirmeth that doctrine of his which plucketh us away from life, from health, from indolence and integrity of senses; and teacheth besides that, whatsoever we crave in our praies at gods hands, concerne us not at all nor appertaine unto us, to be most accordant unto humane life, and the common prenotions & inbred anticipations of knowledge above said. But to the end that no man might denie that he is repugnant and contrary to himselfe, loe what he saith in his third booke of justice. This is it (quoth he) that by reason of the surpassing grandure & beawty of our sentences, those matters which we deliver, seeme feined tales and devised fables exceeding mans power and farre beyond humane nature. How can it be that any man should more plainly confesse, that he is at war with himselfe, than he doth who saith that his propositions and opinions, are so extravagant and transcendent, that they resemble counterfeited tales, and for their excellency surmount the condition and nature of man: and yet forsooth for all this, that they accord and agree passing well with humane life, yea and come neereft unto the said inbred prenotions and anticipations that are in us.

Hee affirmeth that the very essence and substance of infelicitie, is vice; writing and firmly maintaining in all his books of morall and naturall philosophy, that to live in vice, is as much as to live in misery and wretchednesse: but in the third booke of Nature, having said before that it were better and more expedient to live a senselesse foole, yea though there were no hope that ever he should become wise, than not to live at all, he addeth afterwards thus much: For there be such good things in men, that in some sort the very evill things goe before, and are better than the indifferent in the middes betweene. As for this, how he hath written elsewhere, that there is nothing nothing expedient and profitable in fooles, and yet in this place setteth downe in plaine termes, that it is expedient to live foolish and senselesse, I am content to overpasse; but seeing hee saith now that evill things goe before, and one better than the indifferent or meane (which with them of his sect are neither good nor ill) surely it is as much as if hee affirmed that evill things are better than things not evill: and all are, as to say that to be wretched is more expedient than not to be wretched: and so by that meanes, he is of opinion, that not to be miserable is more unprofitable than to be miserable; and if it be more unprofitable, than also it must be more hurtfull and dammageable. But being desirous in some sort to mollifie this absurditie, and to save this fore, he subnexeth as touching evill things, these words: My meaning is not (quoth he) that they should go before and be preferred, but reason is the thing wherewith it is better to live, although a man should ever be a foole, than not to live at all. First and formost then, hee calleth vice an evill thing, as also whatsoever doth participate of vice and nothing els: now is vice reasonable, or rather to speake more properly, reason delinquent: so that to live with reason, if we be fooles and void of wisdom, what is it els, but to live with vice? now to live as fooles, is all one as to live wretched. Wherein is it then, and how commeth it about, that this should go before meane and indifferent things? for it was not admitted that happie life should go before miserie: neither was it ever any part (say they) of Chrysippus his meaning to range and count among good things, To remaine alive; no more than among bad, To depart this life: but he thought that these things were of themselves indifferent and of a middle nature; in which regard otherwhiles it is meet for happy men to leave this life, and for wretches to continue alive. And what greater contrariety can there be, as touching things eligible or refusable, than to say that for them who are happy in the highest degree, it is fit and becoming to forgoe and forsake the good things that be present, for want of some one thing that is indifferent? And yet Chrysippus is of this minde, that no indifferent thing is of the owne nature to be desired or rejected; but that we ought to chuse that onely which is good, and to shun that alone which is bad: so as according to their opinion, it comes to passe, that they never divert their designments or actions to the pursuit after things desirable, nor the avoidance of things refusable; but another marke it is that they shoot & aime at, namely, at those things which they neither eschue nor chuse, & according thereto, they live & die. Chrysippus avoweth & confesseth that there is as great a difference betweene good things & bad, as possibly may be; as needs there must, in case it be true, that as the one sort of them cause those in whom they are, to be exceeding happy, so the other, extreme wretched & miserable. Now in the first booke of the end of good things, he saith that all well good things as bad, be sensible; for these be his very words: That good and evill things be perceptible by sense, we must of necessity acknowledge upon these arguments: for not onely the very passions indeed of the minde, together with their parts and severall kinds, to wit, sadness, feare and such like, be sensible; but also a man may have a sense of theft, adultery, and semblable finnes; yea and of follie, of cowardice, and in one word, of all other vices, which are in number not a few: and not onely joy, beneficence, and other dependances of virtuous offices, but also prudence, valour and the rest of the virtues, are object to the sense. But to let passe all other absurdities contained in these words, who will not confesse, but that there is a meere contradiction in that which they delivered, as touching one that becomes a wife man, and knowes not thereof? for, considering that the present good is sensible, and much different from that which is evill, that one possibly should of a wicked person prove to be virtuous, and not know thereof, & not have sense of vertue being present, but to thinke that vice is still within him; how can this otherwise be, but most absurd? for either no man can be ignorant and out of doubt, whether he hath all vertues together; or els he must confesse, that there is small difference and the same hard to be discerned, betweene vice and vertue, felicity and infelicity, a right honest life and a most dishonest, in case a man should passe from the one to the other, and possesse one for the other, without ever knowing it.

One worke he wrote, intituled, Of lives, and the same divided into foure books: in the fourth whereof, he saith, That a wise man medleth not with great affaires, but is occupied in his owne businesse onely, without being curious to looke into other mens occasions: his very words to this purpose, be these: For mine owne part, of this opinion I am, that a prudent man gladly avoideth a stirring life, intermedleth little, and in his owne matters onely: for to deale simply in a mans owne affaires, and to enter into little businesse in the world, be both alike commendable parts, and the properties of civil and laudable persons. And in maner the same speeches or ver-

ry like thereto, he hath delivered in the third booke of such things as be expetible and to be chosen for themselves, in these termes: For in truth (quoth he) it seemeth, that the quiet life should be without danger, and in perfect security, which few or none of the vulgar sort are able to comprehend and understand. Wherein first and formost, it is evident, that he commeth very neere to the error of Epicurus, who in the government of the world disavoweth divine providence: for that he would have God to rest in repose, idle, and not employed in any thing. And yet Chrysippus himselfe, in his first booke of Lives saith: That a wise man willingly will take a kingdom upon him, yea, and thinke to make his gaine and profit thereby: and if he be not able to reigne himselfe, yet he will at leastwise converse and live with a king, yea, goe forth with him to warre, like as Hydantyrus the Scythian did, and Leucan of Pontus. But I will set downe his own words, that we may see whether, like as of the treble and base strings, there ariseth a consonance of an eight; so there be an accord in the life of a man, who hath chosen to live quietly without doing ought, or at leastwise to intermeddle in few affaires, yea, and yet afterwards accompanieth the Scythians riding on horsebacke, and manageth the affaires of the kings of Bosphorus upon any occasion of need that may be presented? For as touching this point (quoth he) that a wise man will go into warlike expeditions with princes, live, and converse with them, we will consider againe thereof hereafter; being as it is, a thing that as some upon the like arguments imagine not, so we for the semblable reasons admit and allow. And a little after: Not onely with those who have proceeded well in the knowledge of vertue, and beene sufficiently instructed and trained up in good maners, as were Hydantyrus and Leucan above said. Some there be who blame Calisthenes for that he passed over the seas to king Alexander into his campe, in hope to reedifie the city Olynthus, as Aristotle caused the city Stagyræ to be repaired, who highly commend Ephorus, Xenocrates and Menedemus, who rejected Alexander: But Chrysippus driveth his wife man by the head forward, for his gaine and profit, as farre as to the city Panticapæum, and the deserts of Scythia. And that this is (I say) for his gaine & profit he shewed before, by setting downe three principall meanes, becoming a wise man for to practise and seeke his gaine by: the first by a kingdom, and the beneficence of kings; the second by his friends; and the third besides these, by teaching literature: and yet in many places he wearieth us with citing this verse of Euripides:

For what need mortall men take paine?
Onely for things in number twaine.

But in his bookes of Nature he saith: That a wise man if he have lost the greatest riches that may be, esteemeth the losse no more than if it were but a single denier of silver, or one grey goat. Howbeit, him whom he hath there so highly extolled and puffed up with glory, heere lieeth downe and abaseth as much, even to make him a meere mercenary pedante, and one that is faine to teach a schoole: for he would have him to demand and exact his salary sometime before hand of his scholar, when he enters into his schooles; and otherwhile after a certaine prefixed tyme of his schooling is come and gone: And this (quoth hee) is the honestest and more civill way of the twaine; but the other is the surer, namely, to make him pay his money aforehand; for that delay and giving attendance is subject to receive wrong and suiteine losse: and thus much he uttereth in these very termes: Those teachers that be of the wiser sort, call for their schoollage and intervals of their scholars, not all after one maner, but diversly: a number of them, according as the present occasion requireth, who promise not to make them wife men, and that within a yeere; but undertake to doe what lies in them, within a set time agreed upon betweene them. And soone after, speaking of his wife man: He will (quoth he) know the best time, when to demand his pension, to wit, whether incontinently upon the entrance of his scholar, as the most part do; or to give day, and set downe a certaine time; which maner of dealing is more subject to receive injury, howsoever it may seeme more honest and civill. And how can a wife man, tell me now, be a despiser of money, in case hee make a contract and bargain at a price to receive money, for delivering vertue; or if he doe not deliver it, yet require his salary nevertheless, as if he had performed his part fully? Either how can he be greater than to suiteine a losse and damage, if it be so that he stand so strictly upon this point, and be so warie, that he receive no wrong by the payment of his wages? For surely no man is said to bee injured, who is not hurt nor endamaged: and therefore how ever otherwise he hath flatly denied, that a wife man could receive warning; yet in this booke he saith, that this maner of dealing, is expolled to losse and damage.

In

In his booke of Common-wealth, he affirmeth, that his citizens will never doe any thing for pleasure, nor nor adresse and prepare themselves therefore, praising highly Euripides for these verses:

What need men, but for two things, onely swinke?
Bread for to eat, and water shere to drinke.

And soone after, he proceedeth forward, and praiseth Diogenes, for abusing himselfe, by forcing his nature to passe from him in the open street, and saying withall to those that stood by: Oh, that I could chafe hunger as well from my belly. What reason then is there, in the selfsame bookes to commend him for rejecting pleasure, and withall for desisting his owne body as hee did, so beauly in the sight of the whole world, and that for a little filthy pleasure? In his bookes of Nature, having written that nature had produced and brought forth many living creatures for beauty onely, as delighting and taking pleasure in such lovely varietie, and therewith having adjoined moreover a most strange and absurd speech, namely, that the peacocke was made for his tailes sake, and in regard of the beauty thereof: cleane contrary to himselfe, in his bookes of Common-wealth, he reprooveth very sharply those who keepe peacocks and nightingals, as if he would make lawes quite contrary to that soveraigne law-giver of the world, deriding nature for taking delight, and employing as it were her study in bringing forth such creatures; unto which a wife man wil give no place in his city and common-wealth. For how can it otherwise be but monstrous and absurd for to finde fault with those who nourish such creatures, as if it were wantonneesse for to doe, in case he praise the divine providence for creating them? In his first booke of Nature, after he had shewed that wallice or punaifes serve in good stead to awaken us out of sleepe, as also that mice advertise us to beware and take heed where we lay up and bestow every thing; and that it is probable that nature taketh pleasure in producing faire creatures, and joeth in diversitie, he commeth out with this sentence word for word: This appeereth most evidently in the peacocks taile: for heere he signifieth that this bird was made for the tailes sake, and not contrariwise; and so when the cocke was once created, the hen followed after.

In his booke of common-wealth when he had said, that we are come almost to the painting of dung-hills, a little after: There be some (quoth he) who adorne & embelish their corn-fields, with vines climbing and growing upon trees, ranged directly in order, as also with myrtle rowes; who nourish also peacocks and doves, yea and partridges, for to heare them call and record unto them, as also nightingales for their pleasant song. But I would gladly know of him, what hee thinketh, and what his conceit is of bees and of hony; for it would by good consequence follow, that he who had said, that punaifes and wallice were profitably created; should also inferre that bees were made for no profit. Now if he allowed these a place in his Common-wealth, how is it that he forbiddeth his citizens to enterteine those things which delight the eare. To be briefe, like as he were very absurd who should find fault with those guests at a feast, who fell to eat comfits, and sweet banquetting conceits, to drinke wine also, and to feed of delicate viands; and in the meane while commend the man who invited them to such dainties, and provided the same for them: even so, he who praising the divine providence for creating delicate fishes, deinty birds, sweet hony, and pleasant wine, should reproove those who reject not these gifts, nor be content to eat bare bread, and drinke sheere water, things that be ever at hand, and which are sufficient for our food, were as farre out of reason, and makes no reckoning at all how he doth contradict himselfe, and what contrary opinions he holdeth.

Moreover, having in his treatise of Exhortations said, that it was no reason, that folke should be defamed or blamed, for having to doe carnally with their owne mothers, daughters, or sisters; for eating any kinde of meats whatsoever, for going directly out of the bed from a woman, or from a dead body and mortuarie, unto a temple or sacrifice: And heerein (quoth he) we ought to have a regard and eie unto brute beasts, and taking example by them, to collect and conclude, that in all this, there is no absurdity at all, nor any thing against nature; for fifty and to the purpose very well a man may alledge this, and compare the usage of other creatures, to shew that they neither being coupled together nor engendering, nor nor dying in temples, do pollute and defile the divinitie. Contrary to all this, in the first booke of nature he saith: That the poet Hesiodus did very well to admonish and forbid us, not to pisse into fountaines, nor running rivers; yea, and much rather to forbear to make water against an altar, or any image and statue of the gods: neither mattereth, or skilleth it all, if dogs, asses, and yong children, doe so, seeing they have no discretion nor consideration in such things: and therefore it is very absurd to say in one place: That it is meet to consider the savage example of wilde beasts, and in another, as absurd to alledge the same.

Some philosophers there be, who imagine a certaine accessary motion from without in the principall part of our soule; for that a man seemeth to give the head and liberty unto divers inclinations, when he is forced to a thing by outward causes: which motion appeareth principally in doubtfull and variable things; for when of two objects equall in power, and every way feimble, we are of necessity to chuse one, and there is no cause at all to incline us more to the one than to the other, this foresaid accessary and adventitious puissance, comming in otherwise, and seazing upon the inclination of the soule, decideth all the doubt. Against these philosophers, Chrysippus disputing, as if they did violence to nature by the contrary, and by devising an effect without a cause; among sundry other examples, alledgeth the cockall bone, the balance, and many such like things which cannot fall, incline and bend now on one side, and then on another, without some cause & difference which is entirely in them, or else commeth from without forth: for this is generally held; that whatsoever is without cause can have no subsistence, no more than meere hazard and chance: but in these adventitions and accessary motions which they suppose, there be certaine hidden irreptitious causes, which secretly move and induce our appetite and inclination, even without our knowledge to one part or other: and this is that which he often repeateth in the most notable works that he hath put forth; but that which himselfe afterward delivereth cleane contrary, because it is not expoled to openly to the view of the whole world, I will alledge verbatim as he hath delivered it: For in his treatise concerning the office of a Judge, supposing for example sake, that two carriers who ranne a course, were come both together unto the goale, he demandeth what the Judge should doe in this case; namely, whether it were lawfull for him, to give unto whether of them he pleased, the victorious branch of the date tree? this being supposed withall, that they were both lo inward & familiar with him, that he should rather gratifie them both, even out of his owne in some sort, than seeme to defraud either of them of the victorious garland, which seemeth to be common to them both: Whether (I say) it be lawfull for him to encline unto one or to the other, and so award the victory as if they had drawn lots therefore. To encline (I say) casually & without any reason; like as when two groates are presented unto us, every way feimble one to the other, we incline rather to that which we take. And in the first booke of Duties, having said, 30 that there be certaine things that require no great ado, nor intensive consideration, he is of opinion, that in such cases we are to yeeld the choise into the casuall propension of the minde, even as to the adventitious hazard of a lot: as for example; if the question be to make triall of the said two groates, one faith, this is the better, and another that: but for that we are to take one of the twaine, without more ado and farther triall of their bettredness, we take that which comes first; and in another place he saith: in putting this to the adventure of a lot, it falleth out otherwhiles, that wee hit upon the worke: in these places the casuall inclination of the minde, to the first object, and the putting of the matter to the hazard of a lot, is nothing else but to bring in a choise of things indifferent without any cause.

In the third booke of Logique, having premised thus much, that Plato, Aristotle and their 40 successours and disciples even as farre as to Solemon and Syraton, had bestowed great study and travelled much therein: but above all others, Solemon, with this addition, that a man would with with so many and such noble personages to erre for company: he commeth in afterwards with these words: If they had (quoth he) treated and discoursed hereof curiously or by the way, a man haply might laugh at this place well enough: but since that they have so seriously and exactly disputed of Logique, as if it were one of the greatest faculties and most necessary sciences, it is not like that they were so grossly deceived, being men throughout all the parts of philosophy, so singular as we repute them to be. How is it then, may a man reply and say, that you never rest baying and barking at these lo worthy and excellent personages, and convincing them as you suppose to have erred? For there is no likelihood that they writing so diligently and exactly as 50 they have done of Logique, should of the principles and elements, of the end of good things, of justice and the gods, write carelessly and after a loose maner, howsoever you are disposed to earne their treatises and discourses, blinde, repugnant to themselves, and stuffed with an infinit sort of faults and errors. In one place he denieth that the vice comparative, that is to say a joy to see evil happen unto another, hath any being or reall subsistence: For that (quoth he) no good man was ever known to reioice at the harme of another: but in his second booke as touching Good, having declared what Envie is, namely a griefe for another mans well fare: because men are desirous to detract and debase their neighbours, to the end they might be superiours themselves: he addeth afterwards, the joy for another mans harme, and that in these words: Annexed therunto (quoth he) is the joy for another mans harme, because men are desirous that their neighbours about them, should be brought low for the like causes: but when they decline and turne to other naturall affections, there is engendred Pity and Mercie: In which words it appeareth that he ordaineth comparative to be a thing really subsistent as well as envie and pittie, which notwithstanding elsewhere he said had no being at all in the world no more than the hatred of wickednesse or the desire of filthy lucre.

Having in many places affirmed, that men are never a whit more happie, for long continuance of felicity, but that they be still as happy who enjoy felicity but one minute of an hour: in 10 as many other places againe he avoucheth the contrary, saying that a man should not so much as put forth his finger for a transitory and momentary prudence, which endureth but a while, & passeth away like unto the flash and leame of a lightning. But it shal suffice to relate the very words, which he hath written in his sixth booke of morall questions as touching this matter: for when he had premised thus much, that every good thing doth not cause equall joy, nor all virtuous duties like vanity, he commeth after with these words: For if a man is to have prudence one moment of time, or the last daie. onely of his life, he should not so much as hold up or stretch out his finger for a prudence that lasteth so small a while: although no man is said to be the more blessed for long continuance of happinesse, neither is eternall beatitude more 20 expetible or desirable, than that which passeth away within a minute of an hour. Now if he had thought that prudence were a good thing bringing forth blessednesse, as Epicurus did, a man could have found fault with nothing else but the absurdity onely of so strange an opinion and paradox. But seeing that prudence is no other thing than beatitude, of it selfe, and even very felicity; how can it be avoided that herein there should not be a contradiction and repugnancy of speech, namely, to say that transitory happinesse is as eligible and as much to be desired, as that which is perpetuall: and to hold, that the felicity of one moment is worth naught.

He affirmeth that vertues doe follow and accompany one another not onely in this respect, that he who hath one, hath likewise all the rest, but also in this that he who worketh by one, worketh with all according to the other: neither (saith he) is any man perfect, unlesse he be possessed of all vertues. Howbeit in the first booke of morall questions, Chrysippus saith that neither a 30 good and honest man doth alwaies beare himselfe valiantly, nor a naughty man behave himselfe cowardly, for that as certaine objects be presented into mens fantasies, it behooveth one man to persevere and persist in his judgements, and another to forsake and relinquish the same: for probable he saith it is that even the wicked man is not alwaies lascivious. Now in case it be so, that to be a valiant man, is as much as to shew valour, and to be a coward, the same that to use cowardise, they speake contraries who affirme, that a naughty person practising one vice, worketh by all together: and that a valiant man useth not alwaies valour, nor a dastard cowardise.

He denieth Rhetorique to be an art, as touching the ornament, dispose and order of an oration pronounced: and besides in the first booke he hath thus written: And in mine opinion re- 40 quirit it is to have not onely a regard of an honest, decent & simple adorning of words, but also a care of proper gestures, actions, pauses and staies of the voice, as also a meet conformation of the countenance and the hands. Being as you fee thus exquisite and curious in this passage: yet in the same booke cleare contrary, having spoken of the collision of vowels, and hitting one of them upon another: We are not only (quoth he) to neglect this, and to thinke of that which is of greater moment and importance but also to let passe certaine obscurities and defects, sometimes also and incongruities, of which many others would be ashamed. Now one while to permit and allow such exquisite curiosity in the orderly dispose of a mans tongue, even as far as to the decent setting of the countenance and gesture of the hands: and another while not to 50 bath at the committing of grosse incongruities, defects and obscurities, is the property of a man who cares not what he saith, but speaks whatsoever comes in his head.

Over and besides in his naturall positions, treating of those things which require the view of the eie and experience, after he had given warning that we should go warily to worke, and not rashly yeeld our assent thereto, he saith, Let us not therefore be of Platoes opinion, to thinke that our liquid food, so wit, our drinke, passeth directly to the lungs, and our dry nourishment, that is, our meat, into the stomacke; neither let us fall into such like errors as these. For mine owne part, thus I thinke, That for a man to reprehend others, and afterwards to incur the same faults and errors which he reproved, is the greatest repugnancy and contrariety that may be, and the foulest and most shamefull fault of all others. And verily himselfe saith, that the connexions which are made by the ten principall Axiomes, that is to say, Propositions, exceed in number ten hundred thousand; when as neither he had by himselfe diligently enough enquired and searched into the thing, nor by other men well exercised in that art of Arithmetick, attained to the truth. And yet Plato had to testifie on his side, the most renowned Physicians that were, namely, Hippocrates, Philiston and Dioxippus the disciple of Hippocrates: also of Poets, Euripides, Alcam, Empolis and Eratostratus, who all with one voice affirme, that the drinke passeth by the lungs. And as for all the Arithmeticians well practised in the knowledge of numbers, they reprove Chrysippus: and Hipparchus among the rest, proving and shewing that in the foresaid speech of his, he erred most grossly in his computation, if it be true that the affirmative maketh of the said ten Axiomes to the number of 103049 connexions; and the negative 952, over and above three hundred and ten thousands. Some of the ancients said of Zeno that it befel unto him as unto one who had sower wine of his owne, which he could not sell and make away either for vineger or wine: for, that precedent of his which they call αὐτοκόλον, he could not put off neither for a thing that is good, nor so much as indifferent. But Chrysippus hath made the matter farre more intricate and different: for in some passages of his, he saith, that they are itarke mad, who make no account of riches, health, voidnesse of paine and integrity of the body, nor care how to attaine thereto; and having alledged this verse out of Hesiodus,

*O Perles, borne of noble race,
Thy businesse pte, and worke ap:ee.*

he addeth thereto and saith, it were meere madnesse to advise the contrarie, and say,
*O Perles, borne of noble race;
Pte not thy worke in any cse.*

And in his treatise of Lives he writeth, that a wise man will court it with kings and princes, if he may raise his commoditie and gaine thereby; yea, he will keepe a schoole and teach for money, taking of some scholars his minivels aforehand, and bargaining with others for a certaine time. Also in the seventh booke of his offices, he saith, that he will not stick to tumble downe upon his head, and that three times, so he may be sure to have a talent for his labour. In his first booke of Good things, he permiteth and granteth unto whosoever will, to call those αὐτοκόλον or precedents foresaid, Good, and the contrary thereto, Bad, in these very tearmes: If a man list (quoth he) according to such premutations as these, he may call one thing good unto himselfe, and another thing ill; so as he have an eie and regard unto the things, and wander not inconsiderately, nor faile in the understanding of things signified, but otherwise accommodate himselfe to the use and custome of the denomination. Having thus in this place set his Precedent to neere and linked it with Good; in other passages he saith cleane contrary, that none of all this concerneth us at all, but reason doth divert and plucke us quite away from all such things: for, so much hath he set downe in his first booke of Exhortations. But in the third booke of Nature, he saith, that some kings and rich persons are reputed blessed and happie; which is as much as if they were to be accounted happy, who made water in golden chamber pots, or swept the floure with the golden traines of their costly robes. But a good man, if he lose his whole patrimonie and all his estate, weigheth it no more than the losse of a grore or single denier, and maketh no greater matter of sicknesse, than of stumbling or tripping alittle with his foot. And therefore, filled he hath with such contrarieties, not vertue onely, but also providence. For vertue will appeare exceeding bale, mechanically and foolishly, if it be employed in things so vile and contemptible, commanding a man to faile for them as farre as to Bastarus, yea and to throw himselfe upon his head. And Jupiter is very ridiculous, delighting to be called either Ctesius, that is to say, The enricher and donor of possessions, or Epicarpus, that is to say, The giver of hurts; or Chiridotes, that is to say, The grafter and author of favours: for that unto leawd and wicked persons he affoordeth golden chamber pots, and robes garded and bordered round about the skirts with golde; but vouchsafeth unto good men, trash hardly worth a grore, when so they are become rich through the providence of Jupiter. And yet Apollo is much more ridiculous, if it be so, that he fits giving answers and oracles as touching golden chamber pots, gards and fringes of gold, yea and the tripping and stumbling of the foot. This repugnance and contrariety they make more evident and apparent still by their demonstration: For that (quoth they) which may be well or ill used, is neither good nor bad. Now, certaine it is, that all evil and foolish persons use riches, health and strength of the body, amisse; and therefore none of these may be called Good. If then, God give not vertue unto men, but Honesty commeth of it selfe, selfe, and yet bestoweth riches and health without vertue, surely it is upon them who will not use the same well but ill, that is to say, unprofitably, shamefully and mischievously. And verily if the gods can give vertue, they are not good if they do not: and againe, if they can not make good men, neither are they able to helpe them any way, considering, that without it, there is nothing good nor profitable. For, to say that the gods judge those to be good by vertue and by strength, who are otherwise good than by them, is to no purpose, but a vaine conceit: for even so good men do judge the evil by vertue and by strength: so that by this reckoning, they profit men no more, than they be profited by men. And verily Chrysippus judgeth neither himselfe to be a good man, nor any either of his scholars or teachers. What is their opinion then, think you, of others, if it be not that which themselves say, namely, that they are mad and senselesse fooles, that they be miscreants and infidels, lawlesse, and in one word, come to the very height and pitch of all infelicities and miserie? And yet forthwith they hold, that men so wretched and unhappie as they be, are notwithstanding governed and ruled by divine providence. Now, if the gods, changing their minde, should determine to hurt, afflict, plague, destroy and crush us quite, they could not bring us to a woofe state and condition, than wherein we are already; according as Chrysippus saith, That mans life can not be brought to a lower ebbe, nor be in woofe plight and case than now it is, inasmuch as if it had a tongue and voice to speake, it would pronounce these words of Hercules:

*Of miseries (to say I dare be bold)
So full I am, that more I can not hold.*

And what assertions or sentences may a man possibly finde more contrary and repugnant one against another, than those of Chrysippus, as touching both gods and men, when he saith, That the gods are most provident over men, and carefull for their best; and men notwithstanding are in as woofull state as they may be?

Certeine Pythagoreans there are, who blame him much, for that in his booke of Justice he hath written of dunghill cocks, that they were made and created profitable for mans use: For (quoth he) they awaken us out of our sleepe, and raise us to our worke; they hunt, kill and devour scorpions; with their fighting they animate us to battell, imprinting in our hearts an ardent desire to shew valour: and yet eat them we must, for feare that there grow upon us more pollaine, than we know what otherwise to do withall. And so farre forth mocketh he and scorneth those who finde fault with him for delivering such sentences, that he writeth thus in his third booke of the Gods, as touching Jupiter the Saviour, Creatour and Father of justice, law, equity and peace: And like as cities (quoth he) and great townes, when they be over full of people, deduct and send from thence certaine colonies, and begin to make warre upon some other nations; even so God sendeth the causes that breed plague and mortallitie: to which purpose he citeth the testimony of Enripides and other authors, who write that the Trojan warre was raised by the gods, for to discharge and disburden the world of so great a multitude of men wherewith it was replenished. As for all other evident absurdities delivered in these speeches, I let passe, for my purpose is not to search into all that which they have said or written amisse, but onely into their contradictions and contrarieties to themselves. But consider, I pray you, how Chrysippus hath alwaies attributed unto the gods the goodliest names and most plausible termes that can be devised; but contrariwise, most savage, cruell, inhumane, barbarous and Galatian deeds. For such generall mortalities and carnages of men, as the Trojan warre first brought, and afterwards the Median and Peloponnesiacke warres, are nothing like unto colonies that cities send forth to people and inhabit other places; unlesse haply one would say, That such multitudes of men that die by warre and pestilence, know of some cities founded for them in hell and under the ground to be inhabited. But Chrysippus maketh God like unto Deiatus the king of Galatia, who having many sonnes, and minding to leave his realme and roiall estate unto one of them and no more, made away & killed all the rest besides him, to the end that he being left alone, might be great and mightie: like as if one should prune and cut away all the branches of a vine, that the maine stocke might thrive and prosper the better: and yet the cutter of the vine disbrancheth it when the shooes be yoong, small and tender: and we also take away from a bitch many of her whelps when they be so yoong as that they can not yet see, for to spare the damme: whereas Jupiter who hath not onely suffered and permitted men to grow unto their perfect age, but also given them himselfe their nativitie and growth, punisheth them and plagueth them afterwards, devising sundry meanes, and preparing many occasions of their death and destruction, when as indeed he should rather have not given unto them the causes and principles of their generation and birth. Howbeit, this is but a small matter in comparison; and more grievous is that which I will now say: for there are no warres bred among men, but by occasion of some notable vice; seeing the cause of one is fleshly pleasure; of another, avarice; and of a third, ambition and desire of rule. And therefore, if God be the author of warres, he is by consequence, the cause of wickednesse, and doth provoke, excite and pervert men: and yet him- selfe in his treatise of judgement, yea and his second booke of the Gods, writeth that it stands to no sense and reason that God should be the cause of any wicked and dishonest things. For like as the lawes are never the cause of breaking and violating the lawes, no more are gods of impetie: so that there is no likelihood at all that they should move and cause men to commit any foule and dishonest fact. Now what can there be more dishonest, than to procure and raise 10 some to worke the thine and perdition of others, and yet Chrysippus saith, that God ministreth the occasions and beginnings thereof. Yea, but he contrariwise (will one say) commendeth Euripides, for saying thus:

*If Gods do ought th: lewd and filly is,
They are no more accounted Gods, in us.*

And againe,
Soone said that is: Mens faults i' excuse, Nothing more ready than Gods i' accuse.

as if forsooth we did any thing els now, but compare his words and sentences together that be opposit and mere contrary one unto another. And yet this sentence which now is heere com- 20 mended, to wit,

Soone said that is, &c.

we may alledge against Chrysippus, not once, nor twice nor thrice, but ten thousand times. For first, in his treatise of Nature, having likened the eternity of motion to a drench or potion made confusedly of many herbs and spices, troubling and turning all things that be engendered, some after one sort and some after another, thus he saith, Seeing it is so, that the government and ad- ministrat[i]on of the universall world proceedeth in this sort, necessary it is that according to it we be disposed in that maner as we are; whether it be that we are diseased against our owne na- ture, maimed or disinfembred, Grammatians or Musicians. And againe, soone after, accord- ing to this reason, we may say the like of our vertue or vice, and generally of the knowledge or 30 ignorance of arts, as I have already said. Also within a litle after, cutting off all doubt and am- biguity: There is no particular thing, not the very least that is, which can otherwise happen than according to common nature, and the reason thereof: now that common nature, and the rea- son of it is fatall destinae, divine providence and Jupiter, there is not one, search even as far as to the Antipodes, but he knoweth: for this sentence is very ripe in their mouthes: And as for this verse of Homer,

*And as each thing thus came to passe,
The will of Jove fulfilled was.*

he saith that well and rightly he referred all to destiny, and the universall nature of the world, whereby all things are governed. How is it possible then, that these two positions should sub- 40 sist together, namely, that God is in no wise the cause of any dishonest thing: and, that there is nothing in the world be it never so little that is done, but by common nature, and according to the reason thereof? For surely, among all those things that are done, necessarily there must be things dishonest: and yet Epicurus turneth and windeth himselfe on every side, imagining and devising all the subtilt[ies] that he can to unloose, set free, and deliver our voluntary free will from this motion eternall, because he would not leave vice excusable & without just repre- hension; whereas in the meane while he openeth a wide window unto it, and giveth it libertie to plead: That committed it is not only by the necessity of destiny, but also by the reason of God, and according to the best nature that is. And thus much also moreover is to be scene written word for word: For considering that common nature reacheth unto all causes; it cannot 50 otherwise be, but all that is done, howsoever, and in what part soever of the world, must be ac- cording to this common nature, and the reason thereof, by a certaine kind of consequence without impeachment; for that there is nothing without, that can impeach the administrati- on thereof, neither mooveth any part, or is disposed in habitude otherwise, than according to that common nature. But what habitudes and motions of the parts are these? Certaine it is that the habitudes be the vices and maladies of the minds, as covetousnesse, lecherie, ambition, cowardise, and injustice: as for the motions, they be the acts proceeding from thence, as adul- teries, teries, thefts, treasons, manlaughters, murders, and parricides, Chrysippus now is of opinion, That none of all these, be they little or great, is done without the reason of Jupiter, or against law, justice, and providence: in so much as to breake law, is not against law; to wrong another, is not against justice; nor to commit sinne against providence. And yet he affirmeth, that God punisheth vice, and doth many things for the punishment of the wicked. As for example, in the second booke of the gods: Otherwhiles they happen (quoth he) unto good men grievous calamities, not by way of punishment, as to the wicked, but by another kinde of oeconomy and disposition, like as it falleth out usually unto cities. Againe, in these words: First, we are to understand, evill things and calamities as we have said heerebefore; then to thinke, that distri- 10 buted they are according to the reason and dispose of Jupiter, either by way of punishment, or else by some other oeconomy of the whole world. Now surely, this is a doctrine hard to bee digested, namely, that vice being wrought by the disposition and reason of God, is also punished thereby: howbeit, this contradiction he doeth still aggravate and extend in the second booke of Nature, writing thus: But vice in regard of grievous accidents, hath a certaine peculiar reason by it selfe: for after a sort it is committed by the common reason of nature, and as I may so say, not unprofitably in respect of the universall world: for otherwise than so, there were no good things at all: and then proceeding to reprove those who dispute pro & contra, and dis- 20 course indifferently on both parts, he (I meane) who upon an ardent desire to brooke alwaies and in every matter some novelties & exquisite singularities above all other, saith, It is not un- profitable, to cut purses, to play the scyphants, or commit loose, dissolute, and mad parts: no more than it is inconvenient, that there should be unprofitable members, hurtfull and wret- ched persons: which if it be so, what maner of god is Jupiter, I meane him, of whom Chrysip- pus speaketh, in case (I say) he punish a thing, which neither commeth of it selfe, nor unprofit- 30 ably: for vice according to the reason of Chrysippus were altogether irreprehensible, and Jup- iter to be blamed, if either he caused vice, as a thing unprofitable, or punished it when he had made it not unprofitable. Moreover, in the first booke of justice, speaking of the gods, that they oppose themselves against the iniquities of some: But wholly (quoth he) to cut off all vice, is neither possible nor expedient, is it if it were possible, to take away all injustice, all trans- gression of lawes, and all folly. But how true this is, it pertaineth not to this present treatise for 40 to enquire and discourse. But himselfe taking away and rooting up all vice as much as lay in him, by the meanes of philosophy, which to extirpe, was neither good nor expedient, doeth herein that which is repugnant both to reason and also to God. Furthermore, in saying that there be certaine finnes and iniquities, against which the gods doe oppose themselves, he gi- veth covertly to understand, that there is some oddes and inequality in finnes. Over and besides, having written in many places, that there is nothing in the world to be blamed, nor that can be complained of, for that all things are made and finished by a most singular and excellent na- ture: there be contrariwise, sundry places, wherein hee leaveth and alloweth unto us certaine negligences reproveable, and those not in small and trifling matters. That this is true, it may appeere in his third booke of Substance; where having made mention, that such like negligences 50 might befall unto good & honest men: Commeth this to passe (quoth he) because there be some things whereof there is no reckoning made, like as in great houses, there must needs be scat- tered and lost by the way some bran, yea and some few graines of wheat, although in generality the whole besides, is well enough ruled and governed? or is it because there be some evill and malignant spirits, as superintendents over such things, wherein certainly such negligences are committed, & the same reprehensible? and he saith moreover, that there is much necessity in- termingled among. But I meane not hereupon to stand, nor to discourse at large, but to let passe what vanity there was in him, to compare the accidents which befell to some good and vertu- ous persons, as for example, the condemnation of Socrates, the burning of Pythagoras quick- ly by the Cylonians, the dolorous torments that Zeno endured under the tyrant Demylus, or 50 those which Antiphon suffered at the hands of Dionysius, when they were by them put to death, unto the brans that be spilt and lost in great mens houses. But that there should be such wicked spirits deputed by the divine providence, to have the charge of such things, must needs redound to the great reproach of God, as if he were some unwise king who committed the go- vernment of his provinces unto evill captaines and rash headed lieutenants, suffering them to abuse and wrong his best affected subjects, and winking at their reckless negligence, having no care or regard at all of them. Againe, if it be so, that there is much necessity and continuant mingled among the affaires of this world, then is not God the soveraigne lord and omnipotent 60 master master of all, neither be all things absolutely governed and ruled by his reason and counsell.

Moreover he mightily opposeth himselfe against Epicurus and those who take from the administration of the world divine providence, confuting them, principally by the common notions and conceptions inbred in us as touching the gods, by which perswaded we are that they be gracious benefactors unto men. And for that this is so vulgar and common a thing with them, needlesse it is to cite any expresse places to proove the same : And yet by his leave, all nations doe not believe that the gods be bountifull and good unto us. For doe but consider what opinion the Jewes and Syrians have of the gods : looke into the writings of Poets, with how many superstitions they be stuffed. There is no man in maner to speake of who imagineth or conceiveth in his minde, that god is either mortall and corruptible, or hath bene begotten : And Antipater of Tarsis (to passe others over in silence) in his booke of Gods, hath written thus much word for word. But to the end (quoth he) that this discourse may be more perspicuous and cleare, we will reduce into few words the opinion which we have of God. We understand therefore by God a living nature or substance happie, incorruptible, and a benefactor unto men : and afterwards in expounding each of these tearmes and attributes, thus he saith : And verily all men doe acknowledge the gods to be immortall. It must needs be then, that by Antipaters saying, Chrysippus of all those, is none. For he doth not thinke any of all the gods to be incorruptible save Jupiter onely : but supposeth that they were all engendered a like, and that one day they shall all likewise perish. This generally throughout all his bookes doth he deliver : howbeit one expresse passage will I alledge out of his third booke of the gods. After a divers sort (quoth he) for some of them are engendered and mortall : others not engendered at all. But the prooffe and demonstration hereof, if it should be fetched from the head indeed, apperteineth more properly unto the science of Naturall Philosophy. For the Sunne and Moone and other gods of like nature, were begotten : but Jupiter is sempiternall. And againe somewhat after : The like shall be said of Jupiter and other gods, as touching their corruption and generation : for some of them do perish : but as for his parts they be incorruptible. With this I would have you to compare, a little of that which Antipater hath written : Those (quoth he) who deprive the gods of beneficence and well doing, touch but in some part the prenotation and anticipation in the knowledge of them : and by the same reason they also who thinke they participate of generation and corruption. If then he be as much deceived and as absurd, who thinke that the gods be mortall and corruptible, as he who is of opinion that they beare no bountifull and loving affection toward men, Chrysippus is as farre from the truth as Epicurus, for that as the one bereaveth God of immortality and incorruption, so the other taketh from him bounty and liberality.

Moreover Chrysippus in his third booke of the gods speaking of this point, and namely how other gods are nourished, saith thus : Other gods (quoth he) use a certaine nourishment, whereby they are maintained equally : but Jupiter and the world after a nother sort, than those who are engendered, and be consumed by the fire. In which place, he holdeth, that all other gods be nourished, except Jupiter and the world. And in the first booke of Providence, he saith that Jupiter groweth continually untill such a time, as all things be consumed in him. For death being the separation of the body and soule, seeing that the soule of the world never departeth at all but augmenteth continually, untill it have consumed all the matter within it, we cannot say that the world dieth. Who could speake more contrary to himselfe, than he who saith that one and the same god is nourished and not nourished ? And this we need not to inferre and conclude by necessary consequence, considering that himselfe in the same place hath written it plainly. The world onely (quoth he) is said to be of it selfe sufficient : because it alone hath all in it selfe whereof it standeth in no need, of it selfe it is nourished and augmented, whereas other parts are transfused and converted one into another. Not onely then is he contradictorie and repugnant to himselfe in that he saith, other gods be nourished, all except the world and Jupiter : but also here in much more, when he saith that the world groweth by nourishing it selfe : whereas so contrariwise there had bene more reason to say, the world onely is not augmented, having for foode the destruction thereof : but on the contrary side, other gods doe grow and increase, in as much as they have their nourishment from without : and rather should the world be consumed into them, if it be true that the world taketh alwaies from it selfe, and other gods from it. The second point contained in that common notion and opinion imprinted in us as touching the gods, is that they be blessed, happie and perfect. And therefore men highly praise Euripides for saying thus.

If God be God indeed and really,
He needs none of this poets verily;
His praise in hymnes and verses for to write :
Such ditties wretched are which they endite.

Howbeit our Chrysippus here, in those places by me alledged faith, that the world alone is of it selfe sufficient, as comprehending within it all that it hath need of. What then ariseth upon this proposition, that the world is sole sufficient in it selfe, but this, that neither the Sun nor the Moone, nor any other of the gods whatsoever is sufficient of it selfe, and being thus insufficient, they cannot be blessed and happie.

Chrysippus is of opinion, that the infant in the mothers wombe, is nourished naturally, no otherwise than a plant within the earth; but when it is borne, and by the aire cooled and hardened (as it were) like Steele, it moveth the spirit, and becometh an animall or living creature; and therefore it is not without good reason, that the soule was called ψυχη, in regard of ψυχος, that is to say, refrigeration. But not forgetting to be contrary unto himselfe, he supposeth that the soule is the more subtile, rare, and fine spirit of nature: For how is it possible that a subtile thing should be made of that which is grosse, and that a spirit should be rarefied by refrigeration and astringition or condensation? Nay, that which more is, how cometh it about, that affirming as he doth the soule of an infant to be engendered by the means of refrigeration, he should thinke the sun to become animar, being as it is of a fire nature, & engendered of an exhalation transfused into fire? For thus he saith in his third booke of Nature: The mutation (quoth he) of fire is in this maner; by the aire it is turned into water, and out of water having earth under it, there exaleth aire, which aire coming to be subtilized, the fire is produced and environeth it round about; & as for the stars, they are set on fire out of these, together with the sunne; what is more contrary, than to be set on fire and to be cooled? what more opposite to subtilization and rarefaction, than inspissation and condensation? the one maketh water and earth, of fire and aire; the other turneth that which is moist and terrestriall, into fire and aire. And yet in one place he maketh kindling of fire, and in another refrigeration, to be the cause of quickning and giving soule unto a thing: for when the said firing and inflammation comes generally throughout, then it liveth and is become an animall creature; but after it cometh to be quenched and thickned, it turneth into water and earth, and so into a corporall substance. In the first booke of Providence, he writeth thus: For the world being throughout on fire, presently it is with all, the soule and governour of it selfe; but when it is turned into moisture and the soule left within it, and is after a sort converted into a soule and body, so as it seemeth compounded of them both, then the case is altered: In which text he affirmeth plainly, that the very inanimat parts of the world by exustion and inflammation, turne and change into the soule thereof; and contrariwise by extinction, the soule is relaxed and moistened againe, and so returneth into a corporall nature. Heereupon I inferre that he is very absurd, one while to make of senselesse things, animar and living, by way of refrigeration; and another while to transmute the most part of the soule of the world into insensible and inanimat things.

But over and above all this, the discourse which he maketh as touching the generation of the soule, containeth a prooffe & demonstration contrary to his owne opinion; for he saith: That the soule is engendered after that the infant is gone out of the mothers wombe; for that the spirit then is transformed by refrigeration; even as the temper is gotten off Steele. Now to prove that the soule is engendered, and that after the birth of the infant, hee bringeth this for a principall argument; Because children become like unto their parents in behaviour and naturall inclination; wherein the contrariety that he delivereth is so evident, as that a man may see it by the very cie; for it is not possible that the soule which is engendered after birth, should be framed to the manners and disposition of the parents before nativity; or else we must say (and fall out it will) that the soule before it was in esse, was already like unto a soule; which is all one, as that it was by similitude and resemblance, and yet was not, because as yet it had not a reall substance: Now if any one doe say, that it ariseth from the temperature and complexion of the bodies, that this similitude is imprinted in them, howbeit when the soules are once engendered, they become changed, he shall overthrow the argument and prooffe, whereby it is shewed that the soule was engendered; for heereupon it would follow, that the soule although it were ingenerable, when it entruth from without into the body, is changed by the temperature of the like.

Chrysippus sometime saith, that the aire is light, that it mounteth upward on high; and otherwhiles

whiles for it againe: that it is neither heavy nor light. To prove this, see what he saith in his second booke of Motion, namely, that fire having in it no ponderosity at all, ascendeth aloft: sensibly the aire; and as the water is more conformable to the earth, so the aire doth rather resemble the fire. But in his booke entituled Naturall arts, he bendeth to the contrary opinion, to wit, that the aire hath neither ponderosity nor lightnesse of it selfe. He affirmeth that the aire by nature is darke, and for that cause by consequence it is also the primitive cold; and that tenebrosity or darknesse is directly opposite unto light and cleerenesse, and the coldnesse therefore of the heat of fire. Mooving this discourse in the first booke of his Naturall questions, contrary to all this in his treatise of Habitues, he saith: That these habitues be nothing else but aires: For that bodies (quoth he) be contained by them, and the cause why every body contained by any habitude is such as it is, is the continent aire; which in iron is called hardnesse, in stone, spissitude or thicknesse; in silver whitenesse; in which words there is great contrariety, and as much false absurditie: for if this aire remaine the same still as it is in the owne nature, how cometh blacke in that which is not white, to be called whitenesse; sofinesse in that which is not hard, to be named hardnesse; or rare in that which is not solide and massive, to be called soliditie? But in case it be said, that by mixture therein it is altered, and so cometh sensibly, how then can it be an habitude, a faculty, power, or cause of these effects, whereby it selfe is brought under and subdued? for that were to suffer rather than to doe; and this alteration is not of a nature containing, but of a languishing impotencie, whereby it loseth all the properties and qualities of the owne; and yet in every place they hold, that matter of it selfe idle and without motion, is subject and exposed to the receipt of qualities, which qualities are spirits, and those powers of the aire, which into what parts soever of the matter they get and insinuate themselves, doe give a forme and imprint a figure into them. But how can they mainteine this, supposing as they do, the aire to be such as they say it is; for if it be an habitude and power, it will conforme and shape unto it selfe, every body, so as it will make the same both blacke and soft: but if by being mixed and contempered with them, it take formes contrary unto those which it hath by nature, it followeth then, that it is the matter of matter, and neither the habitude, cause, nor power thereof.

Chrysippus hath written often times, that without the world there is an infinit voidnesse; and that this infinitie hath neither beginning, middle, nor end. And this is the principall reason whereby they refuse that motion downward of the Atom by themselves, which Epicurus hath brought in: for in that which is infinit, there are no locall differences, whereby a man may understand or specife either high or low. But in the fourth booke of Things possible, he supposeth a certaine middle space and meane place betweene: wherein he saith the world is founded. The very text where he affirmeth this, runneth in these words. And therefore we must say of the world that it is corruptible: and although it be very hard to prove it, yet me thinks rather it should be so, than otherwise. Nevertheless, this maketh much to the inducing of us to believe that it hath a certaine incorruptibility, if I may so say, namely the occupation or taking up of the middle place, wherein it standeth, because it is in the mids: for if it were thought otherwise to be founded, it were altogether necessarie that some corruption should take holde of it. And againe, a little after: for even so in some sort hath that essence bene ordeined from all eternitie, to occupie the middle region, being presently at the very first such as if not by another manner, yet by attaining this place, it is eternall and subject to no corruption. These words containe one manifest repugnance and visible contrariety, considering that in them he admitteth and alloweth in that which is infinit a middle place. But there is a second also, which as it is more darke and obscure, so it implieth also a more monstrous absurditie than the other: for supposing that the world can not continue incorruptible, if it were feared and founded in any other place of the infinitie, than in the mids; it appeareth manifestly that he feared, if the parts of the substance did not moove and tend toward the mids, there would ensue a dissolution & corruption of the world. But this would he never have feared, if he had not thought that bodies naturally so from all sides tend to the middes not of the substance but of the place that containeth the substance; whereof he had spoken in many places, that it was a thing impossible and against nature, for that within voidnesse there is no difference, by which bodies can be said to move more one way than another: and that the construction of the world is cause of the motion to the center, as also that all things from every side do bend to the mids. But to see this more plainly, it may suffice to alledge the very text in his second booke of Motion: for when he had delivered thus much, That the world is a perfect body, and the parts of the world not perfect, because they are respective relative to the whole, and not of themselves. Having also discoursed as touching the motion thereof: for that it was apt and fitted by nature to moove it selfe in all parts, for to containe and preserve, and not to breake, dissolve and burne it selfe, he saith afterwards, But the universall world tending and mooving to the same point, and the parts thereof having the same motion from the nature of the body; like it is, that this first motion is naturally proper to all bodies, namely, to incline toward the mids of the world, considering that the world mooveth so in regard of it selfe; and the parts likewise, in that they be the parts of the whole. How now my good friend, may some one say, what accident is befallen unto you, that you should forget to pronounce these words withall, That the world, in case it had not fortune for to settle in the mids, must needs have bene subject to corruption and dissolution? For if it be proper and natural to the world to tend alwaies to the same middle, as also to adresse the parts thereof from all sides thereto, into what place soever of the voidnesse it be carried and transported, certes thus containing and embracing (as it were) it selfe, as it doth, it must needs continue incorruptible, immortal, and past all danger of fracture or dissolution: for to such things as be broken, bruised, dissipated and dissolved, this is incident, by the division and dissolution of their parts, when each one runneth and retireth into their proper and natural place, out of that which is against their owne nature. But you sir, supposing that if the world were seated in any other place of voidnesse but in the mids, there would follow a total ruine and corruption thereof; giving out also as much, and therefore imagining a middle in that where naturally there can be none, to wit, in that which is infinit, have verily quit cleane and fled from these tensions, coherences and inclinations, as having in them no assured meanes for to mainteine and holde the world together, and attributed all the cause of the eternall maintenance and preservation thereof, unto the occupation of a place. And yet, as if you tooke pleasure to argue and convince your selfe, you adjoine to the premisses, thus much: In what sort every severall part moveth, as it is coherent to the rest of the body, it stands with good reason, that after the same manner it should moove by it selfe alone; yea, if for disputation sake we imagine and suppose it to be in some void part of this world: and like as being kept in and enclosed on every side, it would move toward the mids, so it would continue in this same motion, although by way of disputation we should admit, that all on a sudden there should appeare some vacuity and void place round about it. And is it so indeed, that every part what ever it be, compassed about with voidnesse, forgoeth not her natural inclination to move & tend to the mids; and should the world it selfe, unless some fortune & blind chance had not prepared for it a place in the mids, have lost that vigor & power which containeth and holdeth all together, & so some parts of the substance of it moove one way, and some another? Now surely heerein there be many other maine contrarieties repugnant even to natural reason; but this particularly among the rest, encountreth the doctrine of God & divine providence, to wit, that in attributing unto them the least and smallest causes that be, he taketh from them the most principall and greatest of all other. For what greater power can there be, than the maintenance and preservation of this universall world, or to caule the substance united together in all parts to cohere unto it selfe? But this according to the opinion of Chrysippus, hapneth by meer hazzard and chance: for if the occupation of a place, is the cause of worlds incorruption and eternitie, and the same chanced by fortune, we must inferre thereupon, that the safety of all things dependeth upon hazzard and adventure, and not upon fatall destiny and divine providence. As for his doctrine & disputation de finibus, that is to say of things possible, which Chrysippus hath delivered directly against that of fatall destiny, how can it chuse but be repugnant to it selfe: for if that be not possible, according to the opinion of Diodorus, which either is or shall be true, but whatsoever is susceptible naturally of a power to be, although the same never come into act or esse, is to be counted possible; there will be a number of things possible which never shall have being, by destiny invincible, inexpugnable, & unmovable things. And therefore either this doctrine overthroweth all the force and puissance of destiny: or if it be admitted as Chrysippus would have it, that which potentially may be, will fall out oftentimes to be impossible; & whatsoever is true, shall be also necessary, as being comprised & contained by the greatest and most puissant cause withstanding and impeaching it ever for being true. For looke whose destiny it is to die in the sea, how can it possible be, that he should be susceptible of death upon the land? And how is it possible, that he who is at Megara should come to Athens, being hindered and prohibited by fatall destiny?

Moreover his resolutions as touching fantasies and imaginations repugne mainly against fatall

fatall destiny: For intending to proove that fantasie is not an entire and absolute cause of assent he saith, that Sages and wise men will prejudice and hurt us much, by imprinting in our mindes false imaginations, if it be so that such fantasies doe absolutely cause assent. For many times wise men use that which is false, unto leawd and wicked persons, representing unto them a fantasie that is but onely probable, and yet the same is not the cause of assent: for so also should it be the cause of false opinion and of deception. If then a man would transerre this reason and argument from the said wise men unto fatall destiny, saying that destiny is not the cause of assents (for so he should confesse that by destiny were occasioned false assents, opinions and deceptions, yea and men should be endamaged by destiny) certes the same doctrine and reason which exempteth a wise man from doing hurt at any time, sheweth withall that destiny is not the cause of all things. For if they neither opine nor receive detriment by destiny: certainly they doe no good, they are not wise, they be not firme and constant in opinion, neither receive they any good and profit by destiny: so that this conclusion which they hold for most assured, falleth to the ground and commeth to nothing, namely, that fatall destiny is the cause of all things. Now by paraventure one say unto me, that Chrysippus doth not make destiny the entire and absolute cause of all things, but only a procatartickall and antecedent occasion, here againe will he discover how he is contradictorie to himselfe, whereas he praiseth Homer exceedingly for saying thus of Jupiter:

*Take well in worth therefore what he to each of you shall send;
And whether good or bad it be,
doe not with him contend.*

As also where he highly extollet Enripides for these verses:

*O Jupiter what cause have I to say,
That mortall wretches we should prudent be?
Depend we doe of thee, and nothing may Bring to effect, but that which pleaseth thee.*

Himselfe also writeth many sentences accordant hereunto, and finally concludeth, that nothing doth rest and stay, nothing stirre and moove, be it never so little, otherwise than by the counsell and minde of Jupiter, whome he saith to be all one with fatall destiny. Moreover the antecedent cause is more feeble and weake than that which is perfit and absolute, neither attaineth it to any effect, as being subdued & kept down, by others mightier than it selfe, rising up & making head against it. And as for fatall destiny Chrysippus himselfe pronouncing it to be a cause invincible, inflexible, and that which cannot be impeached, calleth it Atropos & Adrastra, as one would say, a cause that cannot be averted, avoided or undone. Likewise necessity and Peppromence, which is as much to say as setting downe meas, that is to say, an end and limit unto all things. How then whether doe we not say, that neither assents, vertues, vices, nor well or ill doing, lie in our free will and power: if we affirme fatall destiny is to be maimed or imperfect and meoprosion, that is to say, a fatality determining all things, to be ampermentis, that is to say, without power to finish and effect ought: and so the motions and habitudes of Jupiter's will to remaine imperfect and unaccomplished? for of these conclusions the one will follow, if we say that destiny is an absolute and perfect cause: and the other, in case we hold that it is onely a procatartickall or antecedent occasion. For being an absolute and all sufficient cause, it overthroweth that which is in us, to wit, our free will: and againe, if we admit it to be only antecedent it is marred for being effectuall and without the danger of impeachment. For not in one or two places onely but every where in maner throughout all his commentaries of naturall philosophy he hath written, that in particular natures and motions there be many obstacles and impediments, but in the motion of the universall world there is none at all. And how is it possible that the motion of the universall world should not be hindered and disturbed, reaching as it doth unto particulars, in case be so, that they likewise be stopped and impeached. For surely the nature in generall of the whole man is not at liberty and without impediment, if neither that of the foot nor of the hand, be void of obstacles: no more can the motion or course of a ship be void of let and hinderance, if there be some stay about the sailes, & oares, or their works. Over & besides all this, if the fantasies and imaginations, are not imprinted in us by fatall destiny, how be they the cause of assents? Or if because it imprinteth fantasies that lead unto assent, thereupon all assents are said to be by fatall destiny, how is it possible that destiny should not be repugnant to it selfe? considering that in matters of greatest importance, it ministreth many times different fantasies; and those which distract the minde into contrary opinions? whereas they affirme that those who settle unto one of the said fantasies, and hold not of their assent and approbation doe erre and sinne: For if they yeeld (say they) unto uncertaine fantasies they stumble and fall: if unto false, they are deceived: if to such as commonly are not conceived and understood, they opine. For of necessity it must be one of these three: either that every fantasie is not the worke nor effect of destiny; or that every receipt & assension of fantasie is not void of error; or else that destiny it selfe is not irreprehensible. Neither can I see how it should be blamelesse, objecting such fantasies & imaginations as it doth: which to withstand and resist, were not blameable, but rather to give place and follow them: and verily in the disputations of the Stoicks against the Academicks, the maine point about which both Chrysippus himselfe, and Antipater also contended and stood upon, was this: That we doe nothing at all, nor be enclined to any action, without a precedent consent: but that these be but vaine fictions and devised fables, and suppositions, that when any proper fantasie is presented, incontinently we are disposed, yea, and incited thereto, without yeelding or giving consent. Again, Chrysippus saith: That both God and the wise man doe imprint false imaginations, not because they would have us to yeeld or give our consent unto them, but that we should doe the thing onely, and incite our selves to that which appeereth: As for us, if wee be evill by reason of our infirmity, we condescend to such fantasies and imaginations. Now the repugnance and contrarietie in these words is easily seene; for hee who would not have us to consent unto the fantasies which he presenteth unto us, but onely to worke and doe them, be he God or wise man, knoweth well enough that such fantasies are sufficient to cause us to fall to operation, and that those assents are altogether superfluous: and so if he knowing that the fantasie imprinteth no instinct into operation without consent, ministreth unto us false or probable fantasies: willfull and voluntary is the cause that we stumble, erre, and offend, in giving our assent to such things as are not perfectly understood and comprehended.

OF COMMON CONCEPTIONS AGAINST THE STOICKS.

The Summarie.

Having shewed in my former discoufse, that the Stoicks are contradictory to themselves in all the principall articles of their doctrine, and so consequently that he needed no more but their owne words to condemne them: In this dialogue he joyneth more closely to them, disputing against their rules and precepts, which he examineth and refuteth; whereas before he was content to oppugne them by their owne selves. For to make an entrance into this dialogue, he bringeth in Lamprias, requesting Diadumenus to rid him of those scruples that certaine Stoicks had put into his head: Whereunto the other accordeth, and so they enter into the matter. The summe of whose whole discoufse throughout is this: That the Stoicks would by their principles abolish mans senses, and the common conceptions proceeding from thence, thereby more easily to establish their owne paradoxes: whom he refuteth, dividing his dialogue into three principall parts: in the first whereof is considered, the morall; in the second, the naturall; in the third, the metaphysicall or supernaturall philosophy of the Stoicks: Howbeit, he observeth no exact order nor method, in the disposition of his matters, but enmethow of one discoufse into another, according as things were presented unto him, and came first into his minde, yet in such sort, as there is sufficient to content the reader, who is desirous to know what was the sect and doctrine of the Stoicks, in the manner of the ancient Academicks in their disputations: which being referred to the true marke and scope indeed of all that which we may learne in the world, teacheth every man to humble himselfe before the maiestie of him who is onely wise, and out of whose sacred word we ought to fetch the resolution of the questions debated here in this dialogue, but of those above these, which treat of manners, religion, and divinity.

OF COMMON CONCEPTIONS against the Stoicks.

LAMPRIAS.

LI should seeme verily that you Diadumenus passe not much what any man either thinks or saies of you & other Academicks, such as your selfe, in that you do philosophize cleane contrary to the common notions and conceptions, confessing as you doe, that you make no great account of the five naturall senses, from whence proceed the most part of the said common conceptions, having for their foundation and seat, the beleife and assurance of the imaginations which appeere unto us. But I pray you for to assay and goe in hand to cure me, either by some words, or charmes and enchantments, or by what other meanes and kinds of physicke that you know, comming as I doe unto you, full in mine owne conceit of great trouble and strong perturbation, so exceedingly troubled I have beene, and held in perplexed suspense, I may tell you, by certeine Stoicks; men otherwise the best in the world, and I may say to you, my inward and familiar friends: howbeit, over bitterly bent, and in hostile maner set against the Academic, who for very small matters uttered by me, modestly and in good sort, withall respect and reverence, have (I will not lie unto you) reprooved, checked, and taken me up very unkindly, with some hard words, and breaking forth in heat of choler, called our auncient Philosophers, Sophisters, corrupters, and perverters of good sentences in Philosophy, yea, and seducers of those who otherwise walked in the true path and traine of doctrine surely established; with many other more strange termes, both speaking and thinking of them very basely; untill in the end as if they had beene driven with a tempest, they fell upon the Common conceptions, reproaching those of the Academic, as if they brought in some great confusion and perturbation in the said notions: and one among them there was, who stucke not to say; That it was not by fortune, but by some divine providence that Chrysippus was borne and came into the world, after Arceflus, and before Carnedes: of which twaine, the one was the great author and promoter of the injury and outrage done unto custome; and the other flourished in name and renowne above all other Academicks. Now Chrysippus comming as he did betwene them, by his writings contrary to the doctrine of Arceflus, stopped up the way also against the powerful eloquence of Carnedes, and as he left unto the senses many aides and succours, as it were to hold out a long siege; so he removed out of the way, and fully cleared all the trouble and confusion about anticipations and common conceptions, correcting ech one, and reducing them into their proper place; in so much, as whosoever afterwards would seeme to make new troubles, and violently disquiet matters by him settled, should not prevails nor gaine ought, but incur the obloquie of the world, and be convinced for malicious persons, and deceitfull sophisters. Having thus (I say) by these words beene chafed and set on fire this morning among them, I had need of some meanes to quench the heat as it were of an inflammation, and to rid me of these doubts, which are risen in my minde.

DIADUMENUS.

It fareth haply with you, as with many of the vulgar sort; but if you beleeve the poets who give out, that the ancient citie Sipylus in Magestia, was in old time destroyed and overthrowen by the providence of the gods, when they chastised and punished Tamalus; you may as well be perswaded by our old friends the Stoicks to beleeve, that nature hath brought forth into the world, not by chance and fortune, but by some speciall divine providence, Chrysippus, when the was minded to pervert and overturne the life of man and course of the world, turning all things up side downe, and contrariwise downe side up: for never was there man better made and framed for such a matter than he, And as Cato said of that Julius Caesar Dictator, that before him there was never knownen any to come fober and confederate to manage affaires of state with a purpose to worke the ruin of the common weale; even so this man in mine opinion, with most diligence, greatest eloquence, & highest conceit of spirit seemeth as much as lieth in him to destroy and abolish custome. And there witness against him no lesse even they who magnifie the man otherwise: namely, when they dispute against him as touching that sophisme or syllogisme which is called Pseudomenos, for to say my good friend, that the augmentation composed of contrary positions is not notoriously false, and againe to affirme, that syllogismes having their premisses true, yea and true inductions, may yet have the contrary to their conclusions true, what conception of demonstrations, or what anticipation of beleefe is there, which it is not able to overthrow?

It is reported of the Pourcuttle or Pollyp fish, that in winter time he gnaweth his owne cleies and pendant hairy feet, but the Logicke of Chrysippus, which taken away and cutteth off the principal parts of it, what other conception leaveth it behinde but that which well may be suspected? For how can that be imagined steady and sure which is built upon foundations that abide not firme, but wherein there be so many doubts and troubles? But like as they who have either dust or durt upon their bodies, if they touch another therewith or rub against him, doe not so much trouble and molest him, as they doe begripe and beray themselves so much the more and seeme to exasperate that ordure which pricketh and is offensive unto them; even so, some there be who blame and accuse the Academicks, thinking to charge upon them those imputations, wherewith themselves are found to be more burdened. For who be they that pervert the common conceptions of the senses more, than do the Stoicks? But if you thinke to good, leaving off to accuse them, let us answer to those calumniamations and slanders which they would seeme to fasten upon us.

LAMPRIAS.

Me thinks Diadumenus that I am this day much changed, and become full of variety: me thinks I am a man greatly altered from that I was ere while: for even now I came hither much dismayed and abashed, as being depressed, beaten downe and amazed; as one having need of some advocate or other to speake for me and in my behalfe: whereas now I am cleane turned to an humor of accusation, and disposed to enjoy the pleasure of revenge, to see all the packe of them detected and convinced, in that they argue and dispute themselves against common conceptions and anticipations, in defence whereof they seeme principally to magnifie their owne sect, * * saying that it alone doth agree and accord with nature.

DIADUMENUS.

Begin we then first, with their most renowned propositions, which they themselves call paradoxes, that is to say, strange and admirable opinions: avowing as it were by that name & gently admitting such exorbitant absurdities; as for example that such Sages as themselves are onely kings, onely rich and faire, onely citizens, and onely Judges: or please it you that we send all this stiffe to the market of olde and stale marchandise, and goe in hand with the examination of 40 these matters which consist most in action and practise, whereof also they dispute most seriously?

LAMPRIAS.

For mine owne part I take this to be the better. For as touching the reputation of those paradoxes, who is not full thereof, and hath not heard it a thousand times?

DIADUMENUS.

Consider then in the first place this, whether according to common notions, they can possibly accord with nature, who thinke naturall things to be indifferent: and that neither health, nor good plight and habitude of body nor beauty, nor cleane strength be either expetible, profitable, expedient, or serving in any stead to the accomplishment of that perfection which is according to nature: nor that the contraries hereunto are to be avoided, as hurtfull, to wit, maimes and mutilations of members, deformities of body, paines, shamefull disgraces and diseases. Of which things rehearsed, they themselves acknowledge that nature estrangeth us from some, and acquainteth us with other. The which verily is quite contrary to common intelligence, that nature should acquaint us with those things which be neither expedient nor good, & alienate us from such as be not hurtfull nor ill: and that which more is, that she should either traine us to them or withdraw us from them so farre forth, as if men misse in obtaining the

be ignorant againe of vertue, when it is present, considering withall, that they hold it to be principally and in highest degree accordant to nature; for how can it otherwise be, but against common sense, to conceive well enough the difference between health and sickness, and to be ignorant of that distinction which is between wisdom and folly; but to thinke the one to be present when it is gone, and when a man hath the other, not to know so much, that he hath it? Now forasmuch as after that one advanced and proceeded forward as farre as may be, he is changed into felicity and vertue, one of these two must of necessity follow; that either this estate of progresse and profit, is neither vice nor infelicity; or else that there is no great difference and distance between vice and vertue; but that the diversitie of good things and evil is very small and unperceptible by the sense, for otherwise men could not be ignorant when they 10 had the one or the other, or thinke they had the one for the other: so long then as they depart not from any contrariety of sentences, but will allow, affirme, and put downe all things whatsoever, to wit, That they who profit and proceed are still fooles and wicked; that they who are become wise and good, know not so much themselves, but are ignorant thereof; that there is a great difference between wisdom and folly: Thinke you, that they shew a woonderfull constance and uniformity in the maintenance of their sentences and doctrines?

Well, if in their doctrine they goe against common sense, and are repugnant to themselves; certes, in their life, in their negotiations and affaires, they doe much more: for pronouncing flatly, that those who be not wise, are all indifferently and alike, wicked, unjust, disloyall, faithlesse, and foolish; and yet forsooth, some of them they abhorre and will not abide, but be ready to spit at them; others, they will not vouchsafe so much as to salute if they meet with them upon the way; and some againe they will credit with their monies, nominate and elect by their voices to be magistrates, yea and bestow their daughters upon them in marriage. Now in case they hold such strange and extravagant positions in sport and game, let them plucke downe their browes, and not make so many furrowes as they doe in their foreheades: but if in earnest, and as grave Philosophers, surely, I must needs tell them, that it is against common notions, to reprove, blame, and raile upon all men alike in words, and yet to use some of them in deeds as honest persons, & others hardly to intreat as most wicked; and for example, to admire Chrysippus in the highest degree, & make a god of him; but to mocke and scorne Aleximus, although they thinke the men to be fooles alike, and not one more or lesse foolish than the other. True 30 it is say they; and needs it must be so. But like as he who is but a cubit under the top of the water, is no lesse strangled and drowned than he who lies five hundred fathom deepe in the bottom of the sea: even so they that be come within a litle of vertue, are no lesse in vice still than those who are a great way off: and as blinde folke be blinde still, although haply they shall recover their eye-sight shortly after; even so they that have wel proceeded and gone forward, continue fooles still and sinfull, untill such time as they have fully attained to vertue; but contrary to all this, that they who profit in the schoole of vertue, resemble not those who are starke blinde, but such rather as see not clerely; nor are like unto those who be drowned, but unto them that swimme, yea and approach neere unto the haven; they themselves do beare witness by their deeds, and in the whole practise of their life; for otherwise they would not have used them for their counsellors, 40 captaines, and lawgivers, as blinde men do guides for to lead them by the hands, neither would they have praised and imitated their deeds, acts, sayings and lives of some as they did, if they had seene them all drowned alike and suffocated with folly and wickednesse.

But letting that goe by, consider these Stoicks, that you may wonder the more at them in this behalfe, that by their owne examples they are not taught to quit and abandon these wise men who are ignorant of themselves, and who neither know nor perceive, that they cease to be strifed and strangled any longer, and begin to see the light, and being risen aloft, and gotten above vice and sinne, take their winde and breath againe. Also it is against common sense, that for a man furnished with all good things, and who wanteth nothing of perfect blisse and happiness, it should be meet and befitting, to make himselfe away and depart voluntarily out of this 50 life; yea, and more than so; that he who neither presently hath, nor ever shall have any good thing; but contrariwise, is continually haunted and persecuted with all horrible calamities, miseries, and mishaps that can be, should not thinke it fit and convenient for himselfe to leave and forsake this life, unlesse some of those things which they hold be indifferent, be presented, and doe befall unto him. Well these be the goodly rules and trim lawes in the Stoicks schoole; and verily many of their wise men they cause indeed to go out of this life, bearing them in hand, that they

they shall be more blessed and happie; although by their saying a wife man is rich, fortunate, blessed, happy every way, sure, and secured from all danger: contrariwise, a foole and leawd man is able to say of himselfe,

Of wicked parts (so say I dare be hold)

So full I am, that unmet I can hold.

And yet forsooth, they thinke it meet and seemely for such as these to remaine alive, but for those to forgo this life. And good cause why, quoth Chrysippus, for we are not to measure our life by good things or evil, but by such as are according to nature. See how these Philosophers mainteine ordinary custome, and teach according to common notions. Say you so (good sir) 10 ought not he who maketh profession of looking into the estate of life and death, to search also and consider

What rule at home in house, what worke there is;

How things do stand; what goes well, what amiss.

Should not he (I say) ponder and examine as it were by the ballance, what things incline and bend more to felicity and what to infelicity, and thereby to chuse that which is profitable? but to lay his ground and make his reckoning to live happily or no by things indifferent, which neither do good nor hurt? According to such presuppositions and principles as these, were it not convenient for him who wanteth nothing of all that is to be avoided, to chuse for to live: & contrariwise, for him to leave this life, who enjoiceth all that is to be wished for and desired? And al- 20 beit (my good friend Lamprias) it be a senselesse absurdity, to say that those who taste of no evil, should forsake this life: yet is it more absurd and beside all reason, that for the not having of some indifferent thing, a man should cast away and abandon that which is simply good; like as these men doe, leaving felicity and vertue, which they presently enjoy, for default of riches and health, which they have not. And to this purpose we may well and fitly alledge these verses out of Homer:

And then from Glaucus, Jupiter

all wis and sense did take,

When he with Diomedes would

a foolish bargain make;

For brasse armour to exchange

his owne of golde most fine,

*An hundred* oxen richly worth,*

for that which went for nine.

And yet those armies made of brasse, were of no lesse use in battell, than the other of golde: whereas the decent feature of the bodie and health, according to the Stoicks, yeeld no profit at all, nor make one jot for felicity. Howbeit, these men for all that, are content to exchange wisdom for health, inasmuch as they holde that it would have become Heracitus well enough and Pherecydes, to have cast off their wisdom and vertue, had it bene in their power so to do, in case thereby they might have bene rid of their maladies, the one of the lowlie disease, and the other 40 of the drop sicke. And if Ciree had filled two caps with severall medicines and potions, the one making fooles of wise men, and the other, wise men of fooles, Ulysses ought to have drunke that of folly, rather than to change his humane shape into the forme of a beast, having in it wisdom withall, and by consequence felicity also. And they say, that even wisdom and prudence it selfe teacheth as much and commandeth in this wise: Let me alone, and suffer me to perish, in case I must be caried to and fro in the forme and shape of an asse. But this wisdom and prudence will some man say, which prescribeth such things, is the wisdom of an asse; if to be wise and happy is of it selfe good, and to beare the face of an asse indifferent. There is (they say) a nation of the Aethiopians where a dogge is their king; he is saluted by the stile and name of a king, and hath all honours done unto him, and temples dedicated, as are done unto kings. But men they 50 be that beare rule and performe those functions and offices which appertaine unto governours of cities and magistrates. Is not this the very case of the Stoicks? for vertue with them hath the name, and carrieth the shew and apparence of good, it alone they say, is expetible, profitable, and expedient; but they frame all their actions, they philosophize, they live and die, according to the will, precript, & commandement as it were of things indifferent. And yet there is not an Aethiopian so hardy as to kill that dog their king; but he sitteth upon a throne under a cloth of estate, and is adored of them in all reverence: but these Stoicks destroy this vertue of theirs, and

* Or pieces of come having the forme of an ox flambped upon

and cause it to perish whiles they are wholly possessed of health and riches. But the corollarie which Chrysippus himselfe, hath for a finall set unto these their doctrines, easeth me of farther paines, that I need not to stand more upon this point: For whereas (quoth he) there be in natures things good, things bad, and things meane or indifferent; there is no man but hee would chuse rather to have that which is good, than the indifferent, or that which is bad: and to proove the trueth hereof, let us take witness of the very gods, when as we doe crave of them in our praers and orisons, principally the possession and fruition of good things; if not, yet at least the power and grace to avoid evils; but that which is neither good nor evill, we never desire for to have in stead of good; many we can be content and with to enjoy it, in lieu of evill. But this Chrysippus heere inverting and perverting cleane the order of nature, transposeth and transferreth out of the middle place betwene, the meane and indifferent into the last, and reducing the last bringeth it backe into the mids; giving as tyrants doe to wicked persons, the pre-eminence of superior place, with authority and credit unto evill things; enjoining us by order of law, first to seeke for that which is good; secondly, for that which is evill; & last of all to repue that woorth, which is neither good nor evill: as if a man should next unto heaven fet hell, and reject the earth and all the elements about it into the pit of Tartarus beneath:

The guise that lies no man can found.*

Having then said in his third booke of Nature: That it is better for a man to live in the state of a foole, yea though he never should become wise, than not to live at all; he addeth thus much, 20 moreover word for word: For such are the good things of men, that even the evill things after a sort are preferred before those which are meane and in the mids betwene; not that these go before, but reason, with which jointly to live, availeth more although we should continue fooles all the daies of our life: yea and to be plaine, albeit we should be wicked, unjust, breakers of the lawes, enemies to the gods, and in one word, wretched and unhappie; for all these concur in those that live fooles. Is it better then to be unhappie, than not unhappie; to suffer harme, rather than not to suffer harme; to commit injustice, than not to commit injustice; to transgresse the lawes, than not to transgresse the lawes: which is as much to say, as is it fit and expedient to do those things which are not fit and expedient; and beschemeth it to live otherwise than it becometh? Yea forsooth: For worse it is to bee without reason and senselesse, than to be foolish, 30 What aile they then, and what takes them in the head, that they will not avow and confesse that to be evill, which is worse than evill? And why do they affirme that we are to avoid folly alone, if it be meet to steere lesse, nay rather much more, that disposition which is not capable nor susceptible of folly? But wherefore should any man be offended and scandalized hereat, if hee call to mind that which this philosopher wrote in his second booke of Nature, where he avoucheth: That vice was not made without some good use and profit, for the whole world? But it will be better to recite this doctrine, even in his owne words, to the end that you may know in what place they range vice, and what speech they make thereof, who accuse Xenocrates and Spensippus, for that they reputed not health to be an indifferent thing, nor riches unprofitable. As for vice (quoth he) it is limited in regard of other accidents beside: for it is also in some sort according to nature; and if I may so say, it is not altogether unprofitable in respect of the whole, for otherwise there would not be any good; and therefore it may be inferred, that there is no good among the gods, in as much as they can have none evil: neither when at any time Jupiter having resolved the whole matter into himselfe, shall become one, & shall take away all other differences, will there be any more good, considering there will be no evil to be found. But true it is, that in a daunce or quier, there will be an accord & measure, although there be none in it that singeth out of tune & maketh a discord: as also health in mans body, albeit no part thereof were pained or diseased: but vertue without vice can have no generation. And like as in some medicinale 40 confessions there is required the poyson of a viper or such like serpent, and the gall of the beast Hyana; even so there is another kind of necessarie convenience betwene the wickednesse of Melitus, and the justice of Socrates; betwene the dissolute demeanor of Cleom, and the honest carriage of Pericles. And what meanes could Jupiter have made, to bring forth Hercules and Lycurgus into the world, if he had not withall made Sardanapalus and Phalaris for us? And it is a great marvell if they say not also, that the Phthisicke or ulcer of the lungs, was sent among men for their good plight of bodie, and the gout for swift footmanship: and Achilles had not 50 worne long haire, unless Therjies had bene bald. For what difference is there betwene those that that alledge these doting fooleries or rave so absurdly; and such as say that loosenesse of life and whoredome were not unprofitable for continence; and injustice for justice? So that we had need to pray unto the gods that there might be alwaies sinne and wickednes,

False leasing smooth and glosing tongue, Deceitfull rimes and fraud among.

in case when these be gone, vertue depart and perish withal. But will you see now and behold the most elegant devise and pleasantest invention of his? For like as Comedies (quoth he) carrie otherwhiles ridiculous Epigrams or inscriptions, which considered by themselves, are nothing woorth, howbeit they give a certaine grace to the whole Poeme: even so, a man may well blame 10 and detest vice in it selfe, but in regard of others it is not unprofitable. And first to say that vice was made by the divine providence, even as a lewd Epigram composed by the expresse will of the Poet, surpasseth all imagination of absurditie: for if this were true, how can the gods be the givers of good things, rather than of evill? or how can wickednes any more be enemy to the gods, or hated by them? or what shall we have to say and answer to such blasphemous sentences of the Poets, founding fo ill in religious eares, as these:

*God once dispos'd some house to overthrow,
Twixt men some cause and seeds of strife doth sow.*

Again:

*Which of the gods twixt them did kindle fire,
Thus to contest in termes of wrath and ire.*

Moreover, a foolish and lewd epigram doth embellish and adorne the Comedie, serving to that end for which it was composed by the Poet, namely, to please the spectators, and to make them laugh. But Jupiter whom we surname, Paternall, Fatherly, Supream, Sovereigne, Just, Righteous, and according to Pindarus, ἀνερτύχης, that is to say, the best and most perfect artisan, making this world as he hath done, not like unto some great Comedie or Entlude, full of variety, skill, and wittie devices, but in maner of a city common to gods and men, for to inhabit together with justice and vertue in one accord and happily, what need had he, to this most holy and venerable end, of thieves, robbers, murderers, homicides, parricides and tyrans? for surely vice and wickednesse was not the entry of some morisque-dance or ridiculous care-sport, carrying a delectable grace with it and pleasing to God; neither was it set unto the affaires of men for recreation and pastime, to make them sport, or to move laughter, being a thing that carrieth not so much as a shadow, nor representeth the dreame, of that concord and convenience with nature, which is so highly celebrated and commended. Furthermore, the said lewd epigram, is but a small part of the Poeme, and occupieth a very little roome in a Comedie: neither do such ridiculous compositions abound overmuch in a play, nor corrupt and marre the pleasant grace of such matters as seeme to have bene well and prettily devised: whereas all humane affaires are full thoroughout of vice: and mans life even from the very first beginning and entrie as it were of the prologue unto the finall conclusion of all and epilogue, yea and to the very plaudite, being 40 disordinate, degenerate, full of perturbation and confusion; and having no one part thereof pure and unblamable, as these men say, is the most filthy unpleasant and odious entlude of all others, that can be exhibited. And therefore gladly would I demaund and learne of them, in what respect was vice made profitable to this universall world: for I suppose he will not say it was for divine and celestiall things: because it were a mere reciculous mockery to affirme that unless there were bred and remained among men vice, malice, avarice, and lesing, or unless we robbed, pilled and spoiled, unless we slandered and murdered one another; the fust would not run his ordinary course, nor the heaven keepe the set seasons and usuall revolutions of time, ne yet the earth seated in the midst and center of the world, yeeld the causes of winde and raine. It remaineth then, that vice & sin was profitably engendred for us and for our affaires: and happily this is it which they themselves would seeme to say. And are we indeed the better in health for 50 being sinfull? or have we thereby more plenty and abundance of things necessary? availeth our wickednesse ought to make us more beautifull and better favoured, or serveth it us in any stead to make us more strong and able of body? They answer No. But is this a silent name onely, and a certaine blinde opinion and weening of these night-walking Sophisters, and not like indeed unto vice which is conspicuous enough & exposed to the view of the whole world, in such sort as it is not possible that it should bring any detriment or ought that is unprofitable, and least of all, o good god, of vertue, for which we were borne. And what absurdity were it to say

say, that the commodious instruments of the husband man, the mariner or the carter, should serve their turnes for to attaine unto their purpose and intended end : but that which hath bene created by God for vertue, should corrupt, mar, and destroy vertue: But peradventure it is more than time now, to passe unto some other point, and to let this goe.

LAMPRIAS

Nay I beseech you good sir of all loves and for my sake doe not so: For I desire to know and understand how these men bring in evill things before the good, and vice before vertue.

DIADEMUS.

You say well, and certes my friend this is a point worth the knowledge: much vaine jangling and prittle prattle verily doe these men make, but in the end they come to this conclusion, that 10 prudence is the science of good things & evil together: for that otherwise it could not stand but must needs altogether fall to the ground: For like as if we admit that there be truth, it cannot otherwise be but that falsity and untruth should be likewise hard by: so it is meet and stands to good reason, that if there be good things, the evil also must have their being.

LAMPRIAS

To grant the one of these not to be amisse said, yet me thinks I see of my selfe, that the other is cleane contrary. For I discern very well the difference: because that which is not truth, must immediately be false: but that which is not evil, is not by and by good: For betwene true and false there is no meane: but betwixt good and evil there is: to wit, indifferent. Neither followeth it necessarily, that both good and evil things should have their substance together, and that 20 if the one be, the other likewise should ensue. For it may be that nature had good, and required not the evil, so that it might have that which was neither good nor evil. But as touching the former reason, if your Academicks say ought of it. I would gladly heare from your mouth.

DIADEMUS.

Yes mary (quoth he) much there is alledged by them, but for this present relate I will, that which is most necessarie. First and formost, a mere folly it is to thinke that good things and evil have their subsistence for prudence sake. For contrariwise, when good and evil was before, then prudence followed after: like as physicke ensued upon things hollome and breeding diseases, which are supposed to have bene before. For surely the good and the evil came not up nor were brought forth, to the end that there should be prudence: but that faculty or power whereby 30 we judge and discern betwene evil and good is called prudence: like as the sight is a sense which serveth to distinguish blacke from white, which colours had not their being first, to the end that we should have our seeing, but contrariwise need we had of our seeing for to discern the said colours. Secondly when the world in that generall conflagration, which they hold and talke of, shall be all on a light fire and burnt, there will remaine behind nothing that evil is, but all shall then be wise and prudent: And therefore confesse they must, will they nill they, that there is prudence although there be no evil, neither is it necessary, that if wisdom be, evil also should have a being. But say it were absolutely so, that prudence were the science of evil and good, what harme or absurdity would follow, if upon the abolishing & annulling of evil things there were no prudence any more, but some other vertue in lieu thereof, which were not the 40 science of evil and good together, but onely of good? Like as among colours, if the blacke were quite perished and gone for ever, who will force us to confesse that the sense of seeing is likewise lost? And who would impeach or debarre us for saying that sight is not the sense of discerning blacke and white? Surely if any man would force upon us the contrary, what inconvenience and absurdity were there to answer him thus, Sir if we have not that sense that you speake of, yet we have another sense and naturall power instead of it, whereby we apprehend colours that be white and not white. And verily for mine owne part I doe not thinke that if there were no bitter things in the world, our taste should be therefore utterly lost, or the sense of feeling in case all dolour and paine were gone: no more am I perswaded that prudence should be abolished, if all evil were rid out of the way. But like as those senses would remaine to apprehend 50 sweet favours and pleasant objects of feeling, so this prudence also would continue to be the sciences of things good and not good. As for those who are of another opinion, let them take the name to themselves, so they leave us the thing indeed. But over and besides all this, what should hinder us to say, that the evil is in cogitation and intelligence; but good in reality and essence? like as, I suppose the gods enjoy the reall presence of health, where as they have the intelligence of the fever and pleurisie: considering that we also, albeit we were pestered with all the evils in the world, and had no affluence at all of good things as these men say, yet we want not the understanding what is prudence, what is good and what is felicity.

And this is a wonderfull thing, if there being no vertue present, yet some there are who teach what vertue is, and enforme us in the comprehension thereof; whereas if there were no such thing, it is impossible to have the intelligence of it; for doe but consider what they would persuade us to, who reason philosophically against common conceptions, namely, That by foolishnesse and ignorance, wee comprehend wisdom and prudence; but prudence without follie and ignorance, cannot conceive so much, as ignorance it selfe. And if nature had necessarily need of the generation of evil, certes, one example or two at the most of evil were sufficient; or if you will have it so, requir it was that there should be brought forth ten wicked 10 persons, or a thousand, or ten thousand, and not such an infinit multitude of vices, as the fands of the sea, the dust, or the feathers of divers plumed birds, could not afford so great a number: but of vertue not so much as a bare dreame or vaine vision. They that were the wardens and masters at Lacedemon, of those publike halles or dining places called Phiditra, were wont to bring forth and shew openly unto their youth, two or three of their slaves called Helot, full of wine, and starke drunke, that they might know thereby, what a shamefull and foule thing it was to be drunken, and so take heed of that vice, and learne to be sober. But in this life there be many such examples of vice in our actions; for there is not so much as one sober unto vertue, but we all trip and stumble, nay we wander as if our braines turned round about, living shamefully in 20 misery; and so farre forth are we intoxicate with our owne reason and selfe conceit, filled with so great perturbation and folly, that wee may be well and fitly likened to those dogs which as Aesop tells the tale, seeing certaine skinneres floating above the water, gaped so greedily for to have them, that they would needs drinke up all the sea before them, for to be sure of the said skinneres; but ere they could come by them, they drunke so much as they burst againe: and even we hoping by reason to acquire glory and reputation, and thereby to attaine unto vertue, are spoiled, marred, and destroyed therewith, before we can reach thereunto, being before-hand laden with a mighty deale of meere, heady, and bitter vice, if it be so, as these men give it out, that even they who have made good progresse and proceeded to the end, feeble for all that no ease, no alteration, no remission or breathing time at all from folly and infelicity. But marke I 30 pray againe, how he who saith, that vice was not produced and brought forth into the world unprofitably, depainteth it unto you what maner of thing hee describeth it to be, and what an heritage it is for him who hath it? For in his treatise of Duties or Offices he saith: That the vicious and sinful person, hath no want nor need of anything; that nothing is profitable, nothing meet and convenient for him. How then is vice commodious, wherewith neither health it selfe is expedient, nor store of money, ne yet advancement and promotion? And hath a man no need of those things, whereof some are precedent, preminent, and to be preferred, yea, and beleeve me, very profitable and commodious; others according to nature, as they themselves terme them? And of all these doeth no man finde need, unlesse he become wise? And so by this reckoning, hath the leawd and foolish man no need to become wise; neither be men thirsty 40 or hungry, before they are made wise? So that if they be dry, have they no need of water, nor if hungry, bread?

*Resembling right those gentle quest, who nought else did require,
But under rouse to shrowd their heads, and warme themselves at fire.*

And so belike he had no need of covert nor of mantell, who said:

*Give Hippanax a cloke his corps to fold,
For why, I shake and shiver hard for cold?*

But will you pronounce a paradox indeed, such an one as is extravagant and singular by it selfe? 50 Say hardly then; That a wise man wanteth nought, and hath need of nothing; he is rich, he is full and fortunate, he is of himselfe sufficient, blessed, happy, & every way absolute. But what a dizziness & giddiness of the braine is this to say; That he who is indigent of nothing, yet hath need of the good things which he hath; and that the lewd and vicious person is indigent of many things, and yet needeth nothing? for this is the very assertion which Chrysippus holdeth: That wicked persons have no need, and yet are indigent, turling, shifting, and transposing the common notions, like unto cockall bones or chesse-men upon the board. For all men deeme thus, that to have need, goeth before indigence, supposing him that standeth in need of things which which are not ready at hand, nor easie to be gotten, is indigent. To make this more plaine, no man is said to be indigent of hornes or of wings, for that he hath no need of them; but we say truly and properly, that some have need of armour, of monie, and of apparell, when in the penury and want of these things, they neither have them nor can come by them, to supply their necessity. But these Stoicks are so desirous to be thought alwaies for to brooch somewhat against common sense and conception, that many times they forget themselves and slip out of their owne proper opinions, so much affected they are and given to new conceits; like as in this place, if you please to call your eie unto Chrysippus, and looke somewhat behinde, calling to minde what hath heretofore bene delivered.

This is one of his positions, affirmed even against common sense, and vulgar opinion, that no evil and foolish man can finde good and profit by any thing; and yet many of them by institution and teaching, proceed forward and profit; many who were slaves, become enfranchized; besieged, are delivered; drunken, are guided and lead by the hand; sicke and diseased, are cured of their maladies: but for all this forsooth, they are never the better whatsoever is done unto them; no benefits they receive, no benefactors they have, no nor neglect those who deserve well of them: and so vicious persons are not unthankfull, no more than are good and wise men. And thus ingratitude is not arar, nor hath any being; for that the good never intervert, nor misrecognize the favour and benefit which they have received; and the wicked are capable of none at all. But see (I pray you) what shift they make to save & answer all this: They say (forsooth) that grace, favour, or benefit is ranged in the number of meane things: and that to helpe or be helped, appertaineth onely to the wise. True it is they say, that wicked receive also a grace or benefit. What is that? Those who have part in a benefit, have not they also a part of use and commodity? and whereto a grace or benefit reacheth, doth nothing that is commodious and convenient, extend thither? And is there ought else that maketh a demerit or pleasure done to be a grace, than that the party who doth the pleasure should in some respect be commodious unto the needy receiver?

LAMPRIAS.

But let these matters passe, and tell us what is that ἀρετή, that is to say, utility, which they prize so highly, and whereof they make so great account?

DIADUMENUS.

This is a thing (I may tell you) which they revere and keepe as a great matter and a singularity for their Sages onely, and yet leave them not so much as the name of it. If one wise man, say they, do but put forth his finger prudently, wheresoever it be, all the wise men that are in the whole continent and habitable world find this ἀρετή and utility by it. This is the onely gift and worke of the amity that is among them, and in this doe determine and end the vertues of wise men, namely, the entercourse of common profit and utility, passing to and fro betweene them. As for Aristotle, he doted, Xenocrates also doted, who taught and affirmed that men had helpe from the gods, helpe from their parents, and helpe by their teachers and scholemasters: but never understood they this wonderfull helpe and commoditie, which these wise men receive one from another, when they be moved to vertue, although they be not together, no nor so much as know one another. And verily all men do thinke, that to gather, to lay up, to keepe, to dispense and bestow, is conducrable and profitable, when there is received profit and commodity by such things. And a good substantiall householder buyes himselfe locks and keyes, he kepeth his cellars, his closets and coffers,

*Taking great joy his chamber doore with hand for to unlocke, Where lies of golde and silver both,
his treasure and his Locke.*

But to gather and lay up, to keepe with great care, diligence and paine, those things which are for nothing profitable, is neither honourable, nor yet seemly and honest. If then Ulysses, being taught by Circé to make that fast knot, had with it tied sure and sealed up as it were, not the gifts and presents which Alcinous gave him, to wit, treasurs, pots, plate clothes, apparell and gold; but some trash, as sticks, stones and other pelfe raked together, thinking it a great felicity for him to possesse and keepe charily such ruffe-raffe and trumperie: who would have praised and commended him for it, or imitated this foolish foresaith, wildeffe, providence, and vaine diligence? And yet this is the goodly and beautifull honesty of the Stoicks profession in generall, this is their honourable gravity, this is their beatiude; and nothing els is it, but an heaping up, a keeping and and preserving of things unprofitable and indifferent. For such be those which they say are according to nature; and much more those outward matters: forasmuch as sometime they compare the greatest riches with fringes and chamber-pots of golde, yea and (I assure you) otherwhiles as it falleth out, with oile cruets. And afterwards, like as those who thinke they have most insolently and proudly abused with blasphemous words and polluted the temples, the sacred ceremonies and religious services of some gods or divine powers, presently change their note, and become penitent persons, and falling downe prostrate, or sitting humbly below upon the ground, blefse and magnifie the heavenly power of the Godhead; even so they, as incurring the vengeance and plague of God for their presumptuous follies, arrogant and vaine speeches, are found puddering and raking againe in these indifferent things, nothing indeed pertinent unto them; setting out a throat and crying as loud as they can, what a gay matter, what a goodly and honourable thing it is, to gather and lay up such commodities, and especially the communion and fellowship of enjoying and using them: also that whosoever want the same, and can not come by them, have no reason to live any longer; but either to lay violent hands on themselves, or by long fasting and abstinence from all viands, to shorten their lives, bidding vertue farewell for ever. And these men verily, howsoever they repute Theognis to be a man altogether of a base and abject minde, for saying thus in verse,

*A man from povertie to flee,
O Cyrmis, ought himselfe to cast
Headlong from rocks most sleepe and bie,
Or into seas deepe and wast.*

themselves meane while in prose give these exhortations, and say, that to avoid a grievous malady, and escape exceeding paine, a man ought (if he had not a sword or dagger neere at hand, nor a poisoned cup of hemlocke) to cast himselfe into the sea, or els fall headlong and break like his necke from some sleepe rocke: yet affirme they, that neither the one nor the other is hurtfull, evil or unprofitable; nor maketh those miserable, who fall into such accidents. Whence then shall I begin (quoth he) what ground-worke and foundation of duty shall I lay, or what shall I make the subject and matter of vertue, leaving nature, and abandoning that which is according to nature? And whereto (I pray you, good sir) begin Aristotle and Theophrastus? what principles take Xenocrates and Polemon? And even Zeno himselfe, hath he not followed them, in supposing Nature and that which is according to Nature, for to be the elements of felicity? But these great clerks verily, tested here in these things, as eligible, expetible, good and profitable; adjoining moreover unto them, vertue, which employeth the same, and worketh by ech of them according to their proper use; thinking in so doing, to accomplish a perfect and entire life, and to consummate that concord and agreement which is in truth forthable and consonant unto Nature. For they made no confused mish-mash, nor were contrary to themselves, as those who leape and mount on high from the ground, and immediately fall downe upon it againe, and in naming the same things, meet to be cholen, and yet not expetible; proper and convenient, and withall not good; unprofitable, and yet fit for good uses; nothing at all pertinent unto us, and yet forsooth, the very principles of duties and offices. But looke what was the speech of these noble and famous personages, the same also was their life; their deeds (I say) were answerable and conformable to their words. Contrariwise, the sect of these Stoicks, doth according to that craftie woman whom Archilochus describeth, to cary water in the one hand, and fire in the other: for in some of their doctrines and assertions they receive and admit nature, in another they reject her; or to speake more plainly; in their acts and deeds they adhere and cleave unto those things which are according to nature, as being eligible and simply good; but in their disputations and discourses they refuse and condemne the same as things indifferent and nothing available to vertue for the acquiring of felicity: nay, that which worke is, they give her hard and reprochfull teames. And forasmuch as all men generally are perswaded in their minds, that the soveraigne good is a thing ioyous, exoptable, happie, most honourable, and of greatest dignitie, sufficient of it selfe, and wanting nothing. See now this soveraigne good of theirs, and examine it according to this common opinion: To put forth ones finger like a fage and wife Philosopher, doth this make that ioyous good? or what exoptable thing I pray you, is a prudent torture? who casteth himselfe downe headlong from an high rocke, so he do it with a colour of reason and honesty, is he happy and fortunate? is that most honourable and of greatest price and dignity, which reason many times chuseth to reject, for another thing that of it selfe is not good? is that all-sufficient in it selfe, accomplished and perfect, which whosoever do

presently enjoy, if haply they can not obtaine withall, some one of these indifferent things, they will not deigne to live any longer? was there ever known any discourse or disputation wherein use and ordinary custome suffered more outrage and abuse, which stealing and plucking from it the true and naturall conceptions, as legitimate children of her owne, putteth in the place, bastards, changelings, of a monstrous and savage kinde, and constraineth it to love, cherish and keepe them in lieu of the other? And thus have they done in treating of good things and evil, expetible and to be avoided, proper and strange; which ought to have beene more cleerely and plainly distinguished, than hot from colde, or white colours from blacke. For the apprehensions and conceits of these qualities, are from without forth brought in by the senses naturall; but the other are within vs, taking their originall from those good things that we have within us. Now these men entering into the question and common place of soveraigne felicity, with their Logicke subtilties, as if they were to handle the lying sophisme called Pseudomenos; or that masterfull manner of reasoning named Kyritton, have not solved one of the doubts and questions which there were, but mooved and raised an infinite number of others that were not there before.

Moreover, there is no man who knoweth not that there being two sorts of good things; the one which is the very utmost end, and the other, the means to attaine thereto: the one is more excellent and perfect of the twaine. And Chrysippus himselfe knoweth well enough this difference, as it may appeare by that which he hath written in his third booke of Good things: for he disagreeeth with those who are of opinion, that the end or soveraigne good, is science; and putteth this downe in his treatise of Justice: If there be any who suppose that pleasure is the end of good things, hee thinketh not that Justice can be false; if not the finall end, but simply good and no more, he is of another minde. I do not thinke that you would heare me at this present to rehearse his owne words, for his third booke as touching Justice, is extant and to be had every where. When as they say therefore (my friend) elsewhere, that no good thing is greater or lesse than another, but that the finall end is equall with that which is not the end, and no better than it, it is evident that they be contrary and repugnant not onely to the common notions, but also to their owne very words. And againe, if of two evils, the one maketh us woofe than we were when it came unto us; and the other hurrieth us indeed, but maketh vs not woofe: that evill in mine opinion is the greater which maketh us worse: neither doth that more hurt, which causeth us not to be the woofe. And Chrysippus verily confesseth, that there be certeine feares, sorrowes and deceitfull illusions, which well may hurt and offend us, but not make us woofe. But reade over and peruse the first of those books which are written against Plato, as concerning Justice: for in respect of other causes, it were very well done and worth your labour, to note the frivolous babling in that place of this man, where he makes no spare to deliver all matters and doctrines whatsoever indifferently, even those aswell of his owne sect as of other strangers, flat opposit to common sense: as for example, That it is lawfull to propose two ends and two scopes of our life, and not to referre all that ever we do unto one end. And yet more than that, is this also a common notion, That the end verily is one, but every thing that is done, ought to have a relation to another; and yet of necessity, they must abide the one or the other. For if the first things according to nature be not expetible for themselves and the last end; but rather the reasonable election and choise of them; and if every man doth what lies in him, to have and obtaine those things which are first according to nature, and all actions and operations have their reference thither, namely, to acquire and enjoy the principall things according to nature: if (I say) they thinke so, it must needs be that without aspiring and aiming for to get and attaine those things, they have another end to which they must referre the election and choise of the said things, and not the things themselves: for thus will be the end, even to know how to chuse them well and to take them wisely; but the things themselves and the enjoying of them, will be of small moment, being as a matter and subject which hath the dignity and estimation: for thus I suppose they use and put downe in writing this very word to shew the difference.

LAMPRIAS.

Certes you have passing well and woorthily reported unto us, both what they say, and how they deliver it.

DIADUMENUS.

But marke I beseech you, how they fare like unto those who will needs streine themselves to leape over and beyond their owne shadow; for they leave not behinde, but carie evermore with them some absurdity in their speech, and the same farre remote alwaies from common sense sense: for as if one should say, That an archer doeth all that lieth in him, not to hit the marke, but to doe all that ever he can; he might be justly taken for a man, who spake enigmatickally & by dark riddles, and uttered strange and prodigious words: even so doe these old doting fooles, who with all their power endeavour to maintaine, that to obtaine the things according to nature, is not the end of aiming and aspiring to things according to nature; but forsooth to take and chuse them; and that the desire of health and seeking after it in any man, endeth not in health of each one, but contrariwise, that health is referred to the appetite and seeking after it: saying moreover, that to walke, to read, or speake aloud, to endure sections or incisions, yea and to take purging medicines, so all be done by reason, are the ends of health, and not it, the end of those means. Certes, these men doe rave, & speake idly, as well as they who should say, let me goe to supper, that we may sacrifice, bath, or sweat in the stouph. Nay (that which more is) that which these men say, perverteth order and custome, and containeth a confusion, shuffling & turning upside downe of al our affaires whatsoever. We study not say they, to walke in due time, for to concoct & digest our meats well; but we concoct and digest our meat, because we might walke in due season. Why? Hath nature given us health for Ellebore, or rather brought forth Ellebore for health sake? For what could be uttered more strange and absurd, than such propositions as these? and what difference is there betwene him who saith, that health was made for medicinable drogues, and not drogues medicinable for health? and another who holdeth, that the gathering, the choise, the composition and use of such medicines, is to be preferred before health it selfe? or rather he thinks that health is not in any respect expetible: but hee setteth downe the very end in the penning and handling of those medicines, affirming forsooth that appetite is the end of fruition, and not fruition of appetite: And why not (quoth he) all while there be added thereto these termes; considerately and with reason. True will we say againe, if a man have regard unto the obtaining and enjoying of the thing which he pursueth; for otherwise that considerate reason is to no purpose, in case all be done for to obtaine that, the fruition whereof is neither honorable nor happy.

LAMPRIAS.

And since we are fallen upon this discourse, a man may say, that any thing else whatsoever, is according to common sense rather, than to hold, that without having notice or conception of good, a man may desire and pursue after it; for you live how Chrysippus himselfe divideth Zetison into these streights, as to imagine and dreame of a certeine indifferencie in things tending to that which is neither good nor ill, before that the said good and ill is sufficiently known and understood; for so it might seeme that this indifferencie must needs subsist before if it be so, that a man cannot conceive the intelligence of it, unlesse the good were first understood, which is nothing else but the onely and soveraigne good indeed.

DIADUMENUS.

But consider I pray you, and make now this indifferencie * taken out of the Stoicks schoole, and which they call isopathias, after what maner, and whereby it hath given us the meane to imagine and conceive in our minde that good? for if without the said good, it is not possible to conceive and imagine the indifferencie respective to that which is not good; much lesse the intelligence of good things yeldeth any cogitation unto them, who had not before some prenotion of the good. But like as there is no cogitation, of the art of things which be holmoe or breeding sicknesse in them who had not a precogitation before of those things: even so it is impossible for them to conceive the science of good and evill things, who had no fore-conceit what were good and what were evill? What then is good? nothing but prudence; and what is prudence, nothing but science: and so according to that old common proverbe * Δις Κλέοςτες, * A by-word that is to say, Jupiters Corinth; is oftentimes applied unto their maner of reasoning. For let which the pestill round about, because you may not be thought to scoff the paralogisme or fault in arguing, and laugh at them, although in truth their speech is much after that maner; for it seemeth that for the intelligence of good, one hath need to understand prudence: & againe, to seeke for prudence in the intelligence of good; being driven to pursue the one alwaies for the other, and so to faile both of the one and the other, which implieth a meere contrariety, in that we must alwaies understand the thing before, which cannot be understood apart. Besides, there is another way, whereby a man may perceive and see, not the perversion and distortion, but the very confusion and destruction of all their reasons.

They hold that the very substance of good, is the reasonable and considerate election of that which is according to nature; now this election is not considerate which is directed to some end,

end, as is before said: And what is this? Nothing else say they, but to discourse with reason in the elections of those things which be according to nature. First and formost then, the conception of the soveraigne good, is perished and cleane gone; for this considerate discoursing in elections, is an operation depending of the habitude of good discourse; and therefore being compelled to conceive this habitude from the end, and the end not without it, we come (short of the intelligence of the both. And againe, that which yet is more, by all the reason in the world, it must needs be that the said reasonable and considerate election, was the election of things good, profitable, and cooperant to the attaining of the end. For to chuse such things, which be neither expedient, nor honourable, nor yet any way eligible; how can it stand with reason: for suppose it were as they say; that the end were a reasonable election of things which have some dignity and worthinesse, making unto felicitie. See I beseech you how their discourse and disputation ariseth unto a trim point and goodly conclusion in the end: For the end (say they) is the good discourse, in making choise of those things which have dignity, making unto happinesse. Now when you heare these words, thinke you not my good friend, that this is a very strange and extravagant opinion?

LAMPRIAS.

Yes verily; but I would willingly know, how this hapneth?

DIADUMENUS.

Then must you lay your eare close, and harken with great attention, for it is not for every one to conceive this enigmatical riddle: But heare you sir, and make me answer: Is not the 20 end by their saying, the good discourse in elections according to nature?

DIADUMENUS.

That is their saying.

LAMPRIAS.

And these things which be according to nature, they chuse (doe they not) as good, or having some dignities and preferences inducing to the end, or to some other thing else.

DIADUMENUS.

I thinke not so: but surely, to the end.

LAMPRIAS.

Having discovered thus much already, see now to what point they are come, namely, that 30 their end is to discourse well of felicity.

DIADUMENUS.

They say directly, that they neither have nor conceive any other thing of felicity, but this precious rectitude of discourse touching the elections of things that are of worth. Howbeit some there be who say that all this refutation is directed against Antipater alone, and not the whole sect of the Stoicks, who perceiving himselfe to be urged & hardly pressed by Carneades, fell into these vanities and foolish shifts for his evasion.

Moreover, as touching that which is discoursed and taught in the Stoicks schoole, Of Love, ven against common notions, it concerneth all the Suppots in generall of that sect, who have every one of them their hand in the absurdity thereof: for they avouch that yong youths, are 40 foule and deformed, if they be vicious and foolish: but the wife onely are beawtiful: and yet of these that are thus faire and beawtiful, there was never any one yet either beloved, or lovely and amiable. And yet this is not so absurd: but they say moreover, that such as are in love with those who be foule, cease to love them when they are become faire. And who hath ever scene or known such a kinde of love which should kinde and shew it selfe presently upon the discovery of the bodies deformity and the foules vice: and incontinently, be quenched and vanish away after the knowledge of passing beawty, together with justice and temperance? And verily such I suppose doe properly resemble these gnats, which love to settle upon vineger, foule wine or the some thereof: but the good and pleasant potable wine they care not for, but flie from it. As for that emphaticall apparence of beawty (for that is the terme they give it) which they say is the 50 alluring & attractive bait of love: first and formost it carieth no probability with it nor likelihood of reason. For in those who are most foule and wicked in the highest degree there can be no such emphaticall apparence of that beawty: in case it be so as they say that the leawdnesse of maners sheweth in the face and infecteth the visage: for there be some of them who expound this strange position as strangely, saying that a foule person is worthy to be loved, because there is some hope and expectance that one day he will become faire: many when he hath gotten this beawty once, and is withall become good and honest, then he is beloved of no man. For love say say they, is a certaine hunting as it were after a yong body, as yet rude and imperfect, howbeit framed by nature unto vertue.

LAMPRIAS.

And what other thing doe we now, my good friend, but refute the errors of their sect, who do thus force, pervert and destroy all our common conceptions with their actions which be senselesse, and their words and termes as unusuall and strange? For there was no person to hinder this love of wise men toward yong folke if affection were away: although all men and women to, both thinke and imagin love to be such a passion, as the woers of Penelope in Homer seeme to acknowledge,

Whose heat of love was such that in their hart

Like as Jupiter also said to Juno in another place of the said poet:

Come let us now to bed both goe, and there with sweet delight

Solace our selves: for never earst before remember I

That any love to women faire no nor to Gods esse bright

Thou tam'd my hart, or prickt me so, with them to company.

DIADUMENUS.

Thus you see how they expell and drive morall philosophy into such matters as these,

So increase and tortuous,

So winding quire throughout

That nothing sound is therein found,

But all turnes round about.

And yet they deprave vilipend, disgrace and flout all others, as if they were the men alone who restored nature and custome into their integrity as it ought to be, instituted their speech accordingly: But nature of it selfe doth divert and induce, by appetitions, pursuits inclinations and impulsions, ech thing to that which is proper and fit for it. And as for the custome of Logicke being so wrangling and contentious as it is, it receiveth no good at all nor profit: like as the eare diseased by vaine sounds is filled with thickenesse and hardnesse of hearing. Of which if you thinke so good we will begin anew and discourse else were another time: but now for this 30 present let us take in hand to run over their naturall philosophy, which no lesse troubleth and confoundeth common anticipations and conceptions in the maine principles and most important points, than their morall doctrine as touching the ends of all things. First and formost this is apparently absurd and against all common sense, to say, that a thing is, & yet hath no being nor essence: and the things which are not, yet have a being: which though it be most absurd, they affirme even of the universall world: for putting downe this supposition that there is round about the said world a certaine infinit voidnesse, they affirme that the universall world is neither body nor bodilesse: whereupon ensueth that the world is, and yet hath no existence. For they call bodies onely, existent: for as much as it is the property of a thing existent, to doe 40 and suffer somewhat: And seeing this universall nature hath no existence; therefore it shall neither doe nor suffer ought: neither shall it be in any place, for that which occupieth place is a body, but that universall thing is not a body. Moreover that which occupieth one and the same place is said to remaine and rest: and therefore the said universall nature doth not remaine, for that it occupieth no place: and that which more is, it mooveth not at all, first because that which mooveth ought to be in a place and roome certaine. Again, because whatsoever mooveth, either mooveth it selfe, or else is mooved by another: now that which mooveth it selfe, hath certaine inclinations either of lightnesse or ponderosity: which ponderosity and lightnesse, be either certaine habitudes, or faculties & powers, or else differences of ech body: but that universality, is no body: whereupon it must of necessity follow that the same is neither light nor heavy, and so by good consequence hath in it no principle or beginning of motion; which shall it 50 be mooved of another, for without & beyond it there is nothing: so that they must be forced to say, as they doe indeed, that the said universall nature doth neither rest nor moove. In sum, for that according to their opinion, we must not say in any case that it is a body, and yet the heaven, the earth, the living creatures, plants, men and stones be bodies: that which is no body it selfe shall by these reckonings have parts thereof, which are bodies and that which is not ponderous, shall have parts weightie, and that which is not light, shall have parts light: which is as much against common sense and conceptions, as dreames are not more; considering that there is nothing so evident and agreeable to common sense than this distinction, If any thing be not aminate, inmate, the same is inanimate : and againe, if a thing be not inanimate, the same is animate. And yet this manifest evidence they subvert and overthrow, affirming thus as they do, that this universall frame is neither animate nor inanimate. Over and besides, no man thinketh or imagineth that the same is imperfect, considering that there is no part thereof wanting; and yet they holde it to be imperfect : For (say they) that which is perfect, is finite and determinate; but the whole and universall world, for the infinitenesse thereof is indefinite. So by their saying, something there is, that is neither perfect nor imperfect. Moreover, neither is the said universall frame a part, because there is nothing greater than it; nor yet the whole; for that which is whole, must be affirmed likewise to be digested and in order; whereas being as it is, infinite, it is indeterminate and out of order. Furthermore, The other, is not the cause of the universall world, for that there is no other beside it; neither is it the cause of The other, nor of it selfe, for that it is not made to do any thing; and we take a cause to be that which worketh an effect. Now for ease we should demand of all the men in the world, what they imagine Nothing to be, and what conceit they have of it, would they not say (thinke you) that it is that which is neither a cause it selfe, nor hath any cause of it; which is neither a part, nor yet the whole; neither perfect nor imperfect; neither having a soule, nor yet without a soule; neither moving nor still & quiet, nor subsisting; and neither body nor without body? For what is all this, but Nothing? yet, what all others do affirme and verifie of Nothing, the same doe they alone of the universall world: so that it seemeth they make All and Nothing, both one. Thus they must be driven to say, that Time is nothing, neither Prædicable, nor Proposition, nor Connexion, nor Composition, 20 which be termes of Logicke, that they use, no Philosophers so much; and yet they say, that they have no existence nor being. But (that which more is) they holde that Truth, although it be, yet it hath no being nor subsistence, but is comprehended onely by intelligence, is perceptible and beleaved, although it have no iote of essence. How can this be saved and saved, but that it must surpass the most monstrous absurdity that is? But because it may not be thought that all this smelleth overmuch of the quirks and difficulties in Logicke, let us treat of those which are more proper unto Naturall philosophie. Forasmuch therefore, as they themselves give out, they of all men especially ought to have reformed, rectified redressed 30 and reduced to the best order, the common conceptions of men as touching the Gods, if haply there had crept into them any error and perplexed doubt; or if not so, yet at leastwise, to have let every man alone, and left them to the opinion which the lawes and customes of the countreys wherein they were borne, prescribed unto them as touching religion and divinitie.

*Jupiter is the first, the mid, the last, even all in all,
By him all things begin, proceed, and have their finall.*

*For neither now nor yesterday
These deepe conceits of God began,
Time out of mind, they have beene ay,
But no man knowes, where, how, nor when.*

But these Stoicks having begunne even from the domestically goddesse Vesta (as the proverbe saith) to alter and change the opinion established and received in every countrey, touching religion and the belief of God, they have not left so much as one conceit or cogitation that way sound, sincere and incorrupted. For where is or ever was the man, besides themselves, who doth not conceive in his minde, that God is immortal and eternall? what is more generally acknowledged in our common conceptions as touching the Gods, or what is pronounced with more assent and accord than such sentences as these?

*And there the Gods do alwaies joy
In heavenly blisse, without annoy.*

*Allo,
In heaven the Gods immortal all ever be:
On earth below, poore mortall men walke we.*

*Again,
Exempt from all disesse and crasse age,
The Gods do live in joy, and paine feele none:
They feare no death nor dread the darke passage
Over the Frith of roaring Acheron.*

There may peradventure be found some barbarous and savage nations, who thinke of no God at all; but never was there man having a conception and imagination of God, who esteemed him him not withall to be immortal and everlasting. For even these vile wretches called Acad., that is to say, Atheists, such as Diagoras, Theodorus, and Hippoc. godlesse though they were, could never finde in their hearts to say and pronounce, That God was corruptible. Onely, they could not beleve and be perswaded in their minde, that there was any thing in the world not subject to corruption. Thus howsoever they admitted not a subsistence of immortality & incorruptibility, yet retained they the common anticipation of the Gods: but Chrysippus & Cleantes, having made the heaven, the earth, the aire and sea to ring againe, as a man would say, with their words, and filled the whole world with their writings of the Gods, yet of so many Gods, they make not one immortal, but Jupiter onely; and in him they spend and consume all the rest: so 10 that this propertie in him, to resolve and kill others, is never a jote better, than to be resolved and destroyed himselfe. For as it is a kinde of infirmitie, by being changed into another for to die; so it is no lesse imbecillitie to be maintained and nourished by the resolution of others into it selfe. And this is not like to many other absurdities collected and gathered by consequence out of their fundamentall suppositions, or inferred upon other assertions of theirs; but even they themselves cry out with open mouth expressly in all their writings, of the gods, of providence, of destiny and nature, that all the gods had a beginning of their essence, and shall perish and have an end by fire, melted and resolved, as if they were made of waxe or time. So that to say that a man is immortal, and that God is mortall, is all one, and the one as absurd and against common sense as the other: nay rather I cannot see what difference 20 there will be between a man and God, in case God be defined, a reasonable animall, and corruptible: for if they oppose and come in with this their fine and subtle distinction, that man indeed is mortall, but God not mortall, yet subject to corruption; make what an inconvenience doth follow and depend thereupon: for of necessity they must say, either that God is immortal and corruptible withall; or else neither mortall nor immortal: then which a man can not (if he would of purpose study for it) devide a more strange and monstrous absurdity. I speake this by tongue; for that these men must be allowed to say any thing, neither have there escaped their tongues and pens, the most extravagant opinions in the world.

Moreover Cleantes minding still to fortifie and confirme that burning and conflagration of his, saith: That the sunne will make like unto himselfe, the moone with all other starres, and 30 turne them into him. But that which of all others is most monstrous, the moone and other starres, being forsooth gods, worke together with the sunne, unto their owne destruction, and confesse somewhat to their owne inflammation. Now surely this were a very mockerie, and ridiculous thing for us to powre out our praies and oracions unto them for our owne safety, and to repute them the favours of men, if it be kinde and naturall for them to make haste unto their owne corruption and dissolution. And yet these men cease not by all the meanes they can to insult over Epicurus, crying, Fie, fie for shame, & redoubling, Out upon him, for that by denying the divine providence, he troubled & confounded the general prenotion and conception in our minds of the gods; for that they are held and reputed by all men, not onely immortal and happy, but also humane and benigne, having a carefull eye, and due regard to the good and welfare 40 of men, as in trueth they have. Now if they who take away the providence of God, doe withall abolish the common prenotion of men as touching God; what doe they then, who avouch that the gods indeed have care of us; but yet are helpless to us in nothing, neither give they us any good things, but such onely as be indifferent; not enduing us with vertue, but bestowing upon us riches, health, procreation of children, and such like, of which there is not one profitable, expedient, eligible or available. Is it not certaine that these over throw the common conceptions that are of the gods? neither rest they heere, but fall to flouting, frumping, and scoffing, whiles they give out that there is one god, fumnamed Εὐαγέριος, that is to say, the superintendent over the fruits of the earth; another Πατριάρχης, that is to say, the patron of generation; another Προστάτης, that is to say, the protectour of plants; another Παις, and Πατριάρχης, that is to say, 50 the president of physicke and divination; meane while neither is health simply good, nor generation, ne yet fertilitye of the ground and abundance of fruits, but indifferent, yea and unprofitable to those who have them.

The third point of the comon conception of the gods is, that they differ in nothing so much from men, as in felicity and vertue: but according to Chrysippus, they are in this respect nothing superior to men: for he holdeth, that for vertue Jupiter is no better than Dion; also that Jupiter & Dion being both of them wife, doe equally and reciprocally helpe one another: for this is the good that the gods doe unto men, and men likewise unto the gods, namely, when they proove wife wife and prudent, and not otherwise. So that if a man be no lesse vertuous, he is not lesse happy; inasmuch as he is equall unto Jupiter the saviour in felicitie, though otherwise infortunate, and who for grievous maladies and dolorous dismembering of his body, is forced to make himselfe away, and leave his life, provided alwaies that he be a wife man. Howbeit, such an one there neither is nor ever hath bene living upon the earth: whereas contrariwise infinit thousands and millions there are and have bene of miserable men and extreme infortunate under the rule and dominion of Jupiter, the government & administration wherof is most excellent. And what can there be more against common sense, than to say, that Jupiter governing and dispensing all things passing well, yet we should be exceeding miserable? If therefore (which unlawfull is once to speake) Jupiter would no longer be a saviour, nor a deliverer, nor a protectour, and furnished thereupon Soter, Lyssus, and Alexisaeos, but cleane contrary unto these goodly and beautifull denominations, there can not possibly be added any more goodnesse to things that be, either in number or magnitude as they say; whereas all men live in the extremitie of miserie and wickednesse, considering that neither vice can admit no augmentation, nor misery addition: and yet this is not the worst nor greatest absurdity: but mightily angry and offended they are with Menander for speaking as he did thus bravely in open theater:

*I hold, good things exceeding meane degree,
The greatest cause of humane miserie.*

For this (say they) is against the common conception of men; meane while themselves make God, who is good and goodnesse it selfe, to be the author of evils: for matter could not verily produce any evill of it selfe, being as it is without all qualities; and all those differences and varieties which it hath, it received of that which moved and formed it, to wit, reason within, which giveth it a forme and shape, for that it is not made to moove and shape it selfe. And therefore it cannot otherwise be, but that evill if it come by nothing, should proceed and have being from that which is not; or if it come by some moving cause, the same must be God. For if they thinke that Jupiter hath no power of his owne parts, nor useth ech one according to his owne proper reason; they speake against common sense, and doe imagine a certaine animall, whereof many parts are not obseant to his will; but use their owne private actions and operations, whereunto the whole, never gave incitation, nor began in them any motion. For among those creatures which have life and soule, there is none so ill framed and composed, as that against the will thereof, either the feet should goe forward, or the tongue speake, or the horne push and strike, or the teeth bite; whereof God of necessity must endure & abide the most part, if against his will, evill men being parts of himselfe doe lie, doe circumvent and beguile others, commit burglary, breake open houses, to rob their neighbors, or kill one another. And if according as Chrysippus saith, it is not possible that the least part should behave it selfe otherwise than it pleaseth Jupiter, and that every living thing doeth rest, stay, and moove, according as he leadeth, manageth, turneth, staith and disposeth it:

*Now well I wot, this voice of his,
Sounds worse and more mischievous is.*

For more tolerable it were by a great deale to say, that ten thousand parts, through the impotence and feebleness of Jupiter, committed many absurdities perforce even against his nature and will, than to avouch that there is no intemperance, no deceit and wickednesse, whereof Jupiter is not the cause.

Moreover seeing that the world by their saying is a city, and the Sarres citizens: if it be so, there must be also tribes and magistracies: yea and plaine it is, that the Sunne must be a Senator, yea & the evening starre, some provost, major or governor of the city. And I wot not well whether he who taketh in hand to confute such things, can broche and set abroad other greater absurdities in naturall matters than those doe, who deliver and pronounce these doctrines. Is not this a position against common sense to affirme, that the seed should be greater and more than that which is engendered of it? For we see verily that nature in all living creatures, and so plants even those that be of a wilde and savage kinde, taketh very small and slender matters, such as hardly can be seene, for the beginning & the generation of most great and huge bodies. For not onely of a graine or corne of wheat it produceth a stalk with an eare, and of a little grape stone it bringeth forth a vine tree, but also of a pepin, kernill, akorne or berry escaped and fallen by chance from a bird, as if of some sparkle it kindled and set on fire generation, it fendeth forth the stocke of some bush or thorne or else a tall and mighty body of an oak, a date or pine tree. And hereupon it is that generall seed is called Σπερμα, in Greeke, as one would say against that is to say, the enfolding and wrapping together of a great masse into a small quantity: also nature taketh the name of σπέρμα, as it were σπέρματος, that is to say, the inflation and deflusion of proportions and numbers, which are opened & loosed under it. And againe, the fire which they say is the seed of the world, after that generall conflagration, shall change into the owne seed, the world, which from a smaller body and little masse is extended into a great inflation and deflusion, yea and moreover occupieth an infinite space of voidnesse which it filleth by his augmentation: but as it is engendered, that huge greatnesse retireth and sedeth anon, by reason that the matter is contracted and gathered into it selfe upon the generation. We may heare them dispute, and reade many of their books, and discourses, wherein they argue and crie out against the Academicks, for confounding all things with their Απαλαξίες, that is to say, indistinguishable identities striving and forcing to make in two natures, one endowed with the like quality. And yet what man living is their who conceiveth and knoweth not as much? or supposeth not the contrary, namely, that it were a marvellous strange thing & a very absurdity, if neither stocke-dove to stocke-dove, beeto bee, wheat-corne to wheat-corne, and as the common proverbe goeth, one figge unto another hath bene at all times alike and fensible.

But this in very deed and truth is cleane contrary to all common sense, that these men holde and affirme: how in one substance, there be properly and particularly two qualified, and how the same substance having particularly one qualified, when there cometh another to it, receiveth and keepeth them both, the one as well as the other. For if we admit two, I avouch it may as well have three, fower, five and as many as one will name, in one and the same substance, I say not in divers parts, but all equally and indifferently, though they were infinit, even in the whole. Now Chrysippus saith, that Jupiter, as also the world, resembleth a man, and providence the soule: when as then that conflagration of the world shall be, Jupiter, who onely of all the gods is immortal, shall retire unto providence, and both twaine shall remaine together in the substance of the skie. But leave we now the gods for this present, and pray we unto them that they would vouchsafe to give unto the Stoicks, a common sense and understanding according with other men, and let us see now what they say as touching the elements. This first and formost standeth not with the received conceit and opinion of the world, that a bodie should be the place of a body, and that one body should enter and pierce through another bodie, considering that neither the one nor the other containeth vacuity: but that which is full entereth into that which is full, and that which hath no distance receiveth into it selfe that which is mingled with it, but that which is full and solid, hath no void distance in it selfe by reason of continuity. And these men verily not thrusting one into one, nor two nor three, nor ten together, but cast all parts of the world cur pece-meale, into one, which they first meet with, even the least that is by sense perceptible: saying moreover that it will containe the greatest that shall come unto it. Thus in a braverie after their old manner in many other things, make of that which convinceth and refelleth them, one of their sentences and resolutions, as they who take for suppositions, those things which be repugnant to common sense. And thus upon this supposall, there must needs ensue many monstrous and prodigious positions when they once confusedly mingle whole bodies with whole: and among those absurd paradoxes this also may goe for one, That three be fower. For even that which others bring in & alledge for an example of that which cannot fall into mans imagination, they holde for an undoubted truth: saying, that when one cyath of wine is mingled with two of water, it wanteth not but is equall in the whole, and thus confounding them together, they bring it so about, that one is made twaine, by the equal mixture of one with two: for that one remaineth, and is spread as much as twaine, making that which is equall to a duple. Now if by the mixture with two, it taketh the measure of two in the deflusion, this must needs be the measure together, both of three and of fower: of three because one is mingled with twaine: and of fower, for that being mingled with twaine, it hath as much in quantity, as those wherewith it is mingled. This fine device hapneth unto them, because they put bodies within a body, and for that it cannot be imagined how they cause one to containe another. For, of necessity it must be that bodies making a penetration one within another by mixture, that the one should not containe and the other be contained, nor the one receive and the other be received within. For so this should not be a commixion but a contiguity and touching of superficies one close to another, whiles one entrench within forth, and the other encloseth without, when the other parts remaine pure and entire without mixture, and so shall be one of many divers and differing asunder. But it cannot otherwise be as they would have it, that when there is a mixture, the things mingled, should not be mixed one within another: and that one selfe same thing being within should not withall be contained: and likewise in receiving, containe another: and possible it is not, that either the one or the other should be: but fall out it will, that the two which be mingled, should pierce one within the other; neither can so much as one part of the one or the other remaine by it selfe apart, but necessarily they be all full one of another. And heere ariseth that legge of Arcefilam, so much talked of in the schooles, which insulketh and daunceth upon their monstrous absurdities with much laughter; for if these mixtions be through the whole, what should hinder, but that if a legge bee cut off, putrified, cast into the sea, and in proceesse of time all diffused; not onely the fleet of Antigonum might faile in and thorow it, as said Arcefilam, but also the 1200. saile of Xerxes; yea and the three hundred galleies of the Greeks might give a navall battell within the said legge? for faile it never will to be extended and spread more and more, nor the lesse cease within the greater, ne yet will that mixture ever come to an end, no nor the extremitie of it touch where it will end, and so pierce not thorow the whole, but will give over to be mingled: or if it be not mixed thorowout the whole, surely the said legge will not afford roome so much as for the Greekes to give a navall battell in it, but even the same must needs putrifie and be changed. But if a cyath of wine, or no more but one drop, falling into the Aegean or Candiot-sea, passe directly into the Ocean, or maine Atlantique-sea, it shall not touch onely the superficiall part of the water lost, but spread throughout, in breadth, depth & length. And verily Chrysippus admitteth so much in the very beginning of his first booke as touching Naturall questions, saying that one drop of wine will not faile but be mingled throughout the whole sea. And that we should not marvel so much hereat, he saith moreover, that the said drop by the meanes of mixture, will extend throughout the whole world: which is so absurd and without all appearance of reason, as I cannot devise any thing more. And is not this also against common sense, that in the nature of bodies, there is no supracome, nor first or last, to conclude & determine the magnitude of the body? but that which is proposed as the subject, runneth on still infinitely without end, so as whatsoever is added, yet somewhat more seemeth may be put thereto? for we cannot conceive or comprehend one magnitude greater or lesse than another, if it be incident to both parts thus to proceede in infinitum, which is as much as to take away the whole nature of inequality. For of two magnitudes that be understood unequal, the one cometh first thort of the last parts, and the other goeth beyond and surpasseth; but if there be no inequality of length in them, it followeth that there will be no unevennesse in the upper superficies nor asperitie: for this unevennesse is nothing else, but the inequality of the superficies with it selfe; but asperitie is an inequality of the superficies with hardnesse. Of which qualities they allow none, who determine no bodie in an extreme or utmost part, but draw out all still by a multitude of parts infinitely: and yet who knoweth not evidently, that man is compounded of a greater number of parts, than is his finger, and the world more than a man? for all men know and thinke as much, unless they become Stoicks: but proove they once to be Stoicks, they both say and opine the contrarie; namely, that man is not composed of more parts than is his finger, nor the world of more than is man: for section reduceth bodies into infinitum; and in things infinite there is neither more nor lesse; neither is there any multitude that surpasseth; neither shall the parts of that which is left, cease to be alwaies subdivided still, yea and to furnish out a multitude of themselves. How then do they wind out of these difficulties and untie these knots? certes, with great slight, verisubtilly and valiantly: for Chrysippus saith, that when we be demanded, if we have any parts, and how many there be? also whether they be compounded of other, and of how many? we are to sie unto this distinction; supposing and setting downe, that the whole entire bodie, consisteth of head, breast and legges, as if this were all that was demanded and doubted of. But if they should proceed in their interrogatories to the extreme parts: then saith he, no such answer is to be made, but we are to say, neither that they consist of any certaine parts, nor likewise of how many? neither of infinite nor determinate. But I thinke it were better if I alledged his verie owne words, to the end you may see how he keepeth and observeth the common conceptions, so forbidding us as he doth, to thinke, imagine or say, of what parts, and how many each bodie is compounded, and that it consisteth neither of finite or infinite. For if there were a meane betwene finite and infinite, like as there is betwene good and bad, to wit, indifferent; he should pronounce what the same was, and so save the difficultie. But, if as that which is not equal, incontinently becommeth unequal; and that which is not corruptible, presently is incorruptible; so that which is not finite, is immediately infinit, I suppose, that to say, A bodie is composed of parts neither finite or infinite, is all one as to say, that an argument is composed neither neither of true nor of false propositions, and a number neither of even nor odde. But after all this, vaunting himselfe youthfully, he leaveth not to say, that whereas a pyramis consisteth of triangles, the sides inclining to the commiffure or joint, are unequal, and yet exceed one another, in that they be bigger. Thus you see how trimly he kept and observed common conceptions; for if there be any thing greater, and yet surpasseth not, there must be also somewhat lesse, and yet the same faileth not, and so there shall be also something unequal, that neither exceedeth nor wanteth, which is as much to say, as it shall be equal and yet unequal, not greater but yet greater, not lesse and yet lesse. See moreover I pray you a little, how he answereth unto Democritum disputing and doubting physically and earnestly, if a cone or round pyramis be cut at the base thereof by the plumb or level, what we ought to conceive and judge as touching the superficies of the sections whether they be equal or unequal: for if they be unequal, they will make the said cone or pyramis uneven; and admitting many deepe rabbotted incisions, and rough asperities in manner of steps and grees: and if they be equal, then the sections also must be equal, and so it will be found that the round pyramis or cone shall have the same befall unto it that a cylinder hath, namely, to consist of circles equal and not unequal, which were very absurd. Herein, making Democritum to be an ignorant person and one who knew not what he said, he cometh in with this, and saith, that the superficies be neither equal nor unequal, but that the bodies be unequal, in that the superficies be neither equal nor unequal. Now to set downe by way of ordinance and to affirme, that allowing the superficies to be unequal, it may fall out, that bodies should not be unequal, were the part of a man who permitteth himselfe to have a wonderfull libertie to write and speake whatsoever comes into his head. For both reason and manifest evidence, giveth us to understand quite contrary, namely, that of unequal bodies the superficies also be unequal, and the bigger that a body is, the greater is the superficies, unless the exesse whereby it surpasseth the smaller, be altogether devoid of a superficies: for if the superficies of greater bodies exceed not those of the lesser, but rather faile before they come to an end, then we must of necessity say, that a part of that bodie which hath an end, is without end, and not determinate: for if hee alledge and say that hee is driven perforce thereunto, lest the inequality of superficies might seeme to make unequal incisions, there is no such cause why hee should feare: for those rabbotted incisions which hee suspecteth in a cone or round Pyramis, it is the inequality of the bodies, and not of the superficies that causeth them. So that it were a ridiculous follie, by taking away the superficies, for to be convinced to leave an inequality and unevennesse of the bodies. But to persist still in this matter, what can there be more contrary to common conception, than to saine and devise such stuffe? for if we admit that one superficies is neither equal nor unequal to another, wee may consequently affirme, that neither magnitude is equal or unequal, nor number either even or odde; considering that we can not set downe nor conceive in our minde, any meane betwene unequal and unequal, which is neuter. Moreover, if there were any superficies neither equal nor unequal, what should let but that we may imagine circles also neither equal nor unequal? for verily these superficies of the sections of cones or round Pyramids, be circles: and if we allow thus much in circles, then we may as well admit so much of the Diameters of circles, namely, that they be neither equal nor unequal. And if this goe for good, of angles likewise and triangles, of Parallelograms, and of superficies parallel or equally distant. For if longitudes be neither equal nor unequal one to another, then shall not weight, nor percussion, nor no bodies be equal or unequal. Furthermore, how dare they reprove those who bring in vacancies, and certaine indivisible bodies mainteining combat one against another, supposing that they neither sitre nor stand still; when as they themselves maintaine that such propositions as these be false? If any things be not equal one to the other, the same be unequal one to the other: and these things here be not equal one to the other; neither are they unequal one to the other. For so much as he saith, that there is something greater, which notwithstanding surpasseth not; it were good reason therefore to doubt and demand, whether the same be agreeable and fitting one to the other? and if they agree, how then can either of them be the bigger? Now if it be not sortable, how is it possible that the one should not exceed, and the other come short? for these things can not hang together, to say, that neither the one nor the other surpasseth: and it agreeth not with the greater: or it agreeth, and yet the one is greater than the other. For of necessity it must follow, that those who retaine not nor observe common conceptions, be troubled with such perplexities.

Over and besides, it is against all common sense, to say that no one thing toucheth another:

as also, that bodies touch one another, and yet do in no part touch. Now it must needs be, that they admit this, who allow not the least parts of a body, and so they suppose alwaies something before that which seemeth to touch, and never cease to passe on farther still: which is the thing that they principally object against those, who defend & maintain the indivisible parcels called Atoms; namely, that there is no total touching, but that it is a mixture, considering that such indivisible bodies have no parts. How is it then, that they themselves fall not into the like inconvenience, seeing they admit no part to be either first or last? for that they say, bodies doe touch one another mutually in the whole by a certaine terme or extremity, and not by a part, and the said terme or point is no body. Then a body shall touch a body, by a thing which is no body: and contrariwise, shall not touch, the incorporall being betweene. And if it touch, it shall do likewise and suffer somewhat, being it selfe a body, by that which is incorporall and no body. For the propertie of bodies, is to do and suffer somewhat mutually, yea, and to touch one another: and if the body have a touching in part by the means of that which is incorporall, it shall likewise have a generall and total connexion, even a mixtion and incorporation. Again, in these connexions and mixtures, necessarie it is that termes or extremities of bodies, either continue or not continue, but perish: but both the one and the other is against common sense. For even they themselves allow not corruptions and generations of things incorporall: and impossible it is, that there should be a mixtion or total touching of bodies retaining still their proper termes and extremities. For it is this terme or extremity that determineth and constituteth the nature of a body: and as for mixtions (if there were no approaching nor application of parts to parts) they confound all things wholly which are mixed. And as these men say, we must admit the corruption of extremities in mixtures; and likewise againe, their generations, in the distractions & separations of them. But no man there is able to comprehend this easily: for in regard that bodies touch one another, they also are pressed, thrust and crushed one by the other. And impossible it is, that a thing incorporall should suffer or do thus; neither can we imagine so much: yet would they constraine us to thinke no lesse. For if a sphere or boule touch a flat or plaine bodie onely by a point, certaine it is, that it may be trained and rolled along the said plaine or flat body, by a point. And if the foresaid boule be painted in the superficies thereof with vermillion, it shall imprint a red line onely upon the same plaine body; and being yellow, or of a fire colour, it shall likewise give the same tincture to the superficies of the flat bodie. Now that a thing incorporall should either give or take a colour, is against all common sense. And if we imagine a boule of earth, of Crytall or glasse, to fall from on high upon a smooth bodie of stone, it were against all reason to thinke that it would not breake the same into pieces, namely, when as it shall light upon that which is solide, hard, and able to make resistance: but more unreasonable it were to say, that it were broken by a terme or point that is incorporall: in such manner, as in every fort, their anticipations & common conceptions as touching things incorporall and bodies, must needs be troubled and confounded, or rather utterly abolished, in supposing thus many things impossible.

Against common sense it is to say, that there is a future time, and a time past, but none at all present; as also, that the time which was erewhile and not long since, hath a subsistence, whereas 40 that which now is hath no being at all. And yet this is an usuall and ordinary matter with these Stoicke philosophers, who admit not the least time that is betweene, and will not allow the present to be indivisible; but of all that which a man doeth thinke and imagine as present, they affirme the one part to be of that which is already past, and the other of the future; in somuch as there remaineth and is left in the mids no piece at all of the time present; in case of that which is said to be the very instant, part is attributed unto things past, and part to things to come; whereupon of necessitie one of these twaine must follow, that either in admitting the tense, It is, was; or It shall be; the tense It is, must wholly be abolished, or in admitting the present time, It is, one part thereof is past, and the other to come: as also to say, that of that which is, part is yet future, and part already past: likewise of that which now is present, one parcell is before, and ano- 50 ther behinde; in such sort as present, is that which yet is not present, and not present any more; for that is not present any longer, which is already past; nor present at all, which is yet to come: And thus in dividing the present, they must also needs say, that of the yeere and of the light, part was of the yeere past, and part of the yeere to come; likewise of that which is together and at once, there is some before, and some after: For no lesse troubled are they, in huddling and confounding after a strange manner these termes, Not yet, Already, No more, Now & not now, as if they were all one; whereas other men doe conceive and thinke, that these termes, Ere while,

while, or not long since, & a while after or anon, are different parts from the present time, setting the one before, & the other after the said present. And among these, Archidamus who affirmeth that the present Now, is a certaine beginning, joint or commissure of that which is already past and neere at hand to come, seeth now how in so saying, he utterly abolisheth all time; for were it true that Now is no time, but onely a terme of extremity of time & that every part of time is as it were Now, it would seem then, that this present Now, hath no part at all, but is resolved wholly into ends & extremities, joints, commissures, & beginnings. As for Chrysippus willing to shew himselfe witty & artificial in his divisions, in that treatise which he composed as touching voidnesse, and in other places affirmeth, that the Past and the Future of time subsisteth not, but hath 10 subsisted; and that the present onely hath being: But in the third, fourth, & fift books of Parts, he avoucheth, that of the instant or present, part is Future, & part Past; in such sort as by this means he divideth the substance of time, into those parts of subsistent, which are not subsistent, or to speake more truly, he leaveth no part at all subsistent, if the instant & present hath no part at all, which is not either past or to come: and therefore the conceit that these men have of time, resembleth properly the holding of water in a mans hand, which runneth and sheddeth the more, by how much harder it is pressed together. Come now unto actions and motions, all light and evidence is by them darkned, troubled, and confounded; for necessarily it ensueth, that if the Instant or present is divided into that which is past, and to come, a part of that which now mooveth at this instant; should partly be moved already, and in part to remove afterwards, and 20 withall, that the beginning and end of motion should be abolished: also that of no worke there should be any thing first or last, all actions being distributed and dispersed together with time: for like as they say, that of the present, some is past, and some to come: even so of every action in doing, some part is already done, and other resteth to be done. When had then beginning, or when shall have end, To dine, to write, & to go, if every man who dineth, hath dined already, and shall dine; and who ever goeth, hath gone and shall go? and that which is (as they say) of all abundancies most monstrous, if it be granted, that he who now liveth, hath lived already, & shall live; life had neither beginning, nor ever shall have end: but every one of us as it should seeme by this reckoning, was borne without beginning of life, & shall die without giving over to live: for if there be no extreme part, but ever as one that now liveth shall have somewhat of the present remaining for the future, it will never be untruly said; Socrates shall live, so long as it shall be 30 truly said, Socrates liveth; so that as often as it is true, Socrates liveth, so often it is false, Socrates is dead. And therefore if it be truly said in infinite parts of time, Socrates shall live; in no part of time shall it ever be truly said, Socrates is dead. And verily what end shall there be of any worke? & where shall any action stay & cease, in case as often as it shall be truly said; a thing is now doing, so often likewise it shall be truly said, It shall be done: for lie he shall who saith, This is the end of Plato writing or disputing; for that one day Plato shall cease to write or dispute: if at no time it be a lieto say, of him that disputeth, He shall dispute; or of him who writeth, He shall write. Moreover, of that which is done, there is no part, which either is not finished already, or which 40 shall be finished, and either is past or to come. Besides, of that which is already done, or of that which shall be done, of that which is past or future, there is no sense. And so in one word, and to speake simply, there is no sense of any thing in the world; for we neither see nor heare that which is past or to come; ne yet have we any sense of things which have bene or which shall be; no nor although a thing should be present, is it perceptible & subject to sense, in case that which is present, be partly to come, and in part past already; if I say one part thereof hath bene, and another shall be: and yet they themselves cry out upon Epicurus, as if he committed some great indignitie, and did violence to common conceptions, in mooving as he doeth all bodies with equal celerity, and admitteth no one thing swifter than another: But farre more intolerable it is, and farther remot from common sense to hold, that no one thing can reach or overtake another: 50

Ne nos although Adrastus horse

So swift, a Tortoise slow should course.

according as we say in our common proverb: which must of necessity fall out, if things move according to Before and Behind; and in case the intervals which they passe through, be divisible into infinit parts, as these men would have them: for if the tortoise be but one furlong before the horse, they who divide the said interval or space betweene into infinit parts, and moove both the one and the other according to Primum and Posteriorum, shall never bring the swiftest close unto the slowest, for that the slower alwaies winneth some space or interval before that which is

divisible, into other infinit intervals. And to say, that water which is powred forth out of a cup or boll, shall never be powred all cleane out; how can this chuse but be against common sense? & doeth not this consequently follow upon those things that these men avouch? for never shall a man comprehend or conceive that the motion of things infinitely divisible, according to be- fore, hath fully performed the whole interval; but leaving alwaies some space divisible, it will evermore make all the effusion, all the running forth or the shedding of the liquor, all the motion of a solid body; or the fall of a weighty poise, to be imperfect. I let passe many absurdities de- livered in their doctrine; and touch those onely, which are directly against common sense.

As for the question touching augmentation, it is very auncient: For according as Chrysos- tomus saith; it was by Epicharmus put forth. And for that the Academicks thought it to be not very easie and ready all of a sudden to be cleared; these men come with open mouth against them, accusing them for overthrowing all anticipations, whereas they themselves keepe not at all the common conceptions: and that which more is, pervert the very senses. For whereas the question is plaine and simple; these men grant and allow such suppositions as these, that al particular substances flow and runne, partly by yeelding and sending forth somewhat out of themselves, and in part by receiving other things from without; and that by reason of the num- ber and multitude of that which comes in, or goes out, things continue not one and the same, but become altered and divers by the foresaid additions and detraction, so as their substance receiveth a change. Also that contrary to al right and reason; custome hath so farre prevailed, that such mutations be called augmentations and diminutions: whereas rather they ought to be termed generations, and corruptions, for that they force an alteration of one present state and being, into another; but to grow and diminish are passions and accidents of a body, and sub- ject that is permanent. Which reasons and assertions being after a sort thus delivered in their schooles, what is it that these defenders of Peripatetic and Evidence, these canonical refor- mers (I say) of common notions would have? namely, that every one of us should be double like twinned, or of a two-fold nature: not as the poets feigned the Molionides, to be in some parts conjunct and united, and in other severed and disjointed, but two bodies, having the same colour, the same shape, the same weight and place: a thing that no man ever saw before: may these Philosophers onely have perceived this duplicity, this composition and ambiguities; whereby every one of us are two subjects, the one being substance, the other <sup>30</sup> the one of them runneth and floweth continually, and yet without augmentation and di- minution, or remaining in the same state such as it is; the other continueth still, and yet grow- eth and decreaseth, and yet suffreth all things quite contrary to the other, wherewith it is con- corporate, united, and knit, leaving to the exterior sense no shew of distinct difference. And yet verily it is said of that Lyceus, how in old time hee had so quicke and piercing an eye- sight, that he was able to see through stocks and stones. And one there was by report, who sit- ting in Italy, could from a watch-tower sensibly discern the shippes sailing out of the haven of Carthage, which was distant a day & a nights sailing with a good forewind. And as for Calli- crates and Myrmecides, they have the name to have made chariots so smal, as that the wings of a fly might cover them: yea & in a millet graine or sesam seed to have engraven Homers verses. But <sup>40</sup> surely this perpetuall fluxion & diversity in us, there was never any yet that could divide & dis- tinguish: neither could we our selves ever find that we were double, & that partly we ranne out continually, and in part againe remained alwaies one and the same, even from our nativity to our end. But I am about to deale with them more simply and plainly; for whereas they devide in every one of us foure subjects, or to speake more directly, make ech of us to be foure, it shall suffice to take but two, for to shew their absurditie. When we doe heare Pemheus in a tragedy saying, that he seeth two Sunnes, and two cities of Thebes, we deme of him, that he seeth not two, but that his eyes doe dazell and looke amisse, having his discourse troubled, and under- standing cleane transported. And even these persons, who suppose and set downe, not one city alone, but all men, all beasts, all trees, plants, tooles, vessels, utensils, and garments, to be <sup>50</sup> double, and composed of two natures; reject wee not and bid farewell, as men who would force us not to understand any thing aright, but to take every thing wrong? Howbeit, hap- pily heerein they might be pardoned and winked at, for feining and devising other natures of sub- jects, because they have no meanes else, for all the paines they take, to mainteine and preserve their augmentations: But in the soule, what they should aile, what their meaning might be, and upon what grounds and suppositions, they devied to frame other different sorts and formes of bodies, and those in maner innumerable, who is able to say? or what may be the cause, unless <sup>they</sup> they ment to displace, or rather to abolish and destroy altogether the common and familiar conceptions, inbred in us, for to bring in and set up new fangles, and other strange and forren novelties? For this is woonderfull extravagant and absurd, for to make bodies of vertues and vices, and besides of sciences, arts, memories, fancies, apprehensions, passions, inclinations and affents: and to affirme that these neither lie, nor have any place subsisting in any subject, but to leave them one little hole like a pricke within the heart, wherein they range and draw in, the principall part of the soule, and the discourse of reason, being choked up as it were with such a number of bodies, that even they are not able to count a great sort of them, who seeme to know best how to distinguish and discern one from another. But to make these not onely bodies, <sup>10</sup> but also living creatures, and those endued with reason, to make (I say) a swarme of them, & the same not gentle, mild, & tame, but a turbulent sort & rable by their malicious shrewdnesse, op- posit & repugnant to al evidence, & usual custome, what wasteth this of absurdity in the highest degree. And these men verily do hold that not onely vertues & vices be animal and living crea- tures, nor passions alone, as anger, wrath, envy, grieke, sorrow & malice, nor apprehensions onely, fantasies, imaginations, and ignorances, nor arts and mysteries, as the shoemakers & smiths- craft: but also over and besides al these things, they make the very operations and actions them- selves to be bodies, yea and living creatures: they would have walking to be an animal dancing likewise, shoing, saluting, and reprochfull railing: and so consequently they make laughing & weeping to be animal. And in granting these, they admit also, coughing, sneezing and groa- <sup>20</sup> ning, yea and withall, spitting, reaching, sniting and snuffing of the nose and such like actions, which are as evident as the rest. And let them not thinke much and take it grievously, if they be driven to this point by way of particular reasoning, calling to minde Chrysippus, who in his third booke of Natural questions saith thus: What say you of the night, is it not a body: eve- ning, morning, midnight, are they not bodies? Is not the day a body? The new moone is it not a bodie? the tenth, the fifteenth, the thirtieth day of the moone, the moneth it selfe, Summer, Autumne, and the whole yeere, be they not bodies? Certes all these things by me named they hold with tooth and naile, even against common prenotions: But as for these hereafter, they maintaine contrary to their owne proper conceptions, when as they would produce the hottest thing that is by refrigeration, and that which is most subtile by inspissation. For the soule is a <sup>30</sup> substance most hot and consisting of most subtile parts: which they would make by the refrig- eration and condensation of the body, which as it were by a certaine perfusion and tincture it hardeneth & altereth the spirit, from being vegetative to be animate. They say also that the Sun is become animate, by reason of the moisture turned into an intellectuall and spirituall fire. See how they imagin the Sun to be engendered and produced by refrigeration? Xenophanes, when one came upon a time and tolde him that he had seene Eeles to live in hot scalding water, Why doe we not see the them then (quoth he) in colde water? If therefore they will cause heat by re- frigeration, and lightnesse by attriction and condensation: it foloweth on the other side againe, by good consequence, that by keeping a certaine proportion and correspondence in absurdity, they make heat by colde, thickning by dissolving, and waighty things by rarefaction. As for <sup>40</sup> the very substance and generation of common conception and sense, doe they not determine it even against common sense it selfe? For conception is a certaine phantasie or apprehension: and this apprehension is an impression in the soule. The nature of the soule is an exhalation, which by reason of the rarity thereof can hardly receive an impression: and say that it did re- ceive any, yet impossible it were to keepe and retain it. For the nutriment and generation of it consisting of moist things, holdeth a continuall course of succcession and consumption. The commerce also and mixture of respiration with the aire, engendreth continually some new ex- halation turning and changing by the flux of aire coming in and going forth reciprocally. For a man may imagin rather that a river of running water keepeth the formes, figures & images <sup>50</sup> imprinted therein, than a spirit caried in vapours & humors, to be mingled with another spirit or breath from without continually, as if it were idle and strange unto it. But so much forget they or misunderstand themselves, that having defined comon conceptions to be certaine intel- ligences laid up apart: memories to be firme permanent, & habituall impressions having fixed sciences likewise, every way fast and sure, yet within a while after they set under al this a founda- tion and base, of a certaine slippery substance, easie to be dissipated, caried continually, and ever going and coming to and fro. Moreover this notion and conception of an element and Principle, all men have imprinted in their minde, that it is pure, simple, not mingled nor com- <sup>pofed</sup> posed: for, that which is mixed, cannot be an element nor a principle, but rather that, whereof it is mixed and composed.

Howbeit these men devising God the principle of all things to be a spirituall bodie, and a minde or intelligence seated in matter, make him neither pure nor simple, nor uncompound, but affirme that he is composed of another and by another. As for matter, being of it selfe without reason and void of all quality, it carieth with it simplicity, and the very naturall propertie of a principle: and God, if it be true, that he is not without body and matter, doth participate of matter as of a principle. For if reason and matter, be all one and the same, they have not done well to define matter for to be reasonlesse: but if they be things different, then doth God consist of both twaine, and not of a simple essence, but compounded, as having taken to his intellectuall substance a bodily nature out of matter. Furthermore, considering they call these fower primitive bodies, to wit, earth, water, aire and fire, the first elements, I can not see how they should make some of them simple, and others mixed or compound: for they hold, that the earth and water cannot containe either themselves or any other, and that it is the participation of spirit and fellowship of fire, whereupon dependeth the preservation of their unity: as for the aire and fire by their owne power they fortifie themselves, which being medled with the other two, give them their force vigor and firmitude of substance. How is it then, that either earth is an element or the water, seeing neither of them both is simple, first, or sufficient to keepe and preserve it selfe, but having need of another without to containe them alwaies in their being and to save them? for they have not left so much as any thought that they be a substance. But surely this reason of theirs as touching the earth, that it consisteth of it selfe, containeth much confusion and great uncertainty, for if the earth be of it selfe, how cometh it to passe that it hath need of the aire, to binde and containe it? for so it is no more earth of it selfe, nor water; but the aire hath by thickning & hardning matter, made thereof the earth: and contrariwise, by dissolving and mollifying it, hath created the water: and therefore we may inferre thus much, that neither of these is an element, seeing that some other thing hath given them their essence and generation. Over and besides, they affirme, that substance and matter are subject to qualities, and so in manner doe yeeld their limit and definition: and then on the other side, they make the said qualities to be bodies; wherein there is a great confusion: for if qualities have a certaine proper substance, whereby they are termed and be really bodies indeed, they require no other substance, for that they have one of their owne: but if they have this onely under them which is common, and which they call essence or matter, certaine it is, that they doe but participate of the bodie; for bodies they are not. For that which is in the nature of the subject and doeth receive, must of necessity differ from those things which it receiveth, and whereof it is the subject. But these men see by the halfe; for they terme the matter ἀνύποτος, that is to say, without qualities: but they will not name the qualities ἀνύποτος, that is to say, void of matter. And yet how is it possible to make a body without quality, but wee must imagine a quality without a bodie? for that reason, which completh a body with all manner of qualities, permitteth not the thought to comprehend any body without some qualitie. Either therefore he that fighteth against a bodiless qualitie, seemeth to resist likewise a matter void of qualitie; or if he separate the one from the other, hee parteth and divideth them both asunder. And as for that reason which some of them seeme to pretend, as touching a substance which they name ἀνύποτος, not because it is void of all qualitie, but because it is capable forsooth of every qualitie; it is contrary to common notion, and nothing so much. For no man taketh or imagineth that to be ἀνύποτος, that is to say, unqualified, which is participant of all qualities and incapable of none; nor impassible, that which is apt to receive and suffer every passion; nor immovable, which is moovable every way. And as for this doubt, it is not solved, that howsoever we alwaies understand matter with some quality, yet we conceive withall, that matter and qualitie be different one from the other.

AGAINST COLOTES, THE EPICUREAN.

The Summarie.

WE have in many places before, but principally in two severall Treatises of the former tome, perceived how Plutarch is quite contrary unto the Epicureans, and namely, in one of those Treatises he dealeth with a certaine booke (which he now expressly refuteth) where Colotes endeavoured to prove, that a man can not possibly live well, according to the opinions of other Philosophers, Plutarch sheweth on the contrary side, thus impossible it is to leade a joyfull life after the doctrine of Epicurus, and that it is accompanied with overweening, impudency and slanderous calumniation. And not contenting himselfe thus to have confuted them of purpose once or twice, he setteth upon them in this discourse, and particularly he copeth with Colotes, whose slowness, fithinesse and impietie he beere describeth. The summe of all which declamation is this, That these Epicureans are not any way worthy the name of Philosophers: who contrariwise tread and trample under foot all the parts of true Philosophie, discovering in their writings aswell as thoroughout all their lives, meer beastly brutallitie. But all that is delivered in this Treatise may be reduced well to two principall points: The one containeth a defence or excuse of the doctrine taught by Democritus, Empedocles, Parmenides, Socrates, and other ancient Philosophers, slandered by Colotes, who extolled farre above them, the traditions and precepts of his master. The other discovereth divers absurdities and strange opinions of the Epicureans, even by their owne testimonies: whom Plutarch refelleth soundly; handling in this disputation many articles of Philosophie, Naturall, Morall and Supernaturall: and particularly of the Senses, of Nature, of the Atomes, of the Unversall world, of the Knowledge of man, of the Opinion of the Academics, of the Apprehensions, faculties, passions and affections of the soule: of the certaintie of things, sensible of the falsitie and truth of imaginations, of the use of Lawes, of the profit of Philosophie, of the soveraigne good, of religion, and of other such matters, the principles whereof the Epicureans abolished, bringing in paradoxes wonderfull strange, for to shuffle things confusedly, and make all uncerteine. All which is marked particularly in the traine and course of the authors owne words, and therefore needlesse it is to specifye thereof any more, because I would avoid tautologies & unnecessary repetitions. True it is, that in certaine refutations Plutarch is not so firme as were to be desired: but that may be imputed to his ignorance of the true God. As for the rest, it may suffice & serve, to know the misery & wretchednes of the Epicureans: and that other Philosophers had many good parts, and delivered many beautifull speeches, whereof all vertuous persons may reape and gather great fruit in applying and referring the same to their right use. And for to close up all, he maketh a comparison betwene true Philosophers and the Epicureans, proving in very many places, that Colotes and his fellows like himselfe, are people not onely unsatisfiable, but also most pernicious, and so by consequence unworthy to live in the world.

AGAINST COLOTES THE Epicurean.

Colotes, whom Epicurus was wont (ô Saturninus) to call by way of flattering diminution, Colataras and Colatarius, composed and put forth a little booke, which he entituled, That there could be no life at all according to the opinions of other Philosophers: and dedicated the said booke unto king Ptolemaus. Now what came into my minde to speake against this Colotes, I suppose you would take pleasure to reade the same in writing; being as you are, a man who loveth elegance and all honest things, especially such as concerne the knowledge of antiquity; & besides, esteemeth it the most prince like exercise and roiall study, to beare in minde and have alwaies in hand, as much as possibly may be the discourses of ancient Sages. Whereas therefore of late this booke was in reading, one of our familiar friends, one whom you know well enough, Aristodemus by name, an Aegian borne, a man exceeding passionate, and of all the Academicks a most frantick sectary of Plato, although hee carie not the ferula like unto the madde supposts of Plato, I wot not how contrary to his usuall manner, was very patient and silent all the while, giving care most civilly even to the very end. But so soone as the lecture was done: Goe to now my masters (quoth he) whom were we best to cause for to arise and fight with this fellow in the quarrell and defence of Philosophers? For I am not of Alexander's minde, neither doe I greatly praise him, for that when there was to be chosen the most valiant warrior of those nine hardy knights who were presented, to enter into combat with Hector hand to hand, committed the election unto fortune, and put all to the lot: But you see also (quoth I) that even he referred himselfe to be ordered by the lot, to the end that the choise might passe according to the dispose and ordinance of the wisest man:

*The lot out of the helmet then did fall,
Of Ajax, whom themselves wist most of all.*

And yet if you command me to make election,

*How can I ever put out of mind,
Divine Ulysses, a prince so kind?*

Consider therefore and be well advised how you may be able to refell this man. Then Aristodemus: But you know full well (quoth he) what Plato sometime did, who being offended with his boy that waited upon him, would not himselfe swindge him, but caused Speusippus to doe so much for him, saying withall, That he was in a fit of choler. And even so, I say as much to you, Take the man to you I pray, and entreat him at your pleasure; for my selfe am very angry with him. Now when all the rest of the company were instant with me, and praised me to take this charge in hand: Well I see (quoth I) that I must speake, seeing you will needs have it so: but I am affraid lest I may seeme my selfe to be more earnestly bent against this booke than it deserves, in the defence and maintenance of Socrates, against the incivility, rudenesse, scurrility, and insolence of this man, who presenteth (as one would say) unto him say, as if he were a bea, and demandeth how he may put meat into his mouth, and not into his care: whereas haply the best way were to laugh onely at him for such railing, especially considering the mildnesse and gentle grace of Socrates in such cases. Howbeit in regard of the whole host beside of other Greeke Philosophers, namely, Democritus, Plato, Empedocles, Parmenides, and Alelissus, who by him are foully reviled, it were not onely a shame to be tongue-tied and keepe silence, but also meere sacrilege and impiety, to remittany jot, or forbear to speake freely to the utmost in their behalfe, being such as have advanced philosophy to that honour and reputation which it hath. And verily our parents together with the gods have given us our life: but to live well, we suppose and that truly, that it cometh from the philosophers, by the meanes of the doctrine which we have received from them, as cooperative with law and justice, and the very bridle that doth chastise and restraime our lusts. Now to live well, is to live sociably, friendly, temperately, and justly: of which good qualities and conditions, they leave us not so much as one, who cry out with open mouth, that the soveraigne good of man lieth in his belly, and that all the virtues in the world if they were put together, they would prize no better worth than one crackt crackt braten piece of coine, without pleasure, and in case all maner of delights were quite removed from them. Also the annex heere to their discourses, as touching the soule & the gods, wherein they hold that the soule perisheth, when it is once separate from the body: and that the gods meddle not with our affaires. Moreover the Epicureans reproch other Philosophers, for that they teach men to live loosely, basely, and beastly. And verily such matters as these be mingled in all the writings of Epicurus, and spread throughout his whole philosophy. But this Colotes heere having made an extract of certaine words or voices void of matter and substance, and drawn some pieces and broken fragments without reasons and arguments for to proove and confirm his doctrines, or to give light for their understanding and credit, hath made his booke in maner of a shop full of all sort of wares; or of a table or stall representing strange shewes and monstres: which you (I say) know best of all others, for that you have continually in your hands and doe reade the works of ancient writers. So he seemeth unto me that like to the Lydian, he openeth not one gate and no more upon him, but enwrappeth Epicurus in very many doubts & difficulties, and those of all other, the greatest: for he beginnes with Democritus, who no doubt received at his hands a goodly salary and reward for his apprentillage, being a thing certeinly known, that for a long time Epicurus called himselfe a Democritian, like as others also doe say, and namely Leontem, one of the scholars and disciples of Epicurus, in the highest forme: who in a letter which he wrote unto Lycophron, saith, that Epicurus honored Democritus, for that he attained before him to the true and found understanding of the truth: and that in general the whole treatise of naturall things, was called Democritian, because hee light first upon the principles, and met with the primitive fontaines and foundations of nature. And Aetodorus said directly and openly of Philosophy, That if Democritus had not led the way, Epicurus had never arrived to wisdom and learning. Now if it be true as this Colotes saith, That to live according to Democritus and other philosophers opinions, is no life ... all, Epicurus was a very foole for following Democritus as he did, leading him to that doctrine whereby a man could not live. And first he reproveth him, for that in saying that every thing is no more such than such, he made a confusion of mans life. But so farre off was Democritus from holding the said opinion, namely, that nothing is rather such than such: that he oppugned Protagoras the Sophister for saying so, against whom he wrote many elegant commentaries, full of good arguments concluding the contrary: which our Colotes never seeing, nor so much as dreaming of, was much deceived in the right understanding of the mans words, and namely in one place where he directly saith and determineth that to be is no more than quod sit: in which place he nameth a body to be, and voidnesse quod sit: meaning thereby and giving us to understand, that voidnesse had a proper nature and subsistence of the owne, as well as a body. But he who is of opinion, that nothing is more such than such, followeth one of the decrees & sentences of Epicurus, wherein he delivered, that all apprehensions and imaginations that come by sense, are true. For if when two men give out and say, the one, that the wine is hard: the other, that it is sweet and pleasant, neither of them is deceived in his sense but speaketh true, why should the wine be rather harsh than sweet. And yet it is seene oftentimes that one and the same bath, some find to be hot, & others cold: for that, as these command cold water, so those bid hot water to be powdered in. It is said that a certaine dame or good wife of Lacedaemon went upon a time to visit Berronice the wife of king Diocletianus, but when they approached nere together, they turned away immediately one from the other: the one, as if it should seeme abhorring the smell of ranke butter, and the other offended with the perfume of a sweet ointment or pomander. If then the sense of one be not more true than the sense of another, probable it is and very like that both water is not more cold than hot, and that the ointment and the butter no more senting pleasantly than stinking strongly. For if a man say, that it seemeth thus to one, and so to another, he affirmeth before he is aware, that they be both the one and the other. And as for these symmetries, proportions and accords of the pores or passages in the organs of the senses, whereof they talke so much: as also the divers mixtures of seeds, which they say being disseminate and dispersed throughout all flavors, odors and colours, do move the sense: doe they not directly drive them to this point, that things are no more one than another? For such as thinke that the sense is deceived, for that they see contrary events and passions doe proceed from the same objects, they pacifie againe and save this objection, by teaching that whereas all things be mingled and compounded together, yet nevertheless this is more sortable and fitting to one and that to another: whereby there is not the contraction and apprehension of one and the same quality, neither doth doth the object move all indifferently at once and alike in all parts, but every one meeting with those qualities onely, whereunto they have all sense proportionate, they doe not well to stand so stiffly upon this, that a thing is coloured or not coloured, white or not white, thinking to fortifie and establish their owne senses by destroying those of others. Whereas it behoveth neither to oppugne the senses, for they all touch and reach one quality or other (each one drawing as out of a lively and large fountaine, from this confused mixture, that which is fit and suitable) nor accuse and blame the whole, in touching onely the parts; ne yet thinke that all ought to suffer the same thing, considering that one suffereth by one qualitie and power of it, and another by another. So that now we are to consider and search, what men they be, who bring in this opinion, as touching things that be not such rather than others, rather than these who hold, that whatsoever is sensible is a confused mixture of all qualities together, like unto a wind-instrument composed for all kinds of melodious musick? But they confesse that all their rules are lost, and their judgement quite gone, if they admit any object in some sort pure and sincere, and allow not each one thing to be many.

See moreover in this place, what discourse and disputation Polyanus held with Epicurus in his banquet as touching the heat of wine. For when he demanded in this manner, How now Epicurus, say you not that wine doth heat? one made answer, That he affirmed not universally, that wine did cause heat: and a little after; For it seemeth that wine is not universally a heater, but rather, that such a quantitie of wine may be said to enchaife and set such an one in heat. And then adjoining the cause, he alledgeth the concurrences, compressions and dispersions of the Atomes; the commixtions and conjunctions of others, when the wine cometh to be mingled with the body: and then he addeth this conclusion; And therefore generally we are not to say that wine doth heat; but so much wine may well heat such a nature, and so disposed: whereas another nature it cooleth in such and such a quantity. For in such a masse, there be those natures and complexions, of which, cold if need were, may be composed, and being joined with others as occasion serveth, may cause a vertue refrigerative. And hereupō it is, that some are deceived, saying that wine universally is hot, and others againe, affirming it to be universally colde. He then who saith that the multitude and most part of men do erre, in holding that to be simple hot, which doth heat, and that likewise to be cold, which doth coole, is deceived himselfe, if he thinketh not, that it followeth by good consequence upon that which hee hath said, that one thing is more such than such. And afterwards he inferreth this speech, that many times wine entering into the body, bringeth with it neither a calefactive nor a refrigerative vertue; but that when the masse of the body is moved and stirred, so as there is a transposition made of the parts, then the Atomes which are effective of heat, concur together one while into one place, and through their multitude, set the body into an heat and inflammation; but another while by dispersing and severing themselves asunder, inferre coldnesse.

Moreover he dissembleth not but that he is proceeded thus farre, as to say, that whereas we take things to be, and doe call them bitter, sweet, purgative, soporiferous, and lightome, none of them all have any entier quality or perfect property to produce such effects, nor to be active more than passive, all while they be in the body, but that they be susceptible of sundry temperatures and differences. For even Epicurus himselfe, in his second booke against Theophrastus, in saying that colours are not naturall unto bodies, but are engendered according to certaine situations and positions, respective to the eye-sight of man, saith by this reason, that a bodie is no more destitute of colour, than coloured. And a little before, word for word he writeth thus: But over and beside all this, I know not how a man may say, that these bodies which be in the darke, have any colour at all; and yet oftentimes when the aire a like darke is spread round about, some there be who can distinguish the diversity of colours, others perceive nothing at all, by reason of their feeble & dim-sight. Again when we goe into a darke house, we see not our first entrance, any colours, but after we have bene there a pretie while, we perceive them well enough: And therefore we are to say, that each body is not rather coloured than not coloured. If then colour be a relative, and hath being in regard of some other things, white also is a relative, and blew likewise: if these, then sweet and bitter seemably: so that a man may truly affirme of every quality, that it is not more such, than not such. For to those who are so disposed, a thing shall be such, and to them that are not so affected, not such. So that Colotes doeth all to dath and betray both himselfe and his master also, with the same mire and dirt, wherein he saith those doe sticke who hold that things are not more such than such. What then doth this egregious clerke herein onely shew himselfe, according to the old proverbe:

Whiles he himselfe is full of sores impure?*

No verily; but much more yet in his second reprehension, he chafeth ere he is aware Epicurus together with Democritus out of this life: for he giveth out that Democritus said, The atomes are unto the senses by a certaine law and ordinance colour, by the said law sweet, and by the same law bitter: Also that he who useth this reason, and holdeth this opinion, knoweth not himselfe, if he be a man? nor whether he be dead or alive? To contradict these speeches I wot not well how: but thus much I say, that this is as much inseparable from the sentences and doctrine of Epicurus, as figure and weight by their saying from the Atomes: for what saith Democritus? That there be substances in number infinite, which are called Atomes, because they cannot be divided: howbeit different, without qualitie and impassible, which doe moove and are caried, dispersed to and fro in the infinit voidnesse, which when they approach one another, or concur and meet together, or else be enterlaced & enfolded one about another, then appeareth of these thus heaped and hudled together, one thing water, another fire, another a plant, and another a man: That all these be Atomes still, termed by him Ideæ, and nothing else. For there can be no generation of that which is not; no more than that which once was can become nothing, by reason that these Atomes are so firme and solid, that they can neither change nor alter, nor suffer. And therefore neither can there be colour made of those things which have no colour, nor nature or soule of such as be without quality and are impassible. Whereupon Democritus is to be blamed in that he confesseth not those things that be accident unto principles, but supposeth those to be principles, whereto these happen: For he should not have put downe principles immutable: or at leastwise, when he had supposed them to be such, not to see withall, that therewith the generation and breeding of all qualities perisheth. And to denie an absurdity when one seeth it, is impudence in the highest degree. As for Epicurus, he saith verily, that he supposeth the same principles that Democritus doth, but he saith not, that colour sweet, white, and other qualities are by law and ordinance. Now if he confesse not that he saith, which neverthelesse he said, it is no other but an old custome of his, & that which he is wont to doe. For much like it is to this, that he will seeme to take away divine providence, and yet hee saith, that he alloweth pious and religious devotion toward God: And albeit he giveth out that for pleasure, he maketh choise of amity and friendship, yet for his friends sake he willingly endureth most grievous paines: also for all he supposeth the universall world to be infinit, yet hee taketh not away, above and beneath. But this is not like unto the manner of drinking one unto another at a table, where a man may take the cup in hand and drinke what he will, and so give backe the rest. But in this disputation especially, it behooved to remember well the notable Apophthegme or saying of the wise man. Of what things the beginnings are not necessarie, the ends and consequences fall out to be necessary. Necessary it was not therefore to suppose, or (to speake more truly) to wring from Democritus thus much, That Atomes be the principles of the whole and universall world: or when he had supposed and set downe this doctrine, and withall made a glorious shew of the first probabilities and faire appearances thereof, he should likewise have swallowed that which was troublesome therein, or shewed how those bodies which have no quality, could give unto others all sorts of qualities, onely by meeting and joining together. As for example, to speake of that which is next to hand, in that we call fire, whence came it, and how groweth it to these indivisible bodies called Atomi? if they neither had heat when they came, nor became hot after they met together? For the former presupposeth that they had some quality, and the latter, that they were fit to receive the same, and to suffer. But neither of them twaine ye say, fireth well with the Atomes, in that they be incorruptible. How then? did not Plato, Aristotle and Xenocrates produce golde, of that which was not golde; and stone of that which is not stone; yea, and many other things out of the four simple bodies called elements? Yes I wis: but together with the said bodies there concur immediately at the first, the principles also, to the generation of every thing, bringing with them great contributions, to wit, the first qualities which be in them: afterwards, when there come to meet in one and joine together, dry with moist, cold with heat, solid and firme with that which is gentle and soft, that is to say, active bodies with such as be apt to suffer, and to receive all change and alteration, then ensueth generation, which is the passage from one temperature to another: whereas this Atome or indivisible bodie being of it selfe naked and alone, is destitute of all qualitie and generative facultie; but when it hapneth to run upon others, it can make a sound and noise onely, by reason of the hardnesse and solidity thereof, but no other accident els: for strike they doe, and are stricken againe continually : and so farre be they off from composing and making by this meanes a living creature, a soule, or a nature, that they are not able so much as to raise a round masse or heape of themselves together : for that as they jurre and beat one upon another, so they rebound and flie backe againe asunder. But Colotes verily, as if hee dealt with someking that was ignorant and unlettered, falleth againe upon Empedocles, breathing out these verses :

*One thing will I say more to thee :
there is no true nature
Of mortall wights : of grisly death, no seed nor geniture.
A mixture onely first there is of things, then after all, The same grow to disunion :
and this men Nature call.*

For mine owne part, I doe not see how this is repugnant and contrary unto life, among them especially who are of opinion that there is no generation of that which is not at all, nor corruption of that which is and hath being : but the meeting and union of such things as be, is called Generation ; the dissolution likewise and disunion of the same, is termed Death and corruption. For, that he taketh Nature for Generation, and that he meaneth so, himselfe hath declared, when he set Nature opposite unto Death. And if those live not nor can live, who put generation in union, and death in disunion ; what thing els doe these Epicureans ? And yet Empedocles, so fostering as it were and conjoining the elements by heats, moistnesse and humidities, giveth them in some sort a mixture and composition unitive : but they who drive together the Atomes which they say to be immutable, sturdy and impassible, compose nothing that proceedeth from them, but rather make many and those continuall percussions of them. For their interlacing which impeacheth dissolution, doth stil augment their collision : in such sort, as this is no mixture nor conglutination, but a certaine troublesome striving and combat, which according to them is called Generation. And these Atomes or indivisible bodies which meet together but a moiment, if one while they recule and start backe for the resistance of the shooke which they have given, and another while returne againe and recharge after the blow past, they are more than twice so long apart one from another without touching or approaching, so as nothing can be made of them, not so much as the very body without a soule. But sense, soule, understanding and prudence, there is no man able to thinke and imagine, would he never so faine, how they can be formed of voidnesse and of these Atomes : which neither of themselves apart have any qualitie, nor yet passion or alteration whatsoever, when they are met together, considering that this meeting is no incorporation nor such a coition as might make a mutuall mixture and conglutination, but rather jurs and reciprocall concussions : in such manner, as according to the doctrine of these folke, supposing as they doe, such void, impassible, invisable, undivine and unhelpful principles, yea & such as will not receive any mixture or incorporation whatsoever. To live and to be a creature animall, falleth to the ground and comes to nothing. How cometh it then, that they admit or allow Nature, Soule and Living creature ? Forsooth, even as they do 40 an oth, a vow, praier, sacrifice and adoration of the gods, to wit, in word and mouth onely ; pronouncing and naming in semblance and outward appearance, that which by their principles and doctrines they quite abolish and annul. And even so, that which is borne, they terme Nature, and that which is engendred, Generation : like as they who ordinarily call the frame of wood and timber, Wood it selfe, and those voices or instruments that accord together, Symphonie. And what should he meane to object such speech against Empedocles ? Why trouble we and weary our selves (quoth he) in being so busie about our owne selves, in desiring certaine things as we doe, and avoiding others ? for neither are we our selves, neither live we by using others. But be of good cheere (may one haply say) my loving and sweet Colotarian : have no feare man : no man hindreth you, but that you may regard your selfe, teaching that the nature 50 of Colotes, is Colotes himselfe and nothing els : neither that you need or desire to use certaine things. As for these things among you, they be pleasures : shewing withall, that it is not the nature of tarts, cakes and marchpanes, nor of odors, nor of love sports that you desire, but tarts and marchpanes themselves, sweet perfumes and women they be that you would have. For the Grammarian who saith, the force and strength of Hercules is Hercules, denieth not thereby that Hercules is : nor those who say that symphonies, accords or opinations are bare prolations or pronunciations, affirme not therewithall, that there be no sounds, nor voices, nor opinions : forasmuch forasmuch as there be some, who abolishing the soule and prudence, seeme not to take away either to live or to be prudent. And when Epicurus saith, The nature of things that have being, are the bodies and the void place of them, doe we take his words, as if he meant that nature were somewhat els than the things that be : or that things being, do shew their nature and nothing els ? even as for examples sake, the nature of voidnesse, he is wont to call voidnesse it selfe : yea, and I assure you, the universall world it selfe, the nature of all. Now if a man should demand of him : How now Epicurus, say you indeed that this is voidnesse, & that is the nature of voidnesse ? Yes verily, will he answer againe, but this communication of names the one for another, is taken up and in use. And in truth, that the law and custome warranteth this maner of speech, I also avouch.

And what other thing I pray you hath Empedocles done than taught that nature is nought else but that which is bred and engendred, nor death any thing but that which dieth ? But like as Poets otherwhiles by a trope or figurative speech representing as it were the image of things say thus :

*Debate, tumult, uprore and stomacke fell,
With deadly fute and malice there did dwell.*

Even so the common sort of men doe use the termes of generation and corruption in things that are contracted together and dissolved. And so farre was he from stirring or removing those things that be, or opposing himselfe against things of evident apperance, that he would 20 not so much as cast one word out of the accustomed use : but so far forth as any figurative frawd might hurt or endamage things, he rejected and tooke the same away, rendring againe the usuall and ordinary signification to words, as in these verses :

*And when the light is mixed thus with aire in heavenly sky,
Some man is made or wilde beast : kinde, or birds aloft that flie :
Or else the shrubs : and this rightly is clep'd their geniture, But death, when as dissolved is the foresaid fast joincture.*

And yet I say my selfe, that Colotes having alledged thus much, knew not that Empedocles did not abolish men, beasts shrubs or birds in as much as he saith that all these are composed and finilished of the elements mixed together : But teaching and shewing them how they were deceived, who finde fault with naming this composition a certaine nature or life : and the dissolution unhappy fortune and death to be avoided, he annulled not the ordinary and usuall use of words in that behalfe. For mine owne part I thinke verily that Empedocles doth not alter in these places the common maner of pronouncing and using the said words : but as before it was related, did really as of a different minde as touching the generation of things that had no being, which some call nature. Which he especially declareth in these verses.

*Fooles as they be of small conceit, for farre they cannot see,
Who hope that things which never were,
may once engendred be,
Or sense that those which are shall die, and perish utterly.*

For the verses are thundred out and do sound aloud in their hearing who have any eares at all, that he doth not abolish generation absolutely, but that alone which is of nothing : nor yet corruption simply, but that which is a totall destruction, that is to say, a reduction to nothing. For unto a man who were not willing, after such a savage, rude and brutish maner but more gently 50 to cavil, the verses following after might give a colourable occasion to charge Empedocles with the contrary, when he saith thus :

*No man of sense and judgement sound, would once conceive in minde
That whiles we living here on earth, both good and bad doe finde,
So long onely we being have :
(yet this men life doe call)*

And

And birth before, or after death, we nothing are at all.

Which words verily are not uttered by a man, who denieth them their being who are borne and live, but rather by him who thinketh that they who are not yet borne, as also those that be already dead have their being. And even so Colotes doth not altogether reprove him for this: but he faith that according to his opinion we shall never be sicke nor wounded. And how is it possible that he who faith that men before life and after life, are accompanied with good and bad indifferently, should not leave for them that be alive the power to suffer? What be those then, good Colotes, who are accompanied with this immunity, that they can neither be hurt nor diseased? Even your selfe and such as you are, who be altogether made of an Atome and voidnesse, for by your owne saying, neither the one nor the other hath any sense. But no force. For I here of us harme yet. Mary here is the griefe, that by this reason you have nothing in you to cause delight and pleasure, seeing that an Atome is not capab[e] of such things as moove pleasure: and voidnesse is unapt to be affected by them. But for as much as Colotes for his part would needs immediatly after Democritus seeme to interre and bury Parmenides for ever, and my selfe in putting off a little and passing over the defence of Parmenides, have betwene both taken in hand the maintenance of that which was delivered by Empedocles, because me thought they did more properly adhere and hang to those first imputations, let us now come againe to Parmenides. And whereas Colotes chargeth him with setting abroad certaine shamefull sophistries yet hath the man thereby made friendship nothing lesse honourable nor voluptuousnesse and sensuality more audacious and unbridled. He hath not bereft honesty of that attractive property to draw unto it selfe, nor of the gift of being venerable of it selfe: neither hath he troubled & confounded the opinions as touching the gods. And in saying that All is One, I see not how he hath hindered our life. For when Epicurus himselfe faith, that [All] is infinite, ingenerable and incorruptible, that it cannot be augmented nor diminished, he speaketh and disputeth of All, as of some one thing. And in the beginning of his treatise concerning this matter, having delivered that the nature of All things being, consisteth in small indivisible bodies which he termeth Atomes, and in voidnesse: hee made a division as it were of one thing into two parts: whereof the one in truth is not subsistent, but termed by you impalpable void and bodilesse: whereby it cometh to passe, that even with you, All cometh to be but One: unlessse you will use vaine words and void offense, speaking of voidnesse, and fighting in vaine, as with a shadow, against those ancient Philosophers.

But these Atomes you will say, are according to the opinion of Epicurus in number infinite, and every thing that appereth unto us, ariseth from them. Beholde now what principles you put downe for generation, to wit, infinity and voidnesse: whereof the one is without action, impassible and bodilesse: the other, namely, infinity, disorderly, void of reason, incomprehensible, dissolving and confounding it selfe, for that by reason of multitude it cannot be circumscribed nor contained within limits. But Parmenides hath not abolished either fire or water, or any rocke, no nor the cites (as Colotes faith) inhabited as well in Europe as in Asia, considering that he hath both *instituted an orderly dispose & digestion: and also tempering the elements together, to wit, light and darke, of them and by them absolutely finisheth all things visible in the world, for written he hath at large of Earth, of Heaven, of Sunne, Moone and starres: as also, spoken much of mans generation: and being as he was a very ancient Philosopher, he hath left nothing in Physiologie unsaid, and whereof he hath not delivered both by word and writing his owne doctrine not borrowed else where, passing over the repugnance of other received principall opinions. Moreover he of all others first, and even before Socrates himselfe observed and understood, that in nature there is one part subject to opinion, and another subject to intelligence. And as for that which is opinable, inconstant it is and uncertaine, wandering also and carried away with sundry passions and mutations, apt to diminish and paire: to increase also and growe, yea and to be diversly affected, and not ever after one sort disposed to the same in sense alike. As for the intelligible part, it is of another kinde:

For found it is, whole and not variable, Constant and sure, and ingenerable.

as he himselfe faith, alwaies like to it selfe & perdurable in the owne nature & essence. But Colotes like a lycopilt, cavilling at him, & catching at his words, without regard of the matter, not arguing against his reasons indeed, but in words onely, affirmeth flatly, that Parmenides overthroweth all things in one word, by supposing that All is One. But he verily on the contrary side abo-

lisheth neither the one nature nor the other, but rendreth to ech of them that which is meet, and apperteineth thereto. For the intelligible part he rangeth in the Idea of One, and of That which is, saying that it is and hath being, in regard of eternitie and incorruption: that it is one: because it alwaies resembleth it selfe, and receiveth no diversity. As for that part which is Sensible, he placeth it in the ranke of that which is uncerteine, disorderly and ever mooving. Of which two, we may see the distinct judgement in the soule, by these verses:

The one reverts to truth which is sincere Persuasive, breeding science pure and cleere.

For it concerneth that which is intelligible, and evermore alike and in the same sort.

*The other rests on mens opinions vaine,
Which breed no true beleefe but uncertaine.*

For that it is conversant in such things as receive al manner of changes, passions, & mutabilities. And verily how possibly he should admit and leave unto us sense and opinion, and not withall allow that which is sensible and opinable, a man is not able to shew. But forasmuch as to that which is existent indeed, it appertaineth to remaine in being, and for that things sensible, one while are, and another while are not, but passe continually from one being to another, and alter their estate, inasmuch as they deserve rather some other name than this, of being: This speech as touching All, that it should be one, is not to take away the plurality of things sensible, but to shew the difference betwene them and those that be intelligible, which Plato in his treatise of Ideas minding to declare more plainly, gave Colotes some advantage for to take holde of him. And therefore me thinks it good reason to take before me all in one traine, that also which he hath spoken against him. But first let us consider the diligence, together with the deepe and profound knowledge of this Philosopher Plato, considering that Aristotle, Xenocrates, Theophrastus, and all the Peripateticks have followed his doctrine. For in what blinde corner of the world uninhabitable wrot he his booke? that you Colotes in heaping up together these criminations upon such personages, should never light upon their works, nor take in hand the books of Aristotle as touching the heaven and the soule: nor those compositions of Theophrastus against the Naturalists, nor that Zoroastres of Heraclitus, one booke of Hell and infernall spirits, another of Doubts and questions Naturall: that also of Diogenes concerning the soule. In all which books they are contradictory and repugnant, in the maine and principall points of Naturall philosophy unto Plato? And verily the prince of all other Peripateticks, Strato, accordeth not in many things with Aristotle, and mainetaineth opinions cleane contrary unto those of Plato, as touching Motion, Understanding, the Soule, and Generation. And in conclusion, he holdeth that the very world is not animal: and whatsoever is naturall is consequent unto that which is casuall, and according to fortune. As for the Idea for which Aristotle every where seemeth to censure Plato, and mooveth all manner of doubts concerning them in his Ethicks or morall discourses, in his Physicks, in his Exotericall dialogues, he is thought of some to dispute and discourse with a more contentions and opinative spirit than became a Philosopher, as if he propounded to himselfe for to convell and debase the Philosophy of Plato, so farre was hee from following him. What impudent and licentious rashnesse therefore is this, that one having never known nor seene what these learned clerks had written, and what their opinions were, should coine and devise out of his owne fingers ends, and fallily charge upon them, those things which never came into their heads, and in perswading himselfe that he reproveth and refuteth others, to bring in a prooffe and evidence written with his owne hand, for to argue and convince himselfe of ignorance, or rash and audacious impudence, saying, that those who contradict Plato, agree with him, and they that repugne against him doe follow him? But Plato (quoth he) hath written: That horses are in vaine counted by us horses, and men likewise. And in what odde corner of Platoes works hath Colotes found this hidden? As for us we reade in all his books, that horses be horses, and men be men, and that fire even by him is esteemed fire; for hee holdeth every one of these things to be sensible and opinable, and so he nameth them. But this our trian man Colotes, as though hee wanted never a jot of the highest pitch of sapience and knowledge, presumeth forsooth and taketh it to be all one and the same, to say, A man is not, and A man is that, which hath no being. But Plato thinketh that there is a wonderfull great difference betwene these termes, Not to be: at all, and To be: that which is not: for the former importeth a nullity and abolishment of all substance; and the other sheweth the difference of that which is participated and that which doth participate: which distinction and diversity they who came after, have reduced onely unto a different ranke, of kinds, formes, and of certeine common and proper qualities or accidents, but higher than so they mounted not, falling downe upon some doubts and difficulties more reasonable: for the same reason and proportion there is betwene the thing participated and participating, as is betwene the cause and the matter, the originall and the image, the power and the passion. Wherein principally differeth that which is by it selfe, and ever the same, from that which is by another, and never keepeth one state: for that the one never shall be, nor ever was not exsistent: and for this cause, it is truly and altogether subsistent; whereas the other hath not so much as that being constant, which it hapneth to participate from another, but doth degenerate and grow out of kinde, through imbecillitie; in that the matter doth glide and slide about the forme, receiving many passions and mutations bending toward the image of subsistence, in such sort, as continually it moveth and shaketh to and fro. Like as therefore he who saith, that Plato is not the image of Plato, taketh not away the sense and substance of an image, but sheweth the difference betwene that which is of it selfe, and the other which is in regard of it: even so they abolish not the nature, the use nor sense of men, who say, that every one of us by participating the Idea of a certeine common substance, is become the image of that which giveth similitude and affinity unto our generation. For neither he who saith, that ironed bar is not fire, or the Moone, the Sunne, but (to use the very words of Parmenides)

A flame that beares a borrowed light, Wandering about the earth by night,

doth take away the use of a burning gleed, or the nature of the moone: but if he should affirme, that it were no bodie nor illuminate, then he went against the senses, as one who admitted neither body nor living animall, nor generation nor sense. But he that by opinion imagineth these things to have no subsistence but by participation, and withall, how farre they are short and distant from that which hath always being; and which gave them the power to be, considereth not amisse the sensible, but is dim-sighted in the intelligible: neither doth he annihilate and overthrow the passions which arise and appeare in us, but sheweth unto them that are docible and follow him, that there be other more firme and stable things than these, as touching essence, for that they neither are engendered nor perish, nor yet suffer ought: but teacheth more cleerely & purely, noting and touching the difference by the very termes and names, calling the one for so exsistent, & the other breeding or ingendered. The same usually befalleth also to our late modern writers, who deprive many great and weighty things of this denomination of subsistence, as namely, Voidnesse, Time, Place, and generally, the whole kinde of those speeches wherein are comprised all things true. For these things being, they say are not; and yet they say some are; yea and use the same aswell in their life as their doctrine and philosophy, as having subsistence & being. But I would gladly demand of this accuser of ours himselfe, whether he and his fellows in their affairs perceive not this difference, whereby some things be permanent and immutable in their substances, like as they affirme of their Atomes, that they be at all times and continually after one and the same sort, by reason of their impassibility and stiffe soliditie: whereas all things compounded and compact of them, be flexible, pliable, mutable, breeding and perishing: for that an infinite number of images doe passe and flow from them evermore, yea and an innumerable sort of other things, by all likelihood, from out of the ambulant aire do redow and have recourse unto them, for to supply and fill up the heape still, which masse is become much altered, diversified and transvalsed as it were by this permutation, in that the Atomes which are in the bottome of the said masse can never cease nor give over stirring, but reciprocally beat one upon another, as they themselves affirme. So there is in things such a difference of substance as this: and yet Epicurus is more wise and learned than Plato, in that he teacheth all things equally subsisting, Voidnesse impalpable, the Body solid and resisting, the Principles, things compounded: and for that hee thinketh that the eternall doeth not so much as participate in the common substance with that which is ingendered; the immortal with that which doth perish; the natures impassible, perdurable, immutable, which never can fall or be deprived from their being, with those which have their essence in suffering and changing, and never can continue in one and the same state. Now were it so, that Plato had most justly of all men in the world deserved to be condemned for his error herein, yet my good friend, there should no imputation be charged upon him by these our great masters here, who speake purer and finer Greeke and more exquisitely than he, but onely for confounding some words and speaking improperly; nor to be blamed for abolishing the matters themselves, or taking us out of this life, because he termed them ingendered, and not exsistent, as these men do.

But seeing wee have passed over Socrates after Parmenides, wee must now take his defence in hand. Colotes then began directly at the first (as we say in the common proverbe) to remove him from the sacred line or tribe: and having related how Charephon had brought an answer from the Oracle at Delfos, as touching Socrates, which we all know to be so, saith thus: As for this discourse and narration (quoth he) of Charephon, for that it is altogether odious, captious, sophistical, and full of untrueth, we will overpasse. Then is Plato likewise (to say nothing of others) odious and absurd, who hath put the said answer downe in writing. Then are the Lacedaemonians more odious and intolerable, who keepe that Oracle delivered, as touching Lycurgus, among their most ancient writings and authentical records. Semblably, the discourse and narration of Themistocles was a sophistical and counterfeit device, whereby he perswaded the Athenians to abandon their citie, and so in a navall battell defeated the barbarous prince Xerxes. And even so all the noble lawgivers and founders of Greece are to be counted odious and intolerable, who established the most part of their temples, their sacrifices and solemn feasts, by the answer from the Oracle of Apollo. But if it be so, that the Oracle brought from Delfos as touching Socrates, a man ravished with a divine and heavenly zeale to vertue; whereby he was declared and pronounced wise, were odious, fained and sophistical: by what name shall we truly and justly call your cries, your shouts, your hideous noises, your applauses and clapping of hands, your adorations and canonizations wherewith you exalt and celebrate him, who incited and exhorted you to continuall pleasures one after another, who in one of his letters sent unto Anaxarchus hath written thus: As for me, I invite and call you to continuall pleasures, and not to these vaine and unprofitable vertues, such as have nothing but turbulent hopes of uncerteine fruits. And yet Metodorus writing unto Timarchus, saith thus unto him, Come on (quoth he) let us do some goodly and honest thing for those who are faire and beautifull, so that we be not plunged in these semblable and reciprocal affections, but retiring anon out of this base and terrestriall life, let us advance our selves to these true, holy and divine ceremonies and mysteries of Epicurus. And even Colotes himselfe hearing Epicurus one day discomfiting of Naturall things, fell downe at his feet immediately, and tooke holde of his knees, as if hee had beene a god. And Epicurus likewise taking no small pride and glorie herein, writeth thus unto him againe: For as if you adored that which then was delivered by mee, there came upon you suddenly a desire and zeale proceeding from no cause in nature, to come toward mee, to prostrate your selfe upon the ground, to clip and claspe my knees, and to use those gestures unto me, which ordinarily they doe, who worship the gods and pray unto them: So that you have (quoth he) made mee also reciprocally to desire and adore you. Certes I could finde in my heart to pardon them, who say they would not spare for any cost, but give they cared not what for a table or picture, wherein they might see lively represented to the cie this story depicted; namely, how the one lieth prostrate at the others feet, and embraceth his knees: who mutually againe adoreth him, and maketh his devout prayers unto him. And yet this devotion and service of Colotes, how well soever it was by him ordered and precisely observed, reaped not the condigne fruit thereof: for he was not by him declared A wise man: onely this blessing he had from him againe, Goe thy waies and walke immortal, and repute us also semblably immortal. These men knowing full well in their owne consciences that they use such foolish words, ridiculous jestures, and fond passions, yet forsooth they are so bold as to call other men odious. And Colotes verily having given us a taste of his goodly first fruits, & wise positions as touching Naturall senses, namely, That we do eate our viands and cates, nor hay or forage, and that when the rivers be high, wee ferry over them in botes, but when they be low and passable, we wade easily on foot through the fould, exclaimeth and crieth out afterwards: You use Socrates vaine speeches, you intertaine those who come and speake unto you with one thing in word, and do practise others cleane contrary in deed. And say you so Colotes? First I would gladly know wherein the words of Socrates were vaine & arrogant, considering that he was wont ordinarily to say, that he knew nothing at all; but was a learner continually, and went to search and finde out the trueth: But if haply you should light upon such speeches from Socrates his mouth, as those were which Epicurus wrote unto Idomeneus, send us then the first fruits, for the furniture of our sacred body, for us (I say) & our children: For thus it comes upon me to speake, what more insolent and sottish words could you devise to speake? And yet, that Socrates never said other wise than he did, he hath given us marvellous proofes in the battell of

Delium, and in that of Potidea: That which he did during the time of the thirty tyrants against Archelaus and against the people of Athens: his poverty; his death; his carriage and demeanour in all these times and occasions, be they not answerable every way to the sayings and doctrines of Socrates? This had been a true proof indeed, to have shewed that hee lived and did otherwise than he spake and taught, in case he had proposed the end of man to be a joyfull and pleasant life, and then lived as he did. Thus much as touching the reprochfull termes that hee hath given Socrates. Moreover, he perceiveth not how himselfe is attaint even in those points which he reprooveth and objected as touching things * evident and apparent. For one of the positions and decrees of Epicurus is this, That no person ought irrevocably to beleieve or be perfwaded to a thing, but onely the wife man. Now seeing that Colotes became not one of the 10 Sages, for all that adoration & worship which he performed unto Epicurus, let him demand first and formost these questions, How it is, that he falleth to cates, and not to hay, when he hath need of victuals? and why he casteth a robe about his owne body, and not upon a pillar? considering that he is not assuredly perfwaded, that cates be cates, or that a robe is a robe: But if he doe so, namely, feed upon viands, and wear a robe: if he venture not to wade through rivers when they be risen and high; if he flee from serpents and wooves, being not in a sure beleefe that any thing is such as it seemeth, but doing every thing according as it appeereth unto him; the opinion as touching senses, would not hinder Socrates at all, but that he might likewise use that which seemeth not him. For bread seemed not bread unto Colotes, nor hay to be hay, because he had read those holy canons and sacred rules of Epicurus which fell from heaven 20 out of Jupiters lap: and Socrates upon a vaine arrogance of his owne, conceived an imagination of bread that it was hay, and of hay that it was bread. For these wise men heere, have better opinions and rules to goe by than we. But to have sense, and to receive an impression in the imagination of things evident, is common as well to ignorant persons as to Sages, for that it proceedeth from causes that need no discourse of reason. But that position, that our naturall senses are not certeine nor sufficient enough to proove a thing, and cause beleefe, is no hindrance, but that every thing may appeere unto us: but when we use the senses in our actions, according to that which appeereth, it permitteeth us not to trust the, as if they were every way true and without error: for that sufficeth in them, which is necessary and commodious for use, because there is nothing better. As for Science, knowledge, and perfection, which the soule of 30 a Philosopher desireth to have of every thing, the senses have just none. But of these matters which Colotes hath charged upon many others, he will give us occasion else where to discourse thereof.

Furthermore, that wherein he doth vilipend and mocke Socrates most, in that he demandeth the question, What is man? and in a youthfull bravery, and childishly as he saith, affirmeth that he knoweth not, it is evident that even hee who derideth him, never came himselfe where it was, nor attained thereto: whereas Heracitus contrariwise, as one who had done a great and worthy matter, said thus, I have beene seeking out my selfe. And of all those sentences which are written over the gates of Apollons temple at Delphos, this was thought to be most heavenly and divine, Know thy selfe: which gave unto Socrates occasion first to doubt and enquire thereof; according as Aristotle hath set downe in his Platonique questions. But this fourth seemeth unto Colotes to be a foolish and ridiculous thing. I marvel then why he mocketh not his master likewise for doing so, as often as he writeth and discourseth as touching the substance of the soule, and the beginning of that confused masse: for if that which is compounded of both, as they themselves doe teach, to wit, of such a body & soule, be man, he who searcheth the nature of the soule, searcheth consequently the nature of man, even from his principall & chiefe principle. Now that the same is hardly by reason to be comprehended, but by the outward sense altogether incomprehensible, let us learne not of Socrates, a vaine glorious man & sophistical disputer, but rather of these wise men here, who doe forge & frame the substance of the soule so farre onely as to the faculties extending to the flesh, whereby the giveth heat, 40 softnesse & strength to the bodie, of I wot not what heat and aireous spirit, never wading so far as to that which is the principall, but faint & give over in the way. For that faculty whereby the judgeth, whereby he remembreth, whereby he loveth or hateth, and in one word, that reason which wisely foreseeth & discourseth, he saith, is made of a certaine quality which is namelesse. Now that this namelesse thing is a mere confession of shameful ignorance, in them that say they cannot name that, which indeed they are not able to comprehend and understand, we know well enough. But this also may well deserve pardon, as they are wont to say. For it seemeth that this 15 is no small and light matter neither a thing that every one can finde out and reach unto, being deeply settled in the bottom of some by-place far remote and in some obscure and hidden corner, seeing that among so many words and termes which be in use, there is not one significant enough and sufficient to declare and explaine the same. And therefore Socrates was no fool nor loo, for seeking and searching what himselfe was, but they rather be dolts who go about enquiring after any other thing before this, the knowledge whereof is so necessary and hard to be found. For hardly may he hope to attaine unto the knowledge of any other thing, who is not able to understand the principall part of himselfe. But say we should graunt and yeeld thus much unto him, as to confesse that there is nothing so vaine, so unprofitable and so odious, as 10 for a man to seeke himselfe, we will be so bolde as to demand, what confusion of mans life this should be, or how it is that a man cannot continue in life, when he comes to discourse & reason thus with himselfe, Who and what mought I be? Am I after the maner of some composition, confected and mingled of soule and body? or rather a soule making use of the body, as the horseman doth of his horse? and not a subject composed of horse and man? or whether the principall part of the soule whereby we understand, we discourse, we reason and doe every action, is every each one of us? and all the parts besides both of soule and body, be nothing but the organs and instruments serving to this puillance and faculty? Or to conclude, whether there be no substance of the soule apart, but onely a temperature and complexion of the body, so disposed, that it hath power to understand and to live. But Socrates herein saith he doth not over- 20 throw the life of man, considering that all naturall philosophers doe handle this argument, May they be those monstrous questions that trouble the common-wealth, and turne all upside downe, which are in the Dialogue Phaedrus, wherein he thinketh that he ought to examine and consider himselfe, namely whether he be a beast more savage, more subtil, cautelous and furious than ever was that Typhon: or rather some animal more tame and gentle by nature, and endued with a portion more divine, and a condition nothing proud and insolent. But yet by these discourses and reasonings he overturneth not the life of man, but he chafeth out of it presumption & arrogance, proud and puffed up opinions and vaine overweenings of a mans selfe. For this is that fell Typhon, which your good master and teacher hath made to be so great in your, warning as he doth both against the gods and all good and godly men.

30 After he hath done with Socrates and Plato, he falleth in hand with the Philosopher Stilpo. As for the true doctrines and good discourses of the man, whereby he ordered and governed himselfe, his native country, his friends, & those kings and princes who affected him and made good account of him, he hath not written a word: neither what gravity and magnanimity was in his heart and the same accompanied with mildenesse, moderation, and modesty: but of those little sentences or propositions which Stilpo was wont to use & cast forth in meriment against the Sophisters, when he was disposed to laugh and play with them, he made mention of one: and without alledging any reason against it or solving the subtilty thereof, he made a tragodie, and kept a soule stirre with him about it, saying that by him the life of man and the whole course of this world was subverted: because he said, that one thing could not be affirmed and ve- 40 rified of another. For how should we live (quoth Colotes) if we may not say a good man, or a man is a captain, but we must pronounce apart, man is man, good is good, and captain is a captain: neither ten thousand horsemen, nor a fenced city, but horsemen be horsemen, ten thousand be ten thousand, and so of the rest? But tell me I pray you, what man ever lived the worse for saying thus? And who is he who having heard these words and this maner of arguing, did not conceive and understand straight waies that it was the speech of a man disposed to make some game and disport leamedly, or to propose unto others this Logically quill for exercise sake? It is not Colotes, such a greivous scandall and hainous matter as you would make it, to say man is not good or horsemen be not ten thousand: marry to affirme that god is not god as you and the rest doe, who will not confesse that there is a Jupiter president over generation, or a Ceres that giveth lawes, or a Neptune superintendent over plants, is a dangerous point. This is the separation of names and words that is pernicious, this filtheth our life with contemptuous impiety, Athisme & dissolute audaciousnesse: For when you plucke from the gods these attributes & appellations that essentially be linked & tied to them, you abolish therewithall holy sacrifices, divine mysteries, sacred processions and solemnities: for unto whom shall we performe the nuptiall sacrifices called Proteleia, unto whom shall we offer the oblations for health named Soteria? How shall we accomplish the rites of Phosphoria, the Bacchanals, and the ceremonies going before marriage, if we leave not any priests of Bacchus, if we admitte not Phosphori Præeresii, 50 and

and the saving gods Soters? For I tel you, this toucheth the maine & principal points, this breedeth error in the things themselves & not about certaine bare voices in the Syntaxes and construction of words or use of termes. Now if these be matters that trouble and subvert this life of ours, who be they that offend and be delinquent more in their phrase & language than you? who making prepositions to be the only substance of speech, abolish altogether all simple voices, & admitting such as come next hand, you abolish in the meane while the things by them signified; whereby all discipline, doctrines, erudition, anticipations, intelligences, inclinations and assents are performed, and holde generally that all these be just nothing. But as for Stilpo thus the case standeth: If we affirme of an horse, to runne: he doth not say that the thing affirmed which the Logicians call Predicatum, is all one with the Subiectum, of which it is affirmed; but 10 that the essentiall definition of a man is one, and that of good is another; as also, to be an horse is different from to be running: For if we asked the definition of the one and the other, we will not give the same for both; and in that regard, they doe amisse who affirme the one of the other. For if a man and Good were all one: likewise, an horse, and to runne were both one: how cometh it to passe that the terme Good is affirmed of some meate, drogue, or medicine, and to run likewise, of a lion and a dog? But if the Predicatum or thing affirmed be different, then we doe not well, to say, Good man, or the horse runneth. Now if Stilpo in these matters doe exorbitate and be foully deceived, admitting no copulation at all nor connexion of such things as are said to be in or about the subject, together with the said subject it selfe: but every one of them if it be not absolutely the very same with that unto which it hapneth, hee thinketh not that the same 20 ought to be said and affirmed thereof as an accident: and if therein he be offended with some termes, and go against the ordinary custome of speech, he doth not therefore straightwaies subvert and overthrow mans life, nor humane affaires, as all the world may see well enough.

Colotes now having done with the ancient Philosophers, turneth himselfe to those of his owne time, and yet he nameth not one. Howbeit, he should have done better to have argued atwell against these moderne as those ancients, by name, or not at all to have named those of old time. But he who so often hath pricked Socrates, Plato & Parmenides with his pen, sheweth plainly, that it was for meere cowardise that he durst not be seene to deale with the living; and not upon any modesty or reverence that he spared their names, considering that he used them, who were farre more excellent than they, in no good sort and respect. His meaning was I 30 suspect and guesse, to assaile the Cyrenaiques first, and then in a second place the Academicke, sectaries of Arcesilaus: for as these were the Philosophers who doubted of all things and yielded their assent in nothing at all; so the other reposing passions and imaginations in themselves, thought that the beleefe proceeding from thence, was not sufficient to assure & confirme things, but faring like unto those who are besieged within a citie, abandoning and forsaking all without, they keepe themselves shut within their passions, using this word ordinarily. It seemeth: and of things without, affirming and pronouncing, It is. And therefore (quoth Colotes) they cannot live nor have the use of things. And then, playing his part as it were in a Comedie: These men (saith he) denie that a man, a horse and a wall are; but they say, that they become 40 walles, horses and men; abusing first and formost cautelously and wickedly these termes, like slanderous and foule mouthed lycophants: for surely this is an ordinary cast and usuall with these men. But it behooved to declare the thing it selfe, according as they teach: for they affirme, that things become sweet, wax bitter, prove light some, or grow darke, when ech of these hath the proper efficacye of these passions in it selfe naturally inbred, and such as can not be distracted from it. But if honie be said sweet, an olive branch bitter, haile colde, meere wine hot, the aire of the night darke; there be many beasts, many things, and many men, that will resist the contrary: whilst some are offended with honie and abhorre it, others are delighted with the taste of the olive branch; some are burnt and singed by haile, others cooled with wine; some can not abide the light of the Sun but their sight therewith is dazled and dimmed, others againe 50 see well enough by night. And therefore opinion persisting still and abiding in the passions, keepeth it selfe from offence and error: but going forth once, and busily judging or pronouncing of things exterior, it troubleth many times it selfe, and repugneth with others, who of the same objects receive contrary passions, and different imaginations. And as for Colotes, he resembleth for all the world young children who newly begin to learne their A. B. C. for being used to pronounce and name the letters which they see engraven in their owne baldeaders, when they finde them written elsewhere, they sticke at them, and are much troubled: and even so the very words and sayings which he approoveth, praiseth and embraceth in the writings of Epi- curus, hee will not understand nor acknowledge, when they are uttered by others. For when there is presented unto us one image round and another broken, they who say that the sense verily is truly informed and hath a true impression, but will not suffer us to pronounce that the tower is round, but the oare broken, surely they confirme thereby that their passions be their owne fancies and imaginations, but they will not avow and confesse, that the things without are so affected. But as they before are to say, that they be not horse or wall, but become horse and wall; even so of necessitie we must say, that the sight is imprinted with a round figure or triangular with three unequall sides, but not that a tower is necessarily either triangular in that sort or round: for that the image wherewith the sight is affected may well be broken, but the oare 10 from whence proceedeth the image is not broken. Seeing then there is a difference between the passion and the subject without, either we must say that the beleefe abideth in the passion, or els that the being which is affirmed by the apparence is convinced of untruth, and not found to be so. And whereas they cry out and be offended and angry about the sense, they doe not say that the thing without is hot, but that the passion in the sense is so: is it not all one with that which is spoken as touching the taste, as if one should say, that the thing without is not sweet, but that it is some passion and motion about the sense, that is become such? And he who saith, that hee apprehendeth the imagination of a mans forme, but perceiveth not that it is a man, whereupon hath he taken occasion to say so? Came it not from them who say that they receive an imagination and apprehension of a bowing forme and figure, but the sight 20 doth not affirme that it is bowing and bending, neither that it is round, but some imagination and impression about the sense is become round? True it is will some one say: but as I approach neere unto a tower, or else touch an oare, I will pronounce and affirme, that the one is straight, and the other hath many angles and many faces: But he when he shall come neere, will confesse and say that it seemeth so and that it appeareth such unto him, but no more. O yes good sir, and more than so, when hee seeth and observeth the consequence hereupon, namely, that every fantasie and imagination is feebly of it selfe sufficient to procure beleefe, and none at all, in regard of another; but be all of equall condition. But this your opinion is come just to nothing, namely, that fantasies be all true, and none false and incredible, in case you thinke that these ought to pronounce affirmatively of that 30 which is without, and beleefe not the other a farre off no farther than in that which they suffer: for if they be of equall condition and beleefe alike, when they are neere, and when they be far off, meet it is and just, that either all indifferently or else not these, should have the affirmative judgement following upon them, to pronounce, that a thing is. But if there be a difference of passion in things that be neere, & those which are farther off, then is it false that neither imagination nor sense is one more expresse and evident than another: like unto those which they call attellations which are nothing to the sense, but unto the opinion: so that in following the, they would have their followers to affirme and pronounce of exterior things, attributing to opinion the judgement, that a thing is, and to sense, the passion that appeareth: whereby they transport the judgement from that which is alwaies true, unto that which falleth oftentimes to be so, 40 But what need is there at this time to shew, the confusion and contradiction that is herein? But it seemeth that the reputation of Arcesilaus, who of all Philosophers in his time was best beloved and most esteemed, was his fittall thorn in Epicurus his sides; but troubled him beyond all measure: For he giveth out of him, that delivering as he did nothing of his owne invention he imprinted in the minds of ignorant and unlettered men a certaine opinion and conceit of him, that he was a deep philosopher and very well seene in all kinde of literature. But so far was Arcesilaus, from affecting any glorie & reputation in the world by broching novelties or strange opinions and derogating from the auncient ascribing anything of theirs to himselfe, that the Sophisters in his daies reprooved and charged him for flustering upon Socrates, Plato, Parmenides and Heracitus the opinions as touching the retention of assent and the incomprehensibility of things 50 who indeed never sought nor desired so much at his hands, onely because he would referre the same unto such famous personages, the better to be confirmed by the authority of their name. Howbeit for this; thanks be to Colotes still everyone who saith that the Academicke doctrine was more ancient than Arcesilaus; and was derived from others before his time unto him. But as for the retention of assent, & the doubting of all things, not so much as they verily who have greatly travelled in the matter and have strived to that purpose for to write many great bookes and large treatises, could ever remove or overthrow: but bringing in at the last out of the very schoole and doctrine of the Stoicks; the cessation from all actions, as it were the fiend

Gorgon to scare folke withall, were weary and gave over in the plaine field, after they saw once, that what attempt soever they made, & which way soever they turned themselves their instinct and appetition was never so obeisant as to become a consent and approbation, neither received sense for the beginning of propension and inclination, but seemed to present it selfe to actions, as having no need to be joined with others. For surely with these men the combat is lawfull and the conflict just.

*For looke what words thou doest to others give,
The like thou must be sure to heare, believe.*

And verily to speake unto Colotes, as touching instinct and appetition, is all one as to sound the harpe before an asse. But this point of learning would be delivered unto those who can give eare and conceive, that there be in our soule three kinds of motions, Imaginative Appetitive and Assenting. As for the Imaginative, we cannot take it away, would we never so faine; for as things approach and objects be presented, we cannot chuse but be informed and receive as it were an impression and suffer by them. The Appetitive being stirred up by the imaginative, moveth a man effectually to those things which are proper and convenient for him; as if in the principall and reasonable part thereof there were some propension and inclination. And verily this motion do not they overthrow and anul who hold off, and keepe in their assent, doubting of every thing, but make use of this appetition or instinct, conducting naturally every man to that which is proper and meet for him. What is the onely thing then that the Academics flie and avoid? even that wherein alone there is engendered leasing, deceit and falshood, to opine, to apply the assent, which is ayeelding through imbecillity to that which appeareth, and hath no true profit. For our action requireth two things, to wit, the apprehension or imagination of that which is convenient and familiar: and the instinct or appetition driving unto the same: whereof neither the one nor the other is repugnant to the cohibition of assent. For the discouffe of reason withdraweth us from opinion, and not from appetition or imagination. When as therefore that which is pleasant and delectable seemeth unto us to be proper for us and familiar, there is no need at all of opinion for to move and carry us to it, but appetition immediately presenteth it selfe, which is nothing else but a motion and incitation of the minde. Now for that there must be a sense as it were of these things, and the same consisting of flesh and blood, the same pleasure and delight likewise will appeare good. And therefore it will seemably seeme good unto him who holdeth off his assent, for surely he hath senses, and is made of flesh, blood and bone, and so soone as he hath apprehended the imagination of good, he hath an appetite and desire thereto, doing all that ever he can, not to misse it nor lesse the fruition thereof: but as much as is possible to cleave and adhere continually to that which is proper unto him, as being driven and drawn thereto, by Naturall and not Geometrical constraints. For these goodly, pleasant, and tickling motions of the flesh, be of themselves without any other teacher attractive enough, as they themselves forget not to say, and are able to draw and traine him whosoever he be, that will not confesse nor be knownen, but stoutly denieth that he is made soft and pliable by them. But peradventure you will aske me how it comes to passe that one of these that are so retentive and deinty of their assent, climeth not up some hill, but to the baine or hot house: or when hee riseth and purposeth to goe into the market place, why hee runneth not his head against a post or the wall, but taketh his way directly to the dore? And aske you me this question indeed, you that holde all senses to be infallible, the apprehensions also and imaginations to be certaine and true? Forsooth it is because the baine seemeth unto him a baine and not a mountaine, the dore also appeareth to be a dore, and not the wall: And so is it to be said likewise of such other things everie one: For the doctrine delivered as touching this cohibition of assent, doth not pervert the sense, nor worke in it by strange passions and motions any such change and alteration as may trouble the imaginative faculty. Onely it taketh away and subverteth opinions; but useth all other things according to their nature. But impossible it is not to yeeld consent unto apparent evidences. For to denie those things which wee are verily perswaded of and doe beleve, is more absurd, than neither to deny nor asseme any thing at all. Who be they then that deny such things as they beleve, and goe against things evident? even they who overthrow divination, and denie that there is any government by divine providence: they who say that neither the sun is small nor the moone, which all men honour and adore, to which they make their prayers and offer sacrifice. As for you, doe yee not anull that which is apparent to the whole world, to wit, that naturally infants & yongones, are contained within their mothers and dams? and that be-

tweene paine and pleasure there is no meane, even against the sense and experience of all men? saying that not to be in paine, is to have pleasure; and not to do, is to suffer; as also, not to joy, is to be sorrowfull? But to let passe all the rest, what is more evident, and so fully believed generally, than this, that those who have their braines troubled, and their wits distracted, or otherwise sicke of melancholicke diseases, weene they see and heare those things which they neither heare nor see? namely, when their understanding comes to be in such sort affected and transported, as to breake out into these speeches?

*These women here in habit blacke yet glad, hold in their hands,
To dart at me and burne mine eies, torches and fry brands.*

Also:

*Loe how she in her armes doth beare
My mother deare, who did me reare.*

These verily, and a number besides of other illusions more strange and tragicall than these, resembling the prodigious monsters that Empedocles describeth like anticks, which they make sport and laugh at,

*Einhodo, *Necrota, & Bojui, Antefopage.*

That is to say,

*With crooked shanks and winding feet, resembling rammes in pace,
In bodie made like ox or cow, like man before, in face.*

And all other sorts of monstrous shapes and strange natures, mixed together all in one, fetched from troublesome dreames and alienations of the minde. But these men say, that none of all this is any deception or error of the sight, or vaine apparition, but be all true imaginations of bodies and figures, which passe to and fro out of the inconstant aire about them. Tell me now, what thing is so impossible in nature, that we need to doubt, if it be possible to belevee these? For such things as never any conceived maske-maker or deviler of vildards, any inventive potter, glasse-maker, or curious painter and drawer of woonderfull shapes, durst joine together, either to deceive the beholders, or to make them sport for their pastime: these men supposing verily and in good earnest that they be really subsistent; and that which more is, affirming all firme and constant beleve, all certitude of judgement and of truth, to be quite gone for ever, if such things have not their subsistence, these men I say be they, which involve all in obscuritie and darknesse, who overthrow all apparence, and bring into our judgement feare and terrour, into our actions doubtfull suspition; in case our ordinary and usuall actions, and such affaires of ours which are dayly ready at hand, be caried in the same imagination, beleefe and perswasion, that these enormous, absurd, and extravagant fantasies: for the equalitie which they suppose in all, plucketh away more credit from things ordinary, than it addeth unto such as be uncouth and unusuall: which is the cause that we know Philosophers not a few, more willing to avouch, that no imagination is true, than that all be true without exception; and who distrust all men whom they had not conversed withall, all things which they had not tried generally all speeches which they had not heard, rather than belevee so much as one of these imaginations and illusions which made and franticke folke, fanaticall persons possessed with a furious spirit, or dreamers in their sleeps doe apprehend. Seeing then, some imaginations we may utterly abolish, and others not, lawfull it is to retaine our assent and doubt of things whether they be or no, if there were no other cause els but this discordant, which is sufficient to worke in us suspition of things, as having nothing assured and certaine, but all incertitude and perturbation. As for the differences and differences about the infinite number of worlds, the nature of the Atomes, being indivisible bodies, and their declinations to a side, although they trouble and disquiet many men, yet this comfort there is and consolation, that in all this there is nothing neere at hand to touch us, but rather every one of these questions be farre remote, and beyond our senses; whereas this distrust and diffidence, this perturbation and ignorance about sensible things and imaginations, presented to our eies, our eares and our hands, this doubt, I say, whether they be true or false, what opinion is it that they doe not shake and make to waver, what judgement and assent do not they turne up-side downe? For if men, being not drunke nor intoxicated, nor otherwise troubled in their braines, but sober, well in their wits and found of judgement, professing also to write of the truth, and of the canons and rules to judge by, in the most evident passions and motions of the sense, set downe that for true which can not possibly subsist, and for false that which subsisteth, it is not to be marvelled nor thought incredible, if they give no judgement of such things which evidently appeare, but rather be of contrary judgements. For a man may lesse wonder at one for affirming neither the one nor the other, and keeping himselfe in a meane between two opposits, than for putting downe things repugnant and meere contrary. For he that neither affirmeth nor denieth, but holds himselfe quiet, is lesse repugnant both unto him who putteth downe his opinion, than he who denieth it; and also to him that denieth it, than he who puts it downe. And if it be possible to make doubt and sticke at these things, it is not impossible then to doe so of others; at leastwise according to you who are of opinion, that there is no difference at all betweene sense and sense, betweene imagination and imagination: and therefore this doctrine as touching the retention of belief and assent, is not as Colotes saith, a vaine fable, nor a captious toy of rash and light-headed yong men, that love to jangle and prate, but a setled resolution and habituall disposition of staied men, who be wary and take heed that they mistake not any thing, and fall into inconvenience, or abandon at adventure their judgement to the senses, so conjecturall and doubtfull, and not suffering them to be deceived and carried away with those, who hold that things uncerteine, if they seeme and appeare, ought to be beleaved as well as if they were certeine, notwithstanding they see so great obscurity and incertitude in imaginations and apparent things: But rather the infinity that you put downe, and the images which you dreame of be fables. And as for heady rashnesse and a vaine humour of much babble, hee engendreth in yong students who writeth of Pythoetes being not fully eightene yeeeres of age, that there was not in all Greece a better or more towardly nature; as being one who with admiration was able most excellently to expresse the conceptions of his minde; and that his case was much like to the incomparable beauty of women, wishing and praying therefore, that all those surpassing gifts and most rare parts might not worke the yong man hated and envie.

But busie Sophisters they be, and vaine fellows, who against so great and excellent personages, dare write so impudently and proudly: And yet I confesse, Plato, Aristotle, Theophrastus, and Democritus gainesaid and contradicted those who wrote before them: Howbeit there was never man known but himselfe so bold, as to make a booke against all indifferently, and with such a proud inscription as he did: And than afterwards forsooth, like unto those who have offended and displeased the gods: in the end of the said booke, as one confessing his faults, he saith: That they who have established lawes and ordinances, who have erected roiall governments and pollicke rule of cities and states, have set the life of man in great quiet, safety, and security, yea and delivered it from dangerous troubles: which if they were abrogated and put downe, we should lead a savage life like wilde beasts; one would eat another as they met together; for these be the very words that he useth, though unjustly and untruly: For say a man did abolish lawes, and yet withall leave behind unrepealed and uncondemned the doctrines and books of Parmenides, Socrates, Heraclitus, and Plato, we should be farre for all that from devouring one another, or living a savage life; for we should feare and forbear dishonest things, we should even for vertue and honesty, honour justice, beleve that the gods, good magistrats, and the angels or spirits have the guarding, keeping, and superintendence of mans life, thinking all the gold that is both above and under the ground, not able to counterpeize vertue, and doing willingly by reason and learning as Xenocrates was wont to say, that which now we doe perforce for feare of the lawes. But when shall our life become beastly, savage, and insociable? Mary when, the lawes being taken away, there shall be left remaining, books and discourses, inciting and soliciting men unto pleasure: when it shall be thought and beleaved, that the world is not ruled and governed by Gods providence, when they shall be deemed Sages and wise men, who spit against honesty and vertue, unless it be joined with pleasure, and when they shall deride and mocke such sentences as these,

*In Justice is an eye,
Which all things doth espie.*

*And
God neere doth stand,
And sees all at hand.*

As also this old said sawe; God having in his power the beginning, mids, and end of the whole world, passeth directly throughout all nature, and goeth round about, attended upon by justice, to punish those who transgresse the law divine. For they that despise and contemne these instructions as idle fables, and suppose that the soveraigne good consisteth in the belly and other parts, whereby we enjoy pleasure, be those who had need of the law, they ought to feare the whip, and stand in awe of some king, prince, and magistrate, who hath the sword of justice in his hand, to the end that they might not devour their neighbour by insatiable gluttony, which upon Atheisme and impiety, would grow to excessive outrage: For verily such is the life of brute beasts, for that they know nothing better than pleasure, they have no sense of Gods justice, they neither honour nor regard the beauty of vertue: But if nature hath endued them with any hardnesse, craft, and industrious activity, they employ the same, to satisfie their fleshly pleasure, and accomplish their lusts. And therefore Metadorus is reputed a great wise man, for saying, that all the fine, subtill, witty, and exquisite inventions of the soule, have beene devised for to please and delight the flesh, or else for the hope to obtaine and enjoy the fame; and looke what art soever tendeth not thereto, is vaine & to no purpose. By such discourses and Philosophicall reasons as these, downe goe holosome lawes, and in place thereof enter in lions pawes, woollves teeth, oxes paunches, and camels necks and throates: and for want of writings and speech, the very beasts doe preach and teach such doctrines and opinions as these, with their bleating, bellowing, neighing, and braying: For all the voice that they have, is nothing but belly chere, and the pleasure of the flesh, which they either embrace presently, or joy in the expectation thereof; unless haply there be some kind of them that delighteth naturally in gagling, cackling, and garrulity. So that no man is able to praise those sufficiently, and to their full desert, who to repress such furious and beastly affections, have set downe law, established pollicie and government of State, instituted magistrats, and ordeined holosome decrees and edicts. But who bee they that confound, yea, and utterly abolish all this? Are they not those, who give out that all the great empires and dominions in the worlde are nothing comparable to the crowne and garland of * fearelesse tranquillity and repose: Are they not those, who say, that to be a king and to reigne is to sinne, to erre and wander out of the true way leading to felicity: yea and to this purpose write diversly in these termes, we are to shew, how to maintaine in best sort and to keepe the end of nature: and how a man may avoid at the very first not to enter willingly and of his owne accord into offices of state and government of the multitude. Over and besides, these speeches also be theirs, there is no need at all henceforth for a man to labour and take paines for the preservation of the Greeks, nor in regard of wildeome and learning to seeke for to obtaine a crowne at their hands, but to eate and drinke, & Timocrates, without hurt doing to the body, or rather withall contentment of the flesh. And yet the first and most important article of the digests and ordinance of lawes and pollicie which Colotes so highly commendeth, is the belcefe and firme perswasion of the gods: whereby Lycurgus in times past sanctified the Lacedemonians, Numa the Romans, that ancient Ion the Athenians, and whereby Democritus brought all the Greeks universall to religion: which noble and renowned personages made the people devout & affectionate zealously to the gods in priers, oracles and propheties, by the meanes of hope and feare together, which they imprinted in their hearts: In such sort, that if you travell through the world, well you may finde cities without wals, without literature, without kings, not peopled and inhabited, without houses, monasteries, and such as desire no coine, which know not what Theaters or publicke hales of bodily exercise meane: but never was there nor ever shall be any one city, scene, without temple, church, or chappell, without some god or other, which useth no priers nor orthes, no propheties and divinations, no sacrifices either to obtaine good blessings or to avert heavy curses and calamities: nay, me thinks a man should sooner finde a city built in the aire without any plot of ground whereon it is seated, than that any common wealth altogether void of religion & the opinion of the gods should either be first established, or afterwards preserved and maintained in that state. This is it that containeth and holdeth together all humane society, this is the foundation, prop and stay of all lawes which they subvert and overthrow directly, who goe not round about the bush as they say, nor secretly and by circuit of covert speeches, but openly and even at the first assault set upon the principall point of all, to wit, the opinion of God, and religion: and then afterwards as if they were haunted with the furies, they confesse how grievously they have sinned, in shuffling and confounding thus, all rights and lawes, and in abolishing the ordinance of justice and pollicy, to the end that they might obtaine no pardon, for to slip and erre in opinion, although it be not a part of wise men, yet it is a thing incident to man: but to impute and object those faults unto others which they commit themselves, what should a man call it if he fore-beare

bear to use the proper termes & names that it deserveth? For if in writing against Anidormus or Bion the Sophister, he had made mention of lawes, of pollicy, of justice and government of common weale, might not one have said unto him as Electra did to her furious brother Orestes,

Poore Soule, be quiet feare none ill Deare hart, in beed thou be still.

cherishing and keeping warme thy poore body? As for me, let them argue and expostulate with me about these points, who have lived economically or politickly. And such are they all whom Colotes hath reviled and railed upon. Among whom Democritus verily in his writings admonisheth and exhorteth, both to learne military science, as being of all others the greatest, and also to take paines, and endure travels. Whereby men attaine to much renomme and honour. As for Parmenides hee beautified and adorned his owne native countrey with most excellent lawes which he ordained: in so much as the magistrates every yeere when they newly enter into their offices, binde the citizens by an oth to observe the statutes and lawes of Parmenides. And Empedocles not only judiciously convented and condemned the principall persons of the city wherein he dwelt, for their insolent behaviour and for distracting or embeselling the publicke treasure, but also delivered all the territorie about it from sterility and pestilence, wherunto before time it was subject, by emmuring and stopping up the open passages of a certaine mountaine, through which the southern winde blew and overspred all the plaine country underneath. Socrates alter he was condemned to death, when his friends had made means for him to escape, refused to take the benefit thereof, because he would maintaine and confirme the authority of the lawes; chusing rather to die unjustly, than to save his life by disobaying the lawes of his country. Melissus being pretor or captain generall of the city wherein he dwelt, defeated the Athenians in a battell at sea. Plato left behinde him in writing many good discourses of the lawes and of civill government: but much better imprinted he in the hearts and minds of his disciples & familiars, which were the cause that Dion freed Sicily from the tyranny of Dionysius; and Thrace likewise was delivered by the means of Pytho and Heraclides, who killed king Cotys. Chabrias and Phocion, worthy commanders of the Athenians armie, came both out of the schoole Academia. As for Epicurus he sent as farre as into Asia certaine persons of purpose to taunt and revile Metrodorus his brother. And this you may read written in their owne books. But Plato sent of those friends which were brought up under him Aristimachus to the Arcadians, for to ordeine their common wealth, Phormio to the Elians Menedemus to those of Pyrrhia, Eudoxus to the Cnidians, and Aristotle to those of Stagira, who being all his disciples and familiars, did pen and set downe lawes. Alexander the Great requested to have from Xenocrates rules and precepts as touching the government of a kingdome. And he who was sent unto Alexander from the Greeks dwelling in Asia & who most of all other set him on a light fire and whetted him on to enterprise the warre against the barbarous king of Persia, was Delius an Ephesian, one of Platos familiars. Zenon also a scholar of Parmenides undertooke to kill the tyrant Demylus, and having no good successe therein, but missing of his purpose, maintained the doctrine of Parmenides to be pure and fine golde tried in the fire from all base metal, shewing by the effect, that a magnanimous man is to feare nothing, but turpitude and dishonour and that they be children and women, or else effeminate and heartlesse men like women, who are afraid of dolor and paine: for having bitten off his tongue with his owne teeth, he spit it in the tyrants face. But out of the schoole of Epicurus, and of those who follow his rules and doctrines, I doe not aske what tyrant killer there was or valiant man and victorious in feares of armes, what lawgiver, what counsellour, what king or governour of state, either died or suffered torture for the upholding of right and justice: but onely which of all these Sages did ever so much as imbarke and make a voyage by sea in his countries service and for the good thereof, which of them went in embassage or disburshed any mony thereabout? or where is there extant upon record any civill action of yours in matter of government. And yet because that Metrodorus went downe one day from the city, as far as to the haven Pyræum, & tooke a journey of five or six miles to aide Mythra the Syrian one of the king of Persia traine and court, who had bene arrested and taken prisoner, he wrote unto all the friends that he had in the world, of this exploit of his: and this doubty voyage Epicurus hath magnified & exalted in many of his letters. What a doe would they have made then, if they had done such an act as Aristotle did who rectified the city of his nativity Stagira, which had bene destroyed by king Philip? or as Theophrastus, who twice delivered and freed his native city being held and oppressed by tyrants? Should not think you you the the river Nilus have sooner given over to beare the popyr reed, than they bene weary of describing their brave deeds. And is not this a grievous matter and a great indignity, that of so many sects of Philosophers that have bene, they onely in manner enjoy the good things and benefits that are in cities, without contributing any thing of their owne unto them? There are not any Poets Tragedians or Comedians, but they have endeavoured to doe or say alwaies some good thing or other for the defence of lawes and policie: but these here, if peradventure they write ought, write of policie, that we should not intermeddle at all in the civill government of state: of Rhetoricke, that we should not plead any causes eloquently at the barre: of Royalty, that we should avoid the conversing and living in kings courts: neither doe they name at any time those great persons who manage affaires of common weale, but by way of mockerie for to debase and abolish their glorie. As for example of Epaminondas they say that he had indeede some good thing onely in name and word, but the same was but adversary, that is to say, as little as might be, for that is the very terme that it pleaseth them to use. Moreover they name him heart of yron demanding why he marched up and downe through out all Peloponnesus with his armie as he did, and sat not rather quiet at home in his owne house with a dainty chaplet upon his head given wholly to make good chere, and to sleepe with his belly full in a whole skin. But me thinks I should not for any thing omit in this place to rehearse what Metrodorus hath written in his booke of philosophy, wherein abjuring all dealing in government of state, he saith thus, Some there be of these wise men (quoth he) who being full of vanity and arrogancy, had to deepe an insight into the businesse thereof, that in treating of the rules of good life and of vertue they suffer themselves to be carried away with the very same desires that Lycurgus and Solon fell into. What? was this vanity indeed and the abundance of vanity and pride, to let the city of Athens free, to reduce Sparta to good policy, and the government of holisome lawes, that yong men should doe nothing licenciously nor get children upon curtisans and harlots? and that riches, wanton delicacie, intemperance, loosenesse & dissolution should beare no sway nor have the command in cities, but law onely and justice; for these were the desires of Solon. And thus Metrodorus by way of scorne and contumelious reproch addeth thus much more for a conclusion to the rest, And therefore (quoth he) it is well becomming a gentleman, to laugh a good and right heartily at all other men, but especially at these Solones and Lycurgi. But verily such an one were not a gentleman Metrodorus, nor well borne, but servile, base, unruly and dissolute and who deserved to be scourged not with the whip which is for free borne persons, but with that whip Atragalote, wherewith the maner was to whip and chastise those gelded sacrificers called Gally when they did amisse in the ceremonies and sacrifices of Cybele the great mother of the gods. Now that they warred not against the lawgivers but the very lawes themselves, a man may heare and learne of Epicurus; for in his questions he demanded of himselfe, whether a wife man being assured that no man ever should know, would doe and commit any thing that the law forbiddeth? and he maketh an answer which is not full nor an open, plaine and simple affirmation, saying, doe it I will, marry confesse it and be knowne thereof I will not. Again, writing as I suppose unto Idomeneus, he admonisheth him not to subject and enhrall his life unto lawes and the opinions and reputations of men: unlesse it be in this regard onely that otherwise there is prepared odious whipping chere and that neere at hand. If then it be so, that they who abolish lawes, governments and policies, do withall subvert and overthrow mans life: if Metrodorus and Epicurus doe no lesse, withdrawing and averting their friends and followers from dealing in publicke affaires, and spitefully hating those who doe meddle therein, miscalling and railing at the chiefe and wisest lawgivers that ever were, yea and willing them to contemne the lawes, so that they keepe themselves out of the feare of the whip and danger of punishment, I cannot see that Colotes hath in any thing so much belied others, and raised false imputations against them, as he hath indeed and truly accused the doctrine and opinions of Epicurus.

OF LOVE.

10

This Dialogue is more dangerous to be read by young men than any other Treatise of Plutarch, for that there be certaine glaunces heere and there against honest marriage, to upholde indirectly and underhand, the cursed and detestable filthinesse cover- by couched under the name of the Love of young boyes. But minds guarded and armed with true chastitie and the feare of God, may see evidently in this discourse the mis- 20 rable estate of the world, in that there be found patrons and advocates of so detestable a cause; such I meane as in this booke are brought in under the persons of Protogenes and Pisias. Meane while they may perceive likewise in the combat of matrimoniall love against unnaturall Pæderastie not to be na- med, that honestie hath alwaies meanes sufficient to defend it selfe for being vanquished, yea and in the end to go away with the victorie. Now this Treatise may be comprised in foure principall points: of which, the first (after a brieve Preface wherein Autobulus being requested to rehearse unto his com- panions certaine reports which before time hee had heard Plutarch his father to deliver as touching Love, encreth into the discourse) containeth the historie of Himenodora, enamoured upon a young man named Bacchon; whereupon arose some difference and dispute: of which, Plutarch and those of his companie were chosen arbitrators. Therupon Protogenes seconded by Pisias, (and this at the second point) setting himselfe against Himenodora, disgraceth and discrediteth the whole sex of wo- man kinde, and praiseth openly enough the love of males. But Daphneus answereth them so fully home and pertinently to the purpose, that he discovereth and detecteth all their filthinesse, and confu- 30 teth them as behovefull it was, shewing the commodities and true pleasure of conjugall love. In this defence, assisted he is by Plutarch, who prooveth that neither the great wealth, nor the forward af- fection of a woman to a man, causeth the marriage with her to be culpable or woorthy to be blamed, by divers examples declaring that many women even of base condition, have bene the occasion of great evils and calamities. But as he was minded to continue this discourse, newes came how Bacchon was caught up and brought into the house of Himenodora, which made Protogenes and Pisias to dis- lodge; inasmuch as their departure gave entrie into the third and principall point concerning Love what it is? what bethe parts, the causes, the sundry effects and fruits thereof, admirable in all sorts of persons in altering them so as they become quite changed and other then they were before: which is confirmed by many notable examples and similitudes. In the last point Plutarch discourseth upon this 40 argument, and that by the Philosophy of Plato and the Egyptians, conferring the same with the doctrine of other Philosophers and Poets. Then having expressly and flatly condemned Pæ- derastie, as a most vile and abominable thing, and adjoined certaine excellent ad- vertisements for the enterprising of love in wedlocke, betweene husband and wife, of which he releaseth one proper example, his speech endeth by occasion of a messenger who came in place, and drew them all away to the wedding of Himenodora and Bacchon, before said.

OF LOVE.

FLAVIANUS.

It was at Helicon (ô Autobulus) was it not, that those discourses were held as touching Love, which you purpose to relate unto us at this present, upon our request and intreaty, whether it be that you have put them downe in writing, or beare them well in remembrance, considering that you have so often required and demanded them of your father?

AUTOBULUS.

Yes verily, in Helicon it was (ô Flavianus) among the Muses, at what time as the Theſpians ſolemnized the feaſt of Cupid: for they celebrate certaine games of priſe every five yeeres, in the honour of Love, as well as of the Muses, and that with great pompe and magnificence.

FLAVIANUS.

And wot you what it is that we all here that are come to heare you, will request at your hands?

AUTOBULUS.

No verily, but I ſhall know it when you have tolde me.

FLAVIANUS.

20 Mary this it is: That you would now in this recheſfall of yours, lay aſide all by-matters and needleſſe preambles, as touching the deſcriptions of faire meadowes, pleaſant ſhades; of the crawling and winding Ivie; of rills iſſuing from fountaines running round about; and ſuch like common places, that many love to inſert, deſirous to counterfeit and imitate the deſcription of the river Iſſus, of the Chaſt-tree, and the fine greene graſſe and pretty herbs growing daintily upon the ground, tiſing up alittle with a gentle aſſent, and all after the example of Plato in the beginning of his Dialogue Phædrus, with more curioſitie iwis and affectation, than grace and elegancie.

AUTOBULUS.

30 What needs this narration of ours (my good friend Flavianus) any ſuch Proceeme or Pie- face? for the occaſion from whence aroſe and proceeded theſe diſcourſes, requireth onely an affectionate audience, and calleth for a convenient place as it were a ſtage and ſcaffold, for to relate the action: for otherwiſe, of all things els requiſit in a Comedie or Enterlude, there wanteth nothing: onely let us make our praier unto the Muſes Mother, Ladie Memorie, for to be propice unto us, and to vouchſafe her aſſiſtance, that we may not miſſe, but deliver the whole narration. My father long time before I was borne, having newly eſpouſed my mother, by oc- caſion of a certaine difference and variance that fell out betwene his parents and hers, tooke a journey to Theſſia, with a full purpoſe to ſacrifice unto Cupid the god of Love; and to the ſeaſt hee had up with him my mother alſo, for that it principally appertained unto her to perſorme 40 both the praier & the ſacrifice. So there accompanied him from his houſe, certaine of his moſt familiar friends. Now when he was come to Theſſia; he found Daphneus the ſonne of Archida- mus, and Lyſander who was in love with Simons daughter; a man who of all her woerts was beſt welcome unto her and moſt accepted: Saccharis alſo the ſonne of Ariſtion, who was come from Thibora: there was beſides, Protogenes of Tarſus, and Zuxippus the Lacedæmonian, both of them his olde friends and good hoſts, who had given him kinde entertainment: and my father ſaid moreover, that there were many of the beſt men in Beotia there, who were of his acquain- tance. Thus as it ſhould ſeeme, they abode for two or three daies in the citie, enterprising one another gently at their leaſure with diſcourſes of learning, one while in the common empaled 50 places, keeping companie together. But afterwards, for to avoid the troubleſome contentions of Miniſters and Muſicians, where the youth uſed to wreſtle, and otherwiſe in the Theaters and Shew- places, before-hand for voices, they diſlodged from thence for the moſt part of them, as out of an enemies countrey, and retired themſelves to Helicon, and there ſojourned and lodged among the Muſes: where, the morrow morning after they were thither come, arrived and repaired un- to them Anthemion and Piſias, two noble gentlemen, allied both and affectionate unto Bacchon, ſurnamed The Faire, and at ſome variance one with another by reaſon of I wot not what jealousie, in regard of the affection they bare unto him. For there was in the city of Theſſia, a certaine 60 Dame

Dame named Ismenodora, descended of a noble house and rich withall: yea and of wife and honest carriage besides in all her life: for continued shee had no small time in widowhood without blame, reproch or touch, notwithstanding shee was young, and therewith beautifull.

This fresh widow whiles she treated of a marriage to be made between Bacchus a young gentleman, a neighbours childe, whose mother was a very familiar friend of hers; a certaine young maiden a kinswoman of her owne, by often talking with him, and frequenting his company much, fell herselfe in some fancie with the young man: Thus both hearing and speaking much good and many kinde speeches of him, and seeing besides a number of other gentlemen and persons of good worth to be enamoured upon him; by little and little she also fell to bee in hot love with the youth: howbeit, with a full intention and resolution to doe nothing that should be dishonest, or unbecoming her place, parentage, & reputation, but to be wedded unto Bacchus lawfully in the open sight of the world, and so to live with him in the estate of wedlocke. As the thing it selfe seemed at the first very strange, so the mother of the young man of one side doubted and suspected the greatnesse of her state, and the nobility & magnificence of her house & linage, as not meet & correspondent to his condition, for to be a lover or to be matched there; and on the other side, some of his companions who used to ride forth a hunting with him, considering that the young age of Bacchus was not answerable to the yeeres of Ismenodora, buzzed many doubts in his head, and frighted him from her what they could, saying: That he might be his mother, and that one of her age was not for him; and thus by their jesting and scoffing, they hindered the marriage more, than they who laboured in good earnest to breake it: for hee too began to enter into himselfe, and considering that he was yet a bearded youth, and scarcely undergrown, he was abashed and ashamed to marry a widow. Howbeit in the end, shaking off all others, he referred himselfe to Anthemion and Pisias, for to tell him their minds upon the point, and to advise him for his best: Now was Anthemion his cousin german, one of good yeeres, and elder than himselfe farre; and Pisias of all those that made love unto him, most austere: and therefore he both withstood the marriage, and also checked Anthemion, as one who abandoned and betrayed the young man unto Ismenodora. Contrariwise, Anthemion charged Pisias and said he did not well: who being otherwise an honest man, yet herein imitated lewd lovers, for that he went about to put his friend beside a good bargain, who now might be sped with so great a marriage, out ofso worshipfull an house, and wealthy besides; to the end that he might have the pleasure to see him a long time stripped naked in the wrestling place, fith still, and smooth, and not having touched a woman. But because they should not by arguing thus one against another, grow by little and little into heat of choler, they chose for umpiers and judges of this their controvercie, my father and those who were of his company; and thither they came: assistant also there were unto them, other of their friends, Daphneus to the one, and Protagenes to the other, as if they had beene provided of set purpose to plead a cause: As for Protagenes who sided with Pisias, he inveighed verily with open mouth against dame Ismenodora: whereupon Daphneus: O Hercules (quoth he) what are we not to expect, and what thing in the world may not happen; in case it be so that Protagenes is ready heere to give defiance and make warre against love, who all his life both in earnest and in game, hath bene wholly in love, and all for love, which hath caused him to forget his booke, and to forget his naturall countrey, not as Laius did, who was but five daies journey distant: for that love of his was slow and heavy, and kept still upon the land: whereas your Cupid, Protagenes from out of Cilicia to Athens, to see faire boies, and to converse and goe up and downe with them (for to say a trueth, the chiefe cause why Protagenes made a voyage out of his owne countrey, and became a traveller, was at the first this and no other) Heereat the company rooke up a laughter, and Protagenes: Thinke you (quoth he) that I warre not against love, and not rather stande in the defence of love against lascivious wantonnesse, and violent intemperance, which so by most shamefull acts and filthy passions, would perforce challenge and breake into the fairest, most honest, and venerable names that be? Why (quoth Daphneus then) do you terme marriage and the secret of marriage, to wit, the lawfull conjunction of man and wife, most vile and dishonest actions, than which there can be no knor nor linke in the world more sacred and holy? This bond in trueth of wedlocke (quoth Protagenes) as it is necessary for generation, is by good right praised by Politicians and law-givers, who recommend the same highly unto the people and common multitude: but to speake of true love indeed, there is no jot or part thereof in the societie tie and fellowship of women: neither doe I thinke that you and such as your selves, whose affections stand to wives or maidens, do love them no more than a ste loveth milke, or a bee the honny combe; as caters and cookes who keepe foules in mure, and feed calves and other such beasts fatte in darke places, and yet for all that they love them not. But like as nature leadeth and conducteth our appetite moderately, and as much as is sufficient to breed and other viands; but the excess thereof, which maketh the naturall appetite to be a vicious passion, is called gourtman-dise, and pampering of the flesh: even so there is naturally in men and women both a desire to enjoy the mutuall pleasure one of another: whereas the impetuous lust which commeth with a kinde of force and violence, so as it hardly can be held in, is not fildly called love, neither doth it serveth it that name: For love if it seise upon a young kinde, and gentle heart, endeth by amity in vertue: whereas of these affections and lusts after women, if they have successe and speed never so well, there followeth in the end the fruit of some pleasure, the fruition and enjoying of youth and a beautifull body, and that is all. And thus much testified Aristippus, who when one went about to make him have a distaste and dislike of Lais the curtisan, saying, that she loved him not, made this answer: I suppose (quoth he) that neither good wine, nor delicate fish loveth me, but yet (quoth he) I take pleasure and delight in drinking the one, and eating the other. For surely the end of desire and appetite, is pleasure and the fruition of it. But love if it have once lost the hope and expectation of amity and kindnesse, will not continue nor cherish and make much for beauty sake, that which is irksome and odious, be it never so gallant and in the flower and prime of age, unlesse it bring forth and yeeld such fruit which is familiar unto it, even a nature disposed to amity and vertue. And therefore it is that you may heare some husband in a comedie, speaking tragically thus unto his wife:

Thou hatest me: and I againe,
thine hatred and disdain

Will easily beare: and this abuse
turne to my proper game.

For surely, more amorous than this man is not hee, who not for lucre and profit, but for the fleshly pleasure of Venus, endureth a curst, shrewd and froward wife, in whom there is no good nature nor kinde affection. After which manner Philippides the Comical Poet scoffed at the 30 Orator Stratocles and mocked him in these verses:

She winds from thee, she turnes away unkint,
Hardly thou canst once kisse her head behind.

But if we must needs call this passion Love, yet surely it shall be but an effeminate and baftard love, sending us into womens chambers and cabinets as it were to Cynosarges at Athens, where no other yourthes do exercise but misbegotten baftards: or rather, like as they say, there is one kinde of gentle faulcons or roiall eagles bred in the mountaines, which Homer calleth the Blacke eagle for game: whereas other kinds there be of baftard hawks, which about pooles and meres catch fish or seize upon heave winged birds and slow of flight; which many times wanting their prey, make a piteous noise and lamentable cry for very hunger and famine: even so the true and naturall love is that of young boies, which sparkleth not with the ardent heat of concupiscence, as Anacreon saith the other of maidens and virgins doeth: it is not besmired with sweet ointments, nor tricked up and trimmed, but plaine and simple alwaies a man shall see it, without any intifing allurements in the Philosophers schooles, or about publicke parks of exercise and wrestling places, where it hunteth kindly and with a very quicke and piercing eye after none but young striplings and springals, exciting and encouraging earnestly unto vertue, as many as are meet and woorthy to have paines taken with them: whereas the other delicate and effeminate love, that keepeth home and stirreth not out of doores, but keepeth continually in womens laps, under canopies or within curtaines in womens beds and soft pallers, seeking alwaies after daintie delights, and pampered up with unmanly pleasures, wherein there is no reciprocal amitie, nor heavenly ravishment of the spirit, is worthy to be rejected and chased farre away: like as Solon banished it out of his common wealth, when he exprefly forbade all slaves and those of servile condition to love boies or to be anointed in the open aire without the baines, but he debarrd them not from the companie of women. For amitie is an honest, civil and laudable thing: but fleshly pleasure, base, vile, and illiberal. And therefore that a servile slave should make love to a sweet youth, it is neither decent, civil nor commendable: for this is no carnall love nor hurtfull any way, as that other is of women. Protagenes would have continued his speech and said more, but Daphneus interrupting him: Now surely, you have done it

very

very well (quoth he) and alledged Solon trimly for the purpose; and wee must belike, take him for the judge of a true lover, and the rule to go by, especially when he saith:

Thou shalt love boies, till lovely downe upon their face doth spring, Catching at mouth their pleasant breath, and soft sighs cherishing.

Adjoine also unto Solon (if you thinke good) the Poet Aeschylus, whereas he saith:

*Unthankfull man, unkinde thou art,
For kisses sweet which thou hast found,
Regarding not of thy deare hart,
The thighs so freights and buttocks round.*

Here are proper judges indeed of love. Others I wot well there be, who laugh at them, because they would have lovers like to sacrificers, bowel-priers and soothsaiers, to cast an eie to the handes and the loines: but I for my part, gather from hence a very good and forcible argument in the behalfe of women: for if the companie with males that is against kinde, neither taketh away nor doth prejudice the amitie and good will of lovers, farre more probable it is that the love to women which is according to nature, is performed by a kinde of obsequious favour, and endeth in amity: for the voluntarie submission of the female to the male, was by our ancestors in olde time, o Protagenes, termed zans, that is to say, Grace or Favour: which is the reason that Pindarus saith Vulcane was borne of Junno and zans, that is to say, without the Graces. And Sappho the Poetesse speaking to a yong girle not as yet for her tender yeeres marriageable:

Too yong (my childe) you seeme to me, Withonten Grace also to be.

And Heracles was asked the question of one in these termes:

*What did you force the maiden by compulsion,
Or win her grace and favour with perjavation.*

whereas the submission in this kinde of males to males, if it be against their will, is named violence and plaine rape: but if it be voluntarie, and that upon an effeminate weaknesse they be so farre beside their right wits as to yeeld themselves to be ridden as it were and covered, for those be Platoes words, in manner of foure footed beasts; I say such love is altogether without Grace, so without decencie, most unseemly, filthy and abominable. And therefore I suppose verily, that Solon powred out those verses when he was a lustie yoonker, ranke of blood and full of naturall feed, as Plato saith: for when he was well steeped in yeres he sung in another tune and wrote thus:

*The sports of VENUS Lady bright,
And BACCHUS now are my delight:
In MUSICKE like I pleasure take:
For why? these three men joies domake.*

when he had retired and withdrawn his life as it were out of a troublesome sea and tempestuous storme of Pederastium, into the quiet calme of lawfull marriage and studie of Philosophie.

Now if we will consider better, & looke nerer into the truth, the passion of Love (o Protagenes) be it in one sex or another, is all one & the same: but if upon a froward and contentious humor you will needs divide and distinguish them, you shall finde that this love of boies doth not containe it selfe within compasse, but as one late borne and out of the seasonable time of age and course of this life, a very bastard and begotten secretly in darknesse, it would wrongfully drive out the true legitimate naturall love, which is more ancient. For it was but yesterday or two daies ago as one would say my good friend, and namely, since yong lads began in Greece to disrobe & turne themselves naked out of their clothes, for the exercise of their bodies, that it crept into these unvalpled places, where youtnes prepared themselves for to wrestle: & there closely settling it selfe, lodged and was entailed; where by little and little when the wings were full grown, it became so insolent, that it could not be held in, but offer injury and outrage to that nuptiall love, which is a coadjutresse with nature, to immortalize mankind, in kindling it immediately againe by generation according as the flame is extinguished and put out by death. But this Protagenes here would seeme to deny that the said love tendeth to any pleasure: The truth is this, he is ashamed to confesse, and afraid to avow so much. But there must needs be devised some pretie reason, and cleanly excuse, for the touching, feeling, and handling of these faire yong boies. Wel the pretence and colour to coverall, is amity and vertue. He bestreweth himselfe with dust against he should wrestle, he doth bath and wash in cold water, he knitteth & bendeth his browes full gravely, he giveth it out and maketh his boast that he studieth Philosophie, that he is chaste and continent: and all this is abroad and before folke, for feare of the lawes; but when the night comes, and that every man is retired to his rest,

*Sweet is the fruit that stolen is secretly,
And gatherd close while keeper is not by.*

And if as Protagenes saith this Pederastium aimeth not at carnall conjunction, how then can it be love, if Venus be not there? considering that of all other gods and goddes, her alone Cupid is destined and devoted to serve and attend upon, having neither honour, power nor authoritie, no farther than the will impart and bestow upon him. And if you say unto mee, that there may be some love without Venus, like as there is drunkennesse without wine, for a man may drinke of a certain decoction of figs, or barly made into malt, & be drunke therewith: I answer you, that as this is but a flatulent exagitation, so the motion of such love is fruitlesse, unperfect, bringing lothsome fatietie, and wearisome fulnesse soone. Whiles Daphneus thus spake, it appeered evidently, that Pisias found himselfe galled, and was enchaffed against him. Therefore so soone as he had made an end of his speech, after some little pause: O Heracles (quoth hee) what intollerable impudency and inconsiderate rashnesse is this, that men should confesse and avow, that like dogs they be tied to women by their naturall parts, and so chaste and banish this god Cupid, out of the publicke places of exercise, out of the open galleries and walks; from the pure conversation in open aire, sunne-shine, and before the whole world for to be ranged and brought, to little spades, hatchets, drogues, medicines, charmes and forceries of these wanton and lascivious women? For to speake of chaste and honest dames, I say, it is not becoming that they should either love or be loved. And heereat verily my father said, that himselfe tooke Protagenes by the hand, reciting this verse out of the Poet:

Such words as these no doubt will make The Argives, armes anon to take.

For surely Pisias through his insolencie, causeth us to side with Daphneus, and undertake to mainteine his part, seeing he so farre exceedeth the bonds of all reason, as to bring into marriage and wedlocke, a society without love, and void of that divine instinct of amity, and inspired from heaven above: which we see how we have enough to doe for to mainteine and hold with all the yokes, bittes and bridles, of feare and shame, if this hearty affection and grace be away. Then Pisias, I passe little (quoth he) for all these words: and as for Daphneus me thinks I see how it fareth with him, as it doth with a piece of brasle, which melteth not so much by force of fire, as it doth by another piece of brasle melted, if a man power the same upon it, for then anon it will be liquified and runne together with it. And even so, the beauty of Lysandra doth not so greatly affect and trouble him, as this that conversing along time with one that is enflamed and full of fire, by touching her he is himselfe all fire: and evident it is, that unless hee retire with speed unto us, he will melt and runnall to liquor: But I perceive (quoth he) that I do that which Anthemion should most desire and wish, namely, that I am offensive both to the judges and to myselfe; wherefore I will hold my peace & say no more: You say true indeed (quoth Anthemion) you do me a great pleasure, for you should at the very first have said somewhat to the point, and upon the particular matter now in question: I say therefore (quoth Pisias, but I protest before hand, & that aloud, that for mine owne part I will be no hindrance, but that every woman may have her lover) that this yong man Bacchon had need to take heed and beware of the riches and wealth of Ismenodora, otherwise if wee match him with such an house of so great state and magnificence, we shall ere wee be aware consume him to nothing, like a piece of time among brasle. For a great matter I may tell you it were, if being so yong as he is, and depousing a wife of meane and simple degree, he should in such a mixture hold his owne, and keepe the predominance as wine over water. But we may see that this gentlewoman heere seemeth already to looke for to commaund and be his master: otherwise she would never have refused and rejected so many husbands as she hath done of such reputation, so nobly descended, and so wealthy withall, for to woo and sollicite as she doth a very boy new crept out of the shell, no better than a page but the other day, one iwis that had more need to goe to schoole still, and be under a tutor and governour. And heereupon it is, that those husbands who are of the wiser sort, doe of themselves cast away, or else clip and cut the wings of their wives, that is to say, their goods and riches, which cause them to be proud and insolent, sumptuous and wastefull, full of shrewdnesse, vaine, light, and foolish; and with these wings they mount many times, take their flight and away; or if they stay at home, better it were for a man to be bound with fetters of gold, as the

maner is to encheine prifoners in Aethiopia, than to be tied with the wealth and riches of his wife: But he hath faid nothing as yet (quoth Protopogenes) heereof, nor once touched this string, namely, how in admitting this marriage, we shall in maner invert and that ridiculouslly and with absurdity enough the sentence of Heliodorus who giveth counsell in these words:

*At thirty yeeres (not much above nor under) of thine age, Wed thou a wife: this is the time,
most meet for marriage:
At fowercene yeeres a damosell doth signes of ripenesse shew, At fifteene would she married be,

And we heere cleane contrary almost, will match a young man before he be ready for marriage, unto a woman as old againe well neere as himselfe, as if one should set dates or figges upon old flocks, to make them ripe. And why not? some one will haply say; for she is enamoured upon him; she burnes & is ready to die for love of him, I marvel much who hinders her that she goeth not to his house in a maske, that she sings not lamentable ditties at his dore, & amorous plaints, that she adorneth not his images with garlands and chaplets of flowers, and that she entreth not into combat with her corrivals, and winne him from them all by fight and feats of activity: for these be the casts of lovers; let her knit her browes; let her forbear to live bravely and daintily, 20 putting on the countenance and habit meet for this passion: but if she be modest, shamefaced, sober, and honest, as that she is abashed so to doe; let her sit womanly and decently as it becometh, at home in her house, expecting her lovers and woers, to come and court her there. For such a woman as doth not dissemble, but bewraith openly that she is in love, a man would avoid and detest, so farre would he be from taking her to be his wife, or laying for the ground of his marriage such shamelesse incontinence. Now when Protopogenes had made an end of his speech, and paused a while: See you not o Anthemion (quoth Daphneus) how they make this a common cause againe and matter of disputation, enforcing us to speake still of nuptiall love, who denie not our selves to be the maintainers thereof, nor avoid to enter into the daunce as they say, and to shew our selves to be the champions of it? Yes mary do I (quoth Anthemion) & 30 I pray you take upon you to defend at large this love: and withall let us have your helping hand about this point, as touching riches, which Pisfas urgeth especially, and wherewith he seemeth to affright us more than with any thing else: What can we doe lesse quoth my father then; for were it not a reproch offered unto woman kind, and would it not greatly redound to their discredit and blame, in case we would reject and cast off Ismenodora, for her love and her wealth sake? But she is brave, she is sumptuous, costly, and bearing a great port: What matters that, so long as she is faire, beautifull, and young? But she is come of a noble house and highly descended? What harme of that if she live in good name, and be of good reputation? for it is not necessary that wives to approve their honesty and wisdom, should be fower, austere, curst & shrewd: for chaste dames and sober matrons, doe indeed detest bitterness, as an odious thing and in- 40 tollerable. And yet some there be that call them furies, and say they be curst shrewes unto their husbands, when they be modest, wife, discret, and honest. Were it not best therefore to espouse some old Abasionon out of Thracia, bought in open market: or some Bacchis, a Milesian * passing in exchange for raw hides, and prized no deerer: And yet we know there be many men, whom such women as these hold most shamefully under their girdles, and rule as they list: For even minstrell wenches of Samar, and such as professed dauncing, as Arithonica, Oeanthe, with her labour and pipe & Agatholeia, have over-topped kings and princes, yea trodden their crownes and diademes under foot: As for Semiramis a Syrian, she was at first no better than a poore wench, servant and concubine to one of the great king Ninus slaves: but after that the king himselfe had fet his eye and fancie upon her, he was so devoted unto her, & the againe so imperiouslly ruled over him, and with such contempt, that she was so bold to require at his hands, that he would permit her to sit one day upon her roiall throne, under the cloth of estate, with the diademe about her head, and so to give audience and dispatch the affaires of the kingdome in stead of him; which when Ninus had graunted, & given expresse charge withall, that all his subjects whatsoever should yeeld their loiall obedience to her as to his owne person, yea and performe whatsoever she ordeined and decreed: she caried herselfe with great moderation in her first commandements, to make trial of the pensioners and guard about her; and when she saw that 50

* Agatholeia was a famous dancer, that is to say, whose open sale is a pwaye for assurance, that she will be true and obedient to her husband, as some interpret it.

they gainesaid her in nothing, but were very diligent and serviceable; she commanded them to arrest and apprehend the body of Ninus the king, then to binde him fast, and finally to doe him to death. All which when they had fully executed, she reigned indeed, & for a long time in great state and magnificence ruled all Asia. And was not Bellestis I pray you a Barbarian woman, bought up even in the very market among other slaves? and yet those of Alexandria have certain temples, chappels & altars, which king Ptolomeus who was enamoured upon her, caused to be entituled by the name of Venus Bellestis? And Phryne the famous courtesan, who both heere and also at Delphos is shrined in the same temple and chappell with Cupid, whose statue all of beaten gold standeth among those of kings and queenes; by what great dowry was it that she had all her lovers in such subjection under her? But like as these persons through their effeminate softnesse and puffanimity, became ere they were aware a very prey and pillage to such women: so on the other side, we finde others of base degree and poore condition, who being joined in marriage to noble & rich wives, were not utterly overthrowen with such matches, nor struck faile or abated ought of their generositie and high spirit, but lived alwaies loved and honored by those wives, yea and were masters over them to their dying day. But he that rangeth and reduceth his wife into a narrow compasse and low estate, as if one bent a ring to the slenderesse of his finger, for feare it should drop off, resembleth those for all the world, who clip and shave the maines of their mares, and plucke the haire off their tails, and then drive them to water, into some river or poole: for it is said, that when they see themselves in the water so ill favouredly shorne and curtailed, they let fall their courage, stomacke, and haucie spirit, so as they suffer themselves afterward to be covered by asses. And therefore like as to pretense the riches of a woman above her vertue, or to make choise thereof before nobility of birth were base and illiberal: so to reject wealth joined with vertue and noble parentage is meer folly. King Antigonus writing unto a capitaine of his whom he put with a garison into the fortreffe Munichia in Athens, the which he fortified with all diligence possible, commanded him not only to make the collar and chaine strong, but the dogge also weak and leane: giving him thereby to understand, that he should empoverish the Athenians, and take from them all means whereby they might rebell or rise against him. But a man who hath taken to wife a rich and beautifull woman, ought not to make her either poore, or foule and ill-favoured; but rather by his discretion, 30 good government & wisdom, and by making semblance that he is ravished with no admiration of any thing that she hath, to beare himselfe equall unto her and in no wise subject, giving by his good demeanour and carriage a counterpoise to the balance for to hold her firme, or a waight rather to make her incline and bend that way which is good for them both. Now to returne unto Ismenodora, her yeeres are meet for marriage, and her person fitte for breeding and bearing children, and I heare say the woman is in the very floure and best of her time; for elder she is not (and with that he smiled upon Pisfas) than any of her sisters and corrivals, neither hath she any gray haire, as some of those that be affectionate to Bacchon and follow him. Now if they thinke themselves of a meet age to converse familiarly with him, what should hinder her but she should affect and fancie the young mans person as well (if not better) as any young maiden 40 whatsoever. And verily these young folke are otherwhiles hard to be matched, united and incorporated together, and much a doe there is but by long continuance of time, to cast aside and shake off wantonnesse and wildenesse: for at the first there is many a foule day and blustering tempest, and unlineth will they abide the yoke and drawe together: but especially if there be any inking or jealousy of other loves abroad, which like unto winds when the pilot is away do trouble and disquiet the wedlocke of such young persons as are neither willing to obey, nor have the skill to command. If it be so then, that a nurse can rule her little babe sucking at her paps; a schoolemaster the boy that is his scholar; a master of exercises, the young springall; a lover, the youth whom he loveth; the law and the capitaine, a man grown and him that is able to beare armes; in so much as there is no person of what age soever without government, and at his owne 50 libertie to doe what he list: what absurdity is it if a wife that hath wit and discretion, and is besides the elder, governe and direct the life of a young man her husband? being as she is profitable unto him in regard she is the wiser, and besides milde and gentle in her government, for that she loveth him? Over and besides, to conclude, we all that are Boeotians (quoth he) ought both to honour Heracles, and also not to be offended with the marriage of those who are in yeeres unequal, knowing as we doe that he gave his owne wife Megeta being thirty three yeeres olde, in marriage to Iolani being then but fixteene yeeres of age. As these words passed to and fro, there came (as my father made report) one of Pisfas companions galloping hard one horsebacke from from out of the city bringing newes of a very strange and wonderfull occurrent. For Ismenodora, perswading her selfe (as probable it was) that Bacchon misliked not this marriage in his heart but that he held off, for the respect and reverence that he carried unto those who seemed to divert him from it, resolved, not to give over her suit, nor to cast off the yong men. Whereupon she sent for such of her friends, as were lusty yong and adventurous gallants, and withall her favourites those that wished well to her love: certain women also who were inward with her and most trusty: and when she had assembled them all together in her house and communicated her mind unto them, she waited the very houre, when as Bacchon was wont ordinarily to passe by her dores, going well and orderly appointed forth to the publicke place of wrestling. Now when he approached nere unto her house all enhuiled and anointed as he was, accompanied only with two or three persons, Ismenodora her selfe stepped forth of dores, crossed the way upon him and only touched the mandilion that he had about him: which signall being given, all at once her friends leapt forth & faire caught up this faire youth in his mandilion and dublet as he was, and gently caried him into her house, and immediately shut the dores fast locked. No sooner had they gotten him within dores, but the women in the house turning him out of his upper mandilion afore said, put upon him a faire wedding robe, & withall the servants of the house ran up and downe, and adorned with ivie and olive branches the dores and gates not only of Ismenodora but also of Bacchons house: and with that a minstrill wench also passed along through the street piping and singing a wedding song. As for the citizens of Thebes and the strangers who were there at that time, some of them tooke up a laughter, others being angry and offended hereat, incited the masters and governours of the publicke exercises (who indeed have great authority over the youth and carry a vigilant eye unto them, for to looke nereely unto all their behaviours) whereupon they made no account at all of the present exercises then in hand, but leaving the theater, to the dore they came of Ismenodora, where they fell into hot reasoning and debating of the matter one against another. Now when the said friend of Pisias was come in all hastening upon the spurre with this newes, as if she had brought some great tidings out of the campe in time of warre, he had no sooner uttered, pausing for want of winde and in manner breathlesse, these words, Ismenodora hath ravished Bacchon, but Zenoxippus, as my father told the tale, laughed heartily, and out of Euripides (as he was one who alwaies loved to reade that Poet) pronounced this sentence:

*Well done faire dame: you having wealth at will,
Are worldly wife, your minde thus to fulfill.*

But Pisias, rising up in great choler, cried out, O the will of God, what will be the end of this licentious libertie, which thus overthroweth our citie? seeing how all the world is grown already to this paffe, that through our unbrideled audaciousnesse, we doe what we list; and passe for no lawes? but why say I lawes, for haply it is but a ridiculous thing to take indignation for the transgressing of civill law and right: for even the very lawe of nature is violated by the insolent rashnesse of women. Was there ever the like example scene in the very like Lemnos? Let us be gone (quoth he) goe we and quit from hence forth the wrestling schools, and published place of exercises, the common hall of justice, and the senate house, and commit all to women, if the city be so inveterate as to put up such an indignitie. So Pisias brake company and departed in these termes, and Protagenes followed after him, partly as angry as he, and in part appeasing & mitigating his mood a little. Then Anthemion: To say a truth (quoth he) this was an audacious part of hers, and favouring somewhat of the enterprise of those Lemnian wives in old time, and no marvell; for we our selves know that the woman was exceeding voracious. Hereat Sostratus: Why thinke you (quoth he) that this was a ravishment indeed, and plaine force, and not rather a subtil devise and stratageme, as it were of a yong man himselfe, who hath wit at will, to colour and excuse himselfe, in that escaping out of the armes of his other lovers, he is fallen into the hands of a faire, yong and wealthie Ladie. Never say so (quoth Anthemion) nor intertaine such an opinion of Bacchon: for say that he were not of a simple nature (as he is) and so plaine in all his dealings, yet would he never have concealed so much from me, considering that he hath made me privie to all his secrets, and knoweth full well that in these matters I was of all other most ready to second and set forward the sute of Ismenodora. But a hard matter it is to withstand not anger as Heraclitus saith, but love: for whatsoever it be that it would have, compass the same it will, though it be with the perill of life, though it cost both goods and reputation. For setting this thing aside, was there ever in all our citie, a woman more wise, sober and modest than Ismenodora? when was there ever heard abroad of her, any evil report, and when

went there so much as a light suspicion of any unhoneft act out of that house? Certes we must thinke and say, that the seemes to have bene surprisid with some divine instinct supernaturall and above humane reason. Then laughed Pemptides: You say even true (quoth he) there is a certaine great maladie of the bodie, which thereupon they call sacred: is there any marvell then that the greatest and most furious passion of the minde some do terme sacred and divine? But it seemes unto me, that it fares with you here, as I saw it did sometime with two neighbours in Aegypt, who argued & debated one with another upon this point, that whereas there was presented before them in the way as they went, a serpent creeping on the ground, they were resolved both of them, that it presaged good & was a luckie signe; but either of them tooke & challenged it to himselfe: for even so when I see that some of you draw love into mens chambers, and others into womens cabinets, as a divine and singular good thing, I nothing wonder thereat, considering that this passion is growen to such power and is so highly honoured, that even those who ought to clip the wings thereof, and chase it from them of all sides, those be they that magnifie and extoll it most. And verily hitherto have I held my peace as touching this matter in question, for that I saw the debate and controversie was about a private cause rather than any publicke matter: but now that I see how Pisias is departed, I would gladly heare and know of you, whereat they aimed and tended, who first affirmed that Love was a God? When Pemptides had propounded this question, as my father addrest himselfe and began to make his answer, there came another messenger in place, whom Ismenodora had sent from the citie, for to bring Anthemion with him; for that the trouble and tumult in manner of a sedition grew more and more within the towne, by occasion that the two masters of the publicke exercises, were at some difference one with another, whiles the one was of this minde that Bacchon was to be redemanded and delivered, the other againe thought that they were to deale no farther in the matter. So Anthemion arose incontinently and went his way with all speed and diligence possible: and then my father calling to Pemptides by name, and directing his speech unto him: You seeme Pemptides (quoth he) in my conceit, to touch a very maine and nice point, or rather indeed to stirre a string that would not be stirred, to wit, the opinion and beleefe that we have as touching the gods, in that you call for a reason and demonstration of them in particular. For the ancient faith and beleefe received from our ancients in the country where we are borne is sufficient, than which there can not be said or imagined a more evident argument:

*For never was this knowledge found,
By wit of man or sense profound.*

But this tradition being the base and foundation common to all pietie and religion, if the certitude and credit thereof received from hand to hand be shaken and mooved in one onely point, it becometh suspected and doubtfull in all the rest. You have heard no doubt how Euripides was coursed and troubled for the beginning of his Tragedie Metamippe, in this manner:

Ὡς δὲ θεῶν ἄλλοι ἐγὼ, &c.

*Jupiter whose name I know
By heare say onely and no mo.*

And verily he had a great confidence in this Tragedie, being as it should seeme magnificently and with exquisite elegancie penned: but for the tumultuous murmuring of the people, hee changed the foresaid verses, as now they stand written:

Ὡς δὲ ἀνθρώπων ἢ δαίμονος ἑσθλῶς, &c.

God Jupiter (which name in veritie Doth sort full well to his divinitie.)

And what difference is there by our words and disputation, betwene calling the opinion which we have of Jupiter and of Mercurie into question and making doubt of Cupid or Love? For it is not now of late, and never before, that this God begins to call for altars or to challenge sacrifices: neither is he a stranger come among us from some barbarous superstition, like as certaine 50 Atta and I wot not what Adonides and Adonai, brought in by the meanes of some halfe-men or mungrell Hermaphrodites and odde women; and thus being closely crept in, hath met with certaine honours and worshippes farre unmeet for him, in such sort as he may well be accused of bastardie and under a false title to have bene enrolled in the catalogue of the gods: for my good friend, when you heare Empedocles saying thus,

And equal to herest in length and breadth, was Amittis,

But

*But see in spirit thou it beholds,

you must understand him, that he writeth thus of Love; for that this God is not visible, but apprehended onely by opinion and beleefe, among other Gods which are most ancient. Now if of all them in particular, you seeke for a prooffe and demonstration, laying your hands upon each temple, and making a sophisticall triall by every altar, you shall find nothing void and free from calumnniation and envious slander: for not to go farre off, marke but these verses:

*But Venus aneth can I see How great a goddesse she should be:
Of Cupid she the mother is,
And she alone that Love doth give:
Whose children we (you not wel this)
Are all, who ont the earth do live.*

And verily, Empedocles called her Cupid, that is to say, fertile or giving life: Sophocles, Empedocles, that is to say, fruitfull: both of them using most fit and pertinent attributes. Howbeit, this great and admirable worke, to wit, Generation, is wrought principally and directly by Venus, but collaterally and as an accessary by Love: which if love be present, is pleasant & acceptable; contrariwise, if love be away, and not assistent thereto, surely the act thereof remaineth altogether not expetible, dishonorable, without grace and unamiable. For the conjunction of man and woman without the affection of love, like as hunger and thirst which tend to nothing else but satiety and fulnesse, endeth in nought that is good, lovely and commendable: but the goddesse Venus, putting away all lothsome satiety of pleasure, by the meanes of love, engendred amitie and friendship, yea and temperature of two in one. And herereupon it is that Parmentides verily affirmeth love to be the most ancient worke of Venus, writing thus in his booke intituled Cymogenia, that is to say, the creation of the world.

But Hesiodus seemeth in mine opinion more physically to have made love more ancient than any other whatsoever, to the end that all the rest by it might breed and take beginning. If then we becaue this love of the due honours ordained for it, certes those which belong to Venus will not keepe their place any longer. Neither can it be truly said that some men may wrong and reproch love, and forbear withall to doe injurie unto Venus. For even from one and the same stage we doe here these imputations, first upon love:

*Love idle is selfe, and in good troth
Possesseth such like persons, given to sloth.*

And then againe upon Venus:

*Venus (my children) hath not this onely name
Of Venus or of Cypris: for the same Answereth right well to many an attribute,
And surname, which men unto her impute.
For hell she is: and also violence
That never ends, but aie doth recommence
And furious rage, yong folke for to incense*

Like as, of the other gods there is not one almost, that can avoid the approbrious tongue of unlettered rufficity and ignorance. For do but consider and observe god Mars, who as it were in an Caldæan and Astronomicall table standeth in a place diametrally opposit unto love; make I say what great honours men have yielded unto him, and contrariwise what reprochfull termes they give him againe:

*Mars is starke blinde and seeth not (faire dames) but like wilde bore,
By turning all things up side downe, works mischeife evermore.*

Homer calleth him Phaenon, that is to say, imbrued with blood and polluted with murders; likewise Allogesimachos, that is to say, variable and leaping from one side to another. As for Christippus, by etymologizing and deriving this gods name, fastneth upon him a criminous accusation, saying that apros, for so he is named, in Greeke, cometh of apros, that is to say to murder and destroy:

giving

giving thereby occasion unto some, to thinke that the facultie and power in us, prone to warre, fight, debate, quarrell, anger, and fell stomacke, is called Apros, that is to say, Mars. Like as others also will say, that concupiscence in us, is termed Venus; our gift of speaking, Mercurius; skill in arts and sciences, Muses; and prudence, Minerva. See you not how deepe a pit and downfall of Atheisme and impietie is ready to receive and swallow us up, in case we range and distribute the gods according to the passions, powers, faculties and vertues that be in us?

I see it very well (quoth Pemprides;) but neither standeth it with pietie and religion, to make gods to be passions; nor yet contrariwise, to beleue that passions be gods. How thinke you then (quoth my father) is Mars a god, or a passion of ours? Pemprides answered, That he thought him to be a god, ruling and ordering that part of our soule wherein is seated animosity, anger and manly courage. What Pemprides, cried out my father then, hath that turbulent, warring, overthwart and quarrelling part in us, a deitie to be president over it; and shall this that breedeth amity, societie and peace, be without a divine power to governe it? Is there indeed, a martiall and warlike god of armes, called thereupon Stratium and Enyalium, who hath the superintendence and preidence of mutuall murders wherein men kill and be killed, of armour, weapons, arrowes, darts and other shot of assaults and scaling walles, of saccage, pillage and booties? Is there never a god, to be a witnesse, guide, director and coadjutour of nuptiall affection and matrimoniall love, which endeth in unitie, concord and fellowship? There is a god of the woods and forests, named Agroteus, who doth aide, assist and encourage hunters, in chasing and crying after the roe-bucke, the wilde goat, the hare and the hart; and they who lie in secret wait for to intercept woolves and beares in pitfallles, and to catch them with snares, make their priates to Asifaw,

*Who first, as I have heard men say,
Did grimace and snares for wilde beasts lay.*

And Hercules when he bent his bowe, and was ready to shoot at a bird, called upon another god: and as Aschylus reporteth,

*Phoebus the hunter, directed by-and-by,
His arrow straight, as it in aire did fly.*

And shall the man who hunteth after the fairest game in the world, even to catch friendship and amitie, have no god nor demi-god, no angell to helpe, to favorise, and speed his enterprize and good endeavours? For mine owne part, my friend Daphneus, I take not man to be a more bafe plant or viler tree, than is the oake, the mulberie tree, or the vine which Homer honoured with the name of Hemeris, considering that in his time and season he hath a powerfull instinct to bud and put forth most pleasantly, even the beauty both of body and minde. Then (quoth Daphneus) who ever was there, before God, that thought or said the contrary? Who answered my father: many even all they verily, who being of opinion, that the carefull industrie of plowing, sowing and planting, apperteineth unto the gods:

For certaine Nymphs they have light Diades Whose life they say is equall with the trees.

And as Pindarus writeth,

*God Bacchus who the pure resplendent light
Of Autumne is, and with his kinde influence
Doth nourish trees and cause to grow upright,
And fructifie at length in affluence.*

Yet for all this are not perswaded that the nouriture and growth of children, and yong folke, who in their prime and flour of age, are framed and shaped to singular beauty and feature of personage, belongeth to any one of the gods or demy gods. Neither by their saying, any deitie or divine power, hath the care & charge of man, that as he groweth he should shoot up streight, and arise directly to vertue; and that his naturall indument and generous ingenuity should be perverted, daunted and quelled, either for default of a carefull tutour and directour, or through the leawd and corrupt behaviour of bad company about him. And verily were it not a shamefull indignity and ingratitude thus to say: and in this behalfe to drive God as it were from that bounty and benignity of his to mankind, which being defused spread and dispersed over all, is defectious in no part, no not in those necessary actions and occasions, whereof some have their end more needfull iwis many times than lovely or beautiful to see. As for example, even our very birth at first, is nothing fightly at all nor pleasant, in regard of the bloud and bitter pangs that do accompany it, yet hath the same a goddesse to be the president & overseer there-

of,

of, to wit Lucina, called thereupon Lochia and Ilithia. Besides, better it were for a man never to have bene borne, than to become evill and naught, for want of a good governor and guardian. Moreover the deitie and devine power, leaveth not man destitute when he is sicke, nor when he is dead: but some God there is or other, that hath an office and function even then, and is powerfull in those occasions: there is one, I say, that helpeth to convey the soules of such as have ended their life, from hence into another world, and to lay them in quiet repose, who for bestowing and transporting of them in that sort is called Catunastes and Psychopompos according as he saith.

*The shady night never bare (The harps to sound) a fine musician:
Nor prophet secrets to declare:
Ne yet in cures a good physician:
But for the soules of dead, below,
In their due place, them to bestow.*

And yet in these ministreries and functions many odious troubles and incombrances there be: whereas contrariwise there can be named no worke more holy, no exercise, game of price or profession of maisteries, whatsoeuer, whereof it becometh a god better, to have the dispose, preference and oversight, than is the charge and regard, to order and rule the desires of lovers, affecting and pursuing beautifull persons in the floure and prime of their age. For herein their is nothing foule, nothing forced nor by constraint: but that gentle perswasion & attractive grace, to which yeelding in trueth a pleasaunt and sweet labor, leadeth all travell whatsoever unto vertue and amitie; which neither without a god can attaine unto the desired end which is meet and convenient, nor hath any other god, for the guide, master, and conductor, than Love which is the companion of the Muses graces and Venus;

*For Cupid sowing secretly
In heart of man a sweet desire,
And heat of Love, immediately
By kindling milde and gentle fire.*

According as Menalippides saith, tempereth the pleasaunt things that be with those that are most faire and beautifull. How say you Zenxippus, is it not so? Yes verily (quoth he) I am altogether of that minde: for to hold the contrary were very absurd. Then (quoth my father againe) and were it not as monstrous, that whereas amitie hath foure severall kindes and branches, according as the ancient Philosophers have divided it: The first in nature, then that of propinquity and local affinity, the third of society, and the last this of love, every one of the rest should have a god to be the president and governour thereof, to wit, surname either Eros, or Erôs, or Eros, or Eros, and eros, and this amorous amitie onely or love as accursed, interdicted and excommunicate, be left without a lord and ruler? considering that it requireth more care, sollicitude and government than all the rest? It doth indeed (quoth Zenxippus) and need it hath out of that which is strange but proper and familiar, of the owne.

Moreover (quoth my father) a man may here take hold by the way of Plato his opinion and doctrine to this purpose: to wit, that there is one kind of furie transmitted from the body to the soule proceeding from certaine indispositions and malignant distemperatures of ill humours, or else occasioned by some hurtfull winde or pernicious spirit that passeth and entrench into it, and this furie is a sharpe and dangerous disease. There is another not without some divine instinct: neither is it engendred at home and within us: but a strange inspiration it is, coming from without, a very alienation of reason, sense, and understanding, the beginning and motion whereof ariseth from some better power and a certaine divine puissance. And this passion in generall is named Enthusiasmus, as one would say, a divine inspiration, for like as, ἐνθουσιάζω, in Greeke significth repletion with spirit or winde. And ἔνθουσι, that which is full of prudence and wit: Even so saith he an agitation and shaking of the soule is called ἐνθουσιάζω by the participation and society of some more heavenly and divine power. Now this enthusiastic is subdivided: for one part thereof is prophetical, and can skill of foretelling natural things, when one is inspired and possessed by Apollo. A second is Bacchanall sent from Bacchus whereof Sophocles speaketh in one place thus,

*And see you dance,
With Corybantes.*

For those furies of dame Cybele the mother of the gods, as also Panique & terrors frights hold al of the Bacchanall sacred ceremonies. The third proceedeth from the Muses, which meeting with a tender and delicate soule, not polluted with vice, stirreth up and raiseth a poetical spirit, and musically humour: as for that raging and martiall Enthusiasmus (for ἄρτιναιος it is called) that furious inspiration breathing warre, is well known to every man, for to proceed from god Mars; a furie wherein there is no grace, no musically sweetnesse, hindring the generation and nourishment of children, and inciting people to take armes. There remaineth one alienation more of the understanding ὁ Δαφναιος, and an extasie or transportation of mans spirit, and the same not obscure, nor quiet and calme: concerning which I would demand of Pempeides heere,

*What god is he, that shakes the speare
In hand, which doth so faire fruit beare.*

Even this ravishment of love, settled as well upon faire and good boies, as honest and sober dames; which is the hottest and most vehement transportation of the minde: for see you not that even the very foldier and warrior himselfe, comming once to be surpris'd therewith, laide downe his armes presently, and cast off his warlike furie,

*For then his servants joy did make,
And corselet from his shoulders take.*

and himselfe having no more minde to battell, far still looking upon others that fought. And as for these Bacchanall motions, these wanton skipplings and frisks of the Corybantes, they use to appease and stay by changing, onely in dauncing of the measures, the foot Trochæus into Spondæus; and in song, the Phrygian tune into the Dorique: semblably Pylbia the priestesse of Apollo, being once come downe from her three footed fabrick, upon which she receiveth that incentive spirit of furie, remaineth quiet and in calme tranquillity: whereas the rage of love, after it hath once in good earnest caught a man, and set him on fire, there is no musick in the world, no charme, no lenitive song, no change of place able to stay it: for amorous persons when they be present, doe love, if they be absent, doe long; in the day time they follow after their sweet hearts, by night they lie and warch at their doores; fasting and sober they call upon their faire paramours, full and drunken, they sing and chant of them: neither are poeticall fancies and inventions, as one sometimes said for their lively and effectuall expression, the dreams of persons waking; but rather this may be verified of lovers imaginations, who devise and talke with their loves absent, as if they were present, they salute, embrace, chide, and expostulate with them, as if they saw them in place: for it seemeth that our ordinarie sight doth depaint or other imagination with liquid and waterish colours, which quickly passe away, are gone and departed out of our minds: but the fancies and visions of Lovers being imprinted in their cogitations by fire or enambled, leave in their memorie lively images surely engraven, which move, live, breathe, speake, remaine and continue ever after; like as Cato the Romane said, that the soule of the lover lived & dwelt in the soule of the loved: for that there is settled sure in him the visage, countenance, manners, nature, life, and actions of the person whom he loveth, by which being led and conducted, he quickly dispatcheth and cutteth off a long journey, as the * Cynicks are wont to say, finding a short, compendious and direct way unto vertue: for hee passeth speedily from love to amity and friendship, being caried on end by the favour of this God of Love, with the instinct of his affection, as it were with winde and tide, with weather and water together: in summe, I say, that this enthusiastic or ravishment of lovers is not without some divine power, and that there is no other god to guide and governe it, than he whose feast we solemnize, and unto whom we sacrifice this very day: howbeit, for that we measure the greatness of a god by puissance especially & profit, according as among all humane goods, we hold dear royalty and vertue to be most divine, and so to call them. It is time now to consider first and forme, whether Love be inferior to any other god in power? And verily Sophocles saith:

*Venus in power doth much avale,
To win a prize and to prevail.*

Great also is the puissance of Mars: and verily we see the power of all other gods to be after a sort divided in these matters two waies, the one is allecative, and causeth us to love that which is beautifull and good, the other is adversative, and maketh us to hate that which is foule and bad, which are the first impressions, that from the beginning are engraven in our mindes, according as Plato in one place speaketh of the Idea. Let us now come to the point, and consider how the very act alone of Venus may be had for a great or some such small piece of silver, neither was

* ἄρτιναιος, some

there ever man known to endure any great travell, or to expose himselfe to any danger, for the enjoying of such a fleshy pleasure, unlesse he were amorous withall and love sicke. And to forbear here to name such cuttanes as Phryne and Lais were, we shall finde my good friend, that Gnathanium the harlot,

At lanterne light in evening list, Waiting and calling for some mate.

is many time passed by and neglected: but otherwhiles againe

*If once some sudden spirit moove,
The raging fit of fervent love.*

it maketh a man to prize and esteeme the forefaid pleasure which erewhile he reckoned nothing to worth, comparable in value to all the talents as they say, of Tantalus treasure, and equal to his great seignorie and dominion; so enervate is the delight of love: which we may see yet more evidently by this one argument; namely, that there be many men who will be content to part with others in this kind of venereous pleasure, yea, and can find in their harts to prostitute unto them not only their mistresses and concubines, but also their owne espoused wives; as it is reported of that Galba or Cabbas a Romane, who, if I doe not mistake, invited Macenas upon a time unto his house, & feasted him; where perceiving how from him to his wife there passed some wanton nods and winking, which bewtraid that hee had a minde and fancie to her, he gently rested his head upon a pillow or cushion, making semblance as though he would take a nap and sleepe, whiles they dallied together: in the meane time when one of the servants which were without spying his time, came softly to the table for to steale away some of the wine that stood there; avaunt unhappy knave (quoth Galba) being broad awake, and open eyed, knowest thou not that I sleepe onely for Macenas sake? But peradventure this was not so strange a matter, considering that the said Galba was no better than one of the buffons or pleasaunts that profess to make folke merry and to laugh. I will tell you therefore another example: At Argos there were two of the principall citizens concurrents, and opposite one to the other in the government of the city, the one was named Philostratus, & the other Phanilus; now it fortuned upon a time that king Philip came to the towne: and commonly thought it was, that Phanilus plotted and practised to attaine unto some absolute principallity and soverieignty in the city, by the means of his wife, who was a yong and beautifull ladie, in case he could bring her onco to the kings bed, and that she might lie with him. Philostratus smelling and perceiving as much, walked before Phanilus doore and about his house for the nonce, to see what he would do: who indeed having shod his wife with a paire of high shooes, cast about her a mantle or mandilion, and withall set upon her head a chaplet or hat after the Macedonian fashion; and dressed her every way like unto one of the kings pages; sent her secretly in that habit and attire unto his lodging. Now considering there hath bene in times past and is at this present such a number of amorous persons and lovers, have you ever read or knowen that any one of them hath bene the bawd to prostitute his owne love, though he might thereby have gained soverieigne majesty, and obtained the divine honours of Jupiter? I verily beleve no: for why? there is not a person who dare quetch to contradict and oppose himselfe in government of State against the actions of princes and tyrants? But on the other side, corrivals they have and concurrents many in love, such as will not stick to beard them in the question of faire, yong and beautifull persons, whom they affect and fancie. For it is reported that Aristogiton the Athenian, Anitoleon the Metapontine, and Menalippus of Agrirentum never contended nor contested with the tyrants, for all they saw them to waste and ruinate the common-weale, yea, to commit many enormous outrages; but when they began once to sollicite and tempt their paramours and loves, then they rose up as it were in the defence of their sacred temples and sanctuaries, then they stood against them even with the hazzard and perill of their lives. It is said, that king Alexander wrote unto Theodorus the brother of Proteus in this wise: Convey unto me that Musically wench of thine, so that sings so daintily, and receive for her ten talents, which I send by this bearer; let me have her, I say, unlesse thou thy selfe be in love with her. When Antipatrides another of his minions, came in a maske on a time to his house, accompanied with a pretty gilde that plaied upon the psaltery, & sung passing well; Alexander taking great delight & contentment in the said damosell, demanded of Antipatrides, whether he were not himselfe enamoured of her. And when he answered, Yes verily, and that exceeding much. A mischief on thee (quoth he) leud varlet as thou thou art, and the divell take thee: but the wench he abstained from, and would not so much as touch her. But marke moreover & besides, of what power, even in martiall seats of armes, Love is: Love I say, which is not (as saith Euripides)

Of nature slow, dull, fickle, inconsistent, Nor in soft cheeks of maidens resistant.

For a man that is possessed secretly in his heart with Love, needeth not the assistance of Mars when he is to encounter with his enemies in the field; but having a god of his owne within him, and presuming of his presence,

*Most prest he is and resolute,
To passe through fire and seas;*

10 The blasts of most tempestuous winde, he cares not to appease.

And all for his friends sake, and according as he commandeth him. And verily, of those children, as well sonnes as daughters, of lady Niope, who in a Tragedie of Sophocles are represented to be shot with arrows, and so killed, one there was, who called for no other to helpe and succor her at the point of death, but onely her paramour, in this wise:

*Oh that some god my Love would send,
My life to save, and me defend.*

Ye all know I am sure, doe ye not? how and wherefore Cleomachus the Thessalian died in 20 combat? Not I for my part (quoth Pemprides) but gladly would I heare and learne of you. And it is a storie (quoth my father) worth the hearing and the knowledge. There came to aide the Chalcidians, at what time as there was horwarre in Thessalie against the Eretrians, this Cleomachus: now the Chalcidians seemed to be strong enough in their footmen, but much adoe they had, and thought it was a difficult peece of service, to breake the cavallerie of their enemies, and to repell them. So they requested Cleomachus their alie and confederate, a brave knight, and of great courage, to give the first charge, and to enter upon the said men of armes. With that, he asked the youth whom he loved most entirely, and who was there present, whether he would beholde this enterprize, and see the conflict: and when the yong man answered Yea, and withall, kindly kissing and embracing him, set the helmet upon his head; Cleomachus much 30 more hardy and fuller of spirit than before, assembled about him a troupe of the most valourous holmen of all the Thessalians, advanced forward right gallantly, and with great resolution set upon the enemies, in such sort, as at the very first encounter he brake the front, disarraied the men of armes, and in the end put them to flight. Which discomfiture, when their infanterie saw, they also fled: and so the Chalcidians woon the field, and achieved a noble victorie. Howbeit, Cleomachus himselfe was there slaine, and the Chalcidians shew his sepulchre and monument in their Market place, upon which there standeth, even at this day, a mighty pillar erected. And whereas the Chalcidians before-time held this paderastie or love of yong boies an infamous thing, they of all other Greeks ever after affected and honoured it most. But Aristotle writeth, that Cleomachus indeed lost his life after he had vanquished the Eretrians in 40 battell: but as for him who was thus killed by his lover, he saith that he was of Chalcis in Thrace, sent for to aide those of Chalcis in Euboea: and hereupon it cometh that the Chalcidians use to chant such a caroll as this:

*Sweet boies, faire impes extract from noble race,
Endued besides with youth and beauties grace,
Envie not men of armes and bolde courage,
Ermition of your prime and flowering age:
For here aswell of Love and kinde affection,
As of prowess, we all do make profession.*

The lover was named Anton, and the boy whom he loved Philistus, as Diomysius the Poet writeth 50 in his booke * of Caules.

And in our city of Thebes, o Pemprides, did not one Ardetas give unto a youth whom he loved, a compleat armour, the day that he was enrolled souldier, with the inscription of Ardetas his owne name? And as for Pammenes an amorous man and one well experienced in love matters, he changed and altered the ordinance in battell of our footmen heavily armed, reprooving Homer as one that had no skill nor experience of love; for ranging the Achaeans by their tribes and wards, and not putting in array the lover close unto him whom he loveth: for this indeed had bene the right ordinance, which Homer describeth in these words:

The

* Or entium led Antia.

*The Morians set to close, and shield to shield
So jointly touch'd, that one the other held.*

And this is the onely battalion and armie invincible. For men otherwhiles in danger abandon those of their tribe, their kindred also and such as be allied unto them: yea, and beleve me, they forsake their owne fathers and children: but never was there enemye scene, that could passe through, and make way of evasion betwene the lover and his darling, considering that such many times, thew their adventures resolution in a bravery, and how little reckoning they make of life, unto them being in no distresse nor requiring so much at their hands. Thus Therothe the Theffalian laying and clapping his left hand to a wall, drew forth his sword with the right, and cut off his owne thumbe, before one whom he loved, and challenged his corivall to doe as much, to if his heart would serve him. Another chanced in fight to fall groveling upon his face, and when his enemye lifted up his sword to give him a mortall wound, he requested him to stay his hand a while untill he could turne his body, that his friend, whom he loved, might not see him wounded in his backe part. And therefore we may see, that not onely the most martiall and warlike nations are most given to Love, to wit, the Boeotians, Lacedaemonians, and Candians, but also divers renowned princes and captaines, of olde time: as namely, Meleager, Achilles, Ariflomenes, Cimon, Epaminondas. And as for the last named, he had two yong men whom he deerey loved, Aspicus and Zephiadorus, who also died with him in the field at Mantineas, and was likewise interred neere unto him. And when Aspicus became hereupon more terrible unto his enemies, and most resolute, Enchmann the Amphyffian, who first made head against him, to resisted his furie, and smote him, had herioque honors done unto him by the Phocaeans. To come now unto Hercules; hard it were to reckon and number his loves they were so many: But among others, men honour and worlup to this day Iolau, because they take him to have bene Hercules his derling, in so much as upon his tombe the manner is of lovers to take a corporall oth and assurance of reciprocall Love. Moreover it is reported of Apollo, that being skillfull in Physicke, he saved the life of Alceſis being desperatly sicke, for to gratifie Admetus, who as he loved her intirely being his wife, so he was as tenderly beloved of him. For the Poets doe fable, that Apollo, being inamoured, for pure Love,

*Did serve Admetus one whole yeere
As one that his hir'd servant were.*

And here it falleth out, in some sort well, that we have made mention of Alceſis: for albeit women have ordinarily much dealing with Mars, yet the ravishment and furious fits of Love driveth them otherwhiles to enterprise somewhat against their owne nature, even to voluntarie death: and if the poeticall fables are of any credit, and may goe currant for trueth, it is evident by such reports as goe of * Alceſis of Protesilaus, and Euridice the wife of Orpheus, that Plato obiecth no other god but onely Love, nor doth what they command. And verily howsoever in regard of all other gods, as Sophocles saith,

*He cannot skill of equity,
Of favour and of grace.
But onely with him taste straight, and vigour taketh place.*

Yet he hath good respect and reverence to lovers, and to them alone he is not implacable nor inflexible. And therefore a good thing it is, my friend, I confesse, to be received into the religious confraternity of the Eleusian mysteries: but I see that the votaries professed in Love, are in the other world in better condition accepted with Plato: And this I say as one who neither am too forward in beleiving such fables of Poets, nor yet so backward as to distrust and discredit them all: for I assure you they speake well, and by a certaine divine fortune and good hap they hit upon the trueth, saying as they do, that none but lovers returne from hell unto this light againe: but what way and how they wot not; as wandering indeed and missing of the right path, which plato of all men first by the means of philosophy found out and knew. And yet among the Aegyptians fables, there be certaine small slender and obscure shadowes of the truth, dispersed here an there. Howbeit they had need of an expert and well experienced hunter, who by small tractes knoweth how to trace and finde out great matters. And therefore let us passe them over.

And now that I have discoursed of the force and puissance of Love being so great as it appeareth, I come now to examine and consider the bountie and liberality thereof to mankind, not whether it confere many benefites upon them, who are acquainted with it, and make use thereof thereof (for notable they be and well knowne to all men) but whether it bringeth more and greater commodity to those that are studious of it, and be amorous? For Euripides, howsoever he were a great favourit of Love; yet so it is, that he promised and admired that in it, which of all others is least, namely when he said,

Love teacheth Musicke, make when you will Though one before thereof had no skill.

For he might as well have said, that it maketh a man prudent and witty, who before was dull and foolish; yea & valiant, as hath bene said, who before was a coward; like as they that by putting into fire burning peeces of wood, make them firme and straight, where as they were before 10 weake and tender: Semblably, every amorous person becommeth liberall and magnificent, although he had bene aforetime a pinching snudge: For this bafe avarice and micherie waxeth soft, and melteth by love, like as iron in the fire, in such sort, as men take more pleasure to give away and bestow upon those whom they love, than they doe, to take and receive of others. For yee all know well how Anytus the sonne of Antenor was inamoured upon Alcebiades, and when he had invited certaine friends and guests of his unto a sumptuous and stately feast in his house, Alcebiades came thither in a maske to make pastimes; and after he had taken with him one halfe of the silver cups that stood upon the boord before them, went his waies, which when the guests tooke not well, but said that the youth had behaved himselfe very proudly and malipertly toward him. Not so (quoth Anytus) for he hath dealt very courteously with me, in that, when he 20 might have gone away withall, he left thus much behinde for me. Zenoxippus taking joy hereat: O Hercules (quoth he) you want but a litle of ridding quite out of my heart that hereditary hatred derived and received from our ancestors, which I have taken against Anytus, in the behalfe of Socrates and Philosophie, in case he were lo kinde and courteous in his love. Be it so (quoth my father) but let us proceed: Love is of this nature, that it maketh men otherwise melancholike, austere, and hard to be pleased or conversed withall, to become more sociable, gentle and pleasant: for as ye know well enough,

*More stately is that house in sight,
Wherein the fire burnes cleere and bright.*

and even so, a man is more lightsome and jocund, when he is well warmed with the heat of love. 30 But the vulgar sort of men are in this point somewhat perversly affected and beside all reason; for if they see a flashing celestiall light in an house by night, they take it to be some divine apparition, and woonder thereat: but when they see a bafe, vile, & abject mind suddenly replenished with courage, libertie, magnificence, desire of honour, with grace, favour and liberality, they are not forced to say as Telemachus did in Homer:

*Certes, some god, I know full well,
Is now within, and here doth dwell.*

And is not this also, quoth Daphnau, (tell me, I pray you, for the love of all the Graces) an effect of some divine cause, that a lover who regardeth not, but despieth in a manner all other things, I say nothis familiar friends onely, his fellows and domesticall acquaintance, but the 40 lawes also and magistrates, kings and princes; who is afraid of nothing, admireth, esteemeth and observeth nothing; and is besides so hardy, as to present himselfe before the flashing thot of pitering lightning, so soone as ever he elpieth his faire love,

*Like to some cocke of a ravine kinde less full,
Or hangs the wing, and daunted is withall.*

He drops I say, his courage is cooled, his heart is done, and all his animostic quailed quite. And heere it were not impertinent to the purpose, to make mention of Sappho among the Muses. The Romans write in their history, that Casus the sonne of Vulcan breathed and flathed flames of fire from his mouth. And in trueth the words that Sappho uttereth, be mixed with fire, and by her verses testifieth the ardent and flaming heat of her heart,

50 *Seeking for love some cure and remedy
By pleasant sound of Muses melodye.*

as Philoxenus writeth. But Daphnau, unless peradventure the love of Lyfandra have made you to forget your olde sports and delights wherewith you were wont to passe the time away, call to minde (I beseech you) and rehearse unto us those sweet verses of faire Sappho, wherein the faith, that when her love came in her sight, she lost her voice presently, and was speechlesse, her bodie ran all over into colde sweats, she became pale and wan, she fell a trembling and quaking, her braines turned round, surprised she was with dizzinesse, and fell into a fainting fit of swooning.

Thrice

* For Alceſis was reported to die for the love of Protesilaus, and to have his life.

Thrice happy do I holde that wight,
Who may espionnes enjoy thy sight,
Of thy sweet voice to reape delight,
And pleasant smiles:

Which kinde in me such a fire,
That, as I them do much admire,
My heart they ravish, and desire Transport the whiles.

Thy face no sooner doe I see,
But sudden silence comes on me;
My tongue strings all dissolved bee,
And speech quite gone:

Then, underneath my skin is spread
A fiery flush of colour red;
With that mine eyes be darkened,
And sight yeeld none.

Mine eares also do buzze and ring,
And yet distinctly heare nothing;
Cold drops of sweate run down trickling,
Or stand as dew:

My joints anon and sinewes shake,
My heart-roots pants, my flesh doth quake;
And paleness soone doth overtake
My former hew.

And thus full wan I do remaine,
As flower in house that long hath laine,
Or graffe in field, which wanting raine,
Doth quickly fade:

Untill at length in extase, Withouten sense and breath I lie;
As if death of me suddenly

Surprize had made.

When Daphnaeus had recited this sonnet: Is not this (quoth my father, in the name of Jupiter I beseech you) a plaine possession of the minde by some heavenly power; is not this (I say) an evident motion and a very celestiall ravishment of the spirit? What furious passion was there ever so great and strong, that came upon the propheticke Pythia, when she mounted that three-footed fabrick, from whence she delivered oracles? Who ever was there so farre transported and carried beside himselfe by the pipes and flutes of fanaticall persons supposed to be surprized by some divine spirit of furie, by the tabour and other strange ceremonies in the service of Cybele the mother of the gods? Many there be, that holde the same body, and looke upon the same beauty; but the amorous person onely is caught and ravished therewith. What should be the reason of it? Certes, there is some cause thereof? Verily, when Menander sheweth it unto us, yet we learne it not, nor understand his meaning by these verses:

There is a mal: die of the minde,
That it surpriseth fatally:
Who smitten is therewith, doth finde
Himselfe forewounded inwardly.

And heereof is god Love the cause, who toucheth one, and spareth another. But that which ought indeed to have been spoken rather at the first,

Since now it comes into my minde,
And way out of my mouth would finde.

as Aeschylus saith, I thinke not good to overpasse in silence, being a matter of so great importance. For of all things (my good friend) in a manner, whereof we take knowledge, not by the ministerie of the five naturall senses; some there be, that came into credit (at the beginning) and authority, by fables; other, by lawes; and the rest, by doctrine and discourse of reason. Now the constant beleefe and full perswasion of the gods, the first masters, teachers and authors altho thereof, were Poets, Lawgivers, and in a third ranke, Philosophers, who all with one accord jointly did set this downe as a verity, that Gods there be: howbeit, they are at great discord and variance, touching the number, order, nature, essence and power of them. For those whom the Philosophers acknowledged to be gods, are not subject to diseases, nor to age, neither know they what it is to feele paine or endure trauell:

Escape they doe the passage of the firth,
Of roaring Acheron, and live in joy and mirth.

And in that regard Philosophers admit not at all the Poeticall Idols and Myths; that is to say, contentions and reconciliations: they will not allow Astias and Asios, to be gods, nor confesse them to be the sonnes of Mars: and in many points doe they differ also and dissent from lawgivers; as Xenophanes did, who said unto the Egyptians as touching Osiris: if you take him for a mortall man, adore him not; if you account him an immortal god, lament not for him. Again, the Poets and lawgivers on the other side, deigne not, nor will abide so much as to heare those Philosophers who of certaine Ideas, numbers, unities and spirits, make gods; neither can they possibly conceive and understand such doctrine. In summe, much variety there is & difference in their opinions, about this one point: but like as in old time there were three sects or factions in Athenes, all adverse, opposite & malicious one unto the other, to wit, of the Parall, the Epacri, and Pædæi: yet notwithstanding, when they were assembled and met together in a generall councill, they gave all their voices and suffrages to Solon, and elected him with one common assent their peace-maker, their governour, and lawgiver, as one woorthy without any question or doubt at all, to have conferred upon him the principality and highest degree of vertue and honour: even so those three sects differing in opinion about the gods, and giving their voices some on this side, and others on that, and not willing to subscribe one unto another, nor easily receiving that which is otherwise delivered than by themselves, be all of one and the same minde as touching this one god Love; and him the most excellent Poets, the best Lawgivers, and the principall Philosophers, admit with one voice into the register and kalender of the gods, praising and extolling him highly in all their writings. And like as Alcæus saith, That all the Mitylenians with one accord and generall consent, chose Pittacus for their soveraigne prince and tyrant; even so Hesiodus, Plato, and Solon, bring and conduct Love out of Helicon, into the Academie unto us, for our king, prince, and president, crowned and adorned gaily with garlands and chaplets of flowers, honored also, and accompanied with many shackles and couples professing amitie and mutuall societie: not such as Euripides saith:

With fetters bound and tied was,
Faire stronger than of iron and brasse.

Linking them by a cold, heavy, and massive chaine of need and necessitie; as a colourable vaile and pretence to shame and turpitude; but such as are carried by winged chariots unto the most goodly and beautiful things in the world, whereof others have treated better and more at large. When my father had thus said: See you not (quoth Isacarus) how being fallen now againe, the second time into one and the same matter, you forced your selfe to turne away from it, I wot not how, avoiding to enter into this holy discourse, and (if I may be so bold to say what I thinke) shifting off unjustly to pay the debt, which you have promised us? for having ere while by the way, and against your will made some little mention of the Egyptians and of Plato; you passed them over then, and even so doe you at this present: as for that which Plato hath written, or rather these Muses heere have by him delivered, I know well you will say nothing thereof; although we should request and pray you to doe it: but for that you have covertly signified thus much, that the mythologie or fables of the Egyptians accord sufficiently with the doctrine of the Platonikes concerning Love: it were against all reason that you should refuse to discover, reveale, and declare it unto us: and content will we be, in case we may heare but a little of such great and important matters. Now when the rest of the companie instantly intreated likewise, my father began againe and said: That the Egyptians like as the Greeks, acknowledge two kinds of Love, the one vulgar, the other celestiall: they beleefe also that there is a third beside, to wit, the sunne; and Venus above all they have in great admiration; as for us we see a great affinity and resemblance betweene Love and the sunne; for neither of them both is (as some doe imagine) a materiall fire, but the heat of the one and the other is milde and generative; for that which proceedeth from the sunne, giveth unto bodies nouriture, light, and deliverance from cold winter; that which cometh from the other worketh the same effects in foules: and as the sunne betweene two clouds, and after a foggy mist breaketh forth most ardent: even so Love after anger, fallings out, and fits of jealousie; upon attonement and reconciliation made be-

tweene Lovers, is more pleasant and fervent: and looke what conceit some have of the sunne, that it is kindled and quenched alternately, namely, that every evening it goeth out, and every morning is lighted againe: the same they have of Love, as being mortall, corruptible, and not permanent in one estate: moreover, that habite or constitution of the body which is not exercised and inured to endure both cold and heat, can not abide the sunne; no more can that nature of the soule which is not well nurtured and liberally taught, be able to brooke Love, without some paine and trouble; but both the one and the other is transported out of order, yea and indisposed or diseased alike, laying the weight upon the force and power of Love, and not upon their owne impuissance and weaknesse: this onely seemeth to be the difference betwene them; that the sunne exhibiteth and sheweth unto those upon the earth who have their eyesight, things beautifull and foule indifferently; whereas Love is the light that representeth faire things onely, causing lovers to be lookers of such alone, and to turne toward them; but contrariwise to make none account of all others. Furthermore, they that attribute the name of Venus to the earth, are induced thereto by no similitude nor proportion at all; for that Venus is divine and celestiall, but the region wherein there is a mixture of mortall with immortall, is of it selfe feeble, darke, and shady, when the sunne shineth not upon it; like as Venus, when love is not affixed unto it: and therefore more credible it is, that the moone should resemble Venus, and the sunne Love, rather than any other god; yet are not they therefore all one, because the body is not the same that the soule is, but divers; & like as the sunne is sensible & visible; but Love spiritual and intelligible: and if this might seeme a speech somewhat harsh, a man might say, that the sunne doeth cleane contrary unto Love, for that it diverteth our understanding from the speculation of things intelligible unto the beholding of objects sensible, in abusing and deceiving it by the pleasure and brightnesse of the sight, perswading it to seeke in it, and about it, as all other things; so trueth it selfe, and nothing else where, being ravished with the Love thereof,

*For that we see it shine so faire
Upon the earth, amidst the aire.*

according as Empidius saith, and that for want of knowledge and experience of another life, or rather by reason of forgetfulness of those things which Love reduceth into our memorie. For like as when we awake in some great and resplendent light, all nightly visions and apparitions vanish away and depart, which our soule saw during sleepe: even so it seemeth that the sunne doeth astonish the remembrance of such things as heere happen and chance in this life; yea, and to bewitch, charme, and enchant our understanding, by reason of pleasure and admiration, so as it forgetteth what it knew in the former life: and verily there is the true & real substance of those things; but heere apparitions onely, by which our soule in sleepe admireth, and embraceth that which is most beautifull, divine, and wonderfull: but as the Poet saith;

About the same are vaine illusions, Dreams manifold, and foolish visions.

And so the mind is perswaded that all things heere be goodly and precious, unless haply by good adventure it meet with some divine, honest, and chaste Love for to be her Physician and favor; which passing from the other world by things corporall, may conduct and bring it to the truth, and to the pleasant fields thereof, wherein is seated and lodged, the perfect, pure, and naturall beautie, not sophisticated with any mixture of that which is counterfeite and false; where they desire to embrace one another, and to commune together as good friends, that of long time have had no interview nor intercourse, assisted alwaies by Love, as by a Sextaine, who leadeth by the hand those that are professed in some religion, shewing unto them all the holy reliques and sacred ceremonies one after another. Now when they be sent hether againe, the soule by it selfe can not come neere and approach thereto, but by the organe of the body: and like as, because young children of themselves are not able to comprehend intelligible things; therefore Geometricians put into their hands visible and palpable formes, of a substance incorporeal and impassible, to wit, the representations of spheres, cubes, or square bodies, as also those that be dodecaedra, that is to say, having twelve equall faces: even so the celestiall Love doth present and shew unto us, faire mirrors to behold therein beautifull things, howbeit mortall, thereby to admire such as be heavenly and divine; sensible objects, for to imagine thereby those that be spiritual and intelligible. These be the severall favors and beauties, faire colours, pleasant shapies, proportions and features of young persons in the floure of their age; which shining and glittering as they doe, gently excite and stirre up our memorie, which by little and little little at the first is enflamed thereby: whereby it cometh to passe that some through the folly of their friends and kinsfolke, endeavoring to extinguish this affection and passion of the minde, by force, and without reason, have enjoined no benefit thereof; but either filled themselves with trouble and sinnenke, or else running with their heads forward, into beastly and filthy pleasures, pined away and were consumed. But such as by wise and discreet discourse of reason, accompanied with honest and shamefast modestie, have taken from Love the burning furious and fire heat thereof, and left behinde in the soule a splendeur and light, together with a moderate heat (and not a boiling agitation thereof; stirring, as one said, a slippery motion of the seed, when as the atoms of Epicurus by reason of their smoothnesse and tickling are driven together) which causeth a certaine dilatation, wonderfull degenerative, like as in a plant or tree, which putteth forth leaves, blossomes, and fruit; for that she receiveth nutriment, because the pores and passages of docilitie, obedience and facilitie, to be perswaded by entreteining gently good admonitions and remonstrances be open, such I say within a small time pierce farther, and passe beyond the bodies of those whom they Love, enting as farre as into their soules, and touch their towardnesse, their conditions and manners, reclaiming their eyes from beholding the bodie, and conversing together by the communication of good discourses, behold one another by that meane; provided alwaies that they have some marke and token of true beautie imprinted within their understanding; which if they cannot finde, they forsake them, and turne their Love unto others, after the manner of bees, which leave many greene leaves and faire floures, because they can gather out of them no hony; but looke when they meet with any trace, any influence, or semblance of divine beauty smiling upon them, then being ravished with delight and admiration, and drawing it unto them, they take joy and contentment in that which is truly amiable, expetible, and to be embraced of all men.

True it is that Poets seeme to write the most part of that which they deliver as touching this god of Love, by way of meriment, and they sing of him as it were in a maske; and little doe they speake in good earnest touching the very truth, whether it be upon judgement and reason, or some divine instinct and inspiration: as for example among other things, that which they give out concerning the generation of this god, in this manner:

Dame Iris with faire winged shoes, and golden yellow haire, Conceived by Sir Zephyrus, the mightiest god did beare.

unless it be so that you also are perswaded by the Grammarians, who holde that this fable was devised to expresse the variety and gay diversitie, as it were of sundry colours represented in this passion of Love. For, what else should in respect (quoth Daphnaus.) Listen then said my father, and I will tell you. Forced we are, by manifest evidence to believe, that when we behold the rainbow, it is nothing else but a reflexion of raies and beames, which our eyes suffer, when our sight falling upon a cloud somewhat moist but even & smooth withall and of an indifferent and meane thicknesse, meeteth with the Sunne beames, and by way of repercussion seeth the radiant raies thereof, and the shining light about it, and so imprinteth in our mind this opinion, that such an apparition indeed is settled upon the cloud. And even such is the sophistical device and subtle invention of that in the generous and toward minds of gentle lovers, it causeth a certaine reflexion of memorie, from beauties appearing here, and so called, in regard of that divine, lovely indeed, blessed and admirable beautie. Howbeit the common sort, pursuing and apprehending the image onely thereof, expresse in faire persons, as well boies as young damoels, as it were in mirrors, can reape no fruit more certaine and assured than a little pleasure mingled with paine among; which is nothing else as it seemeth, but the error and wandering dizziness or conceit of most folke, who in clouds and shadows seeke and hunt after the contentment of their lust and desire: much like unto young children who thinke to catch the rainbow in their hands, being drawn and allured thereto by the deceitfull shew presented to their eyes. Whereas the true lover indeed, who is honest and chaste, doth farre otherwise: for he listeth up his desire from thence to a divine, spiritual and intelligible beauty: and whensoever he meeteth with the beauty of a visible bodie, he useth it as the instrument onely of his memorie, he embraceth and loveth it: by conversing also with it ioifully, & with contentment, his understanding is more and more inflamed. Such amorous persons as these, whiles they hunt these bodies here, neither rest to sitting still, in a desire and admiration of this cleare beautie: nor when they are come come thither after their death, returne they hither againe as fugitives, for to hover and keepe about the dores, chambers and cabinets of young married wives, which are nothing else but vaine dreames and illusions appearing to sensuall men and women given overmuch to voluptuous pleasures of the body, and such as untruely be called lovers. For he, who intrueth is amorous, and is thither come where true beauties are, and converseth with them, as much as it is possible and lawfull for a man to doe, is winged anon, mounteth up on high, he is purified and sanctified, continually abiding resedent above, dauncing, walking and disporting alwaies about his god, untill he come backe again into the greene and faire meadowes of the Moone and of Venus, where, being laid a sleepe, he beginneth to receive a regeneration and new nativity. But this is an higher point and deeper matter, than we have undertaken at this present to discourse upon. To turne therefore unto our love, this propertie also it hath, like as all other gods, according to Eu-ripides,

*To take great joy and much content,
When men with honors him profert.*

And contrariwise, he is no lesse displeased, when abuse or contempt is offered unto him. For most kinde and gracious he is unto them that receive and intertaine him courteously: and againe as curst and shrewd to those who shew themselves stiffe-necked and contumacious unto him. For neither Jupiter surnamed Hospital, is so ready to chastice and punish wrongs done unto guests and suppliants, nor Jupiter Genetrix so forward to prosecute & accomplish the curses and execrations of parents, as love quickly heareth the praiers of those lovers who are unthankfully requited by their loves, being the punisher of proud, rude, and uncivill persons. For what should one speake of Encheyritus and Leucomantis, her I meane, who even at this day is called in Cyprus, Paraclypta? And peradventure you have not heard of the punishment of Gorge in Candia, who was served much after the manner of the said Paraclypta, save onely that she was turned into a stone, when she would needs looke out at a window, and put forth her body to see the corps of her lover entered. But of this Gorge there was sometime one enamoured, whose name was Asander, a yooing gentleman, honest and of good parentage descended, who having beene before time of worshipfull and wealthy estate, was decayed much and brought to poverty: howbeit his minde a bated not so withall, that he thought himselfe unworthy of the best fortune that might be. Whereupon he sued unto this Gorge a kinsfellowman of his, by way of marriage, notwithstanding that for her goods and riches she was much sought unto & wooed by many others: and albeit he had divers great and wealthy competitors and corivals, yet he had wrought and gained all the guardians, tutours and neerest kinsfolke of the damoelle to serve his suit.

Here there is a great defect and breach in the originall.

Moreover those things which are named to be the causes that engender Love, be not proper and peculiar to the one sex or to the other, but common to them both. For those images which from without perce and enter into amorous persons, according to the Epicureans opinion, running to and fro, stirring and tickling the masse of the whole body, gliding and flowing into the generall feed, by certaine other dispositions of the atomes, it cannot be that they should so doe from yong boies, and impossible altogether from women: unless also these faire and sacred recordations we call and referre unto that divine, true and celestiall beautie, according to the Platoniques, by the meanes of which rememorations as with wings the soule is mounted and carried up. What should hinder then, but that such recordations may passe as well from yong boies as damoells or women? especially when as we see a good nature, chaff and honest, appeare jointly in the flower of favour and beauty, like as, according to Aristotle, a straight and well fashioned shoe, sheweth the good forme and proportion of the foot: which is as much to say, as when under beautifull faces and in neat and faire bodies, they, who are skillfull in the knowledge and iudgement of such things, perceive the cleare and evident traces of a sincere minde not corrupt nor counterfeit. For it is no reason that a voluptuous person being demanded this question,

*For wanton Love how stands thy minde?
To male more, or to female kinde?*

and

and answering,

*Both hands are right with me where beauty is,
Neither of swaine to mee can come a misse.*

Should seeme to have made fit and pertinent answer according to his owne carnall concupiscence: and that an honest and generous person should not direct his affections to the beautiful and toward disposition of a youthe's nature, but to the naturall parts that make difference of sex. Certes he that loveth horses and is skillfull in good horfmanship, will love no lesse the generosity and swiftnesse of the horse Podergus, then of Aetha the mare of Agamemnon. And the huntsman, taketh not pleasure onely to have good doggs and hounds of the male kinde, but also keepeth the braches and bitches of Candia and Laconia. And shall he who loveth the beauty and sweet favour of mankind, not be indifferently affected both to the one sex and to the other, but make a difference as in divers garments, betwene the love of men and women? And verily men say, that beauty is the flower and blossome of vertue. Now to say, that the feminine sex doth not flower at all, nor shew any apparence and token of a good and towardly disposition to vertue, were very absurd: for Aeschylus went to the purpose, when he wrote these verses:

A damselfe young, if she have knownen and a seld man once carnally, Her eie doth it bewray anon, it sparkles fire suspiciously.

Go to then: are there evident marks & signes to be seene upon the visages of women, to testifie a malapert, bold, wanton, and corrupt nature; and contrariwise, shall there be no light shining in their faces, to give testimony of their modestie and pudicitie? Or rather, shall there be divers demonstrative evidences in many of them, but yet such as will not stirre up and provoke any person to lovethem? Surely it is neither so nor so; there is no truth nor probabilitie in any of them both: but every thing is common indifferently, as well in the one sex as the other, as we have shewed.

Here also there is another want in the originall.

O Dybanus, let us impugne and confute those reasons, whereupon Zeuxippus erewhile discoursed, supposing that Love is all one with concupiscence, which is disordinate, and leadeth the soule into all loosenesse and dissolusion. And yet do I not thinke, that he is so perswaded indeed, and of that beliefe; but for that he hath heard often times odious persons, and such as have no loveliness in them, so to say: of whom, some holde under their hands, and have at command, poore silly women, whom they have gotten for some petty dowries sake, and whom together with their moneys they put to the managing of domesticall affaires, and to make base, vile, and mechanickall accounts, quarrelling and brawling with them every day; and others againe, having more minde and desire to get children, than to love espoused wives, like unto grathoppers, which cast their seed upon squilles, sea onions, or such like herbs, having discharged their lust in all the haste upon any body that first comes in their way, and reaped the fruit onely that they sought for, bid marriage farewell, and make no farther account of their wedded wives, or if they tary and stay with them still, they regard them no more than their olde shoes, making no count either to love them, or to be loved reciprocally of them. And verily, σῆμα and σῆμα, which signifie, to love and to be loved againe dearly, which differ but in one letter from the verbe σῆμα, that is to say, to containe and holde together, seeme unto me at the first sight, directly to import and shew a mutuall benevolence, by long time and acquaintance tempered with a kinde of necessity. But looke what person forever love setleth upon in marriage, so as he be inspired once therewith; at the very first, like as it is in Platoes Common-wealth, he will not have these words in his mouth, Mine and Thine: for simply all goods are not common among all friends, but those only who being severed apart in body, conjoine and colliquate, as it were perforce, their soules together, neither willing nor believing that they should be twaine, but one: and afterwards by true pudicity and reverence one unto the other, whereof wedlocke hath most need. As for that which commeth from without, carying with it more force of lawe, than voluntary obsequence and reciprocall duty, and that in regard of feare and shame,

Eccc

*A piece of worke, that needs the guide
Of many bits, and helmes beside.*

requireth alwaies to have ready at hand a carefull regard among those that are coupled in matrimony: whereas in true love there is so much continency, modesty, loyalty and faithfulness, that although otherwhile it touch a wanton and lascivious minde, yet it diverteth it from other lovers, and by cutting off all malapert boldnesse, by taking downe and debasing insolent pride and untaught flubburnnesse, it placeth in lieu thereof, modest bashfulness, silence and taciturnity; it adorneth it with decent gesture, and seemly countenance, making it for ever after obedient to one lover onely. Ye have heard (I am sure) of that most famous and renowned courtisan Lais, who was courted and sought unto by so many lovers, and ye know well, how she too inflamed and set on fire all Greece with the love and longing desire after her; or to say more truly, how two seas strave about her? how after that the love of Hippolochus the Theffalian had ceased upon her, she quit and abandoned the mount Acerocinthus,

*Seated upon the river side,
Which with greene waves byt did glide.*

as one writeth of it; and flying secretly from a great army as it were of other lovers, she retired herself right decently within Megalopolis unto him; where other women upon very spight, envie and jealousy, in regard of her surpassing beautie, drew her into the temple of Venus, and stoned her to death: whereupon it came, as it should seeme, that even at this day they call the said temple, The temple of Venus the murderesse. We our selves have known divers young maidens, by condition no better than slaves, who never would yeeld to lie with their master; as also sundry private persons of meane degree, who refused, yea, and disdained the companie of queenes, when their hearts were once possessed with other love, which as a mistresse had the absolute command thereof. For like as at Rome, when there was a Lord Dictatour once chosen, all other officers of State and magistrates valed bonet, were presently deposed, and laied downe their ensignes of authority; even so those, over whom Love hath gotten the mastery and rule, incontinently are quit, freed and delivered from all other lords and rulers, no otherwise than such as are devoted to the service of some religious place. And in trueth an honest and veruous dame, linked once unto her lawfull spouse by unfained love, will sooner abide to be clipped, claped and embraced by any wolves and dragons, than the contredaction and bedfellowship of 30 any other man whatsoever but her owne husband. And albeit there be an infinit number of examples among you here, who are all of the * same country, and professed associates in onedance with this god Love; yet it were not well done to passe over in silence the accidents which befell unto Camma the Galatian lady. This young dame being of incomparable beauty, was married unto a tetrarch or great lord of that countrey named Sinnatus; howbeit, one Synorix the mightiest man of all the Galatians was enamoured upon her: but seeing that he could not prevail with the woman neither by force and perswasion, so long as her husband lived, he made no more ado but murdered him. Camma then having no other refuge for her pudicity, nor comfort and easement of her hearts griefe, made choise of the temple of Diana, where she became a religious votary, according to the custome of that countrey. And verily the most part of her time she bestowed in the worship of that goddesse, and would not admit speech with any suiters, many though they were, and those great personages, who sought her marriage: but when Synorix had made meanes very boldly to aske her the question, and to sollicite her about that point, she seemed not to reject his motion, nor to expostulate and be offended for any thing past, as if for pure love of her, and ardent affection, and upon no wicked and malicious minde unto Sinnatus, he had bene induced to do that which he did: and therefore Synorix came confidently to treat with her and demand marriage of her: she also for her part came toward the man kindly, gave him her hand, and brought him to the altar of the said goddesse; where after she had made an offering unto Diana by pouring forth some little of a certaine drinke made of wine & hony, as it should seeme, empoisoned, which she had put into a cup, she began unto Synorix, & dranke up the one halfe of it, giving the rest unto the said Galatian for to pledge her. Now when she saw that he had drunke it all off, she fetched a grievous grone, and brake forth aloud into this speech, naming withall her husband that dead was: My most loving and deere spouse (quoth she) I have lived thus long without thee in great sorrow and heavinesse expecting this day; but now receive me joyfully (seeing it is my good hap to be revenged for thy death upon this most wicked and ungratious wretch) as one most glad to have lived once with thee, and to die now with him. As for

* country, or happily happy
country.

for Synorix, he was caried away from thence in a litter, and died soone after; but Camma having survived him a day and a night, died by report most resolutely and with exceeding joy of spirit. Considering then, that there be many such like examples, aswel among us here in Greece, as the Barbarians, who is able to endure those that reproch and revile Love, as if being associate and assistant to love, she should hinder amitie? whereas contrariwise, the company of male with male, a man may rather terme intemperance and disordinate lasciviousnesse, crying out upon it in this manner:

*Grasse wantonnesse or filthy lust, is it
Not Venus faire that workes it this.*

10 And therefore such filths & baggages as take delight to suffer themselves voluntarily thus to be abused against nature, we reckon to be the worst and most flagitious persons in the world; no man repose in them any trust, no man doth them any iote of honor and reverence, nor vouchsafeth them woorthy of the least part of friendship: but in very trueth, according to Sophocles,

Such friends as these, men are full glad and joy when they be gone:

But whiles they have them, wish and pray, that they were rid anon.

As for those, who being by nature leaud and naught, have bene circumvented in their youth, and forced to yeeld themselves and to abide this villany and abuse, al their life after, abhorre the sight of such wicked wantons, and deadly hate them, who have bene thus disposed to draw them to this wickednesse; yea, and ready they are to be revenged, and to pay them home at one time or other, whensoever meanes and opportunity is offered: for upon this occasion Crates killed Archelaus, whom, in his flower of youth he had thus spoiled: as also Pytholaus slew Alexander the tyrant of Phrya. And Pertander the tyrant of Ambracia demanded upon a time of the boy whom he kept, whether he were not yett with childe: which indignity the youth tooke to the heart, that he slew him outright in the place: whereas, with women, and those especially that be espoused and wedded wives, these be the earnest penies as it were and beginnings of amity; yea, & the very obligation and society of the most sacred & holiest ceremonies. As for fleshly pleasure it selfe, the least thing it is of all other: but the mutuall honour, grace, dilection and fidelity 30 that springeth and ariseth from it daily, is highly to be reckoned and accounted of: and therefore neither can the Delphians be noted for follic, in that they terme Venus theia, that is to say, a chariot; by reason of this yoke-fellowship: nor Homer, in calling this conjunction of man and wife, shamos, that is to say, amity and friendship. Solan likewise is deemed by this, to have bene an excellent law-giver, and most expert in that which concerneth marriage; when he decreed exprelly, that the husband should thrice in a moneth at the least embrace his wife and company in bed with her; not for cattall pleasures sake, (I assure you) but like as cities and states use, after a certaine time betwene, to renew their leagues and confederacies one with another, so he would have that the alliance of marriage should ensooones be entertained ancw by such solace and delectation, after jarres, which otherwhiles arise and breed by some bone cast betwene. 40 Yea, but there be many enormous and furious parts, will some one say, that are plaid by such as are in love with women. And be there not more (I pray) by those that are enamoured upon boies? do but marke him who uttereth these passionate words:

*So often as these eyes of mine behold
That beardless youth, that smooth and lovely boy,
I faint and fall: then wish I him to hold Within mine armes, and so to die with joy:
And thus on tombe were set where I do lie,
An Epigram, mine end to testify.*

But as there is a furious passion in some men doting upon women, so there is as raging an affection in others toward boies, but neither the one nor the other is love. Well, most absurd it were to say that women are not endued with other virtues: for what need we to speake of their temperance and chastity, of their prudence, fidelity and justice: considering that even fortitude it selfe, constant confidence and resolution, yea and magnanimity, is in many of them very evident. Now to holde, that being by nature not indisposed unto other virtues, they are untoward for amitie onely and frendship, (which is an imputation laid upon them) is altogether beside all reason. For well knownen it is that they be loving to their children and husbands: and this their

for to make the same faire and yellow like burnishing gold, hath a certaine propertie in it to pinguish withall, to incarnate, and so to raise and refine the flesh, that it causeth it to be lax, and so to swell and puffe up more plump: of this medicinable oile she made no spare, but used to rub and besmeare the other parts of her body, in such sort, as that by their proportionable rising, she hid her great belly, which grew more round and full every daie than other. Now when her time was come, she endured the pangs and paines of her travell in child-birth, alone by herselfe; being gone downe to her husband like a lionesse into her denne, and there she suckled at her owne breast secretly, if I may so say, her male whelpes, for two boy twinnes she was delivered of; of which two sonnes, the one chanced to be slaine in Aegypt, the other, not long since, but very lately, was with us at Delphos, named after his father, Sabinus. Howbeit for all this, Vespassian caused this lady to be put to death; but for this murder of his he dearly paid, and was punished accordingly: for within a while after, his whole posterity was utterly destroyed and rooted out from the face of the earth, so as there remained not one of his race: for there was not in those daies, and during his empire, a more cruell and inhumane fact committed; neither was there ever any other spectacle that both gods and angels seemed more to abhorre and to turne away their eyes from beholding. And yet her grandiloquence and stout resolutions in her speech, whereby she did exasperate and provoke Vespassian most, was such, that it diminished much the pittifull ruth and compassion, that the beholders of the execution had of her: for when she was past hope of obtaining her husbands life, she would needs die in his turne, and required that exchange for him, saying withall, that it was a greater joy unto her, to for to live in darkenesse and under the earth, than to see him emperor.

And heerewith (quoth my father) ended their discourse as touching Love, at what time as they were nere unto Thesties, for then they might perceive coming toward them, faster than with a foote pace, one of Pisus friends, named Diogenes; unto whom Sostrus spake aloud, when he was yet a good way off: You bring us no newes I hope Diogenes of warre: Oyle better than so (quoth he) being, as there is, a marriage toward; why mend you not your pace therefore, and make haste thither? for the nuptiall sacrifice staith onely for your coming: At which words (as my father said) all the rest of the company joied, and were exceeding glad, onely Zeuxippus shewed himselfe mal-content, and not well pleased; for he could not dissimble it: howbeit he was the first man that approved the act of Ismenadora, as good and lawfull: so and even now he willingly set a garland upon his owne head, and put on a white wedding robe, marching before all the companie through the market place, to render thanksgiving unto the god Love, for this marriage. Well done (quoth my father then) I sweare by Jupiter: goe we on all hands away, and let us be gone; that we may laugh and make our selves merie with this man, and withall adore and worships the god: for evident it is, that hee taketh joy in that which hath beene done, and is present with his favour and approbation to grace the wedding.

OF THE FACE AP- PEARING WITHIN THE ROUNDE OF THE MOONE.

The Summarie.

THis dialogue is defective in the beginning thereof. In it are brought in Sylla and Pharnaces, with some others, disputing with Plutarch, as touching one point of naturall Philosophy, worthy to be considered and read over againe, by those that take delight in such pleasant speculations meete for good wits to be exercised in. The weight of this matter concerneth the globe of the Moone and toucheth principally this notable accident of the face which appeareth therein: by occasion whereof, divers questions depending upon the first and principall, are discussed and resolved by our author, according as he hath comprised and understood them. But here is the mischief in this discourse, like as in many others of this second tome, that it is not only headlesse, but maimed also and dismembred otherwise: and yet the transiour and the french especially hath with great dexterity laid the pieces together, so as the breaches can hardly be seene, unlesse a man looke very nere. Now the principall matters handled here, be these that follow. After that Plutarch had refused three opinions concerning the face in the Moone, and brought in one Lucius, maintaining that position of the Academies, who presuppose that the Moone is terrene and consisteth of an earthly substance, he entreteth into disputation against those who attribute one centre unto the world and the earth, labouring to confirme his owne opinion by divers arguments marked in their order: which he handleth with such a grace that yet a man may see withall, how naturall Philosophy destitute of that light of Gods word (which by Moses in the first chapter of Genesis resolveth and cleareth infinit disputations and controversies in these matters) is in a manner blinde and stumbleth many times most grossly and absurdly. Moreover, according to the traine of words and speeches, which commonly in such conferences follow one upon another, they treat of the centre and motion of the universall world, of the proportion thereof, and the principal parts of it, of the illumination of the Moone, of reflexions and mirrors, of eclipses and the shadow of the earth. Item, whether the Moone be a globe of fire, or of what else? what is her colour? from whence proceedeth & how cometh this resemblance of a face which is observed in her? whether she be inhabited or no? as also of her nature and effects. Toward the end he intermedleth a fable fetched from the Poets and ancient naturall Philosophy, for to mollifie and make more probable and credible that which had beene delivered as touching those that dwell within the Moone. In sum, this treatise giveth good proofe of the quicke and pregnant wit of our author, who could enter into, and perce through all things: whereof if he have not abrayes attained unto the exact knowledge, we should rather by all likelihood blame the iniquity of long time, which hath not permitted us to have these bookes entire and whole, than the insufficiency of so deepe a clerke. To conclude, this ought to unite those that sound and search into the secrets of nature, to joine with that which the moderne Philosophers of our time are able to write slightly and at ease of such matters, what hath beene delivered by the ancients, who indeed have made the coverture unto those who succeeded after them: to the end that there might be drawn out of them all, a certaine firmer resolution, which raiseth us up above the Moone, and all other celestiall bodies, unto the onely God and sole Creator of so many admirable works, thereby to acknowledge, serve and praise him according as his omnipotent greatness doth deserve.

OF THE FACE APPEARING in the roundle of the Moone.

Ell, thus much said Sylla, for it accorded well to my speech, and depended thereupon: but I would very willingly before all things else know, what need is there to make such a preamble for to come unto these opinions, which are so currant and rife in every mans mouth, as touching the face of the Moone. And why not (quoth I) considering the difficultie of these points which have driven us thither: for like as in long maladies, when we have tried ordinarie remedies, and usual rules of diet, and found no helpe thereby, we give them over in the end, and betake our selves to lustrall sacrifices and expiations, to annulets or preservatives for to be hanged about our necks, and to interpretations of dreames: even so in such obscure questions, and difficult speculations, when the common and ordinarie opinions, when usual and apparent reasons will not serve nor satisfie us, necessary it is to assay those which are more extravagant, and not to reject and despise the same, but to enchant or charme our selves, as one would say, with the discourses of our auncients, and trie all means for to finde out the truth: for at the very first encounter you see, how absurd he is & intollerable, who faith, that the forme or face appearing in the Moone, is an accident of our eie-sight, that by reason of weaknes giveth place to the brightness thereof, which accident we call the dazzling of our eies, not considering withall, that this should befall rather against the Sunne, whose light is more resplendent, and beames more quicke and piercing, according as Empedocles himselfe in one place pleasantly noteth the difference, when he faith:

*The Sunne that shines so quicke and bright,

for so he expresseth that milde, amiable, pleasant, and harmelesse visage of the Moone: and afterwards rendereth a reason, why those, who have obscure & feeble sights, perceive not in the Moone any different forme or shape, but unto them her circle shineth plaine, even, uniforme and full round about; whereas they who have more quicke and piercing eies, doe more exactly observe the proportion and lineaments, and discern better the impression of a face, yea, and distinguish more perfectly and evidently the severall parts: for in mine opinion it would fall out cleane contrary, in case the weakenesse of the eie being overcome, caused this apparition, that where the patient eie is more feeble, there the said apparence and imagination should be more expresse and evident: furthermore, the inequality therein, doth fully every way confute this reason; for this face or countenance is not to be seene in a continuante and confuted shadow: But Ageanax the Poet, right elegantly depainteth in some sort the face, in these words:

*All round about environed
With fire she is illumined:
And in the middes there doth appeere,
Like to some boy, a visage cleere:
Whose eies to us doe seeme in view,
Of colour grayish more than blew:
The browes and forehead, tender seeme,
The cheeks all reddish one would deeme.*

For in truth darke and shaddowy things, compassed about with those that are shining & cleare are driven downward, and the same doe rise againe receprocallly, being by them repulled, and in so one word, are interlaced one within another, in such sort as they represent the forme of a face lively and naturally depainted: and it seemeth that there was great probability in that which Clearchus said against your Aristotle. For this Aristotle of yours, though he familiarly conversed with that ancient Aristotle, perverted and overthrew many points of the Peripateticks doctrine. Then Apollonides, taking upon him to speake, demanded, what opinion this might be of Aristotle and upon what reason it was grounded. Surely (quoth I) it were more meet for any man man else to be ignorant hereof, than for you, considering that it is grounded upon the very fundamental principles of Geometry. For this man affirmeth that the thing, which we call the face in the Moone, are the images and figures of the great ocean, represented in the Moone as in a mirror: for the circumference of a round circle, being reflected backe every way, is wont to deceive the sight in such things as are not directly seene. And the full Moone her selfe is, for evenesse, smoothnesse and lustre, the most beautifull and purist mirror in the world. Like as therefore yee holde, that the rainbow appeareth (when our eie-sight is reflected backe upon the Sunne) in a cloud, that hath gotten smoothnesse somewhat liquid, and a consistence withal; even so (quoth he) a man may see in the Moone the great ocean, without, not in the very place where it is situate: but from whence the reflexion by touching the light reverberat and sent backe, maketh a sight and apparition thereof. which Ageanax hath said in another place, after this manner,

The figure of the Ocean is just resembled there In flaming mirror, when great waves it doth against it reare.

Apollonides then, being perswaded that it was so; a singular opinion beleeve me (quoth he) this was of his, and when all is said, newly and after a strange manner devised by a man, who may be thought bold and confident enough in his projects, howbeit full of wit and a great cleke withall. But how did Clearchus refute the same? First & formost (quoth I) If the maine sea or ocean be all of one nature then it must needs be that the currant thereof is all one uniforme & continuante: but the apparence of those blacke & dim obscurities which are observed in the face of the Moone, is not even and continued, but there be certaine isthmes or partitions betwene cleere and bright, which divide and seperat that which is shadie and darke. Therefore seeing each part is distinct, and hath proper bounds and limits apart, the conjunctions & approachments of the cleere to that which is darke, making a semblance of high and low, do expresse and resemble the similitude of a figure, with eies & lips; so that of necessity we are to suppose, that there be many oceans and maine seas, distinguished by the isthmes of firme lands betwene: which is a manifest untruth. And admit that there is but one continued sea for all, it is not credible that the image thereof should appeare so dissipate and distracted by peeces: and as for this point, the surer way is, and lesse dangerous, to demand, than to affirme ought in your presence; namely whether, the habitable earth being equall in length and breadth, it be possible, that all the light reflected and sent backe by the Moone, should equally touch the whole ocean and all those that faile therein, and even such as seeme to dwell in it, as the Brittaines doe: seeing that your selves have maintained that the whole earth, in proportion to the globe or sphere of the Moone, is no more than a very pricke. As for this verily (quoth I) it is your part to regard and consider: and true it is that as touching the reverberation and reflexion of the light from the Moone, it belongeth neither to you nor to Hipparchus. And yet I assure you, my good freind Lamprias (quoth Apollonides) there be many naturalists, who holde it not good to affirme with Hipparchus that our sight is so driven backe; but they suppose and affirme, that it is more like and probable that it hath a certaine temperature and obesant compact structure, than such beatings and repercussions as Epicurus imagineth the Atomes have. Neither doe I beleeve that Clearchus would have us to suppose, that the Moone is a massive and waighy bodie, but celestiall and lightsome: against which you say that the refraction of our eie-sight should reach: and therefore all this reflexion, and reverberation falleth to the ground and comes to nothing. But if I should be urged, and intreated by him to receive and admit the same, I would aske him the question, how it comes to passe, that this image of the sea is to be seene onely in the bodie of the Moone, and not in any of the other starres? for by all likelihood and probability, our sight should suffer the same equally in all, or just in none at all. But I pray you (quoth I, casting mine eies upon Lamprias) call to minde againe that which was first delivered of our part, & by those of our side. Nay rather I am affraid (quoth Lamprias) least we may be thought to offer over much injury unto Platon, if we should so passe over the Stoicks opinion unconfuted, and without opposing any thing against it. Why then reply somewhat upon this man (quoth I) who holdeth that the Moon is a whole mixtion of the aire, and of some milde fire, and then afterwards faith, that like as in a calme, there happeneth other whiles a litle horror or winde, that rumbleth and bloweth upon the sea, even so the aire thereby becommeth blacke; and thereupon is made a certaine resemblance blance and forme of a visage. Courteously done of you Lucius (quoth I) thus to clad and cover with faire words and good termes fo absurd and false an opinion. But so did not our friend, but spake the plaine troth, and said that the Stoicks disfigured the Moones face making it blacke and blew, and filling it with darke spots and clouds, and withall invocating her by the name of Minerva and Diana, and in the meane while making her a lumpie as it were of paste, consisting of darke aire and a fire of charcole, that cannot burne out, nor yeeld light of it selfe, but having a body hard to be judged and knowne, ever smoaking and alwaies burning like to those lightnings which by the Poets are called, lightlesse and smoakie. But that a fire of coales, such as they would have that of the Moone to be, continueth not long, nor can so much as substist, if it meete not with some solid matter, which may holde it in and withall feed and nourish it; I suppose that they know better, who in meriment say that Vulcane is lame and doth halt, than these Philosophers doe: for that indeed fire cannot goe forward without wood or fwell, no more than a lame cripple without his staffe or crouches. If then the Moone be fire, how cometh it to have so much aire in it? For this region aloft which mooveth round, doth not consist of aire, but of some other more noble substance, which is able to subtilize and set on fire every thing beside. But in case it be afterwards engendred in it, how is it that it perissheth not by being changed and transmuted by the fire into a celestiall substance, but maintaineth it selfe, and continueth together as it were, cohabiting with the fire so long, like unto a spike or nail fast set continually in the same parts, and fitted thereto? For being rare as it is, and diffused, meet it were that it should not so abide and continue, but be dissipated and resolved; and to grow compact and thicke it is impossible, so long as it is mixed with fire, having no earth nor water; which are the two onely elements whereby the aire will gather to a consistence and thicknesse. Moreover, the swiftnesse and violence of motion, is wont to enflame the aire that is within stones, yea, and in lead as cold as it is: much more then, that which is in fire, being whirled about, and turned with so great celeritie and impetiositie: for in this regard they are offended with Empedocles, for that he made the Moone congealed aire, in manner of haile, and included within a sphere of fire: and yet themselves say, that the Moone being a sphere or globe of fire, doeth enclose and containe the aire disperfed to and fro; and that the same hath neither ruptures nor concavities, ne yet any profundities, which they admit who will have the Moone to be of earth, but forsooth superficially onely, and as it were settled upon the imbossed and swelling backe thereof: which is against all reason, if it be to endure, and cannot possibly be, in case we give credit to that which we do see in full Moones: for divided it ought not to be, and separate apart, being blacke and darke, but either being hidden, to be altogether darkened, or else to be illuminate when the Moone is overspied by the Sunne. For heere beneath with us, the aire that is in deepe pits and low caves of the earth, where the Sunne beames never come, remaineth darke and shade, without any light at all: but that which is spred about the earth, is cleere, and of a lightsome colour; for by reason of the raritie thereof, it is very easie to be transmuted into every qualitie and facultie; but principally by the light, which if it never so little touch it, as they say, and lay hold of it, you shall see it incontinently changed, and light throughout. This very reason therefore seemeth greatly to helpe and maintaine the opinion of them who drive the aire into I wot not what deepe vallies and pits within the Moone; as also to confute you, who mingle and compound I know not how, her sphere of fire and aire; for impossible it is that there should remaine any shadow or obscuritie in the superficies thereof, when the Sunne with his brightnesse doeth cleere and illuminate whatsoever part of the Moone we are able to discern, and cut with our eye-sight. And as I spake these words, even before I had made an end of my peeche: See (quoth Pharnces) the ordinary cast of the Academie, how it is, practised upon us, in that they busie themselves evermore, and spend time in all their discourses to speake against others, but never allow the discussing and reprooving of that which they deliver themselves: but if any happen to conferre and dispute with them; they must plead in their owne defence alwaies, and not be allowed to reply or come upon them with any accusations: for mine owne part, you shall not draw me this day to render a reason of such matters as you charge upon the Stoicks, nor to speake in their behalfe, before I have called you to an account: for thus turning the world upside downe, as you doe. Heereat Lucius laughing; And very well content am I good sir, (quoth he) so to do, provided alwaies, that you accuse us not of impietie; like as Aristarchus thought that the Greeks ought to have called Cleanthes the Samean into question, judiciously & to condemne him for his impietie and Atheisme, as one that thooke the very foundations dations of the world to overthrow all, in that the man endeavoring to save and maintaine those things which appeare unto us above, supposed the heaven to stand still as immooveable, and that it was the earth that mooved round by the oblique circle of the Zodiacke, and turned about the owne axeltree. As for us, we speake of our selves, and in our owne behalfe. But they, my good friend Pharnces, who suppose that the Moone is earth, why doe they turne the world upside downe, more than you; who place the earth heere hanging in the aire, being faire greater then the Moone, as the Mathematicians take their measure, in the accidents of the eclipses, and by the passages of trajections of the Moone through the shadow of the earth, collecting thereby the magnitude thereof, and what space it taketh up? for surely the shadow of the earth is lesse than it selfe, by reason that it is cast by a greater light. Now that the said shadow is straight, and pointed upward toward the end, Homer himselfe was not ignorant, but signified as much, when he called the night noctua, for the sharpenesse at the point of the said shadow; and yet the Moone as it appeareth in her eclipses, being caught and comprehended within the compass of that shadow, hath much ado to get out of it, by going forward in length, thrice as much as her owne bignesse comes to. Consider then, how many times greater must the earth needs be than the Moone, if it be so, that the shadow which it casteth, where it is sharpest and narrowest, is thrice as much as the Moone. But yee are afraid least the Moone should fall, if she were avowed to the earth: (for it may be haply, that Aeschylus hath sealed you a warrant, and secured you for the earth, when he said thus of Atlas:

*He standeth like a pillar strong and sure,
From earth to heaven above that reacheth straight:
To beare on shoulders twaine, he doeth endure
A masse burden and unwieldy weight.)*

if under the Moone there runne and be spred a light and thin aire, not firme and sufficient for to susteine a solide masse: whereas according to Pindarus:

To beare the earth there standeth most puissant Columns and pillars of hard diamant.

And therefore Pharnces for himselfe is out of all feare, that the earth will fall; may he pittieeth those who are directly and plumbie under the course of the Moone, and namely the Aethiopians, and those of Taprobana, least so weightie a masse should tumble downe upon their heads. And yet the Moone hath one good meane and helpe to keepe her from falling, to wit, her very motion and violent revolution, like unto those bullets or stones, or whatsoever weights be put within a sling, they are sure enough from slipping or falling out, so long as they be violently swong and whirled about. For every body is carried according to the naturall motion thereof, if there be no other cause to empeach or turne it aside out of course: which is the reason that the Moone mooveth not, according to the motion of her poise, considering the inclination thereof downward, is staied and hindered by the violence of a circular revolution. But peradventure more cause there were to marvel, if she should stand altogether as the earth, immovable: whereas now the Moone hath this great cause to empeach her, for not tending downward hither. As for the earth, which hath no other motion at all to hinder it; great reason there is, that according to that onely weight of the owne, it should moove downward and there settle; for more heavy it is than the Moone, not so much in this regard, that greater it is, but more, for that the Moone by reason of heat and adustion of fire, is made the lighter. In briefe, it appeareth by that which you say, if it be true that the Moone be fire, it hath need of earth, or some other matter to rest upon and cleave unto, for to maintaine, nourish, and quicken still the power that it hath: for it cannot be conceived or imagined, how fire should be preserved without fuel, or matter combustible. And you your selves affirme, doe yee not? that the earth abideth firme and sure, without any base or pedestal to susteine and hold it up? Yes verily (quoth Pharnces) being in the proper and naturall place, which is the very mids and center. For this is it whereto all heavy and weightie things doe tend, incline, and are carried to, from every side, and about which they cling, and be counterpeized: but the upper region throughout, if haply there be any terrestriall and heavy matter, by violence sent up thither, repelleth and casteth it downe againe with force incontinently, or to speake more truly, letteth it goe and fall, according to the owne naturall inclination, which is to tend and settle downward.

For the answer and refutation whereof, I willing to give Lucius some reasonable time to summon his wits together, and to thinke upon his reasons: and calling unto Theon by name, Which

Which of the tragical Poets was it (Theon quoth I) who said that Physicians Bitter medicines into the body poure,

When bitter cholers they meane to purge and scoure?

And when he made me answer that it was Sophocles. Well (quoth I) we must permit them so to doe upon necessity: but we ought not to give care unto Philosophers, if they would maintain strange paradoxes, by other positions as absurd, or to confute admirable opinions, devise others much more extravagant and wonderfull; like as these here who broche and bring in a motion forsooth tending unto a middle, wherein, what absurdity is there not? Holde not they that the earth is as round as a ball, and yet we see how many deepe profundities, haucie sublimities & manifold inequalities it hath? affirme not they that there be antipodes dwelling opposit one unto another, and those sticking as it were to the sides of the earth with their heeles upward & their heads downward all arse verſe, like unto these woodwormes or cats which hang by their sharpe claws? Would not they have even us also that are here for to goe upon the ground not plumb upright, but bending or enclining sidelong, reeling and staggering like drunken folke? Doe they not tell us tales, and would make us believe, that if barres and masses of iron waighing a thousand talents a peece, were let fall downe into the bottom of the earth, when they came once to the middle centre thereof, will stay and rest there, albeit nothing els came against them nor sustained them up? And if peradventure by some forcible violence they should passe beyond the said midst, they would soone rebound backe thither againe of their owne accord? Say not they that if a man should faw off the trunks or ends of beams on either side of the earth, the same would never settle downward still throughout, but from without forth fall both into the earth, and so equally meet one another, and cling together about the hart or centre thereof. Suppose not they that if a violent streame of water should runne downward still into the ground, when it met once with the very point or centre in the midst, which they holde to be incorporall, it would then gather together and turne round in maner of a whirlepoole, about a pole, waving to and fro there continually like one of these pendant buckets, and, as it hangeth, wagge incessantly without end? And verily some of these assertions of theirs are so absurd, that no man is able to enforce himselfe to imagine in his minde although falsely, that they are possible. For this indeed is to make high and low all one: this is to turne all upside downe: that those things, which be come as farre as to the midst, shall be thought below and under: and what is under the middle shall be supposed above and aloft; in such sort, as that if a man, by the sufferance and consent of the earth, stood with his navell just against the middle and centre of it, he should by this meanes have his head and his heeles both together standing upward: and if one should come and digge through the place beyond that part of him which was above, shall in the digging be drawn downward, and that which was beneath be cast upward both at once: and if there may be imagined another to goe cleane contrary unto him, their feet which were opposite one unto the other, should nevertheless be said and be indeed both together, beneath and above. Thus they both carrying upon their backs and also drawing after them, not I assure you a box or litle budget, but a fardle and packe, I sweare unto you, of judglers boxes full of so many and so grosse paradoxes and absurdities, wherewith they play passe and repasse, yet the say for all this, that others erre, who place the Moone which they holde to be earth, above, and not where the midst and centre of the world is. And yet if every ponderous body, incline to the same place and bendeth from all sides and on every part to the midst thereof, certainly the earth shall not appropriate and challenge unto it selfe waightie masses as parts thereof because it is the middle of the world, more than in regard it is whole and entire: and the gathering together of heavie bodies about it, shall be no signe nor argument to shew that it is the middle of the world, but rather to prove and testifie that these bodies which have bene taken and pulled from it and returned againe, have a communication and conformitie in nature with the earth. For like as the Sunne converteth into it selfe the parts whereof it is composed, even so the earth receiveth and beareth a stone, as a part appertaining unto it, in such sort as in time every one of these things is incorporate and united with it. And if it chanced that there be some other body which from the beginning was not allotted and laid unto the earth nor plucked from it, but had a part from it, a proper consistence and peculiar nature of the owne, as they may say the Moone had, what should let, but it may abide severally by it selfe, compacted and bound close together in all the proper parts thereof? For heereby, is not the shewed demonstratively that the earth is the midst of the whole world: and the conglotation of waighty bodies dies heere and their concretion which the earth declareth unto us the maner how it is probable that the parts the which be their gathered to the bodie of the Moone, may there also remaine. But he who driveth all earthly and ponderous things into one place, ranging them altogether, and making them the parts of one and the same bodie, I marvell why he attributeth not in like maner the same force and constraint unto light substances, but suffereth so many conglotations of fire to be apart and distinct afunder, neither can I see the reason why he should not bring all the starres into one, and thinke that there ought to be one entire body of all those substances that flie upward and are of fire nature. But you Mathematicians, (friend Pollonides) affirme that the Sunne is distant from the Primum Mobile, and highest scope of heaven, infinite thousand sands of miles: and after him, that the day starre Venus and Mercury, with the other Planets, which being situate under the fixed starres, and distant one from another, by great intervals and spaces betwene, doe make their severall revolutions: meane while you doe not thinke, that the world affordeth unto heavy and terrestriall bodies, a great and large place in it, and a distance one from another. But see what a ridiculous thing it were, to denie the Moone to be earth because it is not seated in the lowest place of the world; and withall to affirme it to be a star so farre remote from the firmament and Primum Mobile, even a huge number of stadia, as if it were plunged low into some deepe gulfe: for so farre under other starres she is, as no man can expresse, and even you Mathematicians want numbers to reckon and summe the distance: and she seemeth after a sort to touch the very earth, making her revolution as the doth, so nere unto the tops of high mountaines, leaving behinde her (as Empedocles saith) the very prints and tracks of her chariot wheelles upon them: for often times she surpasseth not the shadow of the earth, which is very short, and reacheth not high, by reason of the excellencye greatnesse of the Sunne that shineth upon it: and she seemeth to walke her stations so neere unto the upper face of the earth, and in a maner within the armes of it, that she obstructeth and hideth from us the light of the Sunne, because the mounten not above this shadowy, terrestriall and darke region like unto the night, which is (as one would say) the very finge and marches allotted to the earth. And therefore a man may be bolde to say, that the Moone is within the limits and confines of the earth, seeing withall that darkened and shadowed it is by the high crests and tops of mountaines therein. But to leave all other starres, as well fixed as wandring, consider the demonstrations of Aristarchus in his treatise of Magnitudes and Distances, that the distance of the Sunne from us is more than that of the Moone, above eightene folde, but under twentie: and he verily who raiseth the Moone highest, saith that she is from us, fix and fifty times as farre as is the centre of the earth; the distance whereof is fortie thousand stadia. By their calculation who keepe a meane, and according to this supputation, the Sunne ought to be distant from the Moone more than foure thousand and thirty stadia ten thousand times tolde: so farre (I say) is she off from the Sunne in regard of her ponderosity, and so neere approacheth she unto the earth: so that if, by places, we ought to distinguish of substances, the region and portion of the earth challengeth the Moone, and in regard of her proximity and vicinage unto it, she ought by right to be reckoned and enrolled among the natures, affaires, and bodies terrestriall. Neither shall we do amisse in my conceit, if having given unto these bodies (that are said to be aloft) so large a space and distance, we allow also to those beneath, such a race and spacious rounne to runne in, as is from the earth to the Moone: for as he is not moderate nor tolerable, who calleth the upper superficies onely and cope of the heaven æther, that is to say, aloft, or superiour; and all the rest ære, that is to say, beneath; so he who termeth the earth or rather the center of it onely, gæa, that is to say, below or inferiour, is not to be endured; considering that the huge vastity of the world may afford, even in this region beneath, such a competent space as is meet and convenient for motion. For if one would mainteine, that all above the earth is immediately to be counted high and aloft; another presently will come upon him with this contradiction, and say, that he may as well hold, that whatsoever is beneath the Primum mobile or terrestriall firmament, ought to be called, Below. In summe, how is the earth called, The middle? and whereof is it the middle? for the universall frame of the world, called æther, is infinit; and this infinit which hath neither head nor foot: how can it in reason have a navell? for even that which we call the mids of any thing, is a kinde of limitation; whereas infinitie is a meere privation of all limits and bounds. As for him who saith, it is not in the mids of that universalitie, but of the world, he is a pleasant man, if he thinke not withall, that the world it selfe is subject to the same doubts and difficulties: for the said universall frame leaveth not unto the very world a middle, middle, but is without a certaine feat, without affured footing, mooving in a voidnesse infinite, not into some one place proper unto it: and if haply it should meet with some any other cause of stay, and so abide still, the same is not according to the nature of the place. And as much may we conjecture of the Moone, that by the meanes of some other soule or nature, or rather of some difference, the earth continueth firme beneath, and the Moone mooveth. Furthermore you see, how they are not ignorant of a great error and inconvenience: for if it be true, that whatsoever is without the centre of the earth, it skils not how, is to be counted Above and Aloft, then is there no part of the world to be reckoned Below or Beneath; but aswell the earth it selfe, as all that is upon it, shal be above & aloft: and to be short, every bodie neere or about the centre, must go among those things that are aloft; neither must we reckon any thing to be under or beneath, but one pricke or point, which hath no bodie: and the same forsooth must make head and stand in opposition necessarily, against all the whole nature besides of the world; in case, according to the course of nature, above and below, that is to say, above and beneath, be opposite. And not onely this absurdity will follow, but also all heave and ponderous bodies must needs lose the cause, for which they bend and incline hither: for, bodie there will be none, toward which it should move: and as for this pricke or centre that hath no bodie, there is no likelihood, neither would they themselves have it so, that it should be so puissant and forcible, as to draw to it, and reteine about it, all things. And if it be found unreasonable and repugnant to the course of nature, that the world should be all above, and nothing beneath, but a terme or limit, and the same without body, without space and distance; then this that we say, is yet more unreasonable, namely, that the region beneath and that above, being parted distinctly one from another, have nevertheless each of them a large and spacious route to round themselves in. But suppose (if it please you) it were against nature, that terrestriall bodies should have any motion in heaven; let us consider gently and in good termes, not after a tragical maner, but mildly, this prooveth not by-and-by, that the Moone is not earth, but rather, that earth is in some place, where naturally it should not be: for the fire of the mountaine Aetna, is verily under the ground, against the nature of it; howbeit, the same ceaseth not therefore to be fire. The winde contained within leather bottles, is of the owne nature light and given to mount upward, but by force it cometh to be there, where naturally it ought not to be. Our very soule it selfe (I beseech you in the name of Jupiter) is it not against nature deteined within the body; being light, so in that which is heave; being of a fire substance in that which is colde, as yee your selves say; and being invisible, in that which is grosse and palpable? do we therefore denie, that the soule is within the bodie, that it is a divine substance under a grosse and heave masse, that in a moment it passeth thorowout heaven, earth and sea; that it pierceth and entreth within flesh, nerves and marrow; and finally, is the cause together with the humors of infinite passions? And even this Jupiter of yours, such as you imagine and depaint him to be, is he not of his owne nature a mighty and perpetuall fire? howbeit, now he submitteth himselfe and is pliable; subject he is to all formes and apt to admit divers mutations. Take heed therefore, and be well advised (good sir) lest that in transferring and reducing every thing to their naturall place, you do not philosophize, as that you will bring in a dissolution of all the world, and set on foot againe that olde quarrell and contention among all things which Empedocles writeth of: or, to speake more to the purpose, beware you raise not those ancient Titans and Giants, to put on armes against nature: and so consequently endeavour to receive and see againe that fabulous disorder and confusion, whereby all that is weightie, goeth one way, and whatsoever is light, another way apart,

Where neither light some countenance of Sunne, nor earth all Greene With herbs and plants, admired is, nor surging seas is seene.

according as Empedocles hath written; wherein the earth. seeleth no heat, nor the water any winde; wherein there is no ponderosity above, nor lightnesse beneath; but the principles and elements of all things be by themselves solitary, without any mutuall love or dilection between them; not admitting any society or mixture together, but avoiding and turning away one from the other, mooving apart by particular motions, as being disdainfull, proud, and carying themselves in such sort, as all things do where no god is, as Plato saith, that is as those bodies are affected wherein there is no understanding nor soule, untill such time as by some divine providence there come into nature a desire; and so amity, Venus and Love be there engendred, according to the the sayings of Empedocles, Parmenides and Hesiodus; to the end, that changing their naturall places and communicating reciprocally their gifts and faculties; some driven by necessity to moove, other bound to rest; they be all forced to a better state, remitting somewhat of their power, and yielding one to another, they grew at length unto accord, harmony and societie. For if there had not bene any other part of the world against nature, but that each one had bene both in place, and for quality, as it ought naturally to be, without any need of change or transposition, so that there had bene nothing at the first wanting, I greatly doubt what and wherein was the worke of divine providence; or whereupon it is, that Jupiter was the father, creator and maker. For in a campe or field, there would be no need of a man who is expert and skillfull in ranging and ordering of battell, in case every souldier of himselfe knew his ranke, his place, his time and opportunity, which he ought to take, keepe and observe. Neither would there be any use of gardeniers, carpenters or masons, if water were of it selfe taught naturally to go where as it is needfull, and to runne and overflow a place which requieth watering; and if bricks, timber, logs and stones by their owne inclinations and naturall motions, were to range and couch themselves orderly in their due places. Now if this reason and argument of theirs doth directly abolish all providence; if order belong unto God, together with the distinction of all things in the world; why should any man wonder, that nature hath bene so disposed and ordered by him, as that fire should be here, and the starres there? and againe, that the earth should be seated here below, & the Moone placed there above, lodged in a more sure & strong prison, devised by reason, than that which was first ordained by nature? For were it so, that absolutely and of necessity, all things should follow their naturall instinct, and move according to that motion which naturally is given them, neither would the Sunne runne his course any more circularly, nor Venus, nor any other planet whatsoever; for that such light substances, and standing much upon fire, mount directly upward. Now if it be so, that nature receiveth such an alteration and change in regard of the place, as that our fire here being moved and stirred, riseth plumbe upward; but after it is gotten once up to heaven, together with the revolution thereof, turneth round: what marvel is it, if semblably, heave and terrestriall bodies, being out of their naturall places, be forced & overcome by the circumstant aere, to take unto another kind of motion? For it can not be said with any reason, that heaven hath this power to take from light substances the propriety to mount aloft, and can not likewise have the puissance to vanquish heave things & such as naturally move downward: but one while it maketh use of that power of her owne, another while of the proper nature of things, alwaies tending to the better. But to let passe these habitudes and opinions whereto we are servilly addicted, and to speake frankly and without feare what our minde is, I am verily perswaded, that there is no part of the universall world, that hath by it selfe any peculiar order, feat or motion, which a man simply may say to be naturall unto it: but when each part exhibiteth and yeeldeth profitably that, wherefore it is made, and whereto it is appointed, moving it selfe, doing or suffering, or being disposed as it is meet and expedient for it, either for safetie, beautie, or puissance, then seemeth it to have place, motion and disposition, proper and convenient to the owne nature. For man, who is disposed (if any thing els in the whole world) according to nature, hath in the upper parts of the bodie, and especially about his head, those things that be ponderous and earthy; but in the mids thereof, such as be hore and of a fiery nature; his teeth, some grow above, others beneath; and yet neither the one range of them nor the other, is against nature. Neither is that fire which shineth above in his eyes, according to nature, and that which is in the bellie and heart, contrary to nature, but in each place is it properly seated and commodiously. Now if you consider the nature of shell-fishes, you shall finde, that (as Empedocles saith)

The oysters, mures of the sea, and shell-fish every one,
With mus sic coats; the tortoise eke, with crust as hard as stone,
And vaulted backe, which archwise he aloft doth hollow reare; Shew all, that heave earth they do above their bodies beare.

And yet this hard coat and heave crust, like unto a stone, being placed over their bodies, doth not presse or crush them; neither doth their naturall heat, in regard of lightnesse, rise up and vanish away, but mingled and composed they are one with the other, according to the nature of every one. And even so it standeth to good reason, that the world, in case it be animall, hath in many places of the body thereof, earth, and in as many, fire and water, not driven thither perforce, but so placed & disposed by reason: for the eie was not by the strength of lightnesse forced to that part of the body wherein it is; neither was the hart depressed downe by the weight that it had, into the brest; but because it was better and more expedient for the one and the other, to be seated where they are. Semblably, we ought not to thinke, that of the parts of the world, either the earth seated where it is, because it fell downe thither by reason of ponderosities, or the Sunne, in regard of lightnesse, was carried upward, like unto a bottle bladder full of winde, which being in the bottome of the water, presently riseth up, (as Merodorus of Chios was persuaded) or other stars, as if they were put in a ballance, inclined this way or that, as their weight more or lesse required, and so mounted higher or lower to those places where now they are seated: but rather by the powerful direction of reason in the first constitution of the world, some of the starres like unto bright and glittering eies have bene set fast in the firmament, as one would say aloft in the very forehead thereof: and the Sunne representing the power and vigor of the heart, sendeth and distributeth in manner of blood and spirits, his heat and light throughout all. The earth and sea are to the world, proportionable to the paunch and bladder in the body of a living creature: the moone situate betweene the Sunne and the earth, as betweene the heart and the bellie, resembling the liver or some such soft bowell, transmitteth into the inferior parts here beneath, the heat of those superior bodies, and draweth to herselfe those vapors that arise from hence, and those doth she subtilize & refine by way of concoction and purification, and so send and distribute them round about her. Now whether that solid and terrestriall portion in it, hath some other propertie serving for a profitable use or no; it is unknown to us; but surely it is evermore the best and surest way in all things, to go by that which is needfull: for what probability or likelihood can we draw from that which they deliver? They affirme, that of the aire the most subtle and light some part, by reason of the raritie thereof, became heaven; but that which was thickened and closely driven together, went to the making of starres; of which the Moone being the heaviest of all the rest, was concreat and compact of the most grosse and muddy matter thereof: and yet a man may perceive how she is not separate nor divided from the aire, but moveth and performeth her revolution through that which is about her, even the region of the winds; and where comets or blasing starres be engendered and hold on their course. Thus these bodies have not bene by their naturall inclinations, according as each of them is light or heavey, placed and situate as they be, but surely by some other reason they have bene so ranged and ordeined.

After these words were said, when I would have given unto Lucius his turne to speake, and to hold on this discourse, there being nothing at all behinde left, but the demonstrations of this doctrine: Aristotle began to smile, I am a witnesse (quoth he) that you have directed al these your contradictions and refutations, against those, who hold that the Moone is it selfe halfe fire; and who affirme, that all bodies of their owne accord, tend either upward or downward directly: But whether there be any one who saith, that the Starres of their owne nature, have a circular motion, & that in substance they be far different from the foure elements; that came not ever, so much as by chance and fortune into your remembrance: and therefore I count my selfe exempt from all trouble and molestacion in that behalfe. Why, good sir (quoth Lucius) if yee should haply suppose and set downe, that the other starres, and the whole heaven besides, were of a pure and sincere nature, voide of all change and mutation, in regard of passion, as also bring in a certaine circle, in which they performed their motions by a perpetual revolution, you should not finde any one at this time to gaine-say you; notwithstanding there were in this position doubts and difficulties innumerable. But when your speech is descended so low as to touch the Moone, then can it not mainteine in her that impassibility, and the celestially beautie of that body. But to leave all other inequalities and differences therein; certes, that very face which appeareth in the body of the Moone, cometh necessarily from some passion of her owne substance, or else by the mixture of some other, (for that which is mingled in some sort alwaies suffereth) because it loseth that former puritie, being perforce overcast and filled with that which is worfe. As for that dull and slow course of hers, that weake and feeble heat where-by, as the Poet Ion saith, unto what shall we attribute the same, if not to her imbecillitie, in case an eternall and heavenly body body can be subject unto any such passion? In summe, my good friend Aristotle, if the Moone be earth, surely a most faire and beautifull thing it seemeth to be, and full of great maiesticke: if a starre, or light, or some divine and celestially body, I am affraid least the proove deformed and foule, yea, and disgrace that beautifull name of hers, in case of all those bodies in heaven, which are in number so many, she onely remaineth to have need of the light of another,

*The grapes their kinde concoction lacke,
And on the vine tree turne not blacke.*

Casting behinde, her eie alwaies,

Upon the Sunne and his bright raies.

according as Parmenides writeth. And verily our familiar friend, having in a lecture of his, prooved by demonstration this proposition of Anaxagoras; that all the light which the Moone hath, the Sunne giveth unto her, was commended and well reputed for it. For mine owne part, I am not minded to say what I have learned, either of you, or with you; but taking this for a thing granted and confessed, I will proceed forward to the rest behinde. Probable therefore it is, that the Moone is illuminate, not in manner of a glasse or crysfall stone, by the bright irradiation and shining beames of the Sunne striking through her; neither yet by a certaine collustration and mutuall conjunction of lights, as torches which being set a burning together, do augment the light: for so it would be no lesse full moone in the conjunction or first quarter, than in the opposition, in case she did not containe and keepe in, nor repell the raies of the sunne, but suffer them to passe through her by reason of her raritie and frugositie, or if by a contemperate she shineth and kindleth as it were the light about her: for we cannot alledge her oblique and biase declination, or her averfions and turnings away, before and after the conjunction or change, as when it is halfe Moone, tipped croissant, or in the wane; but being directly and plumbe under the bodie that illuminateth it, as Democritus saith, it receiveth and admitteth the Sunne, in such sort, as by all likelihood she should then appeare, and he shine through her: But so farre is the from so doing, that both herselfe at such a time is unseene, and many times hideth the Sunne, and keepeth off his beames from us: for according to Empedocles,

His raies aloft she turneth cleane aside,

That to the earth beneath they cannot wend:

The earth this selfe she doth obscure and hide,

So farre as she in compasse doth extend.

As if this light of the Sunne fell upon night and darknesse and not upon another starre. And whereas Pojadanius saith, that in regard of the thicknes & depth of the Moones body, the light of the Sun can not through her pierce, as far as unto us, this is manifestly convinced as untrue. For the aire as infinite as it is, and deeper by many degrees than the Moone, is nevertheless illuminated and lightned all over, and throughout by the Sunne. It remaineth therefore that according to the opinion of Empedocles, the Moone-light which appeareth unto us, cometh by the reflexion and repercussion of the Sunne-beames. And hereupon it is, that the same is not with us hot and bright, as of necessitie it would be, if it did proceed either from the inflammation or commixtion of two lights. But like as the refraction or reverberation of a voice, doth cause an echo, or resonance more obscure than is the voice it selfe, as it was pronounced; and as the raps, that shot, rebounding backe againe, doeth give, are more milde and soft,

Even so the Sunne beames when they beat

Upon the Moone in compasse great.

yeeld a weake and feeble reflexion or refuxion, as one would say of light, the force thereof being much abated & resolved by the refraction & reflexion. Then Sylla: Certes, great probability this carlieth with it, that you have delivered: But the most forcible objection that is made against this position, how thinke you, is it any waies mitigated and mollified? or hath our friend here passed it over quite with silence? Whereby speake you this (quoth Lucius?) what opposition meane you? or is it the doubt or difficulty about the Moone when she appeareth the one halfe? Even the very same (quoth Sylla) for there is some reason; considering that all reflexion is made by equall angles, that when the halfe Moone is in the middes of heaven, the light should not be caried from her upon the earth, but glance and fall beyond the earth: for the Sunne being upon the Horizon, toucheth with his raies the Moone, and therefore being reflected and broken equally; they must light upon the opposite bound of the Horizon, and so not send the light hither; or else there shall ensue a great distortion and difference of the angle, which is impossible. Why good sir (quoth Lucius) I dare assure you, this hath not bene overpassed, but explained already: and with that, casting his eie as he spake, upon Menelaus the Mathematician:

Mathematician: I am abashed (quoth he) friend Menelam, to overthrow a Mathematicall position, that is supposed and laid as a ground, and fundamentall principle for oblique matters of mirrors: And yet I must (quoth he) of necessity: for that it neither appeareth in this example, nor is generally confessed as true, that all reflexions tend to equall angles; for checked and confuted it is by round embowed or embossed mirrors, when as they represent images appearing at one point of the sight, greater than themselves. This also is disproved by double or two-folde mirrors, for that when they be inclined and turned one unto the other, so as the angle be made within, each of the glasses or plaine superficies, yeeld the resemblance of a double image, and so represent foure in all from one face; two apparent, answerable to that without on the left side; and other twaine obscure, & not so evident on the right side, all in the bottome of the mirrors, where they yeeld images, in appearance greater than the thing it selfe, at one point onely of the sight. The same likewise is overthrowen by those mirrors which are hollow, wherein the aspect is variable: whereof Plato rendereth a reason and efficient cause: for he saith, that a mirror rising of the one side and the other, the sight doeth change the reflexion, falling from the one side to the other: and therefore as the views and visions, some immediately retorne upon us, others gliding upon the opposite parts of the mirror, have recourse againe from thence unto us, it is not possible that all reflexions should be in equall angles: so that when they come to coping and close sight, they thinke by these oppositions to take from the fluxions of light, caried from the Moone to the earth, the equalitie of angles, supposing this to cary more probability with it, than the other. Howbeit, if we must needs yeeld thus much, and grant this unto our best beloved Geometrian: first and foremost by all likelihood this should befall unto those mirrors that are very smooth and exquisitely polished: whereas the Moone hath many inequalities, and asperities, in such sort, as the raies comming from the vast body of the Sunne, and caried to mightie altitudes, which receive one from another, and intercommunicate the lights, as they be sent to and fro, and distributed reciprocally, are refracted, broken, and interlaced all manner of waies, so as the counterlights doe meet and encounter one another, as if they came from many mirrors unto us. Moreover, if we should grant and suppose these reflexions of beames upon the superficies of the Moone, to be made by way of equall angles, there is no impossibility in the matter, but that the same raies being caried to great a way, should have their fractions, flexions, and delapsions; that thereby the light should be confused and shine the more.

Some also there be who prove by lineary demonstration, that the casteth much of her light to the earth plumb downe by direct line drawn under her as she doth encline: But for a man to make such a description and delineation, reading as he doth, and discouering in a publicke auditorie, especially being so frequent, it was not easie, neither could it well be. In briefe I marvel (quoth he) how they came thus to alledge against us the halfe Moone, more than halfe tipped or crostant. For if the Sunne do illuminate the masse, as a man would say, of the Moone, being of a celestiall or fry matter, surely he would not leave halfe the sphere or globe thereof darke alwaies & shadowed without light, to our sense, but how little soever he touched her, turning as he doth about, reason would give and convenient it were that she should be wholly replenished and totally changed and turned, by that brightnesse of his, which spreadeth so quickly, and passeth through all so easily. For considering that wine touching water in one point onely, or a drop of blood falling into some liquor, dieth and coloureth the same all red or purple, like unto blood: and seeing they say that the very aire is altered with light, not by any deflexion or beames intermingled, but by sudden conversion and change; even in a point or prick onely: how can they thinke that one starre comming to touch another starre, and one light another should not be mingled immediately, nor make a confusion and mutation throughout, but to illuminate that onely in the outward superficies which it toucheth? For that circle which the Sunn maketh in fetching a compasse and turning toward the Moone, one while falling upon the very line which parteth that which is visible in her fro the invisible, another while rising up directly, in such sort as that it both cutteth her in twaine & is cutte also by her reciprocally, according to divers regards and habitudes of that which is light to the darke, causing those sundry forms in her, whereby she appeareth but halfe, more than halfe horned and crostant: this I say is more than anything els, that this illumination of the Moone, whereof we speake all this whiles, is not a mixture of two lights but a touching onely, not a collustration or gathering together of sundry lights, but an illustration thereof round about. But for as much as she is not onely illuminate illuminate her selfe, but he also sendeth backe hither unto us the image of that brightnesse, this consisteth us more and more in that which we say as touching her terrene substance. For never are there any reflections and reverberations upon a thing that is rare and of subtile parts; neither may a man easily so much as imagine how light from light, or one fire should reflect and rebound from another: but needs it must be that the subject which maketh the reverberation or reflection is firme, solid and thicke, to the end there may be a blow given against it, and a rebounding also from it. To prove this, doe but marke the aire, which giveth passage unto the Sunne for to perce quite through it, neither admitteth it any repulse or driving backe. Contrariwise we may see, that from wood, from stones, and from clothes or garments, hung forth against the fame, he maketh many reflections of his light, and illuminations on every side. And even so we see, that the earth by him is illuminate; for he sendeth not his beames to the very bottome thereof as in water, nor throughout the whole as in the aire: but looke what circle the Sunne maketh turning about the Moone, and how much he cutteth from her, such another there is that compasseth the earth: and just so much he doth illuminate alwaies, as he leaveth without light: for that which is illumined in the one and the other, is a little more than a hemisphere. Give me leave therefore now to conclude after the manner of Geometricians by proportion. If, when three things there be, unto which the light of the Sunne commeth, to wit, the Aaire, the Moone, and the earth, we see that one of them is by him illuminate, not as the aire, but as the earth: we must of necessity collect that those two be of one nature, considering that of the same cause they suffer the same effects. Now when all the companie highly commended Lucius for this disputation: Passing well done of you Lucius (quoth I) you have to a proper discourse annexed as prety a comparison; for we must give you your right and not defraud you of that which is your due. With that smiled Lucius: I have yet (quoth he) a second proportion which I will adde unto the other, to the end that we may prove demonstration, that the Moone wholly resembleth the earth, not only by this that she suffreth together with the earth, from the same cause, the same accidents: but also because they both doe worke the like effects upon the same object. For this I am sure you will yeeld and grant unto me, that of all those things which are observed about the Sunne, none doe so much resemble one another, as his eclipses doth his setting or going downe: if you will but call to minde that meeting of Sunne and Moone together, which hapned of late daies, and beginning immediately after noonelst, caused many a starre from sundry parts of the skie to be seene, and wrought such a temperature or disposition in the aire, as is of the twilight evening and morning. But if you will not grant me this said supposition in this, our Theon here will cite and bring, I trow, Alimmermus, Cydias, Archiclaudus: and besides them Stefichorus and Pindarus, lamenting that in eclipses, the world is robbed of their greatest light which they bewaile as if it were entered, saying that midnight was come at noone day, and that the radiant beames of the Sunne, went in the way and path of darkenesse: but above all he will alledge Homer, saying that in an eclips, the faces and viages of men were overcast and seized upon with night and darkenesse: also that the Sunne was quite lost and missing out of the heaven being in conjunction with the Moone.

And this happeneth by a naturall cause, according as Homer sheweth in this verse,

Ἡ δὲ σελήνη πάλαι, τοῦ δὲ ἡλίου φάος.

What time as Moones their interchange begin

As one goes out, another commeth in.

As for the rest in mine advise they be as certaine and doe conclude as exactly as the demonstrations of the Mathematicians, to wit, that as the night is the shadow of the earth, so the eclipse of the Sun, is the shadow of the Moone, when as the sight returneth upon it selfe. For the Sunne going downe is hidden from our sight by the earth, and being eclipsed is likewise darkened by the Moone, and both the one and the other be ofuscations of darkenesse; that of the Sunne setting, by the earth, and the other of the Sunne eclipsed by the Moone, by the reason that the shade enpeacheth our sight: of which premises the conclusion evidently doth follow. For if the effect be like, the efficient also be semblable; because necessary it is, that the same accidents or effects in the same subject, must come from the same efficient. Now if the darkenesse occasioned by the eclipses be not so deepe nor affect the aire so forcibly as doth the night, we are not so marvell thereat: for the substance of that bodie which maketh the night, and of it that causeth the eclipse, may wel be the same, although the greatnesse be not equall. For the Aegyptians

Some thinke he meaneth that darknesse over the face of the earth, which hapned at the verie time that our Saviour suffered upon the crosse, which continued six the sixt houre of the day, unto the ninth, that is to say, from noone, untill three of the clocke after noone. * Somewhat had bene said of the change of the Moone, as it should seeme, for it will not stand with the Sunn eclipsed, to be at any other time than at the change, by course of nature.

tians, I suppose, doe hold, that the Moone is in bignesse the 72. part of the earth : And Anaxagoras saith it is just as big as Peloponnesus. Aristarchus writeth that the overthwart line or Diameter of the Moone in proportion to that of the earth is lesse than if 60. were compared with nineteene : and somewhat more than if a hundred and eight were compared with 43 : and thereby the earth bereaveth us of all sight of the Sunne, so great it is. For it must be a great obstacle and opposition betweene, which continueth the time of a night : and the Moone albeit otherwise the hideth all the Sunne, yet that eclipse neither lasteth not so long, nor is so universal : for there appeareth alwaies about his circumference some light, which will not permit the darknesse to be so blacke and deepe, and altogether so obscure. Aristotle also, I meane the ancient Philosopher of that name, rendring a reason why there happen eclipses of the Moone oftener than of the Sunne, among other causes, brings in this for one : that the Sunne is eclipsed by the obstruction of the Moone, and the Moone by that of the earth, which is much greater and more spacious, and so by consequence is opposed very often. And Ptolemy defined this accident thus : The eclipse of the Sunne (quoth he) is the conjunction or meeting of the Sunne and the Moone, the shadow whereof doeth darken our eye-sight : for there is no defect or eclipse of the Sunnes light, but unto those, whose sight the shadow of the Moone hath caught, and so hindreth them from seeing the Sunne. Now in confessing that the shadow of the Moone reacheth downe unto us, I know not what he hath left himselfe for to alledge. Certes, impossible it is, that a starre should cast a shadow : for that which is void altogether of light, is called a shadow ; and light maketh no shadow, but contrariwise, naturally riddeth it away. But what arguments besides, were alledged to this purpose (quoth he ?) The Moone (quoth I then) suffereth the same eclipse : Well done (quoth he) of you, to reduce this into my memorie : But would you have me to prosecute this disputation, as if you had already granted and set downe, that the Moone is subject to eclipses, when she is caught within the shadow of the earth ; or that for a subject and argument of some declamation, and demonstration unto you, I first rehearse all the arguments one after another ? Mary, do so I pray you (quoth Theon : ) bestow your labour in such a discourse, I had need verily (quoth he) of some perswasion, having onely heard say, that when these three bodies, to wit, the earth, the Sunne, and the Moone, are directly in one right line, then happen eclipses ; for that either the earth, taketh the Sunne from the Moone, or the Moone taketh him from the earth : for the Sunne is in defect or eclipse when the Moone, and the Moone likewise when the earth is in the midst of them three ; whereof the one falleth out in conjunction, the other in the opposition or full Moone. Then (quoth Lucius) these be in a manner all the principall points and the very briefe of those that which hath beene delivered : but to begin withall, if you thinke so good take in hand that firme argument which is drawn from the forme and figure of the shadow, which indeed is a Conus or Pyramis (resembling a sugar loaf) with the sharpe end forward, namely when a great fire or great light being round, comprehendeth a masse likewise round but lesse : and hereupon it cometh that in eclipses of the Moone the circumscription of the blacke or darkenesse, from the cleere and light, have alwaies their sections round : for the approachments and applications of a round body, in what part soever, whether it give or receive those sections, by reason of the similitude doe alwaies keepe a round forme and be circular. Now to the second argument. You know well (I suppose) that the first part eclipsed or darkened in the Moone, is that which regardeth the east : and contrariwise in the Sunne, that which looketh toward the west : for the shadow of the earth goeth from east to west, but contrariwise the Sunne and Moone, from west eastward. The experience of the apparitions, giveth us the visible knowledge of these things : and many words there need not to make the demonstration hereof plaine and evident to be understood : by which suppositions is confirmed the cause of the eclipse : For, in as much as the Sunne is eclipsed when he is overtaken, and the Moone by meeting with that which maketh her eclipse, by all likelihood, may rather necessarily, the one is caught behinde, the other surprised before, for that the obstruction, & inumbration beginneth on that side on which so that cometh first that maketh the said inumbration. Now the Moone lighteth upon the Sunne from the west, as striving with him in course and hastning after him : but the shadow of the earth cometh from the east, as having a contrary motion. The third reason is taken from the time and greatnesse of the eclipses of the Moone. For when she is eclipsed on high and farre from the earth, she continueth but a little while in defect or want of light : but when she suffereth the same default being low and nere unto the earth, she is much oppressed, and slowly

getteth the fourth of the shade thereof : and yet when she is low she moveth most swiftly, and being aloft, as slowly. But the cause is in the difference of the shadow, which toward the bottom or base is broader as are the Cones or Pyramids, & so it groweth smaller and smaller taperwise, untill at the top it endeth in a sharpe point. And hereupon it cometh that the Moone being low and so falling within the shadow is compassed with greater circles of the shadow, & so passeth through the very bottom of it, & that which is most darke : but being on high, by reason of the narrow compass of the shadow, being as it were in a small puddle of mire, she is but a little sullied or beraied therewith, & so quickly getteth forth of it. Here I passe by the accidents and effects that have their particular causes. For we daily see that the fire, out of a shady place appeareth & shineth the rather, either by reason of the thicknesse of the darke aire, which admitteth no effusions nor diffusions of the vertue of the fire, keeping in and containing within it selfe the substance thereof : or rather if this be a passion of the sense, like as hot things nere unto cold are felt to be more hot, and pleasures presently upon paines found more vehement : even so things cleere, appeare better when they are laid nere unto those that be darke, by means of different passions, which doe streine the imagination : but the former conjecture seemeth to be more probable : for in the Sunne-shine, the whole nature of fire not onely leeseeth his brightness, but also in giving place unto it, becommeth more dull, and unwilling to burne, for that the heat of the Sunne doth scatter and dissipate the force thereof. If then it were true that the Moone had in it a feeble and dimme or dusky fire, as being a muddy starre, as the Stoicks saie it is, reason it were and meet, that it should not suffer any one of those accidents (but contrary al) which now we see it to suffer, namely to be seene at that time when as it is hidden, and againe to be hidden, what time as she sheweth herselfe : that isto say, to be covered all the rest of the time, being darkened by the aire environing it, and to shine out againe for six moneths, and afterwards for five moneths be hidden, entering within the shadow of the earth. For of 465. revolutions of eclipsed full Moones, 404. are of six moneths, and the rest of five. It must needs be then, during this time, the Moone should appeare shining in the shadow : but contrariwise we see, that in the shadow eclipsed she is, and looeth her light, which she recovereth againe afterwards, when she is escaped and gotten forth of the said shadow, yea, and appeareth often in the day time ; so that it is rather any thing else than a fire body, and resembling a starre.

Lucius had no sooner thus said, but Pharnaces & Apollonides came running both together, to set upon him, and to confute his speech : and then Pharnaces assailed by Apollonides there present : Why : this (quoth he) is that which principally proveth the Moone to be a starre, and to stand much upon fire, namely, that in eclipses she is not wholly darkened, and not at all to be seene, but sheweth through the shade a certaine colour, resembling a coale of fire, and the same fearefull to see to, which is the very naturall and proper hue of her owne. As for Apollonides, he made instance and opposition as touching the word shadow : for that (quoth he) Mathematicians by that terme use alwaies to call the place which is not illumined, but the heaven admitteth no shadow. Whereto I made answer, that this instance of his was alledged rather against the word contentiously, than against the thing Physically, or Mathematically ; for the place which is darkened and obstructed by the opposition of the earth, if a man will not call a shadow, but a place void or deprived of light, yet be it what it will, whensoever the Moone is there, you must of necessity confesse, that she becommeth obscure and darkened : and in one word, I say, it is a very absurd folly to hold, that the shadow of the earth reacheth not to that place, from whence the shadow the Moone falling upon our sight heere upon the earth, causeth the eclipse of the Sunne. And now will I come againe to you Pharnaces : For that burnt colour, like a coale in the Moone, which you say is proper unto her, agreeth very well to a body, that hath thicknesse and depth : neither use there to remaine in bodies which be rare any marke or token of a flame, nor a coale can possibly be made of a body which is not solide & able to receive deepe within it the heat of fire, and the blacknesse of smoake : as Homer himselfe sheweth very well in one place, by these words :

*When flower of fire was gon and shewen away
And flame extinct the coales he did forth lay.*

For the coale seemeth not properly to be fire, but a bodie fire and altered by fire, remaining still in a solid masse or substance which hath taken as it were deepe root : whereas flames are but the setting on fire and fluxions of some nutriment or matter which is of a rare substance, and by reason of feeblenesse is quickly resolved and consumed. In so much as there were not another ther

her argument so evident, to prove that the Moone is solid and terrestriall, as this, if the proper colour thereof resemble a coale of fire. But it is not so my Pharnaces: for in her eclipse she changeth diversly her colours, which Mathematicians in regard of time and place determinately distinguishing in this sort. If she be eclipsed in the West, she appeareth exceeding blacke for three houres and an halfe: if in the middle of the heaven, she sheweth this light reddish or bay colour resembling fire: and after seven houres and an halfe, there ariseth a rednesse indeed. Finally, when this eclipse hapneth in the east and toward the Sunne rising she taketh a blew or grayish colour, which is the cause that the Poets and namely Empedocles calleth her Glaucopis. Considering then, that they see manifestly how the Moone changeth into so many colours in the shadow, they doe very ill to attribute unto her this colour onely of a burning or live coale: which instructs a man may say to be lesse proper unto her than any other, and rather to be some little suffusion and remnant of light appearing and shining through a shadow; and that her proper and naturall colour is blacke and earthly. For seeing that here below whereas the lakes and rivers which receive the Sunne beames, and by that means seeme in their superficies to be some time reddish, and otherwhiles of a violet colour, the shadowy places adjoining take the same colours and are illuminated, starting backe by reason of reflexions & divers rebated splendours. What wonder is it, if a great river (as it were) or flux of shadow falling upon a celestiall sea as a man would say of a light not firm, fedy & quiet, but stirred with innumerable farrres walking over it, and besides, which admitteth divers mixtures and mutations, doth take from the Moone the impression of sundry colours, and send the same hither unto us? For it cannot be avowed that a starre or fire should appeare through a shadow either blacke, blew, or violet; but hills, plaines, and seas, are seene to have many and sundry resemblances of colours by reflexion of the Sunne running upon them, which are the very tinctures, that a brightnesse mingled with shadows and mists (as it were) with painters drugges and colours, bringeth upon them: which tinctures Homer went about to expresse in some fort and to name, when one while he calleth the sea leucos, and eros, that is to say, of a violet colour, or deepened as wine, and otherwhile the waves purple: in one place the sea blew, greene or grey, and the colour white: as for the tinctures and colours appearing upon the earth diversly, he hath let them passe, as I suppose, for that they be in number infinit. So, it is not like that the Moone should have but one plaine and even superficies in manner of the sea, but rather resemble naturally of all things especially the earth, whereof old Socrates in Plato seemeth to fable, whether it were, that under covert words and oenigmatically he ment this here of the Moone, or spake of some other. For it is neither incredible nor wonderfull if the Moone in it having no corruption nor muddinesse but the fruition of pure light from heaven, and being full of heat, not of furious and burning fire, but of such as is milde and harmlesse, hath also within her faire places and marvellous pleasant mountaines also, resplendant like bright flaming fire, purple tinctures or zones, gold and silver likewise good store, not dispersed heere and there in the bottome thereof, but arising up to the upper face of the said planes in great abundance, or else spread over the hills and mountaines, even and smooth. Now say that the sight of all these things cometh unto us through a shadow, and that after divers and sundry sorts, by reason of the variable and different mutation of the circumstant aire, yet looseth not the Moone for all that, the venerable opinion that goeth of her and the reputation of her divinity, being esteemed among men a celestiall earth, or rather a feculent and troubled fire, as the Stoicks would have it, and standing much upon lees or dreggish matter. For the very fire it selfe hath barbarian honours done unto it among the Medes and Assyrians, who for very feare serve and adore such things as be noisome and hurtful, hallowing & consecrating the same above those things which are of themselves good and honorable. As for the name of the earth, there is not a Greeke but he holdeth it right worshipfull, sacred, and venerable: in so much as it is an ancient custome received throughout all Greece, to honour it as much as any other god whatsoever. And far is it from us men, to thinke that the Moone which we take to be a celestiall earth, as a dead body without soule or spirit, and altogether void of such things, which we ought to offer as fruit frutes to the gods. For both by law we yeeld recompence and thanksgiving unto it, for those good things which we have received, and by nature we adore the same, which we acknowledge to be the most excellent for vertue, and right honourable for puissance, and therefore we thinke it no sine at all, to suppose the Moone to be earth. To come now unto the face that appeareth therein: like as this earth upon which we walke, hath many sinuosities and valleys, even so as probable it is, that the said heavenly earth, lieth open with great deepe caves;

and

and wide chinks or ruptures, and those containing either water or obscure aire: to the bottome thereof the light of the Sunne is not able to pierce and reach, but there falleth, and sendeth to us hither a certaine divided reflexion. Then Apollonides: Now I beseech you good sir, even by the Moone herselfe, thinke you it is possible that there should be shadows of caves, gulfs, and chinks there, and that the same should be discovered by our sight heere? or doe you not make reckoning of that which may come thereof? What is that (quoth I:) Mary I will tell you, (quoth he) and albeit you are not ignorant thereof, yet may you give me the hearing. The Diameter of the Moone, according to that bignesse which appeareth unto us, in the meane and ordinary distances, is twelve fingers breadth long: and every one of those blacke and daik shadowy streaks therein, is more than halfe a finger, that is to say, above the foure an twentieth part of the said Diameter. Now if we suppose the whole circumference of the Moone to be thirtie thousand stadia, and according to that supposition the Diameter to be ten thousand, every one of those obscure and shadowy marks within her, will not be lesse than five hundred stadia, or thereabout. Consider then first, whether it be possible that there should be in the Moone so great profundities, and such rugged inequalities, as to make so bigge a shadow? and then, whether being so great, their bignesse should not be defcried and seene by us. Heereupon I smiling upon him: Now I assure you Apollonides (quoth I) I can you thanke, you have done it very well, in devising such a proper demonstration, whereby you will proove both me and your selfe also to be greater than those Giants Aloides, I meane not at every houre of the day, but especially in the morning and evening: doe you thinke that when the Sunne maketh our shadows so long, hee yeeldeth unto our sense this goodly collection and augmentation, that if the thing which is shadowed be greater, then that which maketh the shadow must needs be exceeding great? Neither of us twaine, I wor well, hath ever bene in the isle Lennos, and yet both of us have many a time heard this vulgar lambique verse so rise in every mans mouth:

Allos up'lon m'el'os Anagias fobos

The mountaine Athos shall on either side,

The cow that stands in Lemnos hide.

For this shadow of the hill falleth as it should seeme, upon a certaine brazen image of an heifer in that Isle, reaching in length over sea no lesse than 700 stadia; not because the said mountaine which maketh the shadow is of that height, but because the distaces of the light causeth the shadows of bodies to be by many folds greater than the bodies are. Go to then, consider that when the Moone is at the full, at what time as the rendreth unto our eie the forme of a visage most expressly, by reason of the profunditie of the shadow within, then is she also farthest distant from the Sunne: for the farre recoiling and withdrawing backward of the light, is it that makes the shadow great, and not the bignesse of those inequalities, which are upon the superficies of the Moone. Moreover you see that the excessive glittering of the Sunne shining all about, will not suffer a man to see in the day time the very tops of mountaines: but the deepe, hollow, and shadowy parts therein, appeare very farre off. It carieth therefore no absurditie at all, that a man is not able exactly to see and discern that full light and illumination of the Moone: but that the opposition of darke shadowes unto cleare lights, by reason of their diversitie is more exquisitely seene. But this (quoth I) seemeth rather to checke and confute that reflexion, and reverberation which is said to rebound from the Moone, for that they who stand within the raies or beames that are returned and retorted backe, have meanes to see not onely that which is illumined, but that also which doeth illuminate. For when, in the refutation of a light from the water upon some wall, the light falleth upon the very place it selfe, which is thus illuminate by the reflexion, the eie seeth three things, to wit, the beames or shining light driven backe, the water which maketh that reflexion, and the Sunne it selfe, whose light hitting upon the superficies of the water, is reflexed and sent backe. This being generally granted as a thing evidently seene, yet by way of objection, they bid those who affirme, that the earth is illuminate from the Moone by the reflexion of the Sunnes light from it, to shew by night the Sunne appearing in the superficies of the Moone, like as he may be seene in the day time within the water upon which she shineth, when there is the foresaid reflexion of his beames: But because he cannot then be seene, they inferre, that it must be by some other manner, and not by reflexion, that the Moone is illuminate; and if there be no such reflexion, then cannot the Moone in any wise be earth. How shall this be met withall, and what answer shall be shaped unto it (quoth Apollonides?) for the reason of reflexion seemeth all one, and common as well to us as to you. True (quoth I) common it is in some fort, and in some fort not: but first marke I beseech you the comparison, how they go cleane kin, kam, and against the streame, as if rivers ranne up hilles: for the water is heere beneath upon the earth, and the Moone is above and in the heaven: in such fort as the beames reflected, make the forme of their angles opposit and quite contrarie one unto the other; the one carrying the head or point upward against the superficies of the Moone, the other downward to the ground. Let them not then demand and require that a mirrour should render every forme or face alike, nor that in every distance there should be equall, or semblable reflexion, for in so dooing they would goe against apparent evidence. And they who holde the Moone to be a bodie not smooth, even subtil as water is, but solid, massy, and terrestriall, I cannot conceive why they should looke for to see the Sunne in it as in a glasse. For milke verily doth not yeeld such specularie images nor cause reflexion of the sight, by reason of the inequality and rugged asperity of the parts: how is it possible then, that the Moone should send backe from it the sight as mirrours doe which are more polished? And even this also, if any rafe, blur, filth, or confused spot have caught them in the superficies, from whence the sight being reflected is wont to receive the impression of some figure, may well be seene, but counter-light they yeeld none: and he who requireth, that either the Sunne should appear in the Moone, or our sight be redoubled against the Sunne, let him require withall, that the eie be the Sunne, the sight thereof the light, and man, heaven. For like it is that the reflexion of the Sunne beames against the Moone, for their vehement & exceeding great brightnesse, should with a stroke rebound upon us: but seeing our sight is weake and feeble, what marvel is it, if it neither give such a stroke as might rebound, nor maintaine the continuuty thereof if it leaped backe againe, but is broken and faileth, as not having that abundance of light, whereby it should not be disgregate and dissipated, within those uneven and unnequall asperities? For it is not possible that the reflexion of our sight upon water, or other sorts of mirrours, whiles the same is yet strong, and able, as being neere unto the spring from whence it cometh, should not returne againe upon the eie. But from the Moone, suppose there may rebound some glimmering glances, certes they be all weake and obscure, failing in the very way, by reason of so long a distance. For otherwise arched and hollow mirrours send backe their reflected raies with more force, than they came, in such sort as many times they catch fire and doe burne: whereas the imbossed and couled mirrours made round and bearing out like a bowle, cast from them feeble and darke raies, because they beate them not backe on all sides. You see certainly when two rainebowes appear in the heaven, by reason that one cloud doth inviron and comprehend another, that the rainebow which compasseth the other without forth, yeeldeth dim colours, and not sufficiently distinct & expressed, because the outward cloud being farther remote from our sight, maketh not a strong and forcible reflexion. And what needs there any more to be said? considering that the very light of the Sunne returned and sent backe by the Moone leaeth all the heat: and of his brightnesse there cometh unto us with much adoe but a small remnant, and a portion very little and feeble. Is it possible then that our sight running the same race there should any percell or residue thereof reach from the Moone backe againe to the Sunne? For mine owne part, I thinke not. Consider also I beseech you (quoth I) even your owne selves, that if our eyesight were affected and disposed alike by the water and by the Moone, it could not otherwise be but that the Moone should represent unto us the images of the earth, of trees, of plants, of men, and of farres, as well as water doth; and all other kinds of mirrours. Now if there be no such reflexion of our eie sight frō the Moone, as to bring backe unto us those images, either for the feeblenesse of it, or the rugged inequality of her superficies, let us never require that it should leape backe as far as to the Sun. Thus have we reported as much as our memory would carrie away, whatsoever was there delivered: Now is it time to desire Sylla or rather to require & exact of him, to make his narration, for that admitted he was to here this discourse upon such a condition. And therefore if you thinke so good, let us give over walking, and sitting downe here upon these seates, make him a sedentarie audience. All the companie liked well of this motion. And when we had taken our places, Theon thus began, Certes I am desirous (quoth he) and none of you all more, to heare what shall be said: But before I would be very glad to understand somewhat of those who are said to dwell in the Moone, not whether there be any persons there inhabiting, but whether it be possible that any should inhabit there. For if this cannot be, then it were mere folly and beside all reason, to say, that the Moone is earth: otherwise it would be thought to have beene created in vaine and to

no end: as bearing no fruits, nor affording no habitation; no place for nativity; no food or nourishment for any men or women, in regard of which cause, and for which ends we continually hold, that this earth wherein we live, as Plato saith, was made and created, even to be our nourse and keeper, making the day and night distinct one from another. For you see and know, that of this matter, many things have beene said as well merily and by way of laughter, as seriously and in good earnest. For of those who inhabit the Moone, some are said to hang by the heads under it, as if they were so many Tantalus; others contrariwise, who dwell upon it, are tied fast, like a sort of Ixions, and turned about with such a violence, that they are in danger to be flung and shaken out. And verily the moveth not after one single motion, but three manner of waies: 10 whereupon the Poets call her other-while, reusim, or Trivis, performing her course together, according to length, bredth, and depth in the Zodiak. Of which motions, the first is called, A direct revolution; the second, An oblique winding or wheeling in and out; and the third, The Mathematicians call (I wote not how) An inequality: and yet they see, that she hath no motion at all even and uniforme, nor certaine in all her monthly circuits and reverfions. No marvel therefore, considering the impetuositie of these motions, if there fell a lion sometimes out oflier into Peloponnesus: nay rather we are to wonder, why we see not every day a thousand fells of men & women, yea, and as many beasts shaken out from thence, and flung downe headlong with their heeles upward. For it were a meere mockerie, to dispute and sit and upon their habitation there, if they neither can breed nor abide there. For considering that the Egyptians and 10 Troglodytes, over whose heads the Sunne standeth directly one moment only of the day in the time of the Solstices, and then presently retireth, hardly escape burning, by reason of the excessive heat of the circumstant aires; how possibly can the men in the Moone endure 12 Summers every yere, when the Sunne once a moneth is just in their Zenith, and seeth plumb over head, when she is at the full? As for winds, clouds, and raines, without which the plants of the earth can neither come up nor be preserved, it passeth all imagination, that there should be any there, the aire is so subtil, drie and hote; especially, seeing that even here beneath, the highest mountaines doe admit or feele the hard and bitter Winters from yere to yere, but the aire about them being pure and cleere, and without any agitation whatsoever, by reason of the subtiltie and lightnesse, avoideth all that thicknesse and concretion which is among us: unless 30 haply we will say, that like as Minerva instilled and dropped into Achilles mouth some Nectar and Ambrosia, when he received no other food; so the Moone, who both is called and is indeed Minerva, nourisheth men there, bringeth forth daily for them Ambrosia, according as olde Phereides was wont to say, that the very gods also were fedde and nourished. For as touching that Indian root, which (as Megasthenes saith) certaine people of India, who neither eat nor drinke, nor have so much as mouths, whereupon they be called Asiomis, do burne and smoke to smoke, with the odor and perfume whereof, they live; how can they come by any such there, considering the Moone is never watered nor refreshed with raine? When Theon had thus said: You have (quoth I) very properly and sweetly handled this point; you have (I say) by this merry conceited jest, laid smooth and even, those bent and knit browes, the austerity (I meane) of this whole discourse; which hath given us heart and encouraged us to make answer: for that, if we 40 faile and come short, we looke not for streight examination, nor fear any sharpe and grievous punishment. For to say a trueth, they who take most offence at these matters, rejecting and discrediting the same, are not so great adversaries unto those who are most perswaded thereof; but such as will not after a milde and gentle sort consider that which is possible and probable. First and foremost therefore, this I say, that, suppose there were no men at all inhabiting the Moone, it doth not necessarily follow therefore, that she was made for nothing and to no purpose: for we see that even this earth here is not thorowout inhabited, nor filled in all parts: nay, there is but a little portion thereof habitable, like unto certaine promontories or deny-lands arising out of the deepe sea, for to breed, ingender and bring forth plants & living creatures: for of the 50 rest, some part is desert, waste and barren, by reason of excessive colde and heat; but in trueth, the greatest portion lieth drowned under the great and maine sea. But you (for the great love that you beare to Aristarchus, whom you admire so much, and evermore have in your hands) give no care to Crates, notwithstanding that you reade these verses in Homer:

The ocean sea, from whence both men and gods were first bred, With surging waves the greatest part of earth doth overspread.

Ggggg

And

And yet God forbid, that these parts should be said for to have beene made for nought: for the sea doth expire and breath forth certaine mild vapours: and the most gentle and pleasant winds which arise and blow in the greatest heat of Summer, come from frozen regions and not inhabited for extreme colde, which the snow melting and thawing by little and little do send from them and scatter over all our countreys. And the earth (as Plato saith) ariseth out of the sea in the mids, as a guardiansse and workmistrisse of night and day. What should hinder then, but that the Moone also may well be without living creatures in it, and yet give reflexions unto the light diffused and spread about her; yea, and yeeld a receit or receptacle of the stars raies which have their confluence, meeting and temperature in her, whereby the concocteth the evaporations ascending from the earth, and withall, abareth the over-ardent and fierie heat of the Sunne. Over & besides, attributing as we do very much to the ancient opinion & voice which we have received from our forefathers, we will be bold to say, that she hath bene reputed Diana, as a virgin, barren and fruitlesse, but otherwise salutary, helpfull and profitable to the world. And of all this that hath bene said (my friend Theon) there is nothing that doth proove and shew directly, this habitation of men in the Moone to be impossible: for her turning about being so milde, so kinde and calme, polisheth the aire neere unto it, it distribureth and spreadeth the same all about in so good disposition, that there is none occasion given to feare, that those who live in it should fall downe or slide out of her, unlesse she also come downe withall. As for that manifold variety of her motions, it proceedeth not from any inequality, error or confusion, but the Astrologers demonstratively shew thereby an order and course most admirable, contriving it so, that she should be fast within certaine circles that turne and winde about other circles, some devising that she herselfe stirreth not, others supposing that the mooveth alwaies equally, smoothly and in conforme celerity: for these are the ascensions of divers circles, the circumerensions and turnings about, the habitudes in references one to another, yea, and respective to us, which make most elegantly those orderly elevations and depressions in altitude, which appeare in her motion, yea, and her digressions in latitude, all jointly with that ordinary and direct revolution of hers in longitude. As touching that exceeding heat and continuall inflammation of the Sunne, you will cease (I am sure) to be afraid thereof, in case, first and formost, you will lay to those eleven hote and scalding conjunctions as it were in exchange, as many oppositions when she is at the full; and then oppose unto those excessive and enormous extremities which holde not long, the continuall change and mutation, which reduceth them into a proper and peculiar temperature, taking from them that which is excessive and overmuch in both: for it seemeth very probable, that the time betwene is a season resembling the Springtide. Moreover, the Sun sendeth his beames into us thorow a grosse and troubled aire, casting his heat nourished and fed by evaporations: whereas the aire there, about the Moone, being subtil & transparent, doth disgregate and disperse the said beames, as having no nouriture to mainteine them, nor body to settle upon.

To come now unto trees, woods and fruits; here indeed with us, they be the raines that nourish them: but in other high countreys with you, namely, about Thebes and Siene, it is not the water from heaven, but out of the earth, that feedeth them: for the earth being soaked therewith, and besides refreshed with coole winds and comfortable dewes, would be loth to compare infertilitie with the best watered ground in the world, such is the goodnesse, vertue and temperature of the soile. And verily the trees of the same kinde with us, if they have beene well Wintered, that is to say, if they have endured a sharpe and long Winter, bring forth plenty of good fruit; but in Libys and with you in Aegypt, they are soone hurt and offended with colde, and it they feare exceedingly. And whereas the provinces of Gedrosia and Trogloditis, lying hard upon the ocean sea, be very barren by reason of their drouth, and are altogether without trees: yet within the sea adjoining thereto, and which beareth upon the continent, there grow trees of a wonderfull bignesse, yea & there be that put forth fresh and Greene at the very bottom of the sea: whereof some they call Olive trees, others, Lawrels, and some againe Sis haire. As for those plants which be called Anacamperotes, after they be plucked forth of the ground where they grow, and so hanged up, they doe not onely live as long as a man would have them, but (that which more is) budde and put forth greene leaves. Moreover, of those plants which are set or sowne, some, as namely, Centaury, if they be planted or sowed in a rich or fat soile, and the same well drenched and watered, doe degenerate and grow out of their naturall quality, yea, and leese all their vertue, for that they love to grow drie, and in their proper nature and soile agreeable thereto, they thrive passing well. Others cannot so much as away with any dewes, dewes, as the most part of the Arabian plants; for wet them once, they milke, fade and die. What marvel then if there grow within the Moone, rootes, seeds, plants, and trees, that have no need either of shewers, or of winter winde and weather, but are appropriate naturally to a subtile and dry aire, such as the summer season doeth afford? And why may it not stand with good reason, that the Moone herselfe sends certaine warme windes, and that by her shaking and agitation, as she still mooveth, there should breath forth a sweet and comfortable aire, fine dewes, and gentle moistures, spread and dispersed all about, sufficient to mainteine the plants fresh and Greene: considering withall, that the of her owne temperature is not ardent, nor exceeding drie, but rather soft and moist, and engendering all humiditie? For these cometh not from her unto us, any one effect or accident of ficcidity, but of moisture and of a feminine & soft constitution, many; to wit, the growing and thriving of plants, the putrefaction of flesh killed, the turning of wines to be soure, flat, and dead, the frumelle and tendernes of wood, and the easie deliverance of women in childbirth. But I feare me, that I should moove and provoke Pharmaces againe, who all this while sitteth still and saith nought, if I alledge the ebbing and flowing, or the inundations of the great Ocean, as they themselves say, the firties, streights, and armes of the sea, which swell and rise by the Moone, naturally given to encrease moisture and breed humours: and therefore I will direct my words toward you rather, friend Theon, for you lay unto us, in expounding these verses of the Poet Aleman,

What things on earth the dew, as nowise doth feed:

Which Jupiter and Moone betwixt them breed.

that in this place he calleth the aire Jupiter, and saith, that being moistened by the Moone, he is converted into dew: for the Moone my good friend, seemeth in nature to be quite contrary unto the sunne, not onely in this, that whatsoever he doeth thicken, drie, and harden, she is wont to resolve, moisten, and mollifie, but that which more is, to humect and refrigerate the heat that cometh from him, when the same lighteth upon her, or is mingled with her. Therefore as well they who suppose the Moone to be a fire and ardent body, doe erre, as those who would have the creatures there inhabiting, to have all things necessarie for their generation, food and maintenance, like unto them that live here; never considering the great difference and inequality which is in nature, wherein there be found greater and more varieties and diversities of living creatures, one with another, than with other things: neither would there be men in the world without mouthes, and whose lippes are grown up together, and who were nourished also with smels onely, in case men could not live without solide and substantiall food. But that power of Nature which Ammonius himselfe hath shewed us, and which Hesiodus under covert words hath given us to understand by these verses,

In Mallows and in Asphodels,

which grow on every ground,

What use and profit manifold,

for man there may be found.

Epimenides hath made plaine and evident indeed and effect, teaching us that nature susteineth and preserveth a living creature with very small food and maintenance: for so it may have but as much as an olive, it needs no more nourishment, but may live therewith, and doe full well. Now it is very like & probable, that those who dwell within the Moone, if any els, be light, active and nimble of body, and easie to be nourished with any thing whatsoever: also that the Moone (as well as the Sunne, who is a living creature, standing much upon fire, and by many degrees greater than the earth) is nourished and maintained as they say, by the humours which are upon the earth, like as all other stars, which are in number infinite. So light and slender they imagine those living creatures to be that are above, and so soone contented and satisfied with small necessities. But we neither see this, nor yet consider that a divers region, nature and temperature is meet and agreeable unto them: much like, as if when we could not our selves come nere unto the sea, nor touch and taste it, but have seene it only a farr off, & heard that the water in it is bitter, brackish, salt, and not potable, one should come and tell us, that it nourisheth a mightie number of great creatures, of all sorts & formes, living in the bottom thereof, and that it is full of huge and monstrous beasts, which make use of the water, as we doe of aire; hee would be thought to tell us tales and monstrous fables: even so it seemeth that we stand affected and disposed in these matters of the Moone, not believing that there be any men inhabiting within it. But I am verily perswaded, that they may much more marvel, seeing the earth heere

a farre off, as the dregges, sediment, and grounds as it were of the whole world, appearing unto them through moist cloudes, and foggie mists, a small thing God wot, and the same with-out light, bafe, object, and unmooveable: how the same should breed, nourish, maintaine, and keepe living creatures which have motion, breathing, and vitall heat: and in case they had ever heard these verses out of Homer, as touching certaine habitations,

*Ugly and foule, most hideous to be seene:
Whereof the gods themselves right fearefull beene.*

Alfo:

*Under the earth beneath, and hell unscene,
As farre as heavens from earth removed beene.*

they would thinke verily and say, that they had bene spoken of this earth heere: and that darke hell and Tartarus were heere situate, and farre remote: as also that the Moone onely was the earth, as being equally distant from heaven above and hell beneath. Now before I had well made an end of my speech, Sylla taking the words out of my mouth: Stay a while (quoth he) ô Lamprias, your speech; and hold off with your boat, as they say, for feare you runne an end with your tale upon the ground ere you be aware, and mar all the plaie, which for this present hath another scene and disposition; and I my selfe am the actour: but before I proceed farther, I will bring forth mine author unto you, if there be nothing to impeach me; who beginneth in this manner with a verse of Homer:

*Farre from the maine, within the Ocean sea,
There lies an Island hight Ogygiae,* distant from great Britaine or England Westward, five daies sailing: And other three isles there be, of like distance one from the another, and from the said island, bearing north-west, whereas the sun setteth in Summer: in one of which the barbarous people of the countrey do fable and feine that Saturne was detained and kept prisoner by Jupiter. Now for the keeping as well of it, as of those other isles, and the whole sea adjacent, which was called Saturns sea, the gyant Ogygia, or Briareus was placed: as also that the maine and firme land, wherewith the great sea is bordered round about, is remooved from the othes isles not so farre, but from Ogygia five hundred stadia or there about: unto which men use to row in galleis, for that sea is very ebbe and low, hardly to be passed by great vessels, by reason of the huge quantitie of mudde brought thither by a number of rivers, which running out of the maine continent, discharge themselves into it, raising mightie shelves and barres, whereby the sea is choked up as it were with earth, and hardly navigable: which gave occasion of that old opinion which went thereof, that it should be frozen and stand all over with an ice. Well, the coasts along the firme land, which lie upon this sea, are inhabited by Greeks, all about a mightie bay or gulfe thereof, no lesse spacious than the huge lake Maotis, the mouth or entrance whereof lieth directly opposite unto that of the Caspian sea: These people are reputed and named to be the inhabitants of the continent or firme land, accounting and calling all us Ilanders, as dwelling in a land environed round about, and washed with the sea. They suppose also, that they in old time who accompanied Hercules, and being left by him, abode there, and intermingled afterwards with the people and nations of Saturne, caused to revive againe the Greeke nation there, well nere extinguished, which being subdued and brought under the language, lawes, maners, and fashions of the Barbarians, flourished againe by these means, was well peopled, and recovered their ancient puissance and greatnesse. And heereupon it is, that the chiefe and principall honour, they doe unto Hercules, but in a second place, to Saturne. Now when the starre of Saturne, which we call Phanon, & there by his saying, Nyctimus is entred into the signe Taurus, (& that it doth once in the space of 30. yeeres) they having long before prepared all necessaries for a solemne sacrifice, & a long voiage or navigation, send forth those upon whom the lot falleth, to row in that huge sea, and to live a long time in a strange country. Now when they be imbarcked & entred once in to the wide and open sea, they take their adventure and fortune, as it falleth out. Such as have passed the dangers of the sea & arived in safetie, land first in those Ilands lying opposite against them, being inhabited by Greeke nations, where they see the Sunne to be hidden from them not one full houre in thirtie daies (and that is all their night) whereof the darkenesse is but small, as having a twilight in the west where the Sunne went downe, much like the dawning of the day. Having heere made their abode for ninety daies, during which space they were highly honored and found great entertainment, as being reputed holy men and so termed, conducted they are with with the mindes and transported over into the Island of Saturne: which is inhabited by no others but themselves and such as had bene sent thither before time in this manner. For albeit lawfull it is for them, after they have done service unto Saturne the time of thirty yeeres, to faile home againe into their owne country; yet for the most part they chuse to remaine there still in peace and rest, than to returne soone, for that they be already inured and accustomed to the place: others because without any labor and trouble of theirs, they have plentie of all things, as well for their sacrifices, as for the ordinary maintenance of such, as continually are given to their books and to the study of Philosophy. For surely by their lying, the nature of the Island and the mildenesse of the aire is woonderfull. And whereas some of them were willing to depart from thence, they have bene staied and empeached by a divine power, which hath appeared unto them as unto their friends and familiars, not onely in dreames and by way of outward signes, but visibly also unto many of them, by the meanes of familiar spirits and angels, deviling and talking with them. For they say that Saturne himselfe is personally there, within the deepe cave of a great hollow rocke shining and glittering like pure gold, where he lieth asleepe, for that Jupiter had deviled for him sleepe, in stead of other chaines and bonds, to keepe him fast for stirring. But there be certaine birds haunting the top of the said rocke, which flie downe from thence and carry unto him the divine food Ambrosia. As for the whole Island, it is by report replenished with a most fragrant and odoriferous perfume, which out of that cave, as from a lively fontaine doth breath forth continually. And the said demons or angels doe attend and wait upon Saturne, such I meane as were his courtiers and minions, at what time as he raigned as soveraigne over gods and men; who having the skill of prophetic and divination, doe of themselves foretell many future things: howbeit of the greatest matters and of most importance, they make report and relation after they have bene downe below with Saturne, as his dreames revealed unto them. For whatsoever Jupiter thinketh and deviseth of before, Saturne dreameth: As for his sodaine wakenings, they be Titanicall passions and perturbations of the spirit in him. But his sleepe is milde and sweet, wherein hee the weath his divine and roiall nature of it selfe pure and incurrutable. And thither (quoth he) this stranger and friend of mine being brought, where he served god Saturne at his ease & repose, attained unto the skill of Astrologie, so far forth as it is possible for one that had the exact knowledge of Geometry. And among other parts of Philosophy he gave himselfe unto that which is called naturall. But having a longing desire to visite and see the great Island (for so they call the firme land wherein we are) after the thirtie yeares were past, and his successors thither arrived, taking his leave of his kinsfolke and friends whom he had farewell, he tooke sea in other respects lightly and nimble appointed, but good store he carried with him of voiage provision within pots and cups of gold. But to recount unto you in particular what adventures to him befell, how many nations he visited, through what countries he travelled, how he searched into holy writings, and was professed in all religious orders and holy confraternities, one whole day would not be sufficient (I say) to rehearse, as he himselfe delivered the same unto us, particularising very wel of every thing: but as much as concerneth this present discourse, listen and I will relate unto you. For he continued a long time at Carthage, where he was greatly honored and respected, as also among us, for that he found sacred skinnies of parchment, which at the overthrow and sackage of the former city called Great Carthage had bene secretly conveyed thither and lien hidden a long time under the ground. So he said that of those gods which appeare unto us in heaven, we ought (and so he advised me also) to adore and worship especially the Moone, as the principall guide and maiestie of our life. Whereat when I marvelled and besought him to expound and declare the same more plainly: The Greeks (quoth he) ô Sylla, talke very much of the gods; but in all things they say not well. As for example, first and foremost, in naming Ceres and Persephone they doe well and right: but to put them both together, and to thinke that they are both in one and the same place, they doe amisse: For the one, to wit, Ceres, is upon the earth, the very dame and mistresse of all those things that be above the ground; but the other is in the Moone, and called she is by them that inhabite the moone, Core and Persephone that is to say, Proserpina, Persephone as one would say goddess, for that she bringeth light and brightnesse: but Core, because the sight or apple of the eie, in which is seene the image of him who looketh into it, like as the brightnesse of the Sunne appeareth in the Moone, we call Core. Now whereas it is said that they goe up and downe wandering and seeking one the other, the same carieth some truth with it: for they desire and long after one another when they be parted and asunder, and they embrace embrace one the other in the darke many times. Moreover, that this Core or Proserpina is one while above in heaven and in the light, another while in darkenesse and the night, is not untrue; onely there is some error in reckoning and numbering the time. For we see her not fix moneths, but every sixth moneth, or from fix moneths to fix moneths, under the earth, as under her mother, caught with the shadow: and seldome is it found that this should happen within five moneths: for that it is impossible that she should abandon and leave Pluto, being his wife: according as Homer, hath signified although under darke and covert wordes, not untrue, saying,

But to the farthest borders of the earth and utmost end, Even to the faire Elysian fields the gods then shall thee find.

For looke where the shadow endeth and goeth no farther, that is called the limit and end of the earth: and thither no wicked and impure person shall ever be able to come. But good folke after their death in the world being thither carried, lead there another easie life in peace and repose; howbeit, not altogether a blessed, happie and divine life, untill they die a second death: but what death this is, aske me not, my Sylla, for I purpose of my selfe to declare & shew it unto you hereafter. The vulgar sort be of opinion that man is a subject compounded: and good reason they have so to thinke: but in beleeving that he consisteth of two parts onely, they are deceived: for they imagine that the understanding is in some sort a part of the soule: but the understanding is better than the soule, by how much the soule is better and more divine than the bodie. Now the conjunction or composition of the soule with understanding, maketh reason: but with the bodie, passion: whereof this is the beginning and principle of pleasure and paine, the other of vertue and vice. Of these three conjoined and compact in one, the earth yeeldeth for her part the body; the Moone, the soule; and the Sunne, understanding to the generation or creation of man; and understanding giveth reason unto the soule; * * * * even as the Sunne light and brightnesse to the Moone. As touching the deaths which we die, the one maketh man of 3. two, and the other of 2. one. And the former verily is in the region and jurisdiction of Ceres, which is the cause that we sacrifice unto her. Thus it cometh to passe that the Athenians called in olde time those that were departed, Demogorgones, that is to say, Cereles. As for the other death it is in the Moone or region of Proserpina. And as with the one terrestriall Mercury, so with the other, celestially Mercurie doth inhabit. And verily Ceres dissolveth and separeteth the soule from the bodie sodainly and forcibly with violence: but Proserpina parteth the understanding from the soule, gently, and in long time. And hereupon it is, that she is called, Mercurialis, as one would say, begetting one: for that the better part in a man becometh one and alone, when by her it is separated: and both the one and the other hapneth according to nature. Every soule without understanding, as also endued with understanding, when it is departed out of the body, is ordeined by fatall destiny to wander for a time, but not both alike, in a middle region betweene the earth and the Moone. For such soules as have bene unjust, wicked, and dissolute, suffer due punishment and paines for their sinfull deserts: whereas the good and honest, untill such time as they have purified, and by expiration purged forth of them, all those infections which might be contracted by the contagion of the body, as the cause of all evil, must remaine for a certaine settime, in the mildest region of the aire, which they call the meadowes of Pluto. Afterwards, as if they were returned from some long pilgrimage or wandring exile into their owne country, they have a taste of joy, such as they feele especially, who are professed in holy mysteries, mixed with trouble and admiration, and ech one with their proper and peculiar hope: for it driveth and chafeth forth many soules, which longed already after the Moone. Some take pleasure to be still beneath, and even yet looke downward, as it were to the bottome: but such as be mounted aloft, and are there most surely bestowed, first as victorious, stand round about adorned with garlands, and those made of the wings of Euthymia, that is to saie, Constancie: because in their life time here upon earth, they had bridled and restrained the unreasonable and passible part of the soule, and made it subject and obedient to the bridle of reason. Secondly, they resemble in sight, the raies of the Sunne. Thirdly, the soule thus ascended on high, is there confirmed and fortified by the pure aire about the Moone, where it doth gather strength and solidity, like as iron and Steele by their tincture become hard. For that which hitherto was loose, rare and spongy, groweth groweth close, compact and firme, yea, and becometh shining and transparent, in such sort, as nourished it is with the least exhalation in the world. This is that Heraclitus meant, when he said, that the soules in Plutoes region have a quicke sent or smelling. And first they behold there the greatnesse of the Moone, her beauty and nature, which is not simple nor void of mixture, but as it were a composition of a starre and of earth. And as earth mingled with a spirittuall aire and moisture, becometh soft, and the blood tempered with flesh, giveth it sense; even so, say they, the Moone mingled with a celestially quintessence even to the very bottome of it, is made animate, fruitfull, and generative, and withall, equally counterpeised, with ponderosity and lightnesse. For the whole world it selfe, being thus composed of things which naturally move downward and upward, is altogether void of motion locally, from place to place; which it seemeth that Xenocrates himselfe by a divine discourse of reason understood, taking the first light thereof from Plato. For Plato was he who first affirmed, that every starre was compounded of fire and earth, by the meanes of middle natures given in certaine proportion; in as much as there is nothing object to the sense of man, which hath not in some proportion a mixture of earth and light. And Xenocrates said, that the Sunne is compounded of fire and the first or primitive solid: the Moone of a second solid, and her proper aire: in summe, throughout, neither solid alone by it selfe, nor the rare apart, is capable and susceptible of a soule. Thus much as touching the substance of the Moone. As for the grandence & biggnesse thereof, it is not such as the Geometricians set downe, but farre greater by many degrees. And seldome doth it measure the shadow of the earth by her greatnesse; nor for that the same is small, but for that it bringeth a most fervent and swift motion, to the end, that quickly and with speed he might passe the darke place, and bring away with her the soules of the blessed which make haste and crie: because all the while they are within the shade, they can not heare any more the harmonie of celestially bodies: and withall, underneath, the soules of the damned which are punished, lamenting, wailing, and howling in this shadow, are presented unto them. And this is the reason, that in the eclipses of the Moone, many were wont to ring bassons and pannes of brasle, and to make a great noise and clattering about these soules. And affrighted they are to beholde that which they call the face of the Moone, when they approach neere unto it, seeming to be a terrible and fearefull sight, whereas it is no such matter. But like as the earth with us hath many deepe and wide gulfses, as namely, one here, to wit, the Mediterranean sea, lying betweene Heraclius pillars, and so running into the land hither to us: and another without, that is to say, the Caspian sea, and that also of the red sea. So there be these deepe concavities and vallies of the Moone, and those in number three; whereof the greatest they call The hole or gulf of Heate, wherein the soules do punish and are punished, according as they either did or suffered hurt whiles they were here: the other two * be small, to wit, the very passages whereby the soules must go, one while to the tract of the Moone lying toward heaven, and another while to that which regardeth the earth. And verily, that which looketh to heaven, they call the Elysian field, whereas the other earthward to us, the field of Proserpina, nother, I meane, who is under the ground just against us. Howbeit, the Dæmons do not converse alwaies in the Moone, but descend other whiles hither below, for the charge and superintendence of oracles: there be assistant likewise to the highest mysteries and ceremonies, and those they do celebrate, having an observant eie to wicked deeds which they punish; and withall, ready they are to preserve the good in perils aw. If of warre as the sea: In which charge and function, if they themselves commit any fault, and hereupon earth do ought either by unjust favour or envie, they feele the smart thereof according to their merits: for thrust downe they are againe to the earth, and sent with a witness into mens bodies. But of the number of the better sort, are they who served and accompanied Saturne, as they themselves report; such as in times past also were the Idai Daityli in Crete, the Corybants in Phrygia, & those of Bœotia in the city of Lebadia, named Trophoniades besides, an infinit number of others in sundry parts of the earth habitable; whose names, temples and honors remaine to this day, but the powers & puissances of some do faile and are quite gone, as being translated into another place, & making a most happy change: which translation cometh sooner, other later, alter that the understanding is separate from the soule: and separated obtaine sooner, other later, alter that the love and desire to enjoy the image of the Sunne, by which that divine, blessed and desirable beautie which every nature after divers sorts seeketh after, shineth. For even the vertie Moone turneth about continually for the love of the Sunne, as longing to companie and converse with him, as the very fountaine of all fertilitye. Thus the nature of the soule is spent in the Moone, Moone, retaining onely certaine prints, marks and dreames, as it were, of her life: and heretof, thinke it was well and truly said,

*The soule made haste, as one would say,
Like to a dreame, and flew away.*

which it doth not immediatly upon her separation from the bodie, but afterwards, when she is alone by herselfe and severed from the understanding. And in truth, of all that ever Homer wrote, most divinely he seemeth to have written of those who are departed this life, & be among the spirits beneath, these verses:

Next him, I knew of Hercules the strength and image plaine, Or semblance: for himselfe with gods immortall did remaine.

For like as every one of us is not ire and courage, nor feare nor yet lust, no more than flesh or humours, but that indeed whereby we discourse and understand, even so, the soule it selfe being cast into a forme by the understanding, and giving a forme unto the bodie, and embracing it on every side, expresseth and receiveth a certaine impression and figure, so as albeit she is distinctly separate both from understanding and also from the bodie, she retaineth still the forme and semblance a long time, inasmuch as well she may be called an image. And of these soules, as I have already said, the Moone is the element, because soules doe resolve into her, like as the bodies of the dead into the earth. As for such as have bene vertuous and honest, and which loved to a studious and quiet life, imploied in philosophie, without meddling in troublesome affaires, soone are resolved, for that being left and rid of understanding, and using no more corporall passions, they vanish away incontinently; but the soules of ambitious persons, and such as are busied in negotiations, of ambitious folke also given to the love of beautifull bodies, and likewise of wrathfull people, calling still to remembrance those things which they did in their life, even as dreames in their sleepe, walke wandring to and fro, like to that ghost of Endymion: for considering their inconstancie and aptnesse to be over subject unto passions, the same transporteth and plucketh them from the Moone unto another generation, not suffering them quietly there to passe and vanish away, but still allureth and calleth them away: for now is there nothing small, staied, quiet, constant and accordant, after that being once abandoned of the understanding, so they come to be seized with the passions of the body: so that of such soules void of reason, came and were bred afterwards the Tityi and Typhons, and namely, that Typhon who in times past by force and violence seized the city Delfos, and overturned up-side-downe the sanctuarie of the oracle there; most ungracious imps destitute of all reason and understanding, and abandoned to all passions upon a proud spirit and violence, wherewith they were puffed up. Howbeit, at length, after long time, the Moone receiveth the soules, and composeth them: the Sunne also inspiring into them againe, and sowing in their vitall facultie, understanding, maketh them new soules: yea, and the earth in the third place, giveth them a new bodie: for nothing doth she give after death, of all that which she taketh to generation. And the sunne receiveth nothing of others, but taketh againe that understanding which he gave. But the Moone giveth and receiveth, joyneth and disjoyneth, uniteth and separateth, according to her divers faculties and powers: of which, the one is named Ilithia, to wit, that which joyneth: another, Atymius or Diana, which parteth and divideth. Of the three fatall fitters or destinies, she whom they name Atrapos, is placed within the Sunne, and giveth the beginning of generation. Cloto being lodged in the Moone, is she that joyneth, minglenth and uniteth. The third and last, called Lachesis, is in the earth, who also lendeth her helping hand, and doth participate much with Fortune. For that which is without soule, is weake in it selfe, and naturally exposed to all injuries and to suffer hurt: but the understanding is soveraigne over all the rest, and nothing is able to do it injurie.

Now the soule is of a middle nature and mixt of them both, like as the Moone was made and created by God, as a composition and mixture of things above and things beneath; keeping the same proportion to the Sun, as the earth doth to her. And thus you have heard (quoth Syllis) what I learned of this stranger or traveller; which (as he said himselfe) he understood by those Dæmons, who were chamberlaines and favourites to Saturne.

As for you, O Lamprias and the rest, you may take my relation in good or ill part, as you please.

WHY THE PROPHE- TESSE PYTHIA GIVETH NO

ANSWERS NOW FROM THE ORACLE, IN VERSE OR MEETRE.

The Summarie.

THEY who have so highly praised the excellency of man, extolling the vigor of humane wit and understanding; whatsoever they doe alledge to that purpose, have ordinarily forgot the principall, which is to shew that all the sufficiency of his intelligence is a furious guide; his will, a bottomlesse gulf and pit of confusion; the light of his reason, a deepe darke night; his lusts and desires, so many enraged beasts to rent and tear him in peeces, if God by some speciall and singular grace doe not illumine, regenerate and conduct him. Among a million of testimonies for the prooffe and confirmation hereof, that which presenteth it selfe unto us in this dialogue is most sufficient: for is not this wonderfull, and a certaine signe of a marvellous blindness of mans wisdom, to see those who all their life time doe nothing els but seeke after the soveraigne good, maintaine vertue, detest vices, condemne Athists, Epicureans, and Libertines, yet to dread, feare, yea and adore the sworn enemy of their salvation and true life, to wit, Satan the devill? Truly, and that which now we reade, agreeable to certaine discourses heereafter following, and namely, wherein a disputation is held, wherefore the oracles now doe cease? as also what this word E.I. signifieth, sheweth not onely the opinion of Plutarch and some other Philosophers as touching these matters: but also the miserable state of all those who are abandoned to their owne sense, and void of the knowledge of the true God. And this ought to be remembered a second time, for scarce lest in reading these discourses so eloquently penned, we be turned out of the right way: but rather contrariwise that we may perceive so much the better how vaine and detestable all the habit of man is, if it have for the ground and foundation, nothing but the conceits of his corrupt spirit. So then in this dialogue, we may behold the wisdom of the Greeks, running after Satan: and taking great paines for to stur and set on foot one matter, which we ought to abhorre and bury in perpetual oblivion: or to touch with their might and maine beside, that which the wisdom of the flesh cannot compass. There be here divers personages who revive and set a worke the oracles of that priestesse or prophesse at Delfos, where was the renowned temple of Apollo, the very cave and den of Satan, and wherem he exercised his trade and skill, with impostures and illusions incredible, during the space of many yeares. But to make this disposition of more force and validity, Plutarch after his accustomed fashion of broching and introducing his owne opinion by a third, following the stile and manner of the Academicks writing, bringeth to Delfos a stranger, who being together with Basilocles, Philinus, & other amused and occupied in beholding the statues which were there in great number, there began a discourse by way of disputation touching brasie and the properties thereof. Which when it was well discussed and debated, Diogenianus demanded, why the ancient oracles were delivered in homely verse & those in evil fashion? whereto there were made divers answers sending to this point, to make us beleefe, that wheresoever the words be most rusty, and worst conched, there we are to observe so much the more the excellency of the author. And this confirmeth fully, that which we have already spoken as touching the illusions of the devill, who is not content thus to abuse and deceive his slaves, but in this place hath to deale with a ridiculous & most apparent audaciousnesse: if the eyes of those whom he thus abuse, had never so little means to see the thousand part of his deceitfull guiles, as grosse and thicke as mountains. Continuing this discourse, they handle afterwards the prefaces of these statues, and of others reared in divers places for the better authorising of the oracles; which when Boethus the Epicurean mocked,

Plutarch

Plutarch replieth and reemeth into a common place, concerning the gravitie of the rude and ill fashioned oracles, conferring them with those of Sibylla, and maintaining the authoritie of them with his companions, through all the reasons they could devise. These be in summe, the contents of this Dialogue, which comprehendeth divers matters dependant thereof, and those noted in their order: the conclusion whereof is this, That as reprovable they be, who tax the simplicity and rudenesse of such oracles, as those, who otherwise controll them for their ambiguity, obliquity and obscurity.

WHY THE PROPHETESSE

Pythia giveth no answers now from the Oracle in verse or meeter.

BASILOCLES.

Ou have led this stranger, Philius, such a walke in shewing him the statues and publike works, that you have made it very late in the evening, and I my selfe am weary in staying for you, and expecting when you will make an end.

PHILINUS.

No marvell, we goe so softly, and keepe so slow a pace, o Basilocles, sowing and mowing (as they say) presently with all our speeches after fight and combat, which sprout forth and yeeld unto us by the way as we go, enemies lying as it were in ambush, much like unto those men which in old time came up of teeth sown by Cadmus.

BASILOCLES.

How then? shall we fend for and intreat some one of those who were present there, or will you your selfe gratify us so much, as to take the paines for to deliver unto us, what speeches those were, and who were the speakers?

PHILINUS.

I must be the man, I perceive Basilocles, to doe this for your sake; for hardly shall you meet with any other els throughout the whole citie: for I saw the most part of them going up againe together, with that stranger to Corycium and Lycuria.

BASILOCLES.

What? is this stranger so curious and desirous to see things, and is he withall friendly and wonderfull sociable?

PHILINUS.

Yes that he is; but more studious is he, and desirous to learne: neither is this most worthy of admiration in him; for he hath a kinde of mildnesse, accompanied with a singular good grace: his pregnant wit and quicke conceit ministreth unto him matter to contradict, and to propose doubts: howbeit the same is not bitter and odious in his propositions, nor leavened with any overthwart frowardnesse and perverse stubbornnesse in his answers; in such sort as a man having bene but a little acquainted with him, would soone say of him:

*Certes a lewd man and a bad,
He never for his father had.*

For you know well I suppose Diogenianus, the best man one of them in the world?

BASILOCLES.

I know him not my selfe, Philius: howbeit, many there be who report as much of this yong man. But upon what occasion or cause began your discourse and disputation?

PHILINUS.

Those who were our guides, conversant and exercised in the reading of histories, rehearsed and read from one end to the other, all those compositions which they had written, without any regard of that which we requested them, namely, to epitomize and abridge those narrations, and most part of the Epigrams. As for the stranger, he tooke much pleasure to see and view those faire statues, so many in number, and so artificially wrought: But he admired most of all, the fresh brightnesse of the brasse, being such as shewed no filth nor rust that it had gathered, but carried the glosse and resplendent hew of azur: so as he seemed to be ravished and astonied when he beheld the statues of the admirals and captaines at sea (for at them he began) as representing naturally in their tincture and colour as they stood, sea men and failers in the very maine & deepe sea. Whereupon: Had the ancient workmen (quoth he) a certaine mixture by themselves, and a temper of their brasse, that might give such a tincture to their works? for as touching the Corinthian brasse, which is so much renowned, it is thought generally, and so given out, that it was by meere adventure and chauce, that it tooke this goodly colour, and not by any art: by occasion that the fire caught an house, wherein there was laid up some little gold and silver, but a great quantitie of brasse, which mettals being melted together & so confused one with another, the whole masse thereof was stil called brasse because there was more thereof in it, than of the other mettals. Then Theon: We have heard (quoth he) another reason, more subtile than this, namely, that when a certeine brasse founder or copper smith in Corinth, had met with a casket or coffer, wherein was good store of golde, fearing lest hee should be discovered, and this treasure found in his hands, he clipped it by little and little, melted and mixed it gently with his brasse, which tooke thereupon such an excellent and wonderfull temperature, that he solde the pieces of worke, thereof made, passing deere, in regard of their dainty colour, and lovely beauty, which every man fer much by, and esteemed. But both this and the other is but a lying tale: for by all likelihood this Corinthian brasse was a certeine mixture and temperature of mettals, so prepared by art; like as at this day, artisans by tempering gold and silver together, make thereof a certeine singular and exquisite pale yellow by it selfe, howbeit, in mine eie, the same is but a wanne and sickly colour, and a corrupt hue, without any beautie in the world. What other cause then might there be (quoth Diogenianus) as you thinke, that this brasse heere hath such a tincture? To whom Theon made this answer: Considering (quoth he) that of these primitive elements and most naturall bodies that are, and ever shall be, to wit, fire, aire, water and earth, there is not one which approacheth or toucheth these brasse works, but aire onely, it must of necessitie be, that it is the aire which doeth the deed, and by reason of this aire lying alwaies close upon them, and never parting thereto, commeth this difference that they have from all others. Or rather this is a thing notoriously knowne of old, even before Theognis was borne, as said the comick Poet.

But would you know by what speciall propertie and vertue the aire should by touching, set such a colour upon brasse? Yes, very faire answered Diogenianus. Certes, so would I to my sonne (quoth Theon) let us therefore search into the thing both together in common: and first of all, if you please, what is the cause that oile filleth it full of rust, more than all other liquor whatsoever? for surely it cannot be truly said, that oile of it selfe setteth the said rust upon it, considering it is pure and neat, not polluted with any filth when it commeth to it. No verily (quoth the yong man) and there seemeth to be some other cause else, beside the oile; for the rust meeting with oile, which is subtile, pure, and transparent, appeareth most evidently; whereas in all other liquors, it maketh no shew, nor is seene at all. Well said my sonne (quoth Theon) and like a Philosopher: but consider, if you thinke so good, of that reason which Aristotle alledgeth. Marry that I will (quoth he againe.) Why then I will tell it you (quoth Theon.) Aristotle saith, that the rust of brasse lighting upon other liquors, pierceth insensibly, and is dispersed through them, being of a rare substance, and unequal parts, not abiding close together; but by reason of the compact and fast soliditie of oile, the said rust is kept in, and abideth thrust and united together. Now then, if we also of our selves were able to presuppose such a thing, we should not altogether want some meanes to charme as it were and allay somewhat this doubt of ours. And when we had allowed very well of his speech, and requested him to say on and prosecute the same: he said; That the aire in the citie of Delphos was thicke, fast, strong and vehement withall, by reason of the reflexion and repercussion of the mountaines round about it, and besides, mordicative, as witnesseth the speedie concoction of meat thar it causeth. Now this aire by reason of the subtility and incisive qualitie thereof, piercing into the brasse, and cutting it, forceth out of it a deale of rust, and skaleth as it were much terrestial substance from it: the which it restraineth afterwards and keepeth in, for that the densitie and thicknesse of the aire giveth it no issue: thus this rust being staid & remaining still, gathering also a substance by occasion of the quantity thereof, putteth forth this floure as it were of colour, and there within the superficies contracteth a resplendent and shining hew. This reason of his, we approved very well; but the stranger said, that one of those suppositions alone was sufficient to make good the reason: For that subtility (quoth he) seemeth to be somewhat contrary unto the pissitude and and thicknesse, supposd in the aire: and therefore it is not necessarie to make any supposal thereof; for brasse of it selfe as it waxeth old, in tract of time exaleth and putteth forth this rust, which the thicknesse of the aire coming upon, keepeth in and doeth so incrassate, as that through the quantitie thereof, it maketh it evident and apparent. Against which objection and reply of his, Theon inferred thus againe: And what should hinder (quoth he) that one and the same thing might not be firme or subtle, and withall thicke, both at once: like as his clothes of filke, and linnen, of which Homer writeth thus:

*And from sale web of linnen, ran away,
The oile as moist as it is and would not stay.*

Whereby he giveth us to understand, the fine spinning, and close weaving thereof, which would not suffer the oile to rest upon it, and soake through, but to glide off and drop downe, so neere were the threds, otherwise small, driven together, and so thicke, that it would not let any liquor to passe through. And thus a man may alledge the subtiltie of the aire, not only for to fetch out the rust, but also to bring it to a more pleasant and greenish colour, by mixing splendour and light together with the said deepe azure. Heereupon ensued a pause and silence for a pretie while; and then the discourses and historians above said, alledged againe the words of a certaine oracle in verse (which was delivered, if I be not deceived) as touching the roialtie and reigne of Aegon, an Argive king: Whereat Diogenianus said, that it had beene many times in his head to marvell, at the base, rude, and homely composition of those verses, which doe containe oracles: notwithstanding that the god Apollo is reputed the president of the Muses & eloquence; unto whom no lesse appertained the beauty & elegancy of stile & composition, than goodnesse of voice in song & melody, as who surpassed for sweet versifying Hesiodus & Homer, both very farre: and yet for all that, we see many of his oracles, rude, base, & faulty, as well for the meeter & measure, as the bare words. Then Serapion the Poet, who being come fro Athenas, was there present: Why (quoth he) beleeve you that those verses were of god Apolloes making? that we suffer you to say as you do, that they come a great way short of the goodnesse of those verses which Homer & Hesiodus composed? and shall we not use them as passing well and excellently made, correcting our owne judgement as forestalled and possessed aforehand with an ill custome? Then Boethius the Geometrician (for you wot well that the man hath ranged himselfe already to the sect of Epicurus.) Heard you never (quoth he) the tale of Paufon the painter: Not I verily, quoth Serapion. And yet worth it is the hearing, saith Boethius. He having bargained & undertaken to paint an horse wallowing & tumbling on his backe, drew him running on foote with all foure: whereat when the party was angry and offended, who set him a worke, Paufon laughed at him, and made no more ado, but turned the ends of the painted table; thus when the upper end was shifted downward, the horse seemed not to runne, but to tumble with his heeles aloft. Semblably it falleth out (quoth Boethius) in certaine speeches, when they are inverted and uttered the contrary way: and therefore soone you shall have who will say, that the oracles are not elegant, because they be of god Apolloes inditing: but contrariwise, that they be none of his, because they are but rudely made and unsavory: and as for that it is doubtful and uncerteine: but this is evident and plaine, that the verses of oracles be not exquisitely coyned, and laboriously endited, whereof I crave no better judge then your selfe Serapion: for you are wont to compose and write Poems, which as touching the argument and subject matter be austere and philosophical: but for their wit, grace and elegant composition otherwise, resemble rather the verses of Homer and Hesiodus, than those of the oracles pronounced by Pythia the Priestres of Apollo. With that Serapion: We are diseased all of us (o Boethius) in our eies and eares to, being wont (such is our nicenesse and delicacie) to esteeme and terme such things simply better, which are more pleasant: and peradventure ere it be long, we will finde fault with Pythia, for that she doeth not chaunt and sing more sweetly than Glauce the professed minstrell and singing wench; and because she is not befleeced with odoriferous oiles, nor richly arrayed in purple robes: yea, and some haply will take exception at her, for not burning Cinamon, Ladanum or Frankincense, for perfume: but onely Laurel and barley meale. And see you not faith one, how great a grace the Sapphik verses carie with them, and how they tickle the eares, and joy the hearts of the hearers? whereas Sibylla out of her furious and enraged mouth, as Heracitus saith, uttering forth and resounding words without mirth, and provoking no laughter, nor gloriously painted and set out, nor pleasantly perfumed and bespiced, hath continued with her voice a thousand yeeres, by the meanes of Apollo, speaking by her: And

Pindarus saith, that Cadmus heard from Apollo, not lesse and high musick, not sweet, not delicate, nor broken and full of varietie: for an impassible and holy nature, admitteth not any pleasure: but heere together with the base musick, the most part of the delight also is cast downe, and as it should seeme, hath runne into mens eares and possessed them. When Serapion had thus said: Theon smiling: Serapion, I see well (quoth he) hath done according to his old wont, and followed his owne disposition and maners in this behalfe: for there being offered some occasion to speake of pleasure, he hath quickly caught at it. But yet for all that, let us Boethius, howsoever the verses of oracles be woofse than those of Homer, not thinke that it is Apollo who made them; but when he hath given onely the beginning of motion, then each propheteesse is moved according as she is disposed to receive his inspiration. And verily if oracles were to be penned downe and written, and not to be barely pronounced, I doe not suppose that we would reprove or blame them (taking them to be the hand-writing of the god) because they are not so curiously endited as ordinarily the letters of kings and princes are. For surely, that voice is not the gods, nor the found, nor the phraze, ne yet the meeter and verse, but a womans they be all. As for him, he representeth unto her, fancies onely and imaginations, kindling a light in the soule to declare things to come: and such an illumination as this, is that which they call Enthusiasmus. But to speake in a word to you that are the priests and prophets of Epicurus (for I see well that you are now become one of that sect) there is no meane to cleape your hands, considering that yee impute unto the ancient propheteesses, that they made bad and faultie verses, yea and reprove those moderne priestesses of these daies, who pronounce in prose and in vulgar tearmes the oracles, for feare they should be article against by you, in case they delivered their verses headlesse, without loines and curtailed. Then (quoth Diogenianus) jell not with us I pray you in the name of God, but rather asseile us this common doubt, and rid us of this temple; for there is no man, but desireth to know the reason and cause, why this oracle hath given over to make answer in verses and other speeches as it hath done? Whereunto Theon spake thus: But now my sonne, we may seeme to doe wrong and shamefull injurie unto our discourses and directours heere, these Historians, in taking from them that which is their office: and therefore let that be done first which belongeth to them; and afterwards you may enquire and dispute at leisure of that which you desire. Now by this time were we gon forward as farr as to the statue of king Hiero: and the stranger albeit he knew well all the rest, yet so cautious he was and off to good a nature, that he gave care withall patience to that which was related unto him: but having heard that there stood sometime a certaine colunne of the said Hiero all of brasse, which fell downe of it selfe the very day whereon Hiero died at Saracose in Sicilie, he wondred thereat: and I thereupon recounted unto him other like examples; as namely, of Hiero the Spartan, how the day before that he lost his life in the battell at Leuctres, the eies of his statue fell out of the head: also that the two starres which Lysander had dedicated after the navall battell at the river called Aigos-potamos, were missing and not to be seene: and his very statue of stone put forth of a foddren fo much wilde weedes and greene grasse in so great quantity that it covered and hid the face thereof. Moreover during the time of those wofull calamities which the Athenians sustained in Sicilie, not onely the golden dates of a palme tree fell downe, but also the ravens came and pecked with their bills all about the scutcheon or theckle of the image of Pallas. The Cnidians coronet likewise which Philemelus the tyrant of the Phocæans had given unto Phrysilis the fine dauncing wench, was the cause of her death: for when she had passed out of Greece into Italie, one day as she played and daunced about the church of Apollo in Sierapontine, having the said coronet upon her head, the young men of the city came upon her for to have away the gold of that coronet: and striving about her one with another who should have it, tare the poore woman in peeces among them. Aristotle was wont to say that Homer was the onely Poet who made and devised words that had motion, so emphatical they were & lively expressed: but I for my part would say that the offerings dedicated in the city, to neat statues, jewels, & other ornaments moved together with the divine providence, do forsignifie future things: neither are the same in any part vaine and void of sense; but all replenished with a divine power. Then Boethius: I would not esse (quoth he): for it is not sufficient belike, to enclose God once in a moneth within a mortall bodie, unlesse we thrust him also into every stone and peece of brasse: as if fortune and chance were not sufficient of themselves to worke such feates and accidents. What (quoth I) thinke you then that these things every one have any assintie with fortune and chance? and is it probable that your Atomes doe glide, divide, and decline, neither before

nor

nor after, but just at the very time as each one of them who made these offerings, should fare better or worse? And Epicurus belike, as farre as I see serveth your turne now and is profitable unto you in those things which he hath said or written three hundred yeares past: but this god Apollon, unless he imprison and immure himselfe (as it were) and be mixed within every thing is not able in your opinion, to give unto any thing in the world the beginning of motion, nor the cause of any passion or accident whatsoever. And this was the answer which I made unto Boethius for that point: and in like maner spake I as touching the verses of Sibylla. For when we were come as farre as to the rocke which joineth to the senate house of the city, and there rested our selves, upon which rocke by report the first Sibylla first, being new come out of Helicon, where she had beene fostered by the Muses, although others there be that say she arived at Maleon, to and was the daughter of Lamia, who had Neptune for her father, Serapion made mention of certaine verses of hers wherein she praised her selfe saying, that she should never cease to prophesie and foretell future things, no not after her death; for that she her selfe should then goe about in the Moone, and be that which is called the face therein appearing: also that her breath and spirit mingled with the aire should passe to and fro continually in propheticall words and voices of oracles prognosticating: and that of her bodie transfused and converted into earth, there should grow herbes, shrubs and plants, for the food and pasturage of sacred beasts appointed for sacrifices: whereby they have all sorts of formes and qualities in their bowels and inwards: and by the meanes whereof men may foreknow and foretell of future events. Hereat Boethius made semblance to laugh more than before. And when Zon alledged, that howsoever these seemed to be fabulous matters and meere fables, yet so it was that many subversions & transmutations of Greeke cities, many expeditions also and voiaiges made against them of barbarous armies, as also the overthrowes & destructions of sundry kingdomes and dominions, give testimony in the behalfe of ancient propheties and predictions. And as for these late and moderne accidents (quoth he) which hapned at Cumes and Dicaearchia, long before chanted and foretold by way of prophesie out of Sibylls books; did not the time ensuing as a debt accomplish and pay? the breakings forth and eruptions of fire out of a mountaine, the strange ebullitions of the sea, the casting up aloft into the aire of stones & cinders by subterranean windes under the earth, the ruine and devastation of so many and those so great cities at one time, and that so suddenly, as they who came but the next morrow thither, could not see where they stood 30 or were built, the place was so confuted. These strange events (I say) and occurrents, as they be hardly beleeveld to have hapned without the finger of God, so much lesse credible it is, that foresee and foretolde they might be, without some heavenly power and divinitie. Then Boethius: And what accident (good sir, quoth he) can there be imagined, that Time oweth not unto Nature; and what is there so strange, prodigious and unexpected, as well in the sea as upon the land, either concerning whole cities or particular persons; but if a man foretolde of them, in proceesse and tract of time the same may fall out accordingly? And yet, to speake properly, this is not foretelling, but simply telling, or rather to cast forth and scatter at random in that infinity of the aire, words having no originall nor foundation, which wandering in this wise, Fortune otherwhiles encountreth and concurreth with them at a very venture. For there is a great difference, 40 in my judgement, betwene saying thus, that a thing is hapned which hath bene spoken; and a thing is spoken that shall happen: for that speech which uttereth things that are not extant, containing in it selfe the fault and error, attendeth not by any right, the credit and approbation thereof, by the accidentall event; neither useth it any true and undoubted token of prediction, with a certaine foreknowledge, that happen it will when it hath bene once foretold, considering that infinity is apt to produce all things; but he who guesseth well, whom the common proverbe pronounceth to be the best diviner,

For whose conjecture misseth least,

Him I account the wisest best.

resembleth him, who traceth out and followeth by probabilities as it were by tracts and foot- 50 ings, that which is to come. But these propheticall Sibylls and furious Bacchides, have cast at all adventure as it were, into a vast ocean, without either judgement or conjecture, the time; yea, and have scattered at random the nounes and verbs, the words and speeches of passions and accidents of all sorts. And albeit some of them fortune so to happen, yet is this or that false alike at the present time when it is uttered, although haply the same may chance afterwards to fall out truly. When Boethius had thus discoursed, Serapion replied upon him in this wise: Boethius

(quoth

(quoth he) giveth a good verdict and just sentence of those propositions which are indefinitely and without a certaine subject matter in this maner pronounced. If victorie be foretolde unto a Generall, he hath vanquished: if the destruction of a citie, it is overthrowen: but whereas there is expressed not onely the thing that shall happen, but also the circumstances, how, when, after what sort, and wherewith, then is not this a bare guesse and conjecture of that which peradventure will be; but a praesignification and denouncing peremptorily of such things as without faile shall be: as for example, that prophesie which concerned the lameness of Agessilus, in these words:

10 *Though proud and haughtie (Sparta) now, and sound of foot thou bee,
Take heed by halting regiment,
there come no harme to thee:
For then shall unexpected plagues thy state long time assaile,
The deadly waves of fearfull warres against thee shall prevail.*

Sensibly, that oracle as touching the Isle which the sea made and discovered about Thera and Therapsa, as also the prophesie of the warre betwene king Philip and the Romans, which ran in these words:

20 *But when the race of Trojan bloud, Phenicians shall defeat
In bloody fight, looke then to see strange sights and wonders great.
The sea shall from amid the waves yeeld fire tempests strong,
And fishes thicke of lightning bright, with stony stormes among.
With that an Island shall appear,
that never man yet knew:
30 And weaker men in battell set,
the mightier shall subdue.*

For whereas the Romans in a small time conquered the Carthaginians, after they had vanquished Antibal in the field, and Philip king of the Macedonians gave battell unto the Aetolians and Romans, wherein he had the overthrow; also, that in the end there arose an Island out of the deepe sea, with huge leames of fire and hideous ghasts: a man can not say, that all these things hapned and concurred together by fortune and meere chance: but the very traine and orderly proceeding thereof, doth shew a certaine prescience and fore-knowledge. Also, whereas the Romans were foretolde the time five hundred yeeres before, wherein they should have warre with all nations at once, the same was fulfilled when they warred against the slaves and fugitives who 40 revolted and rebelled. For in all these, there is nothing conjecturall and uncerteine, nothing blinde and doubtfull, that we need infinitely to seeke after fortune therefore: whereas many pledges there be of experience, giving us assurance of that which is finite and determinate, shewing the very way, whereby fatall destinie doth proceed. Neither do I thinke any man will say, that these things being foretolde with so many circumstances, jumped altogether by fortune. For what els should hinder, but that a man may as well say (o Boethius) that Epicurus wrote not his books of principall opinions and doctrines so much approved of you, but that all the letters thereof were jumbled and hudled together by meere chance and fortune, that went to the composing and finishing of that volume. Thus discoursing in this maner, we went forward still. And when in the Corinthian chapell we beheld the date tree of brasse, the onely monument 50 there remaining of all the oblations there offered, Diogenianus wondred to see the frogges and water-snakes which were wrought artificially by turners hand about the butt and root thereof; and so did we likewise: because neither the Palme tree is a moorie plant and loving the waters, like as many other trees are: neither doe the frogges any way pertaine to the Corinthians, as a marke or ensigne given in the armes of their city: like as the Selinuntians by report, offered sometimes in this temple, the herbe Smalach or Parsley, called Solimum, all of gold: and the Tenedonians, an liatcher, taken from the Crabfishes bred in their Island, neere unto the Promontorie called Asterion : for those Crabs onely (as it is thought) have the figure of an hatchet imprinted upon their shell. And verily, for Apollo himselfe, we suppose that ravens, swannes, wolves, hawks, or any other beasts, be more acceptable than these. Now when Serapion alleged, that the workman heereby meant and covertly signified the nouriture and rising of the Sunne out of humors and waters, which by exhalation he converteth into such creatures, whether it were that he had heard this verse out of Homer,

*Then out of sea arose the Sun,
And left this goodly lake anon.*

Or seeme the Aegyptians to represent the East or Sun-rising by the picture of a childe sitting upon the plant Lotos. Thereat I laughed heartily. What meane you thus (good sir, quoth I) to thrust hither the sect of the Stoicks : came you indeed to foist slyly among our speeches and discourses, your exhalations and kindlings of the starres, not bringing downe hither the Sunne and the Moone, as the Thessalian women doe by their enchantments ; but making them to spring and arise as from their first originall out of the earth and the waters ? For Plato verily, called mana celestiall plant, as rising directly from his root, above which is his head. But you in the meane time mocke and deride Empedocles, for saying that the Sunne occasioned by the reflexion of the heavenly light about the earth,

*Hieraies with farseffe visage sends againe
Up to the heavens and there doth brightly shine.*

while your selves make the Sunne terrestrial, animall, or a fennith plant, ranging him among the waters and the native place of frogs. But let vs betake all these matters to the tragical and strange monstruosities of the Stoicks : meane while treat we curiously and by the way of the necessary and by-works of mechanickall artificers and handicrafts men : for surely in many things they be very ingenious and witty : many in every plot they cannot avoid the note of bald devices & affected curiosities in their inventions. Like as therefore he that painted Apollo with a rocke upon his head, signified thereby the day-broke, & the time a little before sunne rising : even so a man may say that these frogs doe symbolize and betoken the season of the Spring, at what time as the Sunne begins to rule over the aire and to discusse the winter : at least waies if we must according to your opinion, understand the Sunne and Apollo to be both, one god, and not twaine. Why ? (quoth Serapion) are you of another minde ? and doe you thinke the Sunne to be one, & Apollo another ? Yes may doe I (quoth he) as well, as that the Sunne and Moone doe differ. Yea and more than so : for the Moone doth not often, nor from all the world hideth the Sunne : whereas the Sunne hath made all men together, for to be ignorant of Apollo : diverting the minde and cogitation by the meanes of the fensle, and turning it from that which is unto that which appeareth onely. Then Serapion demanded of those Historians our guides and conductors, what was the reason that the forsaide cell or chappell, was not intituled by the name of Cypselus who dedicated it, but called the Corinthians chappell. And when they held their peace, because as I take it, they knew not the cause ; I began to laugh thereat : And why should we thinke (quoth I) that these men knew or remembered any thing more, being astonied and amazed as they were to heare you fable and talke of the meteors or impressions in the aire ? For even themselves we heard before relating, that after the tyranny of Cypselus was put downe and overthrowen, the Corinthians were desirous to have the inscription as well of the golden statue at Pisa, as of this cell or treasure house, for to tunne in the name of their whole city. And verily the Delphians gave and granted them so much according to their due desert. But for that the Elians envied them that privilege, therefore the Corinthians passed a publicke decree, by vertue whereof they excluded them from the solemnity of the Isthmian games : And hereof it came, that never after that, any champion out of the territorie of Eli, was known to shew himselfe to doe his devoir at those Isthmick games. And the massacre of the Molionides which Hercules committed about the city of Cleone, was not the cause as some doe thinke, why the Elians were debarred from thence : for contrariwise it had belonged to them for to exclude and put by others ; if for this they had incurred the displeasure of the Corinthians. And thus much said I for my part. Now when we were come as far as to the hall of the Acanthians and of Braidas, our discoursing Historians and exposticours shewed us the place, where sometimes stood theobelisks of Iton, which Rhodopus the famous courtisan had dedicated. Whereat Diogenianus was in a great chafe, and brake out into these words : Now surely (quoth he) the same city (to their shame be it spoken) hath allowed unto a common strumpet a place whether to bring and where to bestow the tenth part of that salarie which she got by the use of her body, and unjustly put to death Aesope her fellow servant. True (quoth Serapion) : but are you so much offended hereat : cast up your eie and looke aloft : behold among the statues of brave capitaines and glorious kings, the image of Anefaret all of beaten gold, which Crates faith was dedicated and set up for a Trophæe of the Greeks lasciviousnesse. The yong gentleman, seeing it : Yea, but it was of Phryne that Crates spake so. You say true (quoth Serapion) : for her proper name indeed was Anefaret : but surnamed she was Phryne in meriment because she looked pale or yellow like unto a kinde of frogge named in Greeke Phryne. And thus many times surnames doe drown and suppress other names. For thus the mother of king Alexander the great, who had for her name at first, Pollyxene, came afterwards to be as they say, surnamed Myrtale, Olympias and Stratonice. And the Corinthian lady Eumetis, men call unto this day, after her fathers name, Cleobuline ; and Herophile, of the city Erythre, she who had the gift of divination and could skill of prophesie, was afterwards in proceesse of time surnamed Sibylla. And you have heard Grammarians say, that even Leda her selfe, was named Anefinoe, and Orestes Acham. But how thinke you (quoth he) casting his eie upon Theon, to answer this accusation as touching Phryne ? Then he smiling againe : In such sort (quoth he) as I will charge and accuse you, for bulying your selfe in blaming thus the light faults of the Greeks. For like as Socrates reprooved this in Callias, that gave defiance onely to sweet perfumes or pretious odors ; for he liked well enough to see the daunces and gesticulations of yong boies, and could abide the sight of kissing, of pleasants, buffons and jesters to make folke laugh : so me thinks that you would chafe and exclude out of the temple, one poore silly woman who used the beaury of her owne body, haply not so honestly as she might : and in the meane time you can abide to see god Apollo environed round about with the first fruits, with the tenth and other oblations arising from murders, warres, and pillage, and all his temple throughout hanged with the spoiles and booties gotten from the Greeks : yea, and are neither angry nor take pity when you reade, over such goodly oblations, and ornaments, these most shamefull inscriptions and titles : Braidas and the Acanthians, of the Athenian spoiles : the Athenians of the Corinthians : the Phocæans of the Thessalians : the Orneates of the Sicyonians : and the Amphyctions of the Phocæans.

But peradventure it was Praxiteles alone who was offensive unto Crates, for that he had set up a monument there, of his owne sweet heart, which he had made for the love of her ; whereas Crates contrariwise should have commended him, in that among these golden images of kings and princes, he had placed a courtisan in gold, reproching thereby and condemning riches, as having in it nothing to be admired, and nothing venerable : for it well becometh kings and great rulers, to present Apollo and the gods with such ornaments and oblations as might testify their owne justice, their temperance and magnanimity ; and not make shew of their golden store and abundance of superfluous delicacies, whereof they have their part commonly who have lived most shamefully. But you alledge not this example of Crates (quoth another of our historians & directours) who caused a statue in gold to be made & set up here, of his woman-baker ; which he did not for any proud and insolent ostentation of his riches in this temple, but upon an honest & just occasion : for the report goeth, that Alyattes the father of this Crates, espoused a second wife, by whom he had other children, whom he reared and brought up. This lady then purposing secretly to take away the life of Crates, gave unto the baker aforesaid, poison, willing her, when she had tempered it with dough, and wrought it into bread, to serve the same up unto Crates. But the woman gave secret intelligence hereof unto Crates, and withall, bestowed the poisoned bread among the children of this step-dame. In regard of which demerit, Crates when he came to the crowne, would acknowledge and requite the good service which this woman had done, with the testimony, as it were, of this god himselfe ; wherein he did well and veritously. And therefore (quoth he) meet it is and seemly, to praise and honor highly such oblations, if any have bene presented and dedicated by cities upon semblable occasions, like as the Opuntians did. For when the tyrants of the Phocæans had broken and melted many sacred oblations both of golde and silver, and thereof coined money, which they sent and dispersed among the cities ; the Opuntians gathered as much silver as they could, wherewith they filled a great pot, sent it hither, and made thereof an offering to Apollo. And I verily, for my part, doe greatly commend those of Smyrna and Apollonia for sending hither certeine come-cars of gold, in token of harvest : and more than that, the Eretrians and Magnesiens, for presenting this god with the first fruits of their men & women, recognising thereby, him to be the giver, not only of the fruits which the earth yeeldeth, but also of children, as being the authour of generation and the lover of mankind. But I blame the Megarians as much, for that they onely in manner of all the Greeks, caused to be erected here, the image of this our god, with a lance in his hand, after the battell with the Athenians, who upon the defeature of the Persians, held their city in possession, and were by them vanquished in fight, and disseized thereof againe. And yet true it is, that these men afterward offered unto Apollo a golden plectre wherewith to play upon his Cittern or Viole, having heard (as it should seeme) the Poet Seythimus, speaking of the said instrument:

*Which Don Apollo, faire and lovely sonne
Of Jupiter, doth tune in skilfull wise,
As who is wont of all things wrought and done,
All ends with their beginnings to comprise:
And in his hand the plectre bright as gold,
Even glittering rays of shining Sun doth holde.*

Now when Serapion would have said somewhat els of these matters: A pleasure it were (quoth the stranger) to heare you devise and discourse of such like things, but I must needs demand the first promise made unto me, as touching the cause why the Prophetesse Pythia hath given over to make answers any longer by oracle, in verse and metree: and therefore, if it so please you, let us surcease visiting the rest of these oblations and ornaments, and rather sit we downe in this place, for to heare what can be said of this matter, being the principall point and maine reason which impeacheth the credit of this oracle; for that of necessitie one of these two things must needs be: either that the Prophetesse Pythia approacheth not neere enough to the very place where the divine power is, or els that the aire which was wont to breathe and inspire this instinct, is utterly quenched, and the puissance quite gone and vanished away. When we had fetched therefore a circuit about, we sat us downe upon the tablements on the South side of the temple, nere unto the chappell of Tellus, that is to say, the Earth, where we beheld the waters of the fountaine Castilium, and the temple of the Muses, with admiration, in such sort as Boethius incontinently said, that the very place it selfe made much for the question and doubt moved by the stranger: For in olde time (quoth he) there was a temple of the Muses even there, from whence the river springs; inso much as they used this water for the solemne libations at sacrifices, according as Simonides writeth in this wise:

And in another place, the same Simonides with a little more curiositie of words, calling upon Cleio the Muse, saith, she is the holy keeper.

*The sacred ewres, who doth superintend Wherby from lovely fountaine do descend
Those waters pure, which all the world admires,
And thereof for to have a taste desires:
As rising from those caves propheticall,
Thus yeeld sweet odors most mirificall.*

And therefore Eudoxus was much overseene to beleeve those who gave out, that this was called the water of Styx. But in trueth, they placed the Muses as assistants to divination, and the warders thereof, neere unto that rivier and the temple of Tellus aforesaid, whereunto appertained the oracle: wherby answers were rendered in verse and song. And some there be who say, that this heroique verse was first heard here:

Συμφέρει μέγιστα δαίμωνι, κλέος τὴν μῆτιν.

*That is to say,
Thou prettie Bees and birds that sing:
Bring hither both your wax and wing.*

at what time as the oracle being forsaken and destitute of the god Apollo, lost all the dignity and so majesty that it had. Then Serapion: These things indeed (quoth he) o Boethus, are more meet and convenient for the Muses. For we ought not to fight against God, nor together with prophetic and divination take away both providence and divinitie; but to seeke rather for the solution of those reasons which seeme to be contrary thereto, and in no wise to abandon and cast off that faith and religious belief, which hath in our countrey, time out of minde, passed from father to sonne. You say very well and truly (quoth I) good Serapion, for we despair not of Philosophie, lophilie, as if it were quite overthrowen and utterly gone, because Philosophers beforetime, pronounced their sentences, and published their doctrines in verse: as for example, Ophelus, Hesiodus, Parmenides, Xenophanes, Empedocles, Thales, and afterwards ceased and gave over to verse, all but your selfe, for you have into Philosophie reduced Poetrie againe, to set up a loud and loftie note, for to incite and stirre up young men. Neither is Astrologie of lesse credite and estimation, because Aristarchus, Timochares, Aristyllus, and Hipparchus, have written in prose: whereas Eudoxus, Hesiodus, and Thales, wrote before them in verse of that argument; at leastwise, if it be true that Thales was the author of that Astrologie which is ascribed unto him. And Pindarus himselfe confelleth, that he doubted greatly of that manner of melodie, which was neglected in his daies, wondering why it was so despised. For I assure you it is no absurd thing, nor impertinent, to search the causes of such mutations: But to abolish all arts and faculties, if haply somewhat be changed or altered in them, I hold neither just, nor reasonable. Then came in Theon also with his vie, adding moreover & saying, that it could not be denied, but that in truth herein there have bene great changes & mutations: howbeit, no lesse true it is, that even in this very place there have bene many oracles & answers delivered in prose, & those concerning affaires, not of least consequence, but of great importance. For as Thucydides reporteth in his historie, when the Lacedæmonians demanded of the oracle, what issue there would be of the warre which they waged against the Athenians? this answer was made: That they should obtaine the victorie, and hold still the upper hand: also that he would aid and succour them, both requested, and unrequested: and that unless they recalled home Pausanias, he would gather together * * * of silver. Semblably, when the Athenians consulted with the oracle about their successe in that warre which they enterprised for the conquest of Sicilie; this answer they received: That they should bring out of the city Erythra, the priestresse of Minerva: now the name of the said woman was Tisychia, that is to say, repose, or quietnesse. Moreover, at what time as Dinomenes the Sicilian, would needs know of the oracle, what should become of his sonnes? this answer was returned: That they should all three be tyrants, and great potentates: wherat when Dinomenes replied againe: Yea mary, my good lord Apollo, but peradventure they may rue that another day. Apollo answered: True indeed, & thus much more over I prophesie unto thee, for to be their destiny. And how this was fulfilled you all know: for Gelon during his reigne, had the dropfie: Hiero was diseased with the stone, all the time of his tyrannie: and Thrasybulus being overtoiled with warres and civil seditions, in short time was dethroned & driven out of his dominions. Moreover, Procles the tyrant of Epiæum, among many others, whom he had cruelly and unjustly put to death, murdered Timarchus, who fled from Athens unto him, with a great quantitie of money, after he had received him into his protection, and shewed him many courtesies and kindneses at his first arrivall: him (I say) he slew, and afterwards cast into the sea his corps, which he had put into a chest: and howsoever other knew not of this murder, yet Cleander of Aegina, was privie thereto, and the minister to execute the same. After this, in proceesse of time, when he was fallen into troubles, and that his state began to be disquieted, he sent his brother Cleotimus hither to the oracle, to enquire secretly whether he were best to flee and retire himselfe out of the way. Apollo made this answer: That he granted Procles flight and retreat thither, where as he commanded his host of Aegina to bellow a chest, or else where the staggas cast their heads. The tyrant understanding that Apollo willed him either to throw himselfe into the sea and there be drowned, or else to be enterred in the ground, because staggas are wont to bury and hide their homes within the earth, when they be fallen, made no halte, but delayed the time: but after a while, when troubles grew more and more upon him, and all things went backward with him, every day worse than other, at length he fled: But the friends of Timarchus having overtaken him, slew him likewise, and flung his body into the sea. Furthermore (which is the greatest matter of all) those Rhetra, by vertue whereof, Lycurgus ordeined the government of the Lacedæmonians common-wealth, were delivered unto him in prose. What should I speake of Athyris, Herodotus, Philochorus, and Ister, who of all others travelled most in gathering of oracles together, which were given in verse, and yet have penned many of them without verse. And Theopompus, who studied, no man so much, to cleere the history as touching oracles; sharply reprooveth those, who thinke that Pythia the prophetesse in those daies, gave no answers nor prophesies in metree: which challenge of his when he minded to proove and make good, he could alledge but very few examples; for that all the rest in manner were even then pronounced in prose, like as at this day, some there be that runne in verse and meeter. By which allegations of his, he made one about the rest notoriously divulged, which is this. There is within the province of Phocis, a certaine temple of Hercules, furnished Mythogone, as one would say, hating women: and by the ancient custome and law of that cuntry, the priest thereof for the time being, must not in the whole yeere company with a woman: by occasion whereof, they chuse old men to this priesthood: howsoever not long since, a certaine young man, who was otherwise of no ill behaviour, but somewhat ambitious, and desirous of honour, and who besides loved a young wench, attuned to this prelacie or sacerdotall dignity: at the first he bridled his affection, and forbore the said damosell: howbeit, one time above the rest, when he was laid upon his bed, after he had drunke well, and beene a dancing, the wench came to visit him; and to be short, he dealt carnally with her; whereupon being much troubled in minde, and in fearefull perplexity, he fled unto the oracle, and enquired of Apollo as concerning the sinne which he had committed, whether he might not be absolved for it by praier or expiatorie satisfaction? and this answer he received:

* All things necessarie, God permitte th.

* This is the divels divinatie.

But if a man haply should graunt that no answer in these daies is delivered by oracle, but in verse; yet would he be more in doubt of ancient oracles, which sometime in meete and otherwhiles in prose gave answers. But neither the one nor the other (my sonne) is strange and without reason, if so be you conceive aright and carry a pure and religious opinion of god Apollo, and doe not thinke that he himselfe it was who in old time composed the verses and at this day prometh unto Pythia the prophesies, as if he spake through masks and visours. But this point is of such moment; that it requireth a longer discourse and farther inquire into it: may for this present it may suffice for our learning, that we call to remembrance and put you in minde briefly, how the body useth many organs or instruments; that the soule employeth the body and the parts thereof; and that the soule is the organ or instrument of God. Now the perfection of any organ or instrument, is principally to imitate and resemble that which useth it, as much as is in the power thereof: and to exhibit the worke and effect of the intention in it selfe, and to shew the same not such as it is in the workman, pure, sincere, without passion, without error and faultlesse, but mixed and exposed to faults: for of it selfe obscure it is and al- 30 together unknown unto us; but it appeareth another, and by another, and is replenished with the nature of that other. And here I passe over to speake of wax, gold, silver, brasse, and all other sorts of matter and substance, which may be cast and brought into the forme of a mould. For every of these verily receiveth one forme of a similitude imprinted therein, but to this resemblance or representation, one adjoineth this difference, and another that, of it selfe: as easily is to be seene, by the infinit diversities of formes in images, as also by the appearance of one and the same visage in divers and sundry mirours, flat, hollow, curbed, or embowed, round outwardly, which represent an infinit variety. But there is neither mirror that sheweth and expresseth the face better, nor instrument of nature more supple, obsequent and pliable, than is the Moone: howbeit receiving from the Sunne a light and fiery illumination, she sendeth not the same backe 40 unto us, but mingled with somewhat of her owne: whereby it changeth the colour, and hath a power or facultie far different, for no heat at all there is in it: and as for the light so weak and feeble it is that it faileth before it cometh unto us. And this I suppose to be the meaning of Heraclitus, when he saith, that the lord, unto whom belongeth the oracle at Delphos, doth neither speake, nor conceale, but signifie onely and give signe. Adde now to this which is so well said and conceived, and make this application: that the god who is heere, useth Pythia the prophetesse, for sight and hearing, like as the Sunne useth the Moone. He sheweth future things by a mortall body, and a soule which cannot rest and lie still, as being notable to shew her selfe immoveable and quiet to him who stirreth and mooveth her, but is troubled still more and more by the motions, agitations, and passions, of her owne, and which are in her selfe: for 50 like as the turnings of bodies, which together with a circular motion, fall downward, are not firme and strong, but turning as they do round by force, and tending downward by nature, there is made of them both a certaine turbulent and irregular circumpiration: Even so the ravishment of the spirit, called Enthusiasmus is a mixture of two motions, when the minde is moved in the one by inspiration, and in the other naturally. For considering that of bodies which have no soule, and of themselves continue alwaies in one estate quiet, a man cannot make use not

moove them perforce, otherwise than the quality of their nature will beare, nor move a cylindre like a bal, or in manner of a square cube, nor a lute or harpe, according as he doth a pipe, no more than a trumpet after the order of a cithern or stringed instrument: ne yet any thing else otherwife than either by art or nature each of them is fit to be used. How is it possible then to handle and manage that which is animate, which mooveth of it selfe, is indured with will and inclination, capable also of reason; but according to the precedent habitude, puillance and nature? As for example, to move one musically, who is altogether ignorant and an enemy of musike; or grammatically, him who skilleth not of grammar, and knoweth not a letter of the booke; or eloquently and rhetorically, one who hath neither skill nor practise at all in orations. Certes I 10 cannot see or say how? And herein Homer also beareth witnesse with me, who albeit he supposeth thus much, that nothing (to speake of) in the whole world, is performed and effected by any cause, unless God be at one end thereof: yet will not he make God to use all persons indifferently in every thing, but each one according to the sufficiency that he hath by art or nature. To prove this, see you not (quoth he) my friend Diogenianus, that when Minerva would perswade the Achaeans to any thing she calleth for Ulysses? when she is minded to trouble and marre the treaty of peace, she seeketh out Pandarus? when she is disposed to discomfit and put to flight the Trojans, she addresseth her selfe and goeth to Diomedes? for of these three, the last was a valiant man of person, and a brave warrior; the second a good archer, but yet a foolish and brainficke man; the first right eloquent and wife withall: for Homer was not of the same minde 20 with Pandarus, if so be it were Pandarus who made this verse,

If God so will, in sea thou maiest well faile

Upon an hurle or a wicker fraile.

But well he knew, that powers and natures be destined to divers effects, according as each one hath different motions, notwithstanding that which mooveth them all, be but one. Like as therefore that facultie which moveth a living creature naturally going on foot, can not make it to flie; nor him who stuteth and stammereth, to speake readily; ne yet him to crie bigge and aloud, who hath a small and slender voice: which was the reason (as I take it) that when Bastus was come to * Rome, they sent him into Africke, there to plant a colonie, and people a citie; for 30 howsoever he had a stutting and stammering tongue, and was otherwise of a small voice, yet a princely minde he carried, a politike head he had of his owne, and was a man of wisdom & government: even so impossible it is, that Pythia should have the knowledge to speake here elegantly & learnedly: for notwithstanding that the were well borne and legitimate as any other, & had lived honestly and discreetly, yet being brought up in the house of poore husbandmen, she descendeth into the place of the oracle, bringing with her no art learned in schoole, nor any experience whatsoever. But as Xenophon thinketh, that a young bride when she is brought to her husbands house, ought to be such an one as hath not seene much, and heard as little; semblably, Pythia being ignorant and unexpert in manner of all things, and a very virgin indeed as touching her minde and soule, cometh to converse with Apollo. And we verily are of opinion, that God for to signifie future things, useth Herons, Wrens, Ravens, Crows, and other birds, speaking after their maner: neither will we have footsaiers, and prophets, being as they are, the messengers and heralds of God, to expound and declare their predictions in plaine and intelligible words: but wee would that the voice and dialect of the prophetesse Pythia, resembling the speech of a Chorus in a tragedie from a scaffold, should pronounce her answers 40 not in simple, plaine, and triviall termes, without any grace to set them out, but with Poeticall magnificence of high and stately verses, disguised as it were with metaphors and figurative phrases, yea, and that which more is, with found of flute and hautboies: what answer make you then, as touching the old oracles? Surely, not one alone, but many. First, the ancient Pythia as hath bene said already, uttered and pronounced most of them in prose: secondly, that time afforded those complexions and temperatures of bodie, which had a propense and forward inclination to Poesie; whereto there were joined incontinently, the alacritie, desires, affections, and dispositions of the soule, in such sort, as they were ever preft and ready, neither wanted they ought but some little beginning from without, to set them on worke, and to stirre the imagination and conception; whereby there might directly be drawn unto that which was meet and proper for them, not onely Astrologers and Philosophers as Philonus saith; but also such as were well soaked with wine, and shaken with some passion, who either upon pittie surprisng them, or joy presented unto them, might immediately slide as it were, and fall into a melodious 50 and and singing voice; inasmuch as their feasts were full of verses, and love songs; yea and their books and compositions, amorous, and favoring of the like. And when Empirides said:

*Love makes men Poets, make it when you will,
Although before in verse they had no skill.*

He meaneth not that love putteth Poetrie or Musick into a man in whom there was none before; but wakeneth, stirreth and enchaineth that which before was drowie, idle, and cold. Or else my good friend, let us say, that now a daies there is not an amorous person, and one that skilleth of love, but all love is extinct and perished, because there is no man, as Pindarus saith,

*Who now in pleasant vaine Poeticall
His songs and ditties doeth adresse,
Which just in rhyme and meeter fall,
To praise his faire and sweet mistresse,*

But this is untrue and absurd: for many loves there be that stirre and moove a man, though they meet not with such minds as naturally are disposed and forward to Musick or Poetrie: and well may these loves be without pipes, without harpes, violes, lutes, and stringed instruments: and yet no lesse talkative nor ardent, than those in old time. Again, it were a shame and without all conscience to say, that the Academie with all the quire and company of Socrates and Plato, were void of amorous affection (whose amorous discourses are at this day extant, & to be read) although they left no Poems behinde them. And is it not all one to say, that there was never any woman but Sappho in love, nor had the gift of prophesie, save onely Sibylla, and Aristonice, or such as published their vaticinations and prophesies in verse? For vertue as Cheremon was wont to say, is mingled and tempered with the manners of those that drinke it: And this Enthusiasticke or spirit of prophesie, like unto the ravishment of love, maketh use of that sufficiency and facultie, which it findeth ready in the subject, and mooveth each one of them that are inspired therewith, according to the measure of their naturall disposition: and yet as we consider God and his providence, we shall see that the change is ever to the better. For the use of speech, resembleth properly the permutation and worth of money; which is good and allowable, so long as it is used and known, being currant, more or lesse, and valued diversly, as the times require. Now the time was, when the very marke and stampe (as it were) of our speech was currant and approved, in meeter, verses, songs and sonets: Forasmuch as then, all historie, all doctrine of Philosophie, all affection; and to be briefe, all matter that required a more grave and stately voice, they brought to Poetry and Musick. For now, onely few men, hardly, and with much ado; give care and understand: but then, all indifferently heard, yea, and take great pleasure to heare those that sung.

as Pindarus saith: but also most men for the great aptitude they had unto Poetrie, when they would admonish and make remonstrances, did it, by the meanes of harpe, lute, and song withall: if they ment to rebuke, chastise, exhort, and incite, they performed it by tales, fables, and proverbes. Moreover their hymnes to the honour and praise of the gods, their praises and vowes, their balads for joy of victory, they made in meeter and musickall rhyme: some upon a dexterity of wit, others by use and practise. And therefore neither did Apollo envie this ornament and pleasant grace unto the skill of divination, neither banished he from this three-footed table of the oracle the Muse so highly honored, but rather brought it in, and stirred it up as affecting and loving Poeticall wittes: yea, and himselfe ministred and infused certeine imaginations, helping to put forward the losie and learned kinde of language, as being much prized and esteemed. But afterwards, as the life of men, together with their fortunes and natures came to be changed; thrift and utilitie (which remooveth all superfluitie) tooke away the golden lusts, and foretops of perukes, the spangled coifes, caules, and attires, it cast off the fine and deintie robes called Xystides; it clipped and cut away the bush of haire growing too long; it unbuckled and unlaced, the trim buskins, acquainting men with good reason, to glory in thriftinesse and frugalitie, against superfluous and sumptuous delicacies, yea, and to honour simplicitie and modestie, rather than vaine pompe and affected curiositie: And even so, the manner of mens speech, changing also and laying aside all glorious shew, the order of writing an historie therewithall, presently came downe as one would say from the stately chariot of verification, to prose, and went a foot; and by the meanes especially of this fashion of writing and speaking king at liberty, and not being tied to measures, true stories, come to be distinguished from lying fables: and Philosophie embracing peripicuity of stile, which was apt to teach and instruct, rather than that which by tropes and figures amused and amazed mens braines. And then Apollo repressed Pythia, that she should not any more call her fellow citizens, Pyrraeos, that is to say, burning fires; nor the Spartanes, Ophioboros, that is to say, devourers of serpents; nor men Oremnos; nor river, Oremptos: and so by cutting off from her, prophesies, verses, and strange termes, circumlocutions and obcuritie, he taught and inured her to speake unto those who resorted to the oracles, as lawes do talke with cities, as kings devise and commune with their people and subjects; and as scholars give care unto their schoole-masters, framing and applying in his manner of speech and language so, as it might be full of sense and perswasive grace: for this lesse we ought to learne and know that, as Sophocles saith:

*God to the wise in heavenly things, is ay a lightsome guide,
But soles so briefly he doth teach, that they goe alwaies wide.*

And together with plainnesse, and diluciditie, belief was so turned and altered, changing together with other things, that beforetime, whatsoever was not ordinary nor common, but extravagant, or obscurely and covertly spoken, the vulgar sort drawing it into an opinion of some holinesse hidden underneath, was astonished thereat and held it venerable: but afterwards, desirous to learne and understand things cleerely and easily, and not with masks of disguised words, they began to finde fault with Poesie, wherein oracles were clad; not onely for that it was contrary and repugnant to the easie intelligence of the truth, as mingling the darknesse and shadow of obscurity with the sentence, but also for that they had prophesies already in suspicion; saying, that metaphors ænigmatically, and covert words, yea and the ambiguities which Poetry useth, were but shifts, retractes, and evasions to hide and cover all, whensoever the events fell not out accordingly. And many you may heare to report, that there be certeine Poeticall persons, practised in versifying, sit yet about the oracle, for to receive and catch some words there delivered; which presently and extempore, they reduce and contrive into verse, meeter, and thime, as if they were panniers to bestow all the answers in. And heere I forbear to speake what occasion of blame, and matter of calumniation in these oracles, these Onomacritoi, Prodanos and Cinesinos have ministred, by adding unto them a tragicall pompe, and swelling inflation of words, when as neither they had need thereof, nor yet received any varietie and alteration thereby. Moreover, certeine it is, that these jugglers and vagarant circumforancian land-leapers, these practisers of legier demain, these plaiers at passe and repasse, with all the packe of those vagabonds, ribaunds, and jesters who haunt the feasts of Cybele and Serapis, have greatly discredited and brought into obloquie the profession of Poetrie: some by their extemporall facultie and telling fortunes, others by way of lotterie forsooth, and by certeine letters and writings, forging oracles which they would give to poore varlets and silly women, who were soonest abused thereby, especially when they saw the same reduced into verse, and so were caried away with Poeticall termes. And from hence it is now come to passe, that Poesie, for that she hath suffered herselfe thus to be prophaned and made common, by such counsers, jugglers, deceivers, enchanters, and false prophets, is fallen from the truth, and rejected from Apolloes three-footed table.

And therefore I nothing wonder if otherwhiles in old time, there was some need of this double meaning, circumlocution, and obcuritie: for I assure you, there was not wont to come hither one for to enquire and be resolved about the buying of a slave in open market: nor another to know what profit he should have by his traffike or husbandry: but hither came or sent great and puissant cities, kings, princes, and tyrants, who had no meane matters in their heads, to consult with Apollo as concerning their important affaires; whom to provoke, to displease, and offend, by causing them to heare many things contrary to their will and minde, was nothing good and expedient for those who had the charge of the oracle: for this god obedieth not Empirides when he setteth downe a law as it were for him, saying thus:

*Phoebus himselfe, and none but he,
Ought unto men the prophet to be.*

for he useth mortall men to be his ministers and underprophets: of whom he is to have a speciall care for to preserve them, that in doing him service, they be not spoiled and flaine by wicked persons:

persons: in which regard he is not willing to conceal the truth; but turning aside the naked declaration thereof, which in poëtrie receiveth many reflexions, and is divided into many parcels, he thereby did away the rigor and odious austerity therein contained. And it skilled much, that neither tyrants should know it, nor enemies be advertised and have intelligence thereof. For their sakes therefore, he enfolded in all his answers, doubts, suspitions and ambiguities, which from others did hide the true meaning of that which was answered. But such as came themselves to the oracle, and gave close and heedfull care, as whom it concerned particularly, those he deceived not, neither failed they of the right understanding thereof. And therefore a very foolish man is he, and of no judgement, who doth take occasion of slander and calumination, if the world and estate of mens affaires being changed, this God thinketh that he is not to aide and helpe men any more after his accustomed maner, but by some other. Furthermore, by the meanes of poëtrie and verification, there is not in a sentence, any greater commodity than this, that being couched and comprised in a certaine number of words and syllables measured, a man may retaine and remember the same better. And necessarie it was for those in olde time, to carry away in memory many things, because there were delivered many signes and marks of places, many times and opportunities of affaires, many temples of gods beyond sea, many secret monuments, and repositories of demi-gods hard to be found of those who failed farre from Greece. For in the voyages of Chios and Candie, * * * * * interpreted by Onesichus and Palanthus, beside many other captaines and admirals, how many signes and conjectures went they by, and were to observe, for to finde the resting feat, and place of abode, which was ordeined to every one of them? and some of them quite missed thereof: as for example, Battus: for his prophesie ran thus, That unless he arrived to the right place, he should be banished. Failing therefore of the country whereto he was sent, he returned againe to the oracle in humble maner, craving his favour. And then Apollo answered him in this wise:

*Thou knowest thy selfe, as well as I can tell,
That uneth yet in Atrike thou hast bene;
(For thither sent I thee to build and dwell)
Nor Meliboea, that place so fertile, scene:
If thither now accordingly thou wend,
Thy wisdom then greatly will I commend.*

And so he sent him away the second time. Likewise Lysander being altogether ignorant of the little hill Archeledes, of the place called Alopecon, as also of the river Oplites.

*And of the dragon, some of earth by kinde

all which hee should have avoided, was vanquished in battell, and slaine about those very places, and that by one Inachian and Ahartian, who had for his device or armes in the target that he bare, a dragon purtraid. But I thinke it needlesse to recite many other ancient oracles of this kinde, which are not easily to be related, and as hardly remembered, especially among you who know them well enough. But now thanks be to God, the state of our affaires and of the world, in regard whereof men were wont to seeke unto the oracle is sealed: for which I reioice and congratulate with you. For great peace there is and repose in all parts; warres be staid, and there is no more need of running and wandering to and fro, from one country to another: civil dissensions and seditions be appeased: there are no tyrannies now exercised: neither doe there raigne other maladies and miseries of Greece, as in times past, which had need of sovereign medecines, exquisite drogues and powerfull confections, to remedy and redresse the same. Whereas therefore there is no variable diversity, no matter of secrecie, no dangerous affaires, but all demands be of pettie & vulgar matters, much like to these schoole questions: Whether a man should marry or no? Whether a man may undertake a voiage by sea or no? Whether he is to take up or put forth money for interest? where, I say, the greatest points, about which cities seeke unto Apollo, are about the fertility of their ground, plenty of corne and other fruits of the earth, the breed and multiplying of their cattell, and the health of their bodies: to goe about for to comprise the same in verse, to devise and forge long circuits of words, to use strange and obscure tearmes, to such interrogatories as require a short simple and plaine answer, were the part of an ambitious and vainglorious Sophister, who tooke a pride in the elegant composing of oracles. Over and besides, Pythia of her selfe is of a gentle and generous nature: and when she descendeth thither and converseth with the god, she hath more regard of truth than of glory, ry, neither passeth she whether men praise or dispraise her. And better it is if it were for us, if we also were likewise affected. But we now in a great agony (as it were) & fearefull perplexity left the place should leese the reputation which it hath had for the space of three thousand yeeres, and doubting that some would abandon it and cease to frequent it, as if it were the schoole of a Sophister, who feared to lose his credit, and to be despised, devise apologies in defence thereof, faining causes and reasons of things which we neither know, nor is becoming us for to learne, and all to appease and perswade him, who complaineth and seemeth to finde fault, whereas we should rather shake him off and let him goe.

*For with him first,
It will be worst,*

who hath such an opinion of this our God, as that he approved and esteemed these ancient sentences of the Sages written at the entrance of the temple, Know thy selfe; Too much of nothing; principally for their brevity, as containing under few words a pithy sentence well and closely couched, and (as a man would say) beaten soundly together with the hammer: but reprov'd and blamed moderne oracles for delivering most part of their answers, briefly, succinctly, simply, and directly. And verily such notable Apophthegmes and sayings of the ancient Sages, resemble rivers that runne through a narrow streight, where the water is pent and kept in so close, that a man cannot see through it, and even so uneth or hardly may the bottom of their sense be sounded. But if you consider what is written or said by them, who endeavour to search unto the very bottom, what every one of these sentences doth comprehend, you shall finde that hardly a man shall meet with orations longer then they. Now the dialect or speech of Pythia is such, as the Mathematicians define a straight and direct line, namely, the shortest that may be between two points: and even so it bendeth not, it crookeneth not, it maketh no circle, it carrieth no double sense and ambiguity, but goeth straight to the truth; and say it be subject to censure and examination, and dangerous to be misconstrued and beleaved amisse: yet to this day it hath never given advantage whereby it might be convinced of untruth: but in the meane time, it hath furnished all this temple full of rich gifts, presents and oblations, not onely of Greeke nations, but also of barbarous people, as also adorned it with the beautiful buildings and magnificent fabricks of the amphictyons. For you see in some sort, many buildings adjoined which were not before, and as many repaired and restored to their ancient perfection, which were either fallen to decay and ruined by continuance of time, or else lay confusedly out of order. And like as we see, that neere unto great trees that spread much and prosper well, other smaller plants and shrubs grow and thrive: even so together with the city of Delphos, Pylaea flourisheth, as being fed and maintained by the abundance and affluence, which ariseth from hence, in such sort as it beginneth to have the forme and shew of solemne sacrifices of stately meetings and sacred waters, such as in a thousand yeeres before it could never get the like. As for those that inhabited about Galaxion in Beotia, they found and felt the gracious presence and favour of our God by the great plenty and store of milke, For,

*From all their ewes thicke milke did spin,
As water fresh from lively spring:
Their rubs and tunnes with milke therein
Brim full they all, home fast did bring:
No barrels, bottels, pails of wood,
But full of milke in houses stood.*

But to us he giveth better marks, and more evident tokens and apparent signes of his presence and favour, than these be; having brought our country (as it were) from drinnesse and penurie, from desert & waste wilderness, wherein it was before, to be now rich and plentiful, frequented and peopled, yea and to be in that honor and reputation, wherein we see it at this day to flourish. Certes, I love my selfe much better, for that I was so well affected, as to put to my helping hand so in this businesse, together with Polyrates and Petræus: Yea and him also I love in my heart, who was the first author unto us of this government and policy, and who tooke the paines and endeavoured to set on foot and establish most part of these things. But impossible it was, that in so small a time there should be seene so great and so evident a mutation by any industry of man whatsoever, if God himselfe had not bene assistant to sanctifie and honour this oracle. But like as in those times past, some men there were who found fault with the ambiguity, obliquity and obscurity of oracles; so there be in these daies, others, who like sycophants cavill at the over-much simplicitie of them; whose humorous passion is injurious and exceeding foolish. For even as little children take more joy and pleasure to see rainbowed, haloes or garlands about the Sunne, Moone, &c. yea, and comets or blasing starres, than they do to behold the Sunne himselfe or the Moone; so these persons desire to have enigmaticall and darke speeches, obscure allegories, and wrested metaphors, which are all reflexions of divination upon the fanle and apprehension of our mortall conceit. And if they understand not sufficiently, the cause of this change and alteration, they go their waies, and are ready to condemne the God, and not either us or themselves, who are not able by discourse of reason to reach unto the counsell and intention of the said gods.

OF THE DÆMON OR FAMILIAR SPIRIT OF SOCRATES.

The Summarie.

He Thebans having lost their freedom and liberty by the violent proceedings of Archias, Leontidas and other tyrants, who banished a great number of good citizens and men of worth, in which roll and catalogue Pelopidas was one (as appeareth in the storie of his life, wherein Plutarch writeth of all this matter at large) it fell out at last, that the exiled persons tooke heart, drew to an head, and wrought so, as they reentred the city of Thebes, slew the tyrants, and displaced the garrison of the Spartans. Which done, they dispatched their ambassages to other States and Common wealths of Greece, for to justifie their action; and namely, among the rest, they sent Caphisias to Athens: who being there, at the request of Archidamus a personage of great authoritie, related and reported the returne of the banished men, the surprising of the tyrants, and the restoring of the citie to their ancient franchises; and that with discourses wonderfull pathetically, and such as shew the singular providence of God in the preservation of States, and confusion of such wicked members as disturbe the publike peace. But in thurtcitall, there inserted, and that with good grace, a digression as touching the familiar spirit of Socrates, by occasion of a Pythagorean Philosopher newly come out of Italie to Thebes, for to take up the bones of Lylis: for by occasion that Galaxidorus the Epicurean denied the superstition of this stranger, prising withall the wisdom and learning of Socrates, who had cleared and delivered Philosophie from all fantastical illusions of spirits and ghosts, Theocritus bringeth in an example of a certaine prediction of this familiar spirit. But withall, when the other had demanded the question, whether the same were an humane and naturall thing or no, the disputation began so kinde and waxe hote; untill such time as Epaminondas and this stranger named Theanor came in place: and then they fell into a discourse of portents and riches, by occasion that Theanor offered silver unto the Thebans, in recompense of their kindest and good entertainment shewed unto Lylis. And as they would have proceeded forward in this argument, there came one who ministred occasion for to returne unto the former narration as touching the enterprise and exploit of the said exiled persons: in which there is intermingled againe a treatise concerning the familiar of Socrates, with a large recitall of the fable of Timarchus. After which, Caphisias rehearseth the issue of the tragædie of the tyrants, shewing thoroughout, notable discourses of the divine wisdom, and joining therewith a consideration of Socrates his wisdom, guiding and directing to a particular plot for the good of all Greece. But in this place thereader

der must remember and call to minde who this Socrates was; to wit, a man destitute of the true knowledge of God, and therefore he is to holde for suspected and naught this familiar spirit of his, if a man would receive and admit the opinion of some interloquutors, who suppose it was a Demon or spirit from without; to the end that we should not rest upon revelation, inspirations and guidances of angels, unlesse it be of such, the testimonies whereof are grounded upon the holy scripture; but ste from the profane curiositie of certaine fantastical heads, who by their books published abroad in print, have dared to revive and raise up againe this false opinion (which some in this age of ours have) of familiar spirits, by whom they are forsooth as well advised and as surely taught and instructed, as by the very spirit of God, speaking unto us by his written word.

OF THE DÆMON OR familiar spirit of Socrates.

Have heard (as I remember) ô Caphisias, a pretty speech of a certaine painter making a comparison of those who came to see the pictures and tables which he had painted: for he was wont to say, that the ignorant beholders and such as had no skill at all in the art of painting, resembled them who saluted a whole multitude of people all at once; but the better sort and such as were skillfull, were like unto those who used to salve every one whom they met, severally by name: for that the former had no exquisite insight into the works, but a superficial and generall knowledge onely; whereas the other contrariwise, judging every piece and part thereof, will not misse one jote, but peruse, consider and censure that which is well done or otherwise. Semblably it falleth out in my judgement, as touching true actions indeed, which are not painted. The conceit and understanding of the more idle and carelesse persons resteth in this bare knowledge, in case they conceive only the summary and issue of a thing; but that of studious and diligent persons, and lovers of faire and goodly things, like unto a judicious and excellent spectator of vertue, as of some great and singular art, taketh more pleasure to heare the particularities in speciall: for that the end of matters, ordinarily, hath many things common with fortune; but the good wit is better scene in causes, & in the vertue of particular occurrences & affaires which are presented; as when valour sheweth it selfe not attonied, but considerate and well advised in the greatest perils; where the discourse of reason is mingled with passion, which the sudden occasion of danger presented doth bring. Supposing then, that we also are of this kinde of spectators, declare you to us now in order from the beginning, how this matter did passe and proceed in the execution thereof, as also what talke and discourse was held there; for that by all likelihood you were present: and for mine owne part, so desirous I am to heare, that I would not faile to go 40 as farre as to Thebes for the knowledge thereof, were it not, that I am thought already of the Athenians, to favorise the Boeotians more than I should.

CAPHISIAS.

Certes, Archidamus, since you are so earnest and forward to learne how these affaires were managed, I ought in regard of the good will which you beare unto us; before any businesse whatsoever (as Pindarus saith) to have come hither, exprelly for to relate the same unto you: but since we are hither come in embassage already, and at good leasure, whiles we attend what answer and dispatch the people of Athens will give us, in making it strange and goodly, and refusing to satisfie so civill a request of a personage so kinde and well affectionate to his friends, were as much as to revive the olde reproch imputed upon the Boeotians, to wit, that they hate 50 good letters and learned discourses; which reproch began to weare away with your Socrates, and in so doing, it seemeth that we treat of affaires with two priests: and therefore see, whether the Seigniors here present be disposed to heare the report of so many speeches and actions; for the narration will not be short, considering that you will me to adjoine thereto the words that passed also.

ARCHIDAMUS.

You know not the men, ô Caphisias, and yet well worthy they are to be known; for noble Iiiii 2 persons

persons they had to their fathers, and those who had been well affected to our country. As for him (pointing to Lyfihides) he is (quoth he) the nephew of Thrasibulus; but he here, is Timotheus the sonne of Conon: those there, be the children of Archinus; and the other, our familiar friends. So that you shall be sure to have a well willing auditors, and such as will take pleasure to heare this narration.

CAPHISIAS.

You say well. But where were I best to begin my speech, in regard of those matters that ye have already heard and known, which I would not willingly repeat?

ARCHIDAMUS.

We know reasonably well, in what state the citie of Thebes stood, before the returne of the banished persons; and namely, how Archias and Leontidas had secret intelligence, and conspired with Phæbidas the Lacedæmonian captaine, whom they perswaded, during the time of truce, to surprize the castle of Cadmus; and how having executed this disservice, they drave some citizens out of the city, and put others in prison, or held the men in awe, whilst themselves ruled tyrannically and with violence. Whereof I had intelligence, because I was (as you wot well) host to Meton and Pelopidas, with whom (so long as they were in exile) I was inwardly acquainted and conversed familiarly. Moreover, we have heard already, how the Lacedæmonians condemned Phæbidas to pay a great fine, for that he had seized the fort Cadmia, and how they put him by, and kept him from the journey and expedition of Olynthus, and sent thither in stead of him, Lysanoridas with two other captaines, and planted a stronger garrison within the castle. Furthermore, we know very well, that Simenias died not the fairest kinde of death, presently upon I wot not what proceesse framed, and an action commenced against him, for that Gorgias advertised the banished who were here, by letters, from time to time, of all matters that passed; in such sort, as there remaineth for you to relate, nothing els, but the returne of the said banished men, and the surprizing or apprehension of the tyrants.

CAPHISIAS.

About that time (Archidamus) all we that were of the confederacie and conspired together, used ordinarily to meet in the house of Simmias, by occasion that he was retired and in cure of a wound which he had received in his leg, where we conferred secretly of our affaires as need required; but in shew openly, discoursed of matters of learning and Philosophy, drawing so unto us often times into our companie, Archias and Leontidas, men who misliked not such conferences and communications, because we would remove all suspicion of such conventicles. For Simmias having abode long time in forren parts among the Barbarians, being returned to Thebes but a little while before, was full of all manner of newes and strange reports as touching those barbarous nations; in so much, as Archias when he was at leisure, willingly gave eare to his discourses and narrations, sitting in the company of us young gentlemen, as being well pleased that we should give our mindes to the study of good letters and learning, rather than busie our heads about those matters which they went about and practised in the meane while. And the very day on which late in the evening, and toward darke night following, the exiled persons above said were come closely under the wall, there arrived from thence unto us a messenger, whom Pherenicus sent, one who was unknown to us all, unless it were to Charon, who brought us word, that to the number of twelve young gentlemen, and those the bravest gallants of all the banished conspirators, were already with the hounds hunting in the forest Cithæron, intending to be here in the evening; and that therefore they had sent before and dispatched a vauncourier of purpose, as well to advertise us thereof, as to be certified themselves who it was that should make his house ready for them to lie secret and hidden therein when they were once come; to the end that upon this foreknowledge they might sit forward and go directly thither. Now as we studied and tooke some deliberation about this point, Charon of himselfe offered his house: whereupon, when the messenger intended to returne immediately & with great speed to the exiles, Theocritus the soothsaier gripping me fast by the hand, & casting his eie upon Charon so that went before: This man (quoth he) Capfissus, is no Philosopher nor deepe scholar, neither is he come to any excellent or exquisite knowledge above others, as his brother Epaminondas, and yet you see how being naturally enclined, and directed withall by the Lawes, unto honor and vertue, he exposeth himselfe willingly unto danger of death, for the deliverie and setting free of his country; whilst Epaminondas, who hath had better meanes of instruction and education to the attaining of vertue, than any other Boeotian whatsoever, is resolute, dull, and backward,

when the question is of executing any great enterprize for the deliverance of his native country. And to what occasion of service shall he ever be so well disposed, prepared and employed, than this? Vnto whom I made answer in this wise: We for our parts, most kinde and gently Theocritus, doe that which hath bene thought good, resolved and concluded upon among our selves, but Epaminondas having not yet perswaded us, according as he thinketh it better himselfe, not to put these our designements in execution, hath good reason to goe against that where-with his nature repugneth, and so he approveth not the designement whereunto he is moved and invited. For it were unreasonable to force & compell a physician, who promiseth & undertaketh to cure a disease, without lancet & fire, for to proceed to incision, cutting & cauterizing. Why (quoth Theocritus) doth not he approve of the conspiracie? No (quoth I) neither alloweth he that any citizens should be put to death, unless they were condemned first judicially by order of law: many, he saith, that if without massacre and effusion of citizens blood they would enterprize the deliverance of the city, he would assist and aide them right willingly. Seeing then that he was not able to induce us for to beleve his reasons, but that we followed still our owne course, he requireth us to let him alone pure, innocent, and unpolluted with the blood of his citizens, and to suffer him for to espie and attend some better occasions and opportunities, by means whereof with justice he might procure the good of the weale publicke. For murder (quoth he) will not containe it selfe within limits as it ought: but Pherenicus happily and Pelopidas, may bend their force principally upon the authors and heads of the tyranny, and wicked persons: but you shall have some such as Eumolpidas and Samidas hot stomacked men, set on fire with choler and desire of revenge, who taking liberty by the vantage of the night, will not lay downe their armes, nor put up their swords, until they have filled the whole city with bloodshed, and murdered many of the best and principall citizens.

As I thus devised and communed with Theocritus, Anaxidorus overhearing some of our words (for nere he was unto us:) Stay (quoth he) and hold your peace, for I see Archias & Lysanoridas the Spartan captaine coming from the castle Cadmia, and it seemeth that they make haste directly toward us. Heereupon we paused and were still: with that Archias calling unto Theocritus, and bringing him apart by himselfe unto Lysanoridas, talked with him a long while, drawing him aside a little out of the way, under the temple of Amphion; in such sort, as we were in an extreme agony & perplexity, for feare lest they had an inkling or suspicion of our enterprize, or that something were discovered: & thereupon they examined Theocritus. As these matters thus passed, Phyllidas (whom you Archidamus know) who was then the principall secretary or scribe under Archias, at that time captaine generall of the armie, being desirous of the approach of the conspirators, & withal both privy and party with us in the complot, came in place and rooke me (as his manner was) by the hand, beginning with open mouth to mocke our exercises of the body and our wrestling: but afterward, drawing me aside, a good way from the others, asked me whether the banished persons would keepe that appointed day or no? I made him answer, Yea. Then have I (quoth he) to very good purpose prepared a feast this day for to entertaine Archias in my house, and so to deliver him with ease into their hands, when he shall have eaten freely, and drunke wine merrily. Passing well done (quoth I) Phyllidas: but I beseech you withall, for to bring together all our enemies, or as many as you can. That is no easie matter (quoth he) to compass, but rather altogether impossible. For Archias hoping that some great lady of honor and estate will come thither unto him, in no wise can abide that Leontidas should be there, so that of necessity we must divide them into sundry houses. Now if Archias and Leontidas both, be once apprehended, I suppose that the rest will soone flie, or else remaine quiet, and be very highly contented if any man will grant them safety and security of their lives. Well (quoth I) we will so doe: but I pray you, what business have they with Theocritus, that they are so long in talke with him? I know not for a truth (quoth Phyllidas) but I have heard that there be certaine prodigious signes of unluckie and unfortunate presage unto the citie of Sparta.

When Theocritus was returned unto us againe, Phidolam the Haliertian coming toward us: Simmias (quoth he) requesteth you to stay here a while for his sake: for he is an intercessor in the behalfe of Amphitem by the means of Leontidas, that his life may be pardoned, and that instead of death, the man might be banished. This is fallen out (quoth Theocritus) in very good time and fitly to the purpose as a man would have it: for I was minded to enquire of you what things were found within the tombe of Alemena, and what shew it carried when it was opened a-

among you: and also whether you were present when Agessilaus sent of purpose for to translate and carry the reliques unto Sparta. Present I was not my selfe Phidolam in person: and I was very much angry and offended with my fellow citizens, in that I was so discarded and left out. Howbeit found there was with the bones and other reliques of the corps, a certaine carquenet of brasse, and that of no great bignesse, and two earthen pots, containing amphors a piece full of earth which in continuance of time was growen hard and converted into stone.

Over the sepulcher there was a table of brasse likewise, wherein were written many letters, and thofe of a strange and wonderfull forme, as being of right great antiquity: for nothing could we pick out of them, notwithstanding the letters appeared very well, after that the brasse was faire washed and scoured cleane, the characters were of such a making by themselves, after a barbarous fashion, and resembling nearest those of the Aegyptians. Whereupon Agessilaus also, as men say, sent a copy of them unto the king of Aegypt, praying him to shew the same unto their priests, to see whether they understood them or no? But peradventure of these matters Simmius also is able to tell us some newes, because about that time he conversed much with the said priests in points of Philosophie. And those of the citie Alartus are of opinion, that their great sterility, and scarcitie, as also the swelling and inundation of the lake hapned not by chance, but was the vengeance divine upon those who suffered the monument of this sepulchre to be digged up and opened. Then Theocritus after he had paused a little: The Lacedaemonians likewise (quoth he) seeme to have beene threatened by the ire of the gods, as the prodigious signes and tokens presage no lesse, whereof Lysanoridas ere while talked with me: who even now is gone into the citie Alartus, to cause the said monument to be filled up againe, and there to offer certaine funerall effusions and libaments, to the ghost of Alenema and Aleus, according to a certaine oracle; but who this Aleus should be, he knoweth not: and so soone as he is from thence returned, he must search also the sepulchre of Diree, which none of the Thebanes doe know, unless they be those who have beene captaines of the horsemen. For looke who goeth out of this office, taketh with him his successor that entrencheth into his place, by night, and when they two be alone together, he sheweth it unto him, and there they performe certaine religious ceremonies without fire, the tokens and marks whereof, they shuffie together, and confound so, as they be not seene; which done, they depart in the darke, and goe divers waies, one from the other. But for mine owne part, Phidolam, I beleve verily he will never finde it out, for the most of those who have beene lawfully called to the captainship of the cavallerie, or to say more truly, even all of them are in exile, except Gorgidas and Plato, whom they will never aske the question, because they are afraid of them. And as for those who are now in place, well may they take the lance and the signet within the castle of Calamus; for otherwise they neither know nor can shew ought. As Theocritus spake these words, Leontidas went forth with his friends; and we entering in, saluted Simmius, being set upon his bed, but I suppose he had not obtained his request, for very penfive and heavie he was; and looking willy in the face upon us all, he brake out into these words: O Hercules, what a world is this, to see the barbarous and savage maners of men? And was not this then a very good answer made by old Thales, who being returned home, after a long voiage, from out of a forren country, and demanded what was the strangest newes that he could make relation of? answered: That he had seene a tyrant live to be an old man. For thus you see, that himselfe who in his owne particular, had never received wrong by a tyrant, yet in regard of the odious trouble, in conversing and having to doe with them, is offended and become an enemy to all soveraigne and absolute governments, which are not subject to render an account unto the lawes. But haply God will see to these matters, and provide in time convenient. But know you (Caphisias) who this stranger may be, that is come unto you? I wot not (quoth he) whom you meane. Why (quoth he) Againe, Leontidas came and told us of a man, who was seene by night to arise from about the tombe of Lysis, accompanied in stately wise, with a great traine of men, in good order; and well appointed, who lodged there and lay upon pallets: for that there were to be seene in the morning little beds hard by the ground, made of chaff tree and of heath or lings. There remained also the tokens of fire, and of the libaments and oblations of milke. Moreover betimes in the morning he demanded of all passengers whom he met, where he should finde the children of Polymnius dwelling in that country? And what stranger might this be (quoth I): for by your report he should be some great personage, and not a private man and of meane degree. Not so (quoth Phidolam) but when he comes welcome he shall be, and we will receive him courteously, ously. But for this present, if peradventure Simmius, you know any thing more than we, concerning those letters whereof we were of late in doubt, declare it unto us: for it is said that the priests of Aegypt understood by conference together the letters of a certaine table of brasse, which Agessilaus not long since had from us, at what time as he caused the tombe of Alenema to be opened. I have not (quoth Simmius, calling another matter presently to minde) seene this said table, Phidolam: but Agotriadas the Spartan carrying with him many letters from Agessilaus came to the city Memphis and went unto the prophet Chonuphis, with whom we conferred as touching Philosophie, and abode together a certaine time, my selfe I meane, and Plato, with Ellepion the Peparethian. Thither I say arrived he as sent from king Agessilaus, who requested Chonuphis, that if he understood any thing of those letters which were written in the said brasse, he would interpret the same, and send it backe unto him incontinently. So this prophet was musing and studying three daies together by himselfe, perusing and turning all sorts of figures and characters of ancient letters: and in the end wrote backe his answer unto king Agessilaus, and by word of mouth told us, that the said writing gave direction and commandement unto the Greeks, to celebrate the feast, and solemnize the plaies and games in the honor of the Muses: also that the forme of those characters, were the very same which had beene used at the time when Protem reigned in Aegypt, which Hercules the sonne of Amphitryon learned: and that God by those letters advised and admonished the Greeks to live in peace and repose, instituting certaine games unto the Muses, for the study of Philosophie and good literature, and disputing one against another continually, with reasons and arguments as touching justice, laying armes cleane aside. As for us, we thought verily even then at the very first, that Chonuphis said well and truly; but much rather, when in our returne out of Aegypt, as we passed along Caria, certaine persons of the Isle Delos, met us upon the way, who requested Plato (as he was a man well seene and exercised in Geometrie) to explaine the meaning unto them of a certaine strange oracle, & hard to be understood; which god Apollo had given them: the tenour whereof was this: That the Delians and all other Greeke nations, should have a cessation & end of all their present troubles and calamities, when they had once doubled the altar which stood in the temple at Delos: for they being not able to guesse nor imagine what the substance and meaning should be, of this answer delivered by the oracle; and besides, making themselves ridiculous, when they thought to double the fabricke and building of the altar (for when they had doubled each side of the foure, they were not ware how by augmentation they made a solid bodie, eight times as bigge as it was before, and that by ignorance of the proportion, which in length yeeldeth the double) they had recourse unto Plato, for to be relolved of this difficulty. Then he calling to minde the foresaid Aegyptian priest, said unto them: that the god plaied with the Greeks, for despising good sciences; reproching them for their ignorance, and commanding them in good earnest to study Geometrie, and not curiously after a superficiall maner; for that it was a matter and worke, not of a depravate conceit, nor of a troubled and dimme understanding, but sufficiently exercised, and perfectly seene in the sciences of Lines; to find of two lines one middle proportioned, which is the onely means to double the figure of a cubicke body, being augmented equally in all dimensions: And as for these (quoth he) Eudoxus the Cnidian, or Helicon the Cyzicenian, hath performed sufficiently unto you: howbeit, we are not to thinke that the god hath need of any such duplication, neither was it, that which he meant, but he commanded the Greeks to give over armes for to converse with the Muses; in dulcing their passions by the study of good literature, and the sciences, and so to couple and carie themselves, as that they might profit, and not hurt one another. But whiles Simmius thus spake, my father Polymnius entred the place, and sat him downe close unto Simmius, beginning thus to speake: Epaminondas (quoth he) requesteth both you, and all the rest that be here, unless your busynesse otherwise be the greater, not to faile, but heere to stay; as being desirous to make you acquainted with this stranger, who is of himselfe a gentle person, and withall, is higher come with a generous and honest intention (being one of the Pythagorian Philosophers) from out of Italy, and his arrivall into these parts, as by occasion of certaine visions and dreames as he saith, yea, and evident apparitions admonishing him to powre and offer unto the good seignior Lysis, upon his tombe, those libaments which are due unto men departed: and having brought with him a good quantitie of gold, he supposeth that he is bound to make recompense unto Epaminondas, for the charges which he was at in keeping & maintaining good Lysis in his old age, and most ready he is, without our request, and against our will, to succour our need and poverty.

vertie. Simmius taking great pleasure to hear this: You tell us (quoth he) of a wonderfull man indeed, and such an one as is worthy of Philosophy: but what is the reason that he came not directly unto us? Because (quoth he) he tooke up lodging last night about the sepulchre of Lyfius; and as I take it, Epaminondas hath led him to the river Ismenus, for to wash; but from thence they will come both together unto us: but before that he spake with us, he lodged upon the tombe of Lyfius, with a purpose as I thinke, to take up the bones and reliques of his body, for to cary with him backe into Italy, unless there were some spirit or daemon impeached him in the night: When my father had thus much said, he held his tongue: and then Galaxidorus: O Hercules (quoth he) how hard a matter is it to finde a man who is altogether free from vanitie, and in whom there is no spice of superstition? For some there be, who even against their willes are otherwhiles surprisid with these passions, by reason either of ignorance or infirmity: others againe, to the end they might be thought more religious, more devout, and better beloved of the gods, upon a singularity, referre all their actions to the gods, as the authors thereof, preferring before all the inventions that came into their minde, dreames and fantasticall apparitions, and all such foolish toies and vanities; which peradventure is not unbecoming nor unprofitable for politicians and statists, who are forced to frame themselves to a stubberne & disordinate multitude, for to reclaime and to pull backe the common & vulgar sort by superstition, as it were by the bit of a bridle, unto that which is expedient for them. But this maske seemeth not onely undecent and unseemly for Philosophy, but also contrary to the profession thereof, which promisseth to teach us all that which is good and profitable with reason, and afterwards referreth the beginning of our actions unto the gods, as if it condemned reason and disgraced the prooffe of demonstration, wherein it seemeth to be most excellent turning aside to I wot not what oracles and visions in dreames, wherein oftentimes the wickedest man in the world, findeth as much as the very best. And therefore in mine opinion our Socrates, & Simmius, used that manner of teaching which is most worthy and befitting a Philosopher, to wit, simple, plaine, without all fiction, chusing it as most free and friendly unto the truth, rejecting and turning upon the Sophisters, all such vanity, as the very fume and smoake of Philosophy. Then Theocritus taking his turne to speake: How now (quoth he) Galaxidorus, hath Melitus perswaded you, as well as he made the judges beleieve, that Socrates dis-familiar spirit of Socrates, and drew along with them Charillus the plaiur upon the flute, who was then come with me to Athens, for to visit Cebes. Now when they went by the shops of the imagers, neere the common halles and courts of justice, they might see before them a mightie heard of hogges, as thicke as one might stand by another, full of dirt and mire, and bearing downe all before them, by reason of their great number; and for that there was no meanes to turne aside from them, they overthrew some of the young men above said, and laid them along, on the ground, yea and all to be raied the rest of their fellows. Thus returned Charillus home to his lodging, with his legges, his thighs, and all his clothes, foully bedaubed with filthy dirt; in such sort, as he maketh us remember many times, and that with good laughing, the familiar band, who flying with him for company, along the mountaine Parnes, were overtaken and killed by our horsemen, for that they had taken another way of flight from the battell, and not, that he directed him unto by his angell or familiar spirit. And thus much I suppose that Simmas himselfe hath heard as well as I. True (quoth Simmas) I have heard it oftentimes, and of many persons, for upon this example and such like, the familiar spirit of Socrates was not a little spoken of in Athens. Why suffer we then, Simmas (quoth Phidolau) this Galaxidorus here, by way of jest and meriment, to debase so much, this so great a worke of divination, as to passe it away in I wot not what voices and sneefings: Which signes the vulgar sort of ignorant persons made use of by jest and mockerie, in small matters, and of no consequence: for when the question is of more greivous dangers, and affaires of greater importance; the saying is verified 10 of Euripides:

*Roman will play the fool, nor such vaine words
Cast out, so neere the edge and dint of swords.*

And Galaxidorus: If Simmas (quoth he) Phidolau, hath hard Socrates himselfe say ought of these matters, I am willing to give care and to pardon him with you: but for any thing that you (or Polymnis) have said, an easie matter it is to confute the same: for like as in Physicke, the beating of the pulse is no great matter in it selfe, nor a pimple or wheke: but signes they be both of the sight or voice of some bird, or a thin cloud running through the aire, signifieth some great winde or violent tempest in the sea: even so unto a propheticall and divining minde, a sneefing 20 or a voice spoken, in it selfe considered, is no such great matter, but signes these may be of most important accidents. For in no art nor science whatsoever, men doe despise the collection or judgement of many things by a few, nor of great matters by small: but like as if an ignorant person, who knoweth not the power of letters, seeing them few in number, and in forme vile and contemptible, could not beleve that a learned man was able to read and relate out of them long warres in times past, the foundations of cities, the acts of mighty kings, and their variable fortunes; and should say that there were something underneath, which tolde and declared unto the said Historian, every one of those matters in order; he might give good occasion of laughter & pleasantly to deride his ignorance unto as many as hard him (speake so: even so take heed and beware, lest we (for that we know not the vertue and efficacy of every signe and fore- 30 ken, in as much as they preface future things) be not foolishly angered, if some prudent and wise man by the same signes foretell somewhat as touching things unknown, and namely, if he say that it is not a voice nor a sneefing, but a familiar spirit, which hath declared the same unto him. For now come I to you Polymnis, who esteeme and admire Socrates as a personage, who by his plaine simplicity, without any counterfet vanity whatsoever, hath humanized as I may so say, Philosophy, and attributed it to humane reason, if he called not his signe that he went by, a voice or sneefing, but after a tragickall manner should name it a spirit familiar. For contrariwise, I would marvell rather that a man so well spoken as Socrates was, so eloquent, and who had all words to ready at command, should say that it was a voice or a sneefing, and not a divine spirit that taught him: as if one should say that himselfe was wounded by an arrow, and not with an 40 arrow by him who shot it, or that a poise was weighed by the balance, and not with a balance, by him that held or managed the balance in his hand: for the worke dependeth not upon the instrument, but upon him who hath the instrument, and useth it for to doe the worke: and even so the instrument is a kinde of signe used by that, which doth signify and prognosticate thereby. But as I have said already, we must listen what Simmas will say, as the man who knoweth this matter more exactly than others doe. You say true indeed (quoth Theocritus) but let us see first, who they be that enter heere in place: and the rather because Epaminondas is one, who seemeth to bring with him hither unto us the stranger above said. And when we looked all toward the gates, we might perceive Epaminondas indeed going before and leading the way, accompanied with Isenodorus, Bacchilidas and Melissus, the plaier upon the flute. The stranger followell af- 50 ter, a man of a good and ingenious countenance to see to, and who carried in his visage great mildnesse and humanity, & besides went in his apparel very gravely and decently. Now when he had taken his place and was set downe close unto Simmas, and my brother next unto me, and all the rest as every one thought good: after silence made, Simmas addressing his speech unto my brother: Go to now Epaminondas, (quoth he) what stranger is this, from whence cometh he, and what may be his name? for this is the ordinary beginning and usuall entrance to farther knowledge knowledge and acquaintance. His name (quoth my brother) is Theanor or Simmas: a man borne in the city Croton, one of them who in those parts professe Philosophy, and did redireth not the glory of great Pythagoras: but is come hither from out of Italy, a long journey, to confirme by good works, his good doctrine and profession. But you Epaminondas, your selfe (quoth the stranger then) hinder me from doing, of all good deeds, the best. For if it be an honest thing for a man to doe good unto his friends, dishonest it cannot be to receive good at their hands: for in thanks there is as much need of a receiver as of a giver, being a thing composed of them both, and tending to a vertuous worke: and he that receiveth not a good turne, as a tennis ball fairly sent unto him, disgraceth it much, suffering it to fall short and light upon the ground. 10 For what marke is there that a man shooteth at which he is so glad to hit and so sorry to misse, as this, that one worthy of a benefit & good turne, he either hath it accordingly, or faileth thereof unworthily? And yet in this comparison, he that there, in shooting at the marke which standeth still, and misseth it, is in fault; but heere, he who refuseth and flieth from it, is he that doth wrong and injury unto the grace of a benefit, which by his refusal, it cannot attaine to that which it tendeth unto. As for the causes of this my voyage hither, I have already shewed unto you; and desirous I am to rehearse them againe unto these gentlemen heere present, that they may be just- 20 ges in my behalfe against you. When the colleges and societies of the Pythagorean Philosophers, planted in every city of our country, were expelled by the strong hand of the seditious faction of the Cyclonians, when those who kept still together were assembled and held a coun- sell in the city of Metapontine, the seditious set the house on fire on every side, where they were met: and burnt them altogether except Phidolau and Lyffis, who being yet young, active and able of body, put the fire by and escaped through it. And Phidolau being retired into the country of the Laconians, saved himselfe among his friends, who began already to rally themselves and grow to an head, yea, and to have the upper hand of the said Cyclonians. As for Lyffis, long it was ere any man knew what was become of him, untill such time as Gorgias the Leontine being failed backe againe out of Greece into Sicilie, brought certaine newes unto Areteus, that he had spoken with Lyffis, and that he made his abode in the city of Thebes. Whereupon Areteus minded incontinently to embarke and take the sea; so desirous he was to see the man: but finding himselfe for feeblenesse and age together, very unable to performe such a voyage, he 30 tooke order expressly upon his death bed with his friends to bring him over alive if it were possible into Itale, or at leastwise, if haply he were dead before, to convey his bones and reliques over. But the warres, seditions, troubles and tyrannies that came betwene and were in the way, impeached those friends, that they could not (during his life) accomplish this charge that he had laied upon them: but after that, the spirit or ghost of Lyffis now departed, appearing visibly unto us, gave intelligence of his death, and when report was made unto us, by them who knew the certaine truth, how liberally he was entertained and kept with you, Polymnis, and namely, in a poore house, where he was held and reputed as one of the children, and in his old 40 agerichly maintained, and so died in blessed estate, I being a young man, was sent alone from many others of the ancient sort, who have store of money, and be willing to bestow the same upon you who want it, in recompense of that great favor and gracious friendship of yours extended to him. As for Lyffis, worshipfully he was entered by you, and bestowed in an honourable sepulchre, but yet more honourable for him will be that confesse, which by way of recom- 50 pense is given to his friend, by other friends of his and kinsholke.

Whiles the stranger spake thus, the teares trickled downe my fathers checks, and he wept a good while for the remembrance of Lyffis. But my brother smiling upon me, as his manner was: How shall we do now Caphisias, quoth he; shall we cast off and abandon our poverty for money, and so say no more, but keepe silence? In no wise (quoth I) let us not quit and forsake our olde friend, and to good a foistresse of young folke: but defend you it, for your turne it is now to 50 speake. And yet I (quoth he) my father, feare not that our house is pregnable for money, unlessse it be in regard onely of Caphisias, who may seeme to have some need of a faire robe, to shew himselfe brave and gallant unto those that make love unto him, who are in number to many, as also of plenty of viands and food, to the end that he may endure the toile and travell of bodily exercises and combats which he must abide in the wrestling schooles. But seeing this other heere, of whom I had more distrust, doth not abandon povertie, nor fasheth out the hereditary indigence of his father and house, as a tincture and unseemly staine; but although he be yet a young man, repureth himselfe gaily set out and adorned with frugality, taking a pride therein, and and resting contented with his present fortunes: Wherein should we any more employ our gold and silver, if we had it, and what use are we to make of it? What, would you have us to gild our armor, and cover our shields as Nicias the Athenian did, with purple and gold intermingled therewith? And shall we buy for you, father, a faire mantle of the fine rich cloth of Adieu, and for my mother, a trim coat of scarlet coloured with purple? For surely we will never abuse this present, in pampering our bellie, in feasting our selves, and making more sumptuous cheere than ordinary, by receiving riches into our house as a costly and chargeable guest? Fie upon that, my sonne (quoth my father) God forbid I should ever see such a change in mine house. Why (quoth he againe) we will not sit stil in the house, keeping riches with watch and ward idle: for so the benefit were not beneficiall, but without all grace, and the possession thereof dishonorable. To what end then shall we receive it, quoth my father. It seemed of late (quoth Epaminondas) unto Jason a captaine of the Theffalians, that I made him an uncivill and rustical answer, when he sent hither a great masse of gold, and requested me to take it as a gift: for I charged him plainly, that he did me great wrong, and began to picke a quarrell with me, in that he affecting and aspiring to a monarchie, came with money to tempt & solicit me a plaine citizen, of a free city, and living under the lawes. But as for you sir, who are come unto us as a stranger, I approve your good will, for it is honest, vertuous and becomming a Philosopher, yea, and I love and embrace it singularly well: but this I must needs say unto you, that you bring medicines and physicke drogues to men that are not sicke and aile nothing. Like as therefore, if you hearing that our enemies warred upon us, were come to bring us harnesse, armes and weapons as so well defensive as offensive for our succour; and being arrived and landed in these parts, should finde all quiet, and that we lived in peace and amitie with our neighbours, you would not thinke that ye ought to give or leave the said armes among them that had no need nor desire thereof: even so, come you are to aide us against povertie, as if we were afflicted and distressed thereby: but it is cleane contrary, for we can beare it with ease, and well content we are to have it dwell with us still in the house: and therefore we feele no want either of money or munition, against her that doth us no displeasure. But this message you shall cary backe unto your fellows and brethren in the same profession beyond sea, that as they use their goods and riches most honestly and in the best manner, so they have friends here also, that can make use of their poverty as well. Now for the keeping, funerals & sepulture of Lysis, he hath himselfe sufficiently paid us there: before and discharged all, in that among many other good instructions, he taught us, not to be afraid of povertie, nor to take it in ill part. To this, Theamor replied in this manner: Doeth it (I pray you) bewray a base minde and want of courage, to feare povertie? and is it not as absurd and as great a default in judgement, to dread and eschue riches? in case (I say) a man, not upon any sound reason, but for outward disguised shew, and in a foolish humor of vanitie, refuse and reject it. And what reason is there, to dissuade and debarre the getting and possession of goods, by all just and honest means, as Epaminondas useth? But rather, forasmuch as you are ready enough in your answeres, as appeareth by that which you made as touching this point, unto Jason the Theffalian, I demand of you first, Epaminondas, whether you thinke any kinde of giving money to be just and lawfull; but no manner of taking? or that simply, both givers and takers do offend and sinne? Not so, quoth Epaminondas: but of this opinion I am, that as of other things, so of riches likewise, there is one giving and possessing, that is civill and honest; and another, dishonest and shamefull. Well then, quoth Theamor, what say you of him who giveth willingly and with a good heart, that which he ought: doeth he not give it well? The other granted and confessed it. Go to then, quoth Theamor, he who receiveth that which is given well and honestly, doth he not take it honestly also? or can there be a more just and lawfull taking of money, than that which is received of him who giveth righteously? I suppose (quoth Epaminondas) there can not be. Betweene two friends therefore (quoth he) Epaminondas, if the one may give, the other likewise may justly take: for in battels I confesse, a man ought to turne away and decline from that enemy of whom he hath received some pleasure; but in the case of benefits and good turnes, it is neither seemly nor honest, either to avoid or to reject that friend that giveth well and honestly. No in trueth, quoth Epaminondas; but you are to consider with us, thus much, That there being in us many lusts and desires, and those of sundry things; some are naturall and (as they say) inbred, budding and breeding in our flesh and about our bodies, for the entertainment of those pleasures which be necessary; others be strangers, proceeding from vaine opinions, which gathering strength and force by tract of time and long custome in bad

nouriture, grow to such an head, that many times they plucke downe and holde our soules in subjection more forcibly and with greater violence, than doe those naturall before said, Now reason, by good use and vertuous exercise, minisreth means, that a man may draw away and spend many of those very passions which are inbred within us; but he had need to employ all the power and strength of custome and exercise against those other concupiscences which be forerunners and come from without forth, for to consume, cut off and chastice them, by all means of repressions and retentions that be reasonable. For if the resistance which reason maketh against the appetite of eating and drinking, forceth many times and conquereth both hunger and thirst; far more easie is it, to cut off avarice and ambition, by forbearing and abstaining those things which the fame do covet, so farre forth, as in the end they will be discomfited and subdued. How say you, thinke you not that it is so? The stranger confessed no lesse. See you not then, quoth he againe, that there is a difference betweene an exercise, and the worke unto which the exercise is addressed? And like as of the art which teacheth how to exercise the body, a man may say, that the worke is the emulation, strife and contention to win the prize of the crowne against the concurrent or adversarie; but the exercise thereof, is the preparation that the champion makes, for to have his body apt, nimble and active thereto by continual trials of matters: even so you will grant, that a difference there is betweene vertue and the exercise of vertue. The stranger said yea unto it. Then tell me first and formost, quoth he, To abstaine from vile, filthy and unlawfull lusts, what thinke you, is it an exercise unto continency, or rather the very worke it selfe, and proofe of continency? The very worke and proofe, I take it to be, quoth he againe: and the exercise and accustomance to sobriety, temperance and continency, is not that which you all practise, when after you have travelled your bodies, and like brute beasts provoked your appetites, you sit downe to meat, and there continue a long time, having your tables before you furnished with exquisit viands of all sorts, but touch not one dish, leaving them afterwards for your servants to engorge themselves therewith and make merry; when you the while present some little thing, and that plaine and simple, unto your appetites, which are already dulled and quenched: for the abstinence from pleasures and delights permitted, is it not an exercise against such as are forbidden? Yes verily, quoth the stranger. There is then (quoth he) my friend, a certaine exercise of justice against avarice and covetousnesse of money; and that is not, to forbear in night season to rob and spoile our neighbours houses, or to strip passengers out of their clothes: no, nor if a man doe not betray his country or friends for a piece of money, is he truly said to inure and exercise himselfe against avarice: for haply the law and feare doth bridle and restraine his covetous desire from doing wrong or hurt to another: but he, who many times abstaineth from taking just gaires, and such as are granted and permitted him by the lawes, he willingly exerciseth and woonteth himselfe to keepe farre from any unjust and unlawfull taking of money. For neither is it possible, that in great pleasures, and those wicked and pernicious, the soule should containe herselfe from the appetite thereof, if many times before, being in full libertie to enjoy them, she did not despise the fame: nor easie for a man to passe over & contemne wicked takings & great gaires presented, who long before hath not chastised and tamed his covetous desire to have and gaine, which by other habitudes enough is nourished & bred up impudently & without all shame to lucre: for it swelleth againe, & is puffed up with injustice, so as hardly & with much ado it can abstaine from doing outrage to any one, for to win private profit thereby: but never will it assault a personage who hath not abandoned & given himselfe over to receive gifts & largesses of his friends, or to take presents & rewards of kings, but hath renounced the very benefits allotted unto him by fortune: who also hath retired & removed himselfe far from avarice, and a leaping desire after a treasure discovered and seen: it will never (I say) tempt him to commit any injustice, nor trouble his thoughts & cogitations: but such an one, will quietly and peaceably frame himselfe to do that which is honest, as having his heart more hauty, than to stoop to law, and being privy to himselfe of all good things settled in his soule. Loe, what men they be, upon whom Caphisus and my selfe be enamoured: and this is the reason friend Simmius, why we request this honest gentleman heere, the stranger, to suffer us to be sufficiently exercised in povertie, that we may attaine unto such vertue. After that my brother had finished this speech, Simmius having twice or thrice nodded with his head: A great man no doubt (quoth he) is this Epaminondas, and a verie great man indeed: and well may he thanke his good father heere Polymnis for all; who from the first beginning, hath given his children the best education and bringing up in Philosphie: but as touching

touching these matters, agree and accord with them, good stranger and friend. As for you Lyfias, let me demand of you (if we may be so bold, as to heare and know of you) whether you purpose to remove him out of his sepulchre, and so transport him over into Italy? or rather to leave him behinde you, to tary among his friends and well-willers, who no doubt will be glad of us to lodge with him, when we shall be there. Theano smiling upon him: It seemeth Simmias (quoth he) that Lyfias liketh well of the place where he is, and is not willing to remove, for that he had no want of any good things here, by the means of Epaminondas: for there be certeine particular sacred ceremonies, which we observe in the sepulture of our fellow professors in this confraternitie of the Pythagoreans, which if they have not when they be dead, me thinke they have not attained to that happy end which we desire. When as therefore we knew by dreames, that Lyfias was departed this life (for we have an infallible signe, appearing unto us in our sleepe, whereby we can discern whether it be the ghost and image of one alive or dead) many had this conceit, that being departed in a forren and farre country, he had bene otherwise enterred than he ought, and therefore we were to translate him from thence where he was, to the end, that being transported, he might have the due service, and accustomed obsequies belonging to our societie. Being therefore come with this minde and cogitation into these parts, and incontinently conducted by those of this country to his sepulchre; about the evening I powered out the libaments for mortuaries, for to call forth his spirit, that it might come and instruct me how I might proceed in this action: and this last night passed, I saw nothing; but me thought I heard a voice saying unto me: That I should not remove that which ought not to be stirred; because the corps of Lyfias had bene by his friends in holy manner enterred, and his soule having her dome already, had her conge and passport to go unto another generation and nativity, accompanied and coupled with another daemon. And verily this morning when I had conferred with Epaminondas, and heard the manner how he had buried Lyfias, I understood that he himselfe had bene instructed by him, in the most secret points of our religion, and how he used the same spirit or daemon for the guidance of his life, unlesse I be so unexpert, that I cannot conjecture what the pilot is by his manner of navigation: for broad be the waies of this life, but few they are, which these angels doe direct and lead men in. When Theano had thus said, he cast his eye upon Epaminondas, as if once againe he would behold his nature and manners, by the inspiration of his countenance and visage. And heereupon came in the Physician, and loosed the band wherewith Simmias his wound was bound up, as purposing to dresse him. Then Phyllidas who came in afterwards with Hippothemidas, willing me and Charon, and Theocritus to arise, drew us apart into a certeine corner or angle of the porch, woonderfully troubled as it might seeme by his countenance. With that, I spake unto him and said: What newes Phyllidas? No newes Caphisus (quoth he to me) for I foresaw my selfe, and foretold you as much, namely, the slacknesse and cowardise of Hippothemidas, requesting you not to communicate unto him your enterprize, nor admit him into your company. Now whiles we were much amazed and astonied at these words: Say not so good Phyllidas (quoth he) for gods sake; neither be you a cause both of our undoing and of the ruine of this city, by thinking rashnesse to be hardnesse: but have patience, and suffer these men to returne in safetie, in case it be so by farall destiny appointed. Phyllidas being chafed herewith, and set in a choler: Tell me (quoth he) Hippothemidas, how many thinke you be privy to our secrets in this designment? I know my selfe (quoth he) to the number of thirty at the least. If there be so many (quoth he) how cometh it to passe, that you onely crosse and gainsay, yea, and hinder that which hath bene concluded and agreed upon by us all? and to this purpose have dispatched a light-horseman, to ride in poste unto the banished persons, (who had put themselves in their journey hitherward) charging them to returne backe, and that in no wise they should goe forward this day? considering that the most part of those things which went to this journey, fortuneit selfe had procured & prepared fit for their hands? upon these words of Phyllidas, we were all much troubled and perplexed: but Charon about the rest, fastning his eye upon Hippothemidas, and that with a fowre and sterne countenance: Most wicked wretch that thou art, quoth he, what hast thou done unto us? No harme, said Hippothemidas, in case, leaving this curst & angrie voice of yours, you can be content and have patience, to heare and understand the reasons of a man asaged as your selfe, and having as many gray haies as you have: for if this be the point, to thew unto our fellow citizens how hardy and courageous we are, that we make no reckoning of our lives, and care not for any perill of death, seeing we have day enough enough Phyllidas, let us never stay for the darke evening, but presently, and immediately from this place run upon the tyrants with our swords drawn, let us kill and slay, let us die upon them, and make no spare of our selves: for it is no hard matter to do and suffer all this: may to deliver the citie of Thebes out of the hands of so many armed men as hold it, to dilfize and expell the garrison of the Spartanes, with the murder of two or three men, is not so easie a thing, (for Phyllidas hath not provided so much wine for his feast and banquet, as will be sufficient to make fifteene hundred souldiers of Archim guard drunken: and say we had killed him, yet Crippidas and Arceus, are ready at night, both of them sober enough to keepe the corps du guard) why make wee such haste then, to draw our friends into an evident and certeine danger of present death, especially, seeing withall, that our enemies be in some sort advertised of their coming and approach; for if it were not so, why was there commandement given by them to those of Thebes, for to be in their armes upon the third day, which is this, and ready to goe with the Lacedaemonian captaines, whensoever they gave commandement? And as for Amplicthem, this very day as I understand, after their judicall proceeding against him, they minded to put to death, upon the coming of Archias. And are not these pregnant presumptions, that the plot and enterprize is to them discovered? Were it not better then to deterre the execution of our designments a while longer, untill such time as the gods be reconciled and appeased? for our diviners and withards having sacrificed a beecke unto Ceres, pronounce that the fire of the sacrifice denounceth some great sedition and danger to the common weale: and that which you Charon particularly ought to take good heed of is this: Yesterday, and no longer since, Hippothodorus the sonne of Erimthes, a man otherwise of good sort, and one who knoweth nothing at all of our enterprize, had this speech with me: Charon is your familiar friend, Hippothemidas, but with me not greatly acquainted; advertise him therefore, if you thinke to good, that he beware and looke to himselfe, in regard of some great danger & strange accident that is toward him: for the last night, as I dreamed, me thought I saw that his house was in travell as it were of child; that he and his friends being themselves in distresse, prayed unto the gods for her delivery, standing round about her during her labour and painfull travell; but she seemed to looie and rore, yea, and to cast out certeine inarticulate voices, untill at the last there issued out of it a mighty fire, wherewith a great part of the citie was immediately burnt, and the castle Cadmea covered all over with smoke onely, but no part of the fire ascended thereto. Loe, what the vision was, which this honest man related unto me, Charon: which I assure you, for the present, set me in a great quaking and trembling; but much more when I once heard say, that this day the exiled persons were to returne and be lodged here within an house of the citie. In great anguish therefore I am, and in a wonderfull agonie, for feare least we engage our selves within a world of calamities and miseries, without being able to execute any exploit of importance upon our enemies, unlesse it be to make a garboile, and set all on a light fire: for I suppose that the citie when all is done, will be ours, but Cadmea the castle as it is already, will be for them. Then Theocritus taking upon him to speake, and staying Charon who was about to reply somewhat against this Hippothemidas: I interpret all this (quoth he) cleane contrary: for there is not a signe that confirmeth me more in following of this enterprize (although I have had always good presages in the behalfe of the banished, in all the sacrifices that I have offered) than this vision which you have rehearsed: if it be so as you say, that a great and light fire thone over all the citie, and the same arising out of a friends house, and that the habitation of our enemies, and the place of their retreat was darkned and made blacke againe with the smoke, which never brings with it any thing better than teares and troublesome confusion: and whereas from among us there arose inarticulate voices, (in case a man should confute it in evil part, and take exception thereat, in regard of the voice) the same will be when our enterprize, which now is enfolded in obscure, doubtfull, and uncerteine suspicion, shall at once both appeere, and also prevaille: as for the ill signes of the sacrifices, they touch not the publike state, but those who now are most powerfull and in greatest authoritie. As Theocritus thus was speaking yet still, I said unto Hippothemidas: And whom I pray you have you sent unto the men? for if he be not too farre onward on his way, we will send after to overtake him. I am not able to say of a truth Caphisus, whether it be possible to reach him, (quoth Hippothemidas) for he hath one of the best horses in all Thebes under him; and a man he is, whom yee all know very well, for he is the master of Atelons chariots, and his chariot men, one unto whom Meleon himselfe from this very first discovered this plot, and made privie unto it. With that, I considering and thinking with with my selfe what man he should speake of: It is not Chlidon (quoth I) Hippothemidas, he who no longer since than the last yeere, wanne the prife in the horle running, at the solemne feast of Iuno? The same is the man quoth he. Who then is he whom I have seene this long while standing at the hall doore and looking full upon us? It is Chlidon himselfe: I assure you quoth he. Now by Hercules I sweare, could any thing have hapned woorse? And with that, the man perceiving how we looked upon him, approached faire and softly from the doore unto us. Then Hippothemidas beckned unto him, and nodded with his head, as willing him to speake unto us all, for that there was no danger because they were all honest men, and of our side. I know them all wel enough quoth he, (Hippothemidas) and not finding you at home nor in the market place, I guessed by and by that you were gone toward them, and therefore I made as great halfe as I could hither, to the end that you might not be ignorant of all things how they goe: For so soone as you commanded me in all speed to meet with our banished citizens in the forest, I went presently to my house for to take horse, & called unto my wife for my bridle, but she could not give it me, and to mend the matter, staid a great while in the chamber or store-house where such things use to be: now after she had made seeking & puddering in every corner within the roome, & could not find it, at length when she had plaid long enough with me, & made a foole of me, she confessed & told me plainly, that she had lent it forth to one of our neighbors, whose wife the evening before came to borrow it of her: whereupon I was in a great chafe, and gave her some curst words; but she like a shrew, paid me with as good as I lent her, and made no more adoe, but cursed me in abominable tearmes, wishing my forth going might be unhappy, and my home coming worse: which execrations I pray god may all light upon her owne head. To be short, she provoked me so farr, that in my choler I dealt her some blowes for her shrewd tongue: with that comes out a number of the neighbors and women especially, where after I had given and taken one for another with shame enough, at last with much adoe I got away from them and came hither to pray you for to send some other messenger to the parties you wot of: for I assure you at this present I am so much out of temper that I am not mine owne man, but in manner beside my selfe. This wrought in us all a mervellous alteration of our wils and affections: For whereas a little before we were offended that our designments were crossed, and their coming impeached, now againe upon this sudden occurrence & the shortnes of time, which allowed us no leisure to put of, & to procrastinate the matter, we were driven into an agony and fearefull perplexity. Howbeit letting a good countenance upon the matter, speaking also cheerfully unto Hippothemidas, and taking him friendly by the hand, I encouraged him, and gave him to understand, that the very gods themselves seconded our intentions and invited us to the execution of the enterprife. This done, Phyllidas went home to his house for to give order about his feast, and withall to draw on Archias to drinke wine liberally and to make mery: Chilon departed also to make ready his house for the intertainment of the banished men, against their returne. Meane while Theocritus and I went againe to Simmius: to the end that finding some good occasion and opportunity for the purpose, we might talke with Epaminondas againe, who was well entred already into a pretie question, which Galaxidorus and Pbiodorus a little before had begun, demanding of what substance, nature and puissance was the familiar spirit of Socrates, so much spoken of? Now what Simmius had alledged against Galaxidorus upon this point, we hard not: many thus much he said, that when he demanded upon a time of Socrates himselfe concerning the said matter, he never could get of him any answer, & therefore he never after would aske him the question, but he said, that oftentimes he had bene present when Socrates gave out that he reputed those men for vaine persons, who said they had seene with their eie any divine power, and so communed therewith: but contrariwise that he could hold better with those, who said they tooke knowledge of such a thing by hearing a voice, speaking unto one that gave attentive care thereto, or earnestly enquired thereof: whereupon he set our heads on worke when we were apart by our selves, and made us to guesse and conjecture, that this daemon of Socrates, was no vision, but a sense of some voice, and an intelligence of words, which came unto him, by an extraordinary manner. Like as in our dreames, it is not a voice indeed that men heare lying fast asleepe, but the opinion of some words that they thinke they heare pronounced: but this intelligence of dreames cometh in truth, to men asleepe, by reason of the repose and tranquillity of the body: whereas they that be awake cannot heare, but very hardly, these divine advertisementes, being troubled and disquieted with tumultuous passions, and the distraction of their affaires, by occasion whereof they cannot wholly yeeld their minde minde and thought to heare the revelations that the gods deliver unto them. Now Socrates having a pure and cleare understanding not tossed and turmoiled with any passions nor mingled with the body, unlesse it were very little, for things necessary and no more, was easie to be touched, and so subtil that soone it might be altered with whatsoever was objected and presented to it: now that which met with it, we may conjecture that it was not simply a voice or sound, but a very articulare speech of his daemon, which without any audible voice touched the intellectuall part of his soule, together with the thing that it declared and revealed unto him. For the voice resembeth a blow or stroke given unto the soule, which by the eares is constrained to receive speech, when we speake one unto another: but the intelligence or understanding of a divine and better nature, leadeth and conducteth a generous minde by a thing that causeth it to understand without need of any other stroke: and the same minde or soule obedieth and yeeldeth thereto accordingly, as it either slacketh loofe or stretcheth hard the instincts and inclinations, not violently by resistance which the passions make, but supple and pliable, as slacke and gentle raines. And hereof we shall not need to make any wonder, considering that we see how little helmes turne about and winde the greatest hulks and caragues that be: and againe the wheeles that potters use, being never so little touched with the hand, turne very easily: for although they be instruments without life, yet being as they are counterpeised and framed even on every side, by reason of their polished smoothnesse, they are apt to stire and yeeld unto the moving cause with the least moment that is. Now the soule of man being bent and stretched out stiffe with innumerable inclinations as it were with so many cords, hath more agility than all the ingins or instruments in the world, if a man hath the skill to manage and handle it with reason, after it hath taken once a little motion, that it may bend to that which conceived it: for the beginnings of instincts and passions, tend all to this intelligent and conceiving part, which being stired and shaken, it draweth, pulleth, stretcheth and haleth the whole man: Wherein we are given to understand, what force and power hath the thing that is entred into the conceit and intelligence of the minde. For bones are senselesse, the sinewes and flesh full of humors, and the whole masse of all these parts together, heave and ponderous, lying still without some motions: but so soone as the soule putteth somewhat into the understanding, and that the same moveth the inclinations thereto, it starteth up and riseth all at once, and being stretched in all parts, runneth a maine, as if it had wings into action. And so the manner of this moving, direction, and promptitude, is not hard, and much lesse, impossible to comprehend: whereby the soule, hath no sooner understood any object, but it draweth presently with it, by instincts and inclinations, the whole masse of the body. For like as reason conceived and comprised without any voice, moveth the understanding: even so in mine opinion, it is not such an hard matter, but that a more divine intelligence and a soule more excellent, should draw another inferior to it, touching it from without, like as one speech or reason may touch another, and as light, the reflection of light: For we in truth, make our conceptions and cogitations knowne one to another, as if we touched them in the darke, by meanes of voice: but the intelligences of Daemons having their light, doe shine unto those who are capable thereof, standing in need of neither of nounes nor verbs which men use in speaking one to the other, by which makes they see the images and resemblances of the conceptions and thoughts of the minde: but the very intelligences & cogitations indeed they know not, unlesse they be such as have a singular and divine light, as we have already said: and yet that which is performed by the ministry of the voice, doth in some sort helpe and satisfie those who otherwise are incredulous. For the aire being formed and stamped as it were by the impression of articulare sounds, and become throughout, all speech and voice, carrieth a conception and intelligence into the minde of the hearer: and therefore according to this similitude and reason, what marvell is it if that also which is conceived by these superior natures altereth the aire, and if the aire being by reason of that quality which it hath, apt to receive impressions, signifith unto excellent men and such as have a rare and divine nature, the speech of him who hath conceived ought in is minde? For like as the strokes that light upon targuits or sheelds of brasse, be heard a farr off, when they proceeded from the bottome in the mids within, by reason of the resonance and rebound: whereas the blowes that fall upon other sheelds are drowned and disperfed, so as they be not heard at all: even so the words or speeches of Daemons and spirits, although they be carried and flie to the eares of all indifferently, yet they resound to those onely, who are of a settled and staid nature, and whose soules are at quiet, such as we call divine and celestiall men. Now the vulgar sort have an opinion, that some Dæmon doth communicate a kinde of divinitie unto men in their sleepes: but they thinke it strange and a miracle incredible, if a man should say unto them, that the gods doe move and affect them sensibly when they be awake, and have the full use of reason: As if a man should thinke that a musician may play well upon his harpe or lute, when all the strings be slackt and let downe: but when the said instruments be set in tune, and have their strings set up, he cannot make any found, nor play well thereupon. For they consider not the cause which is within them, to wit, their discord, trouble and confusion, whereof our familiar friend Socrates was exempt, according as the oracle prophesied of him before, which during his infancie was given unto his father: for by it, commanded he was, to let him doe all that came into his minde, and in no wise either to force or divert him, but to suffer the instinct and nature of the child to have the reins at large, by praying onely unto Jupiter Agoræus that is to say eloquent, and to the Muses for him: and farther than so, not to busie himselfe nor to take care for Socrates, as if he had within him a guide and conductor of his life better than ten thousand masters and pedagogues. Thus you see, Philolaus, what our opinion and judgement is as touching the Dæmon or familiar spirit of Socrates both living and dead, as who reject these voices, sleeefings and all such fooleries. But what we have heard Timarchus of Charonæto discourse of this point, I wot not well whether I were best to utter and relate the same, for feare some would thinke, that I loved to tell vaine tales. Not so quoth Theocritus, but I pray you be so good as to rehearse the same unto us: For albeit fables doe not very well expresse the truth, yet in some sort they reach thereto. But first tell us, who this Timarchus was? For I never knew the man. And that may well be Simias (quoth Theocritus) for he died when he was very yong, and requested earnestly of Socrates to be buried, nere unto Lamprocles Socrates his sonne who departed this life but few daies before, being a deere friend of his, and of the same age. Now this yong gentleman, being very desirous (as he was of a generous disposition, and had newly tasted the sweetnesse of Philosophy) to know what was the nature and power of Socrates familiar spirit, when he had imparted his mind and purpose unto me only and Cebes, went downe into the cave or vault of Trophonius, after the usuall sacrifices and accustomed complements due to that oracle performed: where having remained two nights and one day, inasmuch as many men were out of all hope that ever he would come forth againe, yea and his kinsfolke and friends bewailed the losse of him, one morning betimes he issued forth very glad and jocund: And after he had given thanks unto the god and adored him, so soone as he was gotten through the presse of the multitude, who expected his returne, he recounted unto us, many wonders strange to be heard and seene: for he said, that being descended into the place of the oracle, he first met with much darknes, & afterwards when he had made his praies, he lay a long time upon the ground, neither knew he for certaine whether he was awake, or dreamed all the while? Howbeit, he thought that he heard a noise which light upon his head, and smote it, whereby the futures or seanes thereof were disjoined and opened, by which he yeelded forth his soule; which being thus separat, was very joyous, seeing it selfe mingled with a transparent & pure aire. And this was the first time that it seemed to breathe at liberty, as if long time before untill then, it had bene drawn in and pent, for then it became greater and larger than ever before, in manner of a saile spread and displaied to the full. Then he supposed that he heard (though not cleerely and perfectly) as it were a noise or sound turning round about his head, and the same yeelding a sweet and pleasant voice. And as he then looked behinde him he could see the earth no more, but the Isles all bright and illuminate with a mild and delicate fire, and those exchanged their places one with another, and withall, received sundry colours, as it were divers tinctures, according as in that variety of change the light did alter: and they all seemed unto him in number infinite, and in quantity excessive: and albeit they were not of equal pourprife and extent, yet round they were all alike: also, to his thinking, by their motion which was circular, the skie resounded, because unto the uniforme equality of their mooving, the pleasant sweetnesse of the voice and harmonie composed and resulting of them all, was correspondent and conformable. Amid these Ilands there seemed a sea or great lake diffused and spread, shining with divers mixt colours, upon a ground of grey or light blew. Moreover, of these Isles some few sailed as one would say, and were caried a direct course downe the water beyond the current; but others, and those in number many, went aside out of the chanell, and were with such a violence drawn backe, that they seemed to be swallowed under the waves. Now this sea or lake, was (as hee thought) very deepe toward the South; but on the North side full of selves and shallow flats; in

in many places it swelled and overflowed the land; in others it retired and gathered in, as much for it againe, and arose not to any high tides: as for the colour, in some place it was simple and sea-like; in another, not pure, but troubled and confused with mud, like unto a meere or lake. As concerning the force of the waves about these Isles which are caried together, the same bringeth them backe a litle, but never conjoineeth the end to the beginning: so as they make at no time a circle entire and perfect, but gently divert the application and meeting of their ends, so as in their revolution they winde in and out, and make one crooked obliquity. To the mids of these, and toward the greatest part of the ambient aire, is inclined the sea, somewhat lesse than eight parts of the universall continent, as he thought. And the same sea hath two moutnes or entrances, whereby it receiveth two rivers of fire breaking into it, opposite one to the other, in such sort, as the blewnesse thereof became whitish, by reason that the greatest part was repelled and driven backe. And these things he said, that he beheld with much delight. But when he came to looke downwarde, he perceived a mighty huge hole or gulfe all round, in manner of an hollow globe cut thorow the mids, exceeding deepe and horrible to see to, full of much darknesse, and the same not quiet and still, but turbulent and often times boiling and walmng upward, out of which there might be heard innumerable roarings and growings of beasts, cries and wrawlings of an infinite number of children, with sundry plaints and lamentations of men and women together, besides many noises, tumults, clamors and outcries of all sorts, and those not cleere, but dull and dead, as being sent up from a great depth underneath, wherewith he was not a litle terrified, untill such time as after a good while, there was one whom he saw not, who said thus unto him, O Timarchus, What is your desire to know? Who made answer: Even all, for what is there here, not admirable? True, quoth he; but as for us, litle have we to do, & a small portion in those superiour regions, because they appertaine to other gods: but the division of Proserpina being one of the foure, and which we dispose and governe, you may see if you will, how it is bounded with Styx. And when he demanded againe of him, what Styx was: It is (quoth he) the way which leadeth unto hell and the kingdome of Pluto, dividing two contrary natures of light and darknesse with the head and top thereof; for as you see, it beginneth from the bottome of hell beneath, which it toucheth with the one extremity, and reacheth with the other to the light all about, and so limiteth the utmost part of the whole world, divided into foure regiments. The first, is that of life; the second, of moving; the third, of generation; and the fourth, of corruption. The first, is coupled to the second, by unity, in that which is not visible; the second, to the third, by the minde or intelligence, in the Sun; the third, to the fourth, by nature, in the Moone. And of every one of these copulations, there is a friend, or Destiny the daughter of Necessity, that keepeth the key. Of the first, she that is named Atropos, as one would say, Inflexible; of the second, Clotho, that is to say, the Spinster; of the third in the Moon, Lachesis, that is to say, Lot, about which is the bending of geniture or nativity. As for all the other Isles, they have gods within them; but the Moone appertaining to the terrestriall Dæmons, avoideth the confines of Styx, as being somewhat higher exalted, approaching once onely in an hundred seventie seven second measures: and upon the approach of this precinct of Styx, the foules cry out for feare. And why? hell catcheth and swalloweth many of them, as they glide and slip about it: and others, the Moone receiveth and taketh up, swimming from beneath unto her; such I meane, as upon whom the end of generation fell in good and opportune time, all save those which are impure and polluted: for them, with her fearefull flashing and hideous roaring, she suffereth not to come neere unto her; who seeing that they have missed of their intent, bewaile their wofull state, and be caried downe againe as you see, to another generation and nativity. Why, quoth Timarchus, I see nothing but a number of starres leaping up and downe about this huge and deepe gulfe, some drowned and swallowed up in it, others appearing againe from below. These be (quoth he) the dæmons, that you see, though you know them not. And marke withall, how this comes about. Every soule is endued with a portion of minde or understanding; and of man, there is not one void of reason: but looke how much thereof is mingled with flesh and with passions, being altered with pleasures and dolours, it becommeth unreasonable. But every soule is not mixed after one sort, one as much as another; for some are plunged within the bodie, and being troubled and disquieted with passions, runne up and downe all their life time: others partly are mingled with the flesh, and in part leave out that which is most pure, and not drawn downward to the contagion of that grosse part, but remaineth swimming and floating as it were aloft, touching the top or crowne onely of mans head: (wheréas

the rest is depressed downward to the bottome, and drowned there) and is in manner of a cord hanging up aloft just over the soule which is directly and plumbe under, to upholde and raise it up, so farre forth as it is obeisant thereto, and not overruled and swaied with passions and perturbations: for that which is plunged downe within the bodie, is called the soule; but that which is entire and uncorrupt, the vulgar sort calleth the understanding, supposing it to be within them as in mirrorours that which appeareth by way of reflexion: but thoe that judge aright and according to the truth, name it Dæmon, as being cleane without them.

These stars then which you see as if they were extinct and put out, imagine and take them to be the soules which are totally drowned within bodies: and such as seeme to shine out againe, and to returne light some from beneath, calling and shaking from them a certaine darke & foggy milt, as if it were some filth and ordure, esteeme the same to be such soules, as after death are retired and escaped out of the bodies: but those which are mounted on high and move to and fro in one uniforme course throughout, are the Dæmons or spirits of men, who are said to have intelligence and understanding. Endeavour now therefore and straine your selfe to see the connexion of each one, whereby it is linked and united to the soule. When I heard this, I began to take more heed, and might see stars leaping and floating upon the water, some more, some lesse, like as we observe pieces of cooke, shewing in the sea where fishers nets have beene cast: and some of them turned in manner of spindles or bobins, as folke spin or twilt therewith, yet drawing a troubled and unequall course and not able to direct and compose the motion straight. And the voice said that those which held on a right course and order by motion, were they whose soules were obeisant to the raines of reason, by the meanes of good nurture and civill education, and such as shewed not upon the earth their beastly, grosse and savage brutishnesse: but they that estoones tile and fall up and downe unequally and disorderly, as struggling to breake out of their bounds, are those which strive against the yoke, with their disobedient and rebellious maners, occasioned by want of good bringing up, one while getting the mastery and bringing them about to the right hand, another while curbed by passions and drawn away by vices, which notwithstanding they resist another time againe, and with great force strive to withstand. For that bond which in manner of a bridle-bit is put into the mouth as it were of the brutish and unreasonable part of the soule, when it pulleth the same backe, bringeth that which they call repentance of sins, & the shame after unlawfull and prohibited pleasures, which is a griefe and remorse of the soule restrained and bridled by that which governeth and commandeth it, untill such time as being thus rebuked and chastised, it become obedient and tractable like unto a beast made tame without beating or tormenting, as quickly and readily conceiving the signes and markes which the Dæmon sheweth. These therefore, at the last (long and late though it be) are ranged to the rule of reason. But of such as are obedient at the first, and presently from their very nativity hearken unto their proper Dæmon, are all the kind of prophets and diviners, who have the gift to foretell things to come, likewise holy and devout men: Of which number you have heard how the soule of Hermodorus the Clazomenian, was wont to abandon his body quite, and both by day and night to wander into many places: and afterwards to returne into it againe, having beene present the while to heare and see many things done and said a farre off: which it used so long, untill his enemies by the treachery of his wife, surprisid his body one time when the soule was gone out of it, and burnt it in his house. Howbeit, this was not true: for his soule never departed out of his body: but the same being alwaies obedient unto his Dæmon, and slackening the bond unto it, gave it meanes and liberty to run up and downe, and to walke to and fro in many places, in such sort, as having seene and hard many things abroad, it would come and report the same unto him: But those that consumed his body as he lay asleepe, are tormented in Tartarus even at this day for it: which you shall know your selfe, good young man, more certainly within these three moneths (quoth that voice) and for this time see you depart. When this voice had made an end of speaking, Timarchus, as he told the tale himselfe, turned about to see who it was that spake; but feeling a great paine againe in his head, as if it had bene violently pressed and crushed, he was deprived of all sense and understanding, and neither knew himselfe nor any thing about him: But within a while after when he was come unto himselfe, he might see how he lay along at the entry of the foresaid cave of Trophonius, like as he had himselfe at the beginning. And thus much concerning the fable of Timarchus: who being returned to Athens, in the third moneth after, just as the voice foretold him, departed this life. And then we woondred heereat, and made report thereof backe to Socrates; who rebuked and and chid us, for saying nothing to him of it, whiles Timarchus was alive; for that he would willingly himselfe have heard him more particularly, and examined every point at the full. Thus you have heard, Theocritus, a mingled tale and historie together of Timarchus: But see whether we shall not be faine to call for this strangers helpe, to the decision of this question: for verie proper and meet it is for to be discussed by such devout and religious men. And why (quoth Theamor) doth not Epaminondas deliver his opinion thereof, being a man trained up, and instituted in the same discipline and schoole with us. Then my father smiling at the matter: This is his nature (quoth he) my good friend, he loveth to be silent, and wary he is what he speaketh, but woonderfull desirous to learne, and insatiable of hearing others. And heereupon Spintharus the Tarentine, who conversed familiarly with him heere a long time, was wont to give out this speech of him; That he had never talked with a man, who knew more, and spake lesse than he. But tell us now what you thinke your selfe, of that which hath beene said. For mine owne part (quoth he) I saie, that this discourse and report of Timarchus, as sacred and inviolable, ought to be consecrated unto God: and marvel I would, if any should discredit and hardly beleieve that which Simmius himselfe hath delivered of him; and when they name swans, dragons, dogs, and horses, sacred, beleieve not that there be men celestiall and beloved of the gods, considering they hold and say, that God is never εἰς οὐρανόν, that is to say, a lover of birds, but ἐν τῇ γῇ, that is to say, a lover of mankind. Like as therefore a man who is said to be Φυλιππος, that is to say, a lover of horses, taketh not a fancie, nor regardeth alike all horses, comprised under the whole kinde, but chusing alwaies some one more excellent than the rest, rideth, cherisheth, and maketh much of him especially: even so, those divine spirits which surmount our nature, make choise and take as it were out of the whole flocke the best of us, upon whom they set their brand or marke, and them they thinke worthy of a more singular and exquisite education, and those they order and direct not with reines and bridles, but with reason and learning, and that by signes, whereof the common and rascall sort have no knowledge nor experience. For neither doe ordinary hounds understand the signes that huntmen use, nor every horse, the silling and chirting of the elcuiury, but such onely as have beene taught and brought up to it; for they with the least whistling and houping that is, know presently what they are commanded to do, and quickly be ordered as they ought. And verily, Homer seemeth not to be ignorant of this difference, whereof we speake: for of diviners and soothsaiers, some he calleth εὐροτομοὶ, that is to say, authours, or observers of birds; others, πτεροί, that is to say, bowel-priers, that spie into the inward of sacrifices; and some againe there be, who hearing and knowing what the gods themselves do speake, are able to declare secretly and foretell things to come; as may appeare by these verses:

King Priams decree sonne Helenus, their minde soon under stood,
And what his god and goddesse both in counsell deemed good.

And a little after:

For thus I heard the gods to say,
Who as immortal live for ay.

For like as they who are without, and not of the domesticall and neere acquaintance of kings, princes and generall captaines, do know and understand their willes & minds by the meanes of certaine firelights, found of trumpets and proclamations; but to their faithfull, trusty and familiar friends they speake by word of mouth: even so, God communeth and talketh with few, and that very seldom; but unto the common sort he giveth signes, and of these consisteth the arte of divination: for the gods receive very few men in recommendation for to adorne their lives, but those onely whom they are disposed to make exceeding happy and divine indeed: and those soules which be delivered from farther generation, and are for ever after at libertie and dismissed free from the bodie, become afterwards Dæmons, and take the charge and care of men, according as Hesiodus saith. For like as champions, who otherwise heretofore have made profession of wrestling and other exercises of the bodie, after they have given over the practise thereof, by reason of their olde age, leave not altogether the desire of glorie by that meanes, nor cast off the affection in cherishing the bodie, but take pleasure still to see other young men to exercise their bodies, exhorting and encouraging them thereto, yea, and enforcing themselves to runne in the race with them: even so, they that are past the combats & travels of this life, and through the vertue of their soules come to be Dæmons, despise not utterly the affaires, the speeches and studies of those that be here, but being favorable unto them who in their good endeavors aspire to the same end that they have attained to, yea, and after a fort, banding and siding with them, do incite and exhort them to vertue, especially when they see them neere unto the ends of their hopes, and ready in manner to touch the same. For this divine power of Dæmons, will not fort and be acquainted with every man indifferently, but like as they who stand upon the shore, can do no other good unto them who swim farre within the sea, and a great way from the land, but looke upon them and say nothing; but to such as are neere to the sea side, they runne, and for their sakes, wading a little into the sea, helpe both with hand and voice, and so save them from drowning: even so (Simmias) dealeth the Dæmon with us; for so long as wee are plunged and drowned within mundane affaires, and change many bodies, as it were so many waggons and chariots, passing out of one into another, it suffereth us to strive and labour of our selves, yea, and by our owne patience and long sufferance to save our selves, and gaine the haven: but when there is a soule, which hath already by innumerable generations supported and endured long travels, and having in manner performed her course and revolution, straineth all her might and maine, with much swee to get forth and ascend up: to it God envieth not her owne proper Dæmon and familiar spirit to be assistant, yea, and giveth leave to any other whatsoever, that is willing thereto. Now one is desirous and ready alwaies to helpe and second another, yea, and forward to promote the safetie thereof: the soule also for her part, giveth good care, because she is so neere, and in the end is saved; but she that obiecth not nor hearkeneth to her owne familiar & proper dæmon as forsaken of it, speedeth not wel in the end. This said, Epaminondas looking toward me: It is high time, Caphisias, for you (quoth he) to go into the wrestling schoole and place of exercise, to the end that you disappoint not your companions: meane while, we (when it shall be thought good to dissolve and dismisse this meeting) will take the charge of Theodor. Then said I, Be it so: but I suppose, that Theocritus, together with Galaxidorus & my selfe, is willing to commune and reason with you a little. In good time (quoth he) let them speake their minde and what they will. With that, he rose up and tooke us apart into a winding and turning corner of the gallery, where we came about him, and began to perswade and deale with him for to take part with us in the enterprise. He made us answer, That he knew well enough the day when the banished persons were to returne; and had taken order with his friends to be ready a-30 gainst the time with Gorgidas, and to embrace the opportunity thereof: howbeit, they were not determined to take away the life of any one citizen, not condemned by order of law, unless some urgent necessitie enforced them thereto. And otherwise, it were very meet and expedient for the comminatie of Thebes, that there should be some not culpable of this massacre, but innocent and cleare of all that then shall be committed; for so these men will be lesse suspected of the people, and be thought to counsell and exhort them for the best. We thought very well of this advice of his, and so he repaired againe to Simmias; and we went downe to the place of publicke exercises, where we met with our friends; and there we deale one with another apart, as we wrestled together, questioning about one thing or another, and telling this or that, every one preparing himselfe to the execution of the designe: and there we might see Archias and Philippus all anointed and oiled going toward the feast. For Phyllidas fearing that they would make haste and put Amphibemus to death, so soone as ever hee had accompanied Lysanorides and sent him away, tooke Archias with him, feeding him with hope to enjoy the lady whom he desired, and promising that she should be at the feast: whereby he perswaded him to minde no other thing, but to solace himselfe and make merry with those who were wont to roist and riot with him. By this time it drew toward night, the weather grew to be colde, and the winde rose high, which caused every man with more speed to retire and take house. I for my part, meeting with Damoclidus, Pelopidas and Theopompus, entertained them; and others did the like to the rest. For after that these banished persons were passed over the mountaine Cythera, they parted themselves; and the coldnesse of the weather gave them good occasion (without all suspicion) 50 to cover their faces, and so to passe along the city undiscovered. And some of them there were, who as they entred the gates of the city, perceived it to lighten on their right hand without thunder, which they tooke for a good preface of safetie and glorie in their proceedings, as if this signe betokened, that the execution of their designment should be lightsome and honourable, but without any danger at all. Now when we were all entred in, and safe within house, to the number of eight and fortie, as Theocritus was sacrificing apart in a little oratorie or chappell by himselfe, himselfe, he heard a great rapping and bouncing at the doore: and anon there was one came and brought him word, that two halberds of Archias guard knocked at the outward gate, as being sent in great haste to Charon, commanding to open them the doore, as greatly offended that they had staid so long. Whereat Charon being troubled in minde, commanded that they should be let in presently: who meeting them within the court with a coronet upon his head, as having newly sacrificed unto the gods, and made good chere, demanded of these halberds, what they would. Archias and Philippus (say they) have sent us, willing and charging you with all speed to repaire unto them. Why, what is the matter (quoth Charon) that they should send for me in such haste at this time of the night, and what great newes is there? We know not, said these sergeants; but what word would you have us to carry backe unto them? Mary, tell them (quoth he) that I will cast off my chaplet, and put on another robe, and presently follow after: for if I should goe with you, it might be an occasion of trouble, and moove some to suspect that you lead me away to prison. You say wel, answered the officers againe, do even so; for we must goe another way to those souldiers that watch and ward without the city, and deliver unto them a commendement from the head magistrates and rulers. Thus departed they. With that, Charon returned to us, and made relation of these newes; which strucke us into our dumps, and put us in a great affright, supposing for certeine, that we were betrayed, and our plot detected: most of the company suspected Hippothenidas, for that he went about to impeach the returne of the exiled persons, by the meanes of Chlodon, whom he meant to send unto them: who seeing that he missed of his purpose, by all likelihood, upon a fearefull and timorous heart, might reveale our conspiracie, now when it was come to the very point of execution: for come hee was not with others into the house where we were all assembled: and to be short, there was not one of us all, that judged better of him than of a wicked and treacherous traitor: howbeit, we agreed all in this, that Charon should go thither as he was commanded, and in any wise obey the magistrates who had sent for him.

Then he commanding (Archidamus) his owne sonne to be present, a stripling about fifteene yeeres of age, and the fairest youth in all the city of Thebes, very laborious and affectionate to bodily exercises; and for stature and strength, surpassing all his fellows and companions of that age; made this speech unto us: My masters and friends, this is my sonne and onely child, whom I love entirely, as you may well thinke; him I deliver into your hands, beseeching you in the name of the gods and all saints in heaven, that if you finde any perfidious treacherie by me against you, to doe him to death and not spare him. And now I humbly pray you, most valiant and hardy knights, prepare your selves resolutely against the last feast that ever these tyrants shall make: abandon not, for want of courage, your bodies to be villanously outraged and spoiled by these most leud and wicked persons, but be revenged of them, and now shew your invincible hearts, in the behalfe of your cuntry. When Charon had delivered these words, there was not one of us all but highly commended his magnanimitie and loialtie; but we were angry with him, in that he doubted of us that we had him in suspicion and distrust; and therefore willed him to have away his sonne with him. And more than that, me thinks (quoth Pelopidas) you have not done well and wisely for us, in that you sent him not before to some other house: for what reason or necessitie is there, that he should either perish or come into perill, being found with us? and yee it is time enough to convey him away, that in case it fall out with us otherwise than well, he may grow up after his kinde, for to be revenged of these tyrants another day. It shall not be so, quoth Charon; he shall even stay here, and take such part of fortune as we shall do: and besides, it were no part of honesty or honour, to leave him in danger of our enemies: And therefore, my good sonne (quoth he) take a good heart and a resolute, even above these yeeres of thine, enter in Gods name into these hazzards and trials that be thus necessarie, together with many valiant and hardy citizens, for the maintenance of liberty and vertue. And even yet, great hope we have, that good successe will follow, and that some blessed angell will regard 50 and take in protection those who adventure thus for righteousnesse and justice sake. Many of us there were (Archidamus) whose teares trickled downe their cheeks, to heare Charon deliver these words; but himselfe being inflexible and not relenting one jot, with an undanted heart, a settled countenance, and eyes still drie, put his sonne into Pelopidas hands, embraced every one of us, thooke us by the hands, and so encouraging us to proceed, went forth of the doores. Wondrous full was this; but much more you would have wondrous, to have seene the alacrity, cheerefull and constant resolution of his sonne, as if he had beene another Neopolemus, who never looked looked pale, nor changed colour for the matter, notwithstanding so great danger presented; neither was he one jote astond: but contrariwise, drew forth Pelopidas sword out of his scabbard, to see and trie whether it was keene enough.

Whiles these matters thus passed, there comes towards us Dionus, one of Cephsodorus friends, with a sword by his side, and a good curialon of Steele under his robe, who having heard that Charon was sent for to come to Archias, blamed much our long delay, & whetned us on to go forthwith to the tyrants houses: For in so doing (quoth he) we shall prevent them, by coming suddenly upon them: if not, yet better were it for us, to set upon them without dores, separate one from another, and not all in one plumpe, than to stay for them, enclosed all within one parlour, and be there taken by our enemies, like a swarme of bees, and have all our throats cut. In like maner Theocritus the divinator, urged us to make haste, saying, that all the signes of sacrifices were good, and prefaged happy successe with all security. Whereupon we began on all hands to take armes, and to prepare our selves: by which time, Charon was returned to us, with a merrie and cheerefull countenance: who smiling and looking upon us: Be of good chere (quoth he) my masters and friends, all is well: there is no danger, and our affaire proceedeth well: for Archias and Philippus, so soone as they heard that I was come, upon their sending for me, being already well cup-shotten, and halfe drunke with wine, so as both their minds and bodies were very farre out of tune; with much adoe they rose from the boord, and came forth to the dore unto me: Now Charon, quoth Archias, we heare that our banished men lie lurking here within the citie, being secretly and by stealth entred into it. Whereat I seeming to be much amazed: Where (quoth I) are they said to be, and who? That we know not (quoth Archias, and that is the cause why we sent for you, to come before us, if haply you have heard any thing of it more certainly. Heereupon I remaining for a while as one somewhat astonied and pensive, comming againe to my selfe, began thus to thinke, that this must needs be some headlesse rumour, and arising from no good ground, nor certeine author; neither was it like to be any one of them that were privy to the complot who had discovered it, because they would not then have beene ignorant of the house where they were assembled, and therefore it could not chuse but be some blinde brute blown abroad through the citie, and come to their eares. So I said unto him, that during the life of Androchides, we had heard many such flying tales, and vaine false rumors that ranne about the city and troubled us. But now (quoth he) Archias, I have heard no such thing: howbeit, if it please you to command me, I will enquire and hearken farther into the thing, and if I find any matter of importance, I will come and enforme you of it. It is well said of you (quoth Phylidas: and it were very good Charon, that in these cases you be very inquisitive, and leave nothing unsearched: for why should we be carelesse and negligent in anything, but rather it behooveth us to be circumspect, and to looke about us on every side: providence in these cases is very requisite, and good it is to make all sure: and when he had so said, he tooke Archias and had him into the parlour, where they be now drinking hard: and therefore my good friends, let us stay no longer; but after we have made our prayers unto the gods, for our good speed, go about our businesse. Charon had no sooner said this, but we praied unto the gods for their assistance, and encouraged one another to the enterprise. It was the very just time, when all men use to be at supper: and the whistling winde arising still more & more, had brought some snow or sleet, mingled with a drifling raine, so as there was not one person to be seene in the streets as we passed along. Those therefore who were appointed to assaile Leontidas and Hippates, who dwelt neere together, went out in their cloakes, having no other armes or weapons, but each of them their swords, and those were Pelopidas, Democidas, and Cephsodorus: But Charon, Melon, and others, ordeined to set upon Archias, had their breast-plates or demy-cuiraces before them, and upon their heads thicke chaplets, some of firs, others of the pine or pitch tree branches: and part of them were clad in womens apparell, counterfeiting drunken persons, as if they were come in a maske and mummerie with their women. And that which more is, Archidamus, fortune also making the beastly cowardise and foolish ignorance of our enemies equal to our hardinesse, and resolute preparations, and having diversified and distinguished even from the beginning our enterprise, like a plaie or enterlude, with many dangerous intercurrents, was assistant & ran with us, at the very point and upshot of the execution thereof, presenting unto us, even then a doubtfull & dangerous occurrent, of a most sudden & unexpected accident: for when Charon after he had talked with Archias & Philippus, was returned to the house, and had disposed us in order, for to go in hand with the execution of our

deffignment; there was brought from hence a letter written by Archias the high priest heere among you, unto that Archias his old host and friend, which declared unto him (as it should seeme) by all likelihood, the returne of the banished, and the surpris which they were about, the house also wherein they were assembled, and all the complices who were of the conspiracy. Archias being by this time drenched and drowned in wine, and besides that, transported and past himselfe, with the expectation of the women, whose coming he attended, albeit the messenger that brought the letter, said it contained serious affaires, of great consequence, yet he onely received it, and made no other answer but this: What tellest thou me of serious affaires; we shall thinke of them to morrow; and with that, put the letters under the pillow, whereon he leaned, calling for the pot againe, and commanding that it should be filled; sending Phylidas ever and anon to the dore, to see if the women were yet coming. Thus whiles this hope entertained and held the feast, we came upon them, and passed along through the servitours unto the very hall or parlour, where they were at supper, and there we staid a while at the dore, eying and viewing every one of them as they sat about the table. Now the sight of those chaplets and garlands which we ware upon our heads, and of the womens apparell, which some of us were dressed in, deceived them a little upon our first coming, in such sort, as for a while there ensued silence, untill such time as Melon first laying hand upon his sword hilt, rushed in to the middes of the place: with that, Cabirichus Cyamiſtos who was Archon for the time, tooke him by the arme as he passed by, and held him backe, crying out withall: Phylidas, Is not this Melon? but Melon shaking him off so, as he left his hold, drew forth his sword withall, and ranne upon Archias, who being hardly able to rise, he gave not over untill he had killed outright in the place. Charon then fet upon Philippus, whom he wounded in the necke, and notwithstanding that he defended himselfe with the pots that stood about him upon the table, yet Lysibemus mounting upon the boord, laied him along on the floore, and there under-foot dispatched him. As for Cabirichus we spake him faire, and entreated him not to take part with the tyrants, but to joine with us, in delivering our native cuntry from tyranny, as he was a sacrosaint magistrate, and consecrated unto the gods for the good and safetie of the commonwealth. But being not easily induced to hearken unto reason, and that which was most expedient for him, because he was little better than halfe drunke; he hanging still in doubtfull suspense and perplexitie, arose up on his feet, and presented unto us his javelin, with the head forward, which by the custome of the place, the Provosts with us, ever goe withall: whereupon I caught hold of the javelin in the middes, and held it over my head, crying unto him, to let it goe, and save himselfe; or else he should die for it. In this meane while, Theopompus standing on his right side, ranne him through with his sword, saying withall: There lie thou also together with them whom thou hast flattered and soothed up: for it were not becomming thee to ware a coroner and garland when Thebes is set free, nor to offer any more sacrifice to the gods, before whom thou hast cursed thy cuntry, by making praiers so often for the prosperity of her enemies. When Cabirichus was fallen downe dead, Theocritus who stood by, caught up the sacred javelin, and drew it out of the blood that there was shed. This massacre being done, some few of the servants, who durst interpose themselves, and come betweene for the defence of those usurpers, we slew; but as many as were quiet, and stirred not, we shut up within a chamber, where men are wont to keepe; being not willing that they should get forth, and goe to publish throughout the city what was done, before we knew how the world went with others.

Thus you heare how this chare was done. As for Pelopidas and his traine, they came to the utmost gate of Leontidas, where they knocked as softly, as they thither came gently and with silence, and to one of the servants who heard them knocke, & demanded who was there, they answered, That they were come from Athen; and brought letters unto Leontidas from Calistratus. The servitour went and told his master so much, who being commanded to set open the gate, unbarred and unbolted it; the gate no sooner yielded from them a little, but they rushed in all at once with violence, bare downe the man and laied him along, ran a pace through the court and hall and so directly passed to the bed chamber of Leontidas: who presently suspecting what the matter was, drew his dagger, & put himselfe forward to make resistance & to stand upon his defence. Unjust he was no doubt & tyrannicall, howbeit otherwise a tall man of his hands, and of a touragious stomacke: yet forga he to overthrow the lampe, & put out the light, and in the darke to intermingle himselfe with those who came to assault him, and so haply to get a way from them; but being espied by them, so soone as ever the doore was open, he stabbed Cephsodorus in the very flanke under the short ribs : and then incounting with Pelopidas who would have entered second into the chamber, he cried out aloud and called to his servants for helpe : but Samadas with others about him kept them backe, and otherwise of themselves they durst not meddle nor hazard their lives to deale with the noblest persons of the city, and those who for strength and valour were known to surpass the rest. So there was a scuffling and stiffe combat betwene Pelopidas and Leontidas, in the very portall of the chamber dore, which was but narrow, where Cephsiodorus fell downe in the midst betwene them ready to die, so that others could not come in to succor Pelopidas : At the last when our friend Pelopidas had received a little wound in his head, but given Leontidas many a one, he overthrew him and flew him upon the body of Cephsiodorus, who being yet warme and not fully dead, saw his enemy fall, and therewith putting forth to his right hand to Pelopidas, and bidding all the rest adew, he joyfully yeelded up his breath. When they had dispatched this businesse, they turned immediately from thence to Hypates house, and when the doore was likewise set open for them, the killed him also, as he thought to escape, and fled by the roofof the house unto his neighbours. Which done, they returned with speed directly unto us, whom they found abroad at a gallery called Polyfylon. After we had saluted and embraced one another & talked a litle all together, we went straight to the common goale; where Phyllidas having called forth the goaler : Archias (quoth he) and Philippus command you with all speed to bring your prisoner Amphithemus unto them. The goaler considering that it was an unreasonable houre, and withall perceiving that Phyllidas in his speeches was not very well staied, but that he was yet chafed and panted still unquietly upon the fresh fray so that he had beene at, doubting and suspecting a skirmish : VVhen was it ever seene (quoth he) Phyllidas, that the Polemarchy or chiefe captaines sent for a prisoner at this time of the night when by you? and what token or watchword bring you from them? As the goaler reasoned thus, Phyllidas made no more adoe, but with an horlemans staffe or lance that he had in his hand, ranne him through the sides, and laied him dead on the ground, wicked wretch that he was, whom the next morrow, many a woman trampled under their feet, and spit in his face as he lay. Then brake we the prison dore open, and first called by name unto Amphithemus, and afterwards to others, according as each of them was of our acquaintance and familiarity; who hearing and knowing our voices leapt out of their pallets upon their feete, and willingly drew their chaines and irons after them : but such as had their feet fast in the stockes, stretched forth their hands and cried unto us, beseeching they might not be left behinde: and whiles we were busie in setting them loose, many of the neighbours by this time who dwelt nere and perceived what was done, were run forth already into the streets with glad and joyfull hearts. The very women also, as any of them heard ought of their acquaintance, without regard of observing the custome and manner of the Boeotians, ran out of doores oncunto another, and demanded of every one whom they met in the street, what newes? And as many of them as light either upō their fathers or husbands, followed them as they went, and no man impeached them in so doing : for the pitifull commiseration, the teares, praiers, and supplications, especially of honest and chaste wives, were in this case very effectuell, and moved men to regard them. VVhen things were brought to this passe, so soone as we heard, that Epaminondas and Gorgidas with other friends, were now assembled within the temple of Minerva, we went directly unto them, and thither repaired also many honest citizens and men of quality, flocking still more and more in great frequency. Now after relation was made unto them how all things sped, & that they were requested to assist us in the performance and execution of that which was behind, and for that purpose to meet all together in the common market place, incontinently they set up a shout, and cried unto the citizens, Liberty, liberty, distributing armes and weapons among as many as came to joine with them : which they tooke forth of the temples and halles, being full of the spoiles of all sorts, won from enemies in times past, as also out of the armoters, furbushers, and cutlers shops there adjoining. Thither came Hipposthenidas likewise with a troupe of friends and servants, bringing those trumpetters with him, who were by chance come to the city against the feast of Hercules : and so immediately some founded the al arm in the market place, and others in all parts of the city besides, and all to astonish and affright those of the adverse part, as if the whole city were revolted, and had risen against them : who making a great smoake, for the nonce in the streets, because they would not be defied, put themselves within the castle Cadmea, drawing with them those choise foldiers called Hyperiores, that is to say, the better, who were wont usually to ward all night and keepe a standing corps de guard about the said castle. Now those who were above in the fast fort, seeing their owne captaine to run so disorderly and in great affright, and to make halt to get in, perceiving also from above, how we were gathered together about the market place in armes; and no part of the city quiet, but full of tumult, uprores and garboiles, whereof the noise ascended up unto them, durst not adventure to come downe, though they were to the number of five thousand, as fearing the present danger : but pretended for their excuse the absence of Lysanoridas their captaine, who was ever wont to remaine with them, but onely that day, which was the cause that afterwards as we have heard, the Lacedaemonians making meanes by a peece of money, to apprehend him in Corinth, whether he was retired, and immediately put him to death: but upon composition and safe conduct, they delivered up the castle into our hands, and so departed with all the foldiers in it.

OF THE MALICE OF HERODOTUS.

The Summarie.

HERODOTUS considering in what credit and request Herodotus the Historiographer was, who in many places of his bookes, which are at this day extant in our hands describeth divers states and honorable persons of Greece, is minded here in this treatise to arme as it were and prepare the readers against all such false suggestions and imputations : and in the very entry of his discourse, accuseth Herodotus of malice and leasing. For proove of this challenge he setteth downe certaine markes, whereby a man may discern a slanderous writer from a sage and discreet Historiographer. Which done, he applyeth the said markes unto Herodotus, shewing by a number of examples drawn out of his stories and narrations that often times he useth odious words, when as others more milde and gentle were as ready for him to use : that he describeth an evill matter, when as there was no need to make mention thereof: that he taketh pleasure to speake ill & to raile: that among praises, he inserteth the bitter blames of one and the same personage : and in recounting one thing two manner of waies and more, he refresheth alwaies in the worse, and imputeth worthy deeds and brave exploits unto disordinate and irregular passions, and so after an oblique manner doth the persons injury. So that this treatise teacheth as well the writers of histories, to looke well about themselves, and stand upon their guard, lest they be esteemed, slanderous, foolish and impudent : as also the readers to carry with them a pure and sincere judgement, for to make their profit by those bookes, which they take in hand to read.

OF THE MALICE of Herodotus

MANY men there be, ô Alexander, whom the stile & phrase of Herodotus the Historiographer (because it seemeth unto them plaine, simple, naturall, and running smoothly upon the matters which he delivereth) hath much deceived : but more there are, who have bene caught and brought into the same error, by his maners and behaviour. For it is not onely extreame injustice, as Plato said, to seeme just and righteous, when a man is nothing lesse, but also an act of malice in the highest degree, to counterfeit mildenesse and simplicity, and under that pretence and colour, to be covertly most bitter and malicious. Now for that he sheweth this spite of his against the Boeotians and Corinthians especially, although he spareth not any others whatsoever, I thought it my part and duty

duty doe defend herein the honor of our ancestors in the behalfe of truth, against this onely part of his writings, and no more. For to pursue and goe thorow all other lies and forged tales of his, dispersed in that historie, would require many great volumes. But as Sophocles said:

Of eloquence the flattering face, Prevailles much and winneth grace, especially when it meeteth with a tongue which is pleasant, and carrieth such a force, as to cover among other vices, the malicious nature of an Historiographer. Philip king of Macedonie was wont to say unto those Greeks who revolted from his alliance, and sided with Titus Quintus, that they had changed their former chaines, and given them for others, that were indeed more polished; howbeit longer a faire deale. Even so a man may say, that the malignitie of Herodotus is smooother and more delicate than that of Theopompus, but it toucheth neerer to the quicke, and stingeth more; like as the windes are more sharpe and piercing, which blow through a narrow streight or close glade, than such as are spread more at large. I thinke therefore that I shall doe very well, first to describe generally, and as it were in grosse, the traits and marks as it were of a narration which is not pure, sincere, and friendly, but spitefull and malicious, for to apply the same afterwards to each point that we shall examine, and see whether they doe agree fitly thereto.

First and formost therefore, he that useth the most odious nounes and verbs, when there be others at hand more milde and gentle, for to expresse things done: as for example; whereas he might say, that Xerxes was very ceremonious, and somewhat superstitiously given; reporteth so that he was fanaticall; and chuleth rather to challenge Cleon for rash audacious, and furious madnesse, than for light and vaine speech: surely he carrieth not a good and gentle minde, but taketh pleasure to make a narration in the worst manner.

Secondly, when there is some vice otherwise in a man, which appertaineth not unto the historie, and yet the writer catcheth hold thereof, and will needs thrust it into the narration of those affaires which require it not, drawing his historie from the matter, fetching a compasse about, after an extravagant manner, and all to bring in either the infortunite or unhappy accident, or else some absurd and shamefull act of a man: it is very evident that such an one delighteth in reprochfull and evill language. And therefore contrariwise, Thucydides, howsoever Cleon committed an infinite number of grosse and foule faults, yet he never traduced him openly for them in his writings. And as touching the busie orator Hyperbolus, he glanced at him onely by the way, terming him a naughtie man, and so let him goe. Philistus likewise passed over all the outrages and wrongs (many though they were) of Diomysus the tyrant, which he offered unto the barbarous nations, so long as they were not interlaced among the affaires of the Greeks. For the digressions & excursions of an history, are allowed, principally for some fables or antiquities. Moreover, he who among the praises of some great personages, thrusteth in some matter tending to reproch & blame, seemeth to incur the malediction of the tragical Poet,

*Cursed be thou, that lov'st a vail to have,
Of men's mishaps, who now lie dead in grave.*

Furthermore, that which is equipollent and reciprocall thereto, every man knoweth, that the leaving out and passing over quite of some good qualitie, or laudable fact, seemeth not to be a thing reprehensible and subject to account, though done it were maliciously, and the same were left out in some such place as pertained well to the traine of the historie: for to commend a man coldly and after an unwilling manner, favoreth no more of civillie, than to blame him affectionately; and besides that, it is nothing more civill, it smelleth haply more of malice, and of the twaine is worse.

The fourth signe of a malicious nature in an historian, in my account is this: when one and the same thing is interpreted or reported two waies, or more, to incline unto the harder construction. For permitted it is unto Sophisters and Rhetoricians, either for to gaine their fee, or to winne the name and reputation of eloquence, otherwhiles to take in hand for to defend and adorne the worse cause; because they imprint not deeply any credit or belife of that which they deliver: and they themselves doe not deny, that they undertake to proove things incredible, even against the common opinion of men. But he that composeth an historie, doeth his part and devoir, if he writeth that which he knoweth to be true: but of matters doubtful, obscure, and uncerteine, those which are better seeme to be reported more truly alwaies, than the worse. And many there be, who omit quite and overpasse the worse: as for example;

Ephorus having said as touching Themistocles, that he was privy to the treason that Pausanias plotted and practised, and what he treated with the lieutenants of the king of Perſia: Howbeit, he consented not (quoth he) nor never could be induced to take part with him of those hopes, whereto he did sollicit him. And Thucydides left this matter wholly out of his storie, as not acknowledging it to be true. Again, in matters confessed to have bene done, but yet not known, for what cause, and upon what intention; he that guesseth and casteth his conjecture in the worse part, is naught and maliciously minded: and thus did the comical Poets, who gave out, that Pericles kindled the Peloponneſian warre, for the love the of courtisan Aspasia, or else for Phidias sake, and not rather upon an high minde and contention to take downe the pride of the Peloponneſians, & in no wise to give place unto the Lacedæmonians. For of arts approved and laudable affaires, he that suppoſeth and setteth downe a lewd and naughty cause, and by calumniation draweth men into extravagant suspitions, of the hidden and secret intention of him who performed the act, which he is not able to reprove or blame openly: as they who report of Alexander the tyrants death, which dame Thebe his wife contrived, that it was nota deed of magnanimity, nor upon the hatred of wickednesse and vice, but proceeding from the passionate jealousy of a woman: as also those who say; that Cato Uticensis killed himselfe, fearing lest Cæſar would execute him shamefully: these (I say) are envious and spitefull in the highest degree. Semblably, an historical narration smelleth of malice, according as the manner of a worke or act done is related: as if it be put downe in writing, that it was by the meanes rather of money and corruption, than of vertue & valour, that some great exploit was performed, (as some there were who did not sticke to say as much of Philip) or else, that it was executed without any travel and danger, as others gave out of Alexander the Great: also not by forecast and wisdom, but by the favour of fortune; like as the envour and ill willer of Timotheus, who in painted tables represented the pourtraite of divers cities and townes, that of themselves fell within the compasse of his net and toile, when he lay fast asleepe: evident it is, that it is that it tendeth to the empaing of the glorie, beautie, and greatnesse of those acts, when they take from them the magnanimity, vertue, and diligence of the authors, and give out they were not done and executed by themselves. Over and besides, those who professedly and directly speake evill of one, incur the imputation of quarrellers, rash-headed and furious persons, in case they keepe not within a meane: but such as doe it after an oblique manner, as if they discharged bullets, or shot arrowes at one side from some blinde corner, charging surmises and suspitions; and then to turne behinde and shift off all, by saying, they doe not believe any such thing, which they desire most of all to be beleaved, howsoever they disclame all malice and evill will: over and besides their cancred nature, they are steined with the note of notorious impudencie. Next neighbours unto these, are they, who among imputations and blames, adjoine certaine praises: as in the time of Socrates, one Aristoxenus having given him the termes of ignorant, untaught, dissolute; came in with this afterwards: but true it is that he doeth no man wrong, and is worst to himselfe: for like as they, who will cunningly and artificially flatter otherwhiles, among many and unmeasurable praises, mingle some light reprehensions, joining with their sweet flatteries, (as it were some tart sauce to season them) certaine words frankly and freely spoken: even so the malicious person, because he would have that beleaved which he blameth, putteth thereto some little sprinkling of a few praises. There may be exemplified and numbered many other signes and marks of malice: but these may suffice to give us to understand the nature and intention of this author whom now we have in hand.

First and formost therefore to begin at heavenly wights, and as they say at Vesta, to the daughter of Imachus, whom all the Greeks thinke to have bene deified and honored with divine honors by the barbarous nations, in such sort as that she hath left her name to manie seas, and noble ports, in regard of her great glory and renomme; and opened the source (as it were) and original beginning of many right noble, most famous and roiall families; this our gentle Historiographer saith, that she yielded her selfe unto certaine marchants of Phenicia, to be caried away, for that the having bene deflowered not against her will, by a master of a ship, feared lest she should be spied great with child; and withall believeth the Phenicians themselves, as if they gave out as much of her. He reports himselfe also to the testimony of the sages and wise men of Perſia, that the Phenicians ravished and caried her away with other women: shewing withall directly his opinion a little after, that the most noble and bravest exploit that ever the Greeks achieved, to wit, the war of Troy, was an enterprize begone in folly, for a lewd and naughty woman: for it is very apparent quoth he, that these women if they had not bene willing themselves, they had never bene so ravished, and had away as they were. And therefore we may us well say that the gods did foolishly to shew themselves angry and offended, with the Lacedæmonians for the abusing of the daughters of Scythus the Leucærian; as also to punish Ajax, for that he forced lady Cassandra: for certaine it is according to Herodotus, that if they had not bene willing, they had never bene deflowered: and yet himselfe saith that Aristomenes was taken alive, and eared away by the Lacedæmonians; and afterwards Philoemen captaine generall of the Achæans talt: way by the Lacedæmonians, and the confill of the Romans, fell likewise into the hands of his enemies: all of them such personages as hardly may be found more valiant and hardy warriors in the world. But what marvel is this, considering that men doe take leopards, and tygres alive? Now Herodotus blameth the poore women, who were by force abused, and defendeth those wicked men who offered them that abuse. Besides, so much affected he is in love unto the Barbarous nations, that he will acquite & cleere Buicides of that ill name which went of him, for slaying of his guests & sacrificing men, and attributing unto all the Aegyptians by all his testimonies, much godlinesse, religion and justice, returneth upon the Greeks this inhumaine and abominable cruelty. For in his second booke he writeth that Menelaus having received Helena at the hands of king Proteus his wife, and bene by him honored with great and rich presents, shewed himselfe againe a most unjust and wicked man. For when the winde and weather served him not for to embarke and saile away, he wrought by his report, a most cursed and detestable fact, in taking two of the inhabitants male children of that countrey, and cut them in peeces for sacrifice: by occasion whereof being hated of the Aegyptians, and pursued, he fled directly with his fleet, and departed into Libya. For mine owne part, I wot not what Aegyptian hath given out this report of Menelaus: but contrariwise I know full well, that in Aegypt they retaine still to this day many honors in the memoriall, both of him and also of his wife Helena. Moreover this writer holding on still his course, reporteth that the Persians learned of the Greeks, to abuse boies carnally and contrary to kinde. And yet how is it possible that the Persians should learne this vilany and filthinesse of the Greeks, considering that the Persians in maner all doe confesse, that the children were there gueldd, before they had ever seene the Greeks sea. Also he writeth, that the Greeks were taught by the Aegyptians, their solemne pompes, festivall procellions, and publicke assemblies: likewise to adore the twelve gods: yea & that Melampus had learned of the same Aegyptians the very name of Dionysus, that is to say, Bacchus, who taught it the other Greeks. As touching the sacred mysteries, and secret ceremonies of Ceres, that they were brought out of Aegypt by the daughters of Danaus: as also that the Aegyptians beat themselves and are in great sorrow, yet will themselves name nothing why they so doe, but remaine close and keepe silence in the religious service of the gods. As touching Hercules and Bacchus whom the Aegyptians esteeme as gods, and the Greeks very aged men, he maketh mention in no place of this precise observation and distinction: howsoever he saith that this Aegyptian Hercules, was reckoned and ranged in the second order of the gods, and Bacchus in the third, as those who had a beginning of their essence, and were not eternall: and yet he pronounceth those other to be gods, but unto these, he judgeth that we ought to performe anniversary funerals, as having bene sometime mortall, and now canonized demi-gods, but in no wise to sacrifice unto them as gods. After the same maner spake he of Pan, overthrowing the most holy and venerable sacrifices of the Greeks by the vanities and fables which the Aegyptians deviled. Yet is not this the worst, nor so intolerable; for deriving the pedegree of Hercules from the race of Perseus, he holdeth, that Perseus was an Assyrian, according to that which the Persians say: But the captaines and leaders of the Dorians (saith he) seeme to be descended in right line from the Aegyptians, and fetch their genealogie and ancestours from before Danaus and Atrius: for as concerning Epaphus, Io, Isus and Argus, he hath wholly passed over and rejected, striving to make, not onely the other two Hercules Aegyptians and Phœnicians, but also this whom himselfe nameth to be the third, a meere stranger from Greece, and to enroll him among Barbarians, notwithstanding that of all the ancient learned men, neither Homer, nor Hesiodus, ne yet Archilochus, Pindarus, Stesichorus, Alexander, nor Pindarus, do make mention of any Hercules an Aegyptian or Phœnician, but acknowledge one alone, to wit, our Boeotian and Argian. And that which more is, among the seven sages, whom he termeth by the name of Sophilters, he will needs beare us downe, that Thales was a Phœnician borne, extracted from the ancient stocke of the Barbarians. And in one place, reproching in some sort the gods, under the vi-

fard and person of Solon, he hath these words: O Craesus, thou demandst of me as touching humane things, who know full well, that the deitie is envious and full of inconstant incertitude: where attributing unto Solon, that opinion which himselfe had of the gods, he joyneth malice unto impiety and blasphemy. And as for Pittachus, using him but in light matters, and such as are of no consequence, he passeth over in the meane while, the most worthy and excellent deed that ever the man did: for when the Athenians and Mitylenians were at warre about the port Sigeum; Phrynon the captaine of the Athenians having given defiance, and challenged to combat hand to hand; the hardiest warrior of all the Mitylenians, Pittachus advanced forward and presented himselfe to his face for to performe his devoir, where he bare himselfe with such dexterity, that he caught this captaine; as mighty a man as he was and tall of stature, and so entangled him; that he slew him outright. And when the Mitylenians, for this prowesse of his, offered unto him goodly rich presents, he launced his javelin out of his hand as farre as ever he could, and demanded so much ground onely as he raught with that shot. And thereupon, that field, even at this day, is called Pittacium. But what writeth Herodotus, when he comes to this place? In lieu of erecting this valiant act of Pittachus, he recounteth the flight of Alcæus the Poet, who flung from him his armour and weapons, and so ran away out of the battell: whereby it appeareth, that in avoiding to write of vertuous and valiant acts, but in not concealing vicious and foule facts, he testifieth on their side who say, that envie, to wit, a griefe for the good of another, and joy in other mens harmes, proceed both from one root of malice.

After all this, the Alcæonides who shewed themselves brave men and generous; and namely, by delivering their countrey from tyranny, are by him challenged for treason: for he saith, That they received Pisistratus upon his banishment, and wrought meanes for his returne again, upon condition, that he should espouse and marry the daughter of Melesias: and when the maiden said thus unto her mother, See my good mother, Pisistratus doth not company kindly with me, as he should, and according to the law of nature and marriage; hereupon the said Alcæonides tooke such indignation against the tyrant for his perverse dealing, that they chased him into exile. Now, that the Lacedæmonians should taste aswell of his malice as the Athenians had done before them, see how he defaceth and traduceth Othryades, a man esteemed and admired among them above all others, for his valiance: He only (saith he) remaining alive of those three hundred, ashamed to returne to Sparta, when all the rest of that company and confort of his were slaine and left dead in the field, presently overwhelmed himselfe in the place under an heape of his enemies shields reared for a Trophæ, and so died: for a little before, he said, that the victory betwene both sides rested doubtfull in even ballance; and now he witnesseth, that through the shame and baseness of Othryades, the Lacedæmonians lost the day: for as it is a shame to live being vanquished, so it is as great an honor to survive upon a victorie. I forbear now to note and observe, how in describing Craesus every where for a foolish, vain-glorious and ridiculous person in all respects, yet nevertheless he saith, that being prisoner he taught and instructed Cyrus, a prince who in prudence, vertue and magnanimity surpassed all the kings that ever were. And having by the testimonie of his owne historie, attributed no goodnesse unto Craesus, but this onely, that he honoured the gods with great offerings, oblations and ornaments, that he presented unto them; which very fame (as himselfe declareth) was the most wicked and profane act in the world: for whereas his brother Pantaleon and he were at great variance and debate, about succession in the kingdome during the life of their father; after that he came once to the crowne, he caught one of the nobles, a great friend and companion of his brother Pantaleon, who had before time bene his adversarie, and within a fullers mill all to beclawed and mangled him with tuckers cards and burling combs, so as he died therewith; and of his money which he did confiscate and seize upon, he caused those oblations and jewels to be made which he sent as a present to the gods. Concerning Deioetes the Median, who by his vertue and justice attained to the kingdome, he saith, that he was not such an one indeed, but an hypocrite, and by semblance of justice was advanced to that regall dignitie. But what should I stand upon the examples of Barbarous nations; for he hath ministred matter enough in writing onely of the Greeks. He saith, that the Athenians and many other Ionians, being ashamed of that name, were not only unwilling, but also denied utterly to be called Ionians: also, as many of them as were of the noblest blood, and descended from the very Senate and Phryaneum of the Athenians, begat children of Barbarous women, after they had killed their fathers and former children: by occasion whereof those women made an ordinance among themselves, which they bound bound with an oth, and ministred the same unto their daughters, never to eat nor drinke with their husbands, nor to call them by their names: and that the Milesians at this day be descended from the said women. And having cleanly delivered thus much under hand, that those onely who celebrated the feast named Apallutia, were indeed true Ionians: And all (quoth he) doe keepe and observe that solemnity, save onely the Ephesians and Colophonians. By this lie device he doth in effect deprive these states, of the noble antiquity of their nation. He writeth likewise, that the Cumæans and Mitylenæans, were compacted and agreed withall, for a peece of money, to deliver into the hands of Cyrus, Pactyas, one of his captaines, who had revolted from him: But I cannot say (quoth he) certainly, for how much, because the just summe is not exactly knownen. But he ought not by his leave to have charged upon any city of Greece such a note of infamy, without he had bene better assured thereof. And afterwards he saith, that the inhabitants of Chios pulled him, being brought unto them out of the temple of Athena Poliocha, that is to say, Tutelar and protectresse of the city, for to deliver him unto the Persians; which the Chians did after they had received for their hire, a peece of land called Starnes. Howbeit, Charon, the Lampfacinian, a more ancient writer, when he handleth the story of Pactyas, taketh neither the Mitylenæans, nor the Chians, for any such sacrilege: but writeth of this matter, thus word for word: Pactyas (quoth he) being advertised that the Persian army approached, fled first to Mitylena, and afterwards to Chios: and there he fell into the hands of Cyrus. Moreover this our author in his third booke, describing the expedition or journey of the Lacedæmonians against Polycrates the tyrant, saith that the Samians, both are of opinion and also report, that it was by way of recompence and requital, because they had sent them aid in their warre against Meffene, that the Lacedæmonians entred into armes and warred upon the tyrant, for to reduce the exiled persons home againe, and restore them to their livings and goods: but he saith, that the Lacedæmonians deny flatly this to have bene the cause: saying it was neither to set the Isle Samos at liberty, nor to succour the Samians, for that they had intercepted and taken away a faire standing cup of chaffice the Samians, for that they had intercepted and taken away a faire standing cup of gold, sent by them as a present unto king Craesus: and besides a goodly cuirace or breastplate, sent unto them from king Amasis. And yet we know for certaine, that in all those daies, there was not a city in Greece so desirous of honour, nor so infest and deadly bent against tyrants, as Lacedæmon was: for what other cuppe of gold, or cuirace was there, for which they chased out of Corinth and Ambracia the usurping race of the Cypselidæ; banished out of Nexos, the tyrant Lygdamis; expelled out of Athens, the children of Pisistratus; drove out of Sicyone, Aeschines; exiled from Thebes, Symmachus; delivered the Phocæans from Aulis; and turned Criseus out of Miletus: as for the lordly dominions over Thessaly, they utterly ruined and rooted out, which Aristomedes and Angelus usurped, whom they suppressed and defeated by the meanes of Leonyidas their king? But of these things I have written else where more exactly and at large. Now if Herodotus saith true, what wanted they of extreame folly and wickednesse in the highest degree, in disavowing and denying a most just and honorable occasion of this warre, to confesse that they made an invasion upon a poorer and miserable nation oppressed and afflicted under a tyrant, and all in remembrance of a former grudge, to be revenged for a small wrong upon a base minde and mechanical avarice. Now haply he had a fling at the Lacedæmonians and gave them a blur with his pen, because in the traine and consequence of the story, they came so just under it; but the city of the Corinthians, which was cleane out of his way, he hath notwithstanding taken it with him and bespurred and dashed as he passed by, with a most grievous slander and heavy imputation. The Corinthians also (quoth he) did favor and second with great affection this voiage of the Lacedæmonians, for to requite an hainous outrage and injury, which they had received before time at the Samians handes: And that was this? Periander the tyrant of Corinth, sent three hundred yong boies, that were the sonnes of the most noble persons in all Corfu, to king Altiastes for to be gelded. These youths arrived in the Isle Samos, who being landed the Samians taught how to sit as humble suppliants within the temple and sanctuary of Diana, & set before them for their nourishment certaine cakes made of Sesam seed & hony. And this forsooth was it that our trim historiographer calleth to great an outrage & abuse offered by the Samians unto the Corinthians; for which he saith, the Lacedæmonians also were stirred up and provoked against them, because they had saved the children of Greeks from eviration. But surely he that fasteneth this reproch upon the Corinthians, sheweth that the city was more wicked than the tyrant himselfe. As for him, his desire was to be revenged of the inhabitants of Corfu,

Corfu, who had killed his sonne among them: but the Corinthians, what wrong received they of the Samians, for which they should in hostile maner set upon them, who opposed themselves and impeached so inhumane and barbarous cruelty to be committed? and namely, that they should revive and raise up againe an old cankred grudge and quarrels, that had lien dead and buried the space of three generations; and all in favour and maintenance of tyranny, which had laine very grievous and unsupportable upon them, and whereof, being overthrowen and ruined as it is, they cease not still to abolish and doe out the remembrance for ever. Lo, what outrage it was, that the Samians committed upon the Corinthians; but what was the revenge and punishment that the Corinthians devised against the Samians? For if in good earnest they tooke indignation and were offended with the Samians, it had bene meet, not to have incited the Lacedæmonians, but to have diverted them rather, from levying warre upon Polycrates, to the end that the tyrant not being defeated and put downe, they might not have bene freed nor delivered from tyrannicall servitude. But that which more is, what occasion had the Corinthians to bee angry with the Samians, who though they desired, yet could not save the Corceyreans children, considering they tooke no displeasure against the Cnidians, who not onely preserved, but also restored them to their parents? And verily the Corceyreans, make no great regard, nor speake ought, of the Samians in this behalfe: many the Cnidians, they remembered in the best maner; for the Cnidians they ordained honours, privileges, and immunities, and enacted publicke decrees to ratifie and confirm the same. For these Cnidians sailing to the Isle of Samos, arrived there, drove out of the foresaid temple the guard of Periander, tooke the children forth, and brought them safe to Corfu, according as Antenor the Candiote, and Dionysius the Chalcidian in the booke of Foundations have left in writing. Now that the Lacedæmonians undertooke this expedition, not for to be quit with the Samians, and to punish them, but to deliver them rather from the tyrant, and for to save them; I will beleeve no other testimonie but the Samians themselves. For they affirme, that there is among them now standing, a tombe or monument by them erected at the publicke charges of the citie, for the corps of Archias a citizen of Sparta, whose memoriall they doe honour, for that in the said service he fought valiantly, and lost his life: for which cause the posteritie defended from that man, doe yet unto this day, beare singular affection, and do all the pleasures they can unto the Samians, as Herodotus himselfe beareth witnesse. Furthermore, in his fifth booke he writeth, that Clisithenes, one of the most noble and principall personages of all Athens, perswaded the priestresse Pythia, to be a false propheteesse, in mooving the Lacedæmonians alwaies by her answers that she gave out, for to deliver the citie of Athens from the thirtie tyrants: and thus unto a most glorious peece of worke and right just, he adjoineth the impuration of so great an impietie, and a damnable device of falshood; and withall, becometh god Apollo of that prophesie which is so good and honest, yea and becometh Themis, who also as they say assisteth him in the oracle. He saith also, that Isagoras yielded his wife unto Cleomenes, for to use her at his pleasure, whensoever he came unto her: and then, as his ordinary maner is, intermingling some praises among blanes, because he would be the better beloved: This Isagoras (quoth he) the sonne of Trifander, was of a noble house; but I am not able to say of what antiquitie before-time his pedigree was; but onely that his kinsfolke and those of his blood, doe sacrifice unto Jupiter, surnamed Curus. Now I assure you, this our Historian is a proper and pleasant conceited fellow, to send away Isagoras thus to the Carians, as it were to ravens, in a mischief. And as for Criseus, he packeth him away not by a backe doore or postern, but directly by the broad & open gate, as far as unto Phenice; saying, that his first originall came long since from the Gephyrians: but what Gephyrians trow yee: not those in Eubæa, or in Eretria, as some doe thinke: but he saith plainly they be Phœnicians, and that he is so perswaded of them by heare-say. And not being able to deprive the Lacedæmonians of their glory, for delivering the city of Athens from the servitude of the thirtie tyrants, he goeth about to obliterate quite, or at leastwise in some sort to disgrace and dishonor that most noble act, with as foule a passion, and as villanous a vice: for hee saith, that they repented incontinently, as if they had not well done, by the induction of false and supposed oracles, thus to have chased out of their countrey the tyrants their friends, guests, and allies, who promised to deliver Athens into their hands, and to have yielded the city unto an unthankfull people; and that anon they sent for Hippias, as farre as to Sigæum, for to reduce him to Athens: but the Corinthians opposed themselves, and diverted them, whiles Soficles discoursed and shewed

how many miseries and calamities the citie of Corinth had endured whiles Periander & Cypselus held them under their tyrannicall rule: and yet of all those enormous outrages which Periander committed, they could not name any one more wicked and cruell, than that of the three hundred children which he sent away for to be gelded: Howbeit, this man dareth to say, that the Corinthians were mooved and provoked against the Samians, who had saved the said youtthes, and kept them from suffering such an indignity, and caried the remembrance thereof for revenge, as if they had done them some exceeding great injurie: so full is his malice and gall of inconstancie, of repugnance and contradiction in all his speeches, which ever and anon is ready to offer it selfe in all his narrations. After all this, comming to describe the taking of the citie Sardis, he diminished, deformeth, and discredith the exploit all that ever he can, being so armed with shamelesse audacitie, that he termeth those shippes which the Athenians set out, and sent to succor the king, and to plague the Ionians, who rebelled against him, the originall causes of all mischiefe, for that they assailed to set at liberty and deliver out of servitude, so many goodly and faire cities of the Greeks, held forcibly under the violent dominion of the barbarous nations. As touching the Eretrians, he maketh mention of them only by the way, & passeth in silence a most woorthy and glorious piece of service, which they performed at that time: for when all Ionia was now already in an uprore & hurburly, and the kings armada neere at hand, they put out their navie, and in the maine sea of Pamphylia, defeated in a navall battell the Cyprians: then returning backe, and leaving their navie in the rode before Ephesus, they went by land to lay siege unto the capital citie of Sardis, where they beleagured Artaphernes within a castle, into which he was fledde, intending thereby to raise the siege before the citie Miletus: which service they put in execution and performed; causing their enemies to remoove their campe, and dislodge from thence, in a woonderfull great feare and affright: but seeing a greater number of enemies to presse hard upon them, they returned. Many Chroniclers report the historie in this manner; and among the rest Lysimachus Malloles, in his chronicle of the Eretrians. And verily it would have becomed well, if for no other reason, yet after the taking and destruction of their citie, to have added this their act of valour and prowesse. Howbeit, this good writer, contrariwise faith, that being vanquished in the field, the Barbarians followed in chafe, and pursued them as farre as to their shippes: and yet Choron the Lamplaccian, maketh no mention thereof, but writeth thus, word for word: The Athenians (quoth he) put to sea with a fleet of twentie galleys, for to aid the Ionians, and made a voiage as farre as to Sardis, where they were masters of all, except the kings fortresse or wall; which done, they returned to Miletus. In the sixth booke, our Herodotus, after he had related thus much of the Plataeans, that they had yielded and committed themselves to the protection of the Lacedæmonians, who made remonstrance unto them, that they should doe farre better to range and side with the Athenians their neighbours, and able to defend them: he addeth moreover and faith afterwards, not by way of opinion and suspition, but as one who knew it was so indeed, that the Lacedæmonians thus advised and counselled them at that time, not for any good will and loving affection that they bare unto them, but because they were all very well appaied to see the Athenians to have their hands full, and to be matched with the Bæotians. If then Herodotus be not malicious, it cannot chuse, but that the Lacedæmonians were very cautelous, fraudulent, and spightfull; and the Athenians as blockish and senselesse, not to see how they were thus deluded and circumvented. The Plataeans likewise were thus posted from them, not for any love or honor entended unto them, but because they might be the occasion of war. Furthermore, he is convinced to have fallily devised, and colourably pretended the excuse of the full moone against the Lacedæmonians, which whiles they attended and staied for, he faith, they failed and went not in that journey of Marathon, to aid the Athenians: for not onely they began a thousand voiaiges, and fought as many battels in the beginning of the moneth and new of the moone, but also at this very battell of Marathon, which was fought the sixth day of the moneth Boedromion, that is to say, November, they missed very little, but they had arrived in due time: for they came soone enough to finde the dead bodies of those that were slaine in the field, and lying still in the place: and yet thus hath he written of the full moone. It was impossible for them to doe this out of hand, being as they were, not willing to breake the law; for that as yet it was but the ninth day of the moneth: and they made answer, that they might not set forth, unless the moone were at the full. And thus these men waited for the full moone. But you good fit transerre the full moone into the beginning of the halfe moone or second quarter, confounding confounding the course of heaven, and the order of daies, yea, and shuffling every thing together. Over and besides, promising in the forefront and inscription of your historie, to write the deeds and affaires of the Greekes, you employ all your eloquence to magnifie and amplifie the acts of the Barbarians; and making semblance to be affectionate to the Athenians, yet for all that, you make no mention at all of that solemne pompe and procession of theirs at Agra, which they hold even at this day, in the honour of Hecate, or Proserpina, by way of thanksgiving for the victorie, the feast wherof they do celebrate. But this helpeth Herodotus verie much to meet with that impropagation and slander that went of him, namely, that he flattered the Athenians in his storie, for that he had received a great summe of money of them for that purpose: for if he had read this unto the Athenians, they would never have neglected nor let passe that wicked Philippides, who went to moove and sollicit the Lacedæmonians to be at that battell, from which himselfe came, and he especially, who as he faith himselfe, within two daies was in Sparta, after he had bene at Athens, if the Athenians after the winning of the field did not fend for the aide of their confederates and allies. But Dysillus an Athenian, none of the meanest Chroniclers, writeth, that he received of the Athenians, the summe of ten talents of silver, by vertue of an act that Anthus propounded.

Moreover, many are of opinion, that Herodotus in his narration of the battell of Marathon, himselfe marred the whole grace and honour of the exploit, by the number that he putteth downe of them who there were slaine: for he faith, that the Athenians made a vow to sacrifice unto Proserpina or Diana surnamed Agrotera, as many yeere-old goats as they slew of the Barbarians: but when after the discomfiture and overthrow, they saw that the number of the dead bodies was infinit, they made supplication to the goddesse for to be dispensed for their vow and promise, and to acquit them for five hundred every yeere to be killed in sacrifice for her. But to passe over this, let us see what followed after the battell. The Barbarians (quoth he) with the rest of their ships drawing backe and retiring into the open sea, and having taken a ship boord those slaves of Eretria, out of the lile where they had left them, doubled the point of Sunium, with a full purpose to prevent the Athenians before they could recover the citie. And the Athenians were of opinion, that they were advised thus to do by a secret complot betweene them and the Alcmæonidæ who had appointed and agreed with the Persians to give them a signall so soone as they were all embarked, by holding up aloft and shewing them a shield as farre off. And so they fetched a compass about the cape of Sunium. And here I am content that he should go cleere away with this, that he called those prisoners of Eretria by the name of slaves, who shewed as much courage and valour in this warre, yea, and as great a desire to win honour, as any Greeks whatsoever, although their vertue sped but ill, and was unworthily afflicted. And lesse account I make also of this, that he defameth the Alcmæonidæ, of whom were the greatest families and noblest persons of all the citie. But the worst of all is this, that the honour of this brave victorie is quite overthrowen, and the issue or end of so woorthy and renowned a piece of service is come just to nothing in a manner, neither seemeth it to have bene any such battell or so great an exploit, but onely a short scuffling or light skirmish with the Barbarians when they were landed, as evill willers, carpers and envious persons give out to deprave the service, if it be so, that after the battell, they fled not when they had cut the cables of their ships, permitting themselves to the winde, for to cary them as far as possibly might be frō Attica, but that there was a shield or target lifted up aloft in the aire as a signall unto them of treason, and that of purpose they made faile toward the city of Athens, in hope to surprize it; and having without any noife in great silence doubled the foresaid point of Sunium, and were discovered a float, hovering about the port Phaleræ, inso much as the principall and most honourable personages of the Athenians, being out of all hope to save the citie, betrayed it into their hands: for afterwards he ditchargeth and cleareth the Alcmæonidæ, and attributeth this treason unto others: And certeine it is (quoth he) that such a target or shield was shewed. And this he faith so confidently, as if himselfe had seene the thing. But impossible it is that it should be so, in case the Athenians won the victorie cleere: and say it had so bene, the Barbarians never could have perceived it, flying so as they did in great affright and danger, wounded also as they were, and chased both with sword and shot into their ships, who left the field every man, and fled from the land as fast as ever he could. But afterwards againe, when he maketh semblance to answer in the behalfe of the Alcmæonidæ, and to recture those crimes which himselfe broched, and charged upon them: I woonder (quoth he) and I can not beleeve the rumour of this imputation, that ever the Alcmæonidæ, by any compact compact with the Barbarians, shewed them the signall of a shield, as willing that the Athenians should be in subjection to the Barbarians under Hippias. In thus doing, he putteth me in mind and remembrance of a certaine clause running in this manner: Take him you will; and having taken him, let him goe you will. Sembably, first you accuse, and anon you defend: write you do and frame acculatorie imputations against honourable persons, which afterwards you seeme to cancel, discrediting herein (no doubt) and distrusting your selfe: for you have heard your owne selfe to say, that the Alcmaeonidae set up a targuet for a signal to the Barbarians vanquished and flying away; but in relieving them againe and answering in their defence, you shew your selfe to be a slanderous sycophant: for if that be true which you write in this place, that the Alcmaeonidae were worse, or at leastwise, as badly affected to tyrants, as Callias the sonne of Phenippus and father of Hippocleus, where will you bestow and place that conspiracie of theirs against the common wealth, which you have written in your former books? saying, that they contracted alliance and affinitie in marriage with Pisistratus; by meanes whereof, they wrought his returne from exile to exercise tyrannie: neither would they ever have banished him againe, had it not bene that their daughter had complained and accused him, that he used her not according to law of marriage & of nature. Thus you see what confused variations, contradictions and repugnances there be in that imputation and suspition of the Alcmaeonidae: but in sounding out the praises of Callias the sonne of Phenippus, with whom he joineeth his sonne Hippocleus, who by the report of Herodotus himselfe, was in his time the richest man in all Athenis, he confesseth plainly, that for to insinuate himselfe into the favor of Hippocleus, and to flatter him, without any reason or cause in the world arising out of the matter of the story, he brought Callias. All the world knowes, that the Argives refused not to enter into that generall confederacy and association of the Greeks, requiring onely, that they might not be ever at the Lacedaemonians command, nor forced to follow them, who were the greatest enemies, & those who of all men living hated them most: when it would not otherwise be, he rendereth a most malicious and spitefull cause and reason thereof, writing thus: When they saw (quoth he) that the Greeks would needs comprise them in that league, knowing full well, that the Lacedaemonians would not impart unto them any prerogative to command, they seemed to demand the communion thereof, to the end that they might have some colourable occasion and excuse to remaine quiet and sit still: which he saith, that Artaxerxes long after, remembred unto the ambassadors of the Argives, 30 who came unto him at Susa, and gave this testimonie unto them, That he thought there was not a city in all Greece friended him more than Argos. But (soone after, as his accustomed manner is, seeming to retract all, and cleanly to cover the matter, he comes in with these words: Howbeit, as touching this point, I know nothing of certainty; but this I wot well, all men have their faults, and I doe not believe, that the Argives have caried themselves woorth of all others: but howsoever (quoth he) I am bound to say that which is commonly received, yet I beleve not all: and let this stand thorowout the whole course of mine historie. For this also is given out abroad, That they were the Argives who solicited and sent for the king of Persia to levie warre upon all Greece; because they were not able in armes to make head against the Lacedaemonians, and cared not what became of them, to avoid the present discontentment and griefe wherein they 40 were. And may not a man very well returne that upon himselfe, which he reporteth to be spoken by an Aethiopian, as touching the sweet odours and rich purple of the Persians? * Deceitfull are the Persian ornaments, deceitfull are their habiliments. For even so a man may very well say of him: *Deceitfull are the * phrases, deceitfull are the figures of Herodotus his speeches*;

* Grecis melius, dicitur de his rebus, quod deceitfull are the Persian ornaments, deceitfull are their habiliments.

So intricate and tortuous,
so winding quite thorough,
As nothing found is therein found,
but all turn'd round about.

And like as painters make their light colours more apparent and eminent, by the shadowes that they put about them; even so Herodotus by seeming to denie that which he affirmeth, doth en- 50 force and amplifie his calumniationes so much the more; and by ambiguities and doubtfull speeches, maketh suspitions the deeper. But if the Argives would not enter into the common league with all other Greeks, but held off and stood out upon a jealousie of soveraigne command, or emulation of vertue and valour against the Lacedaemonians; no man will say the contrary, but that they greatly dishonoured the memorie of their progenitor Hercules, and disgraced the nobilitie of their race. For better it had bene, and more becomming, for the Siphnians and

Cithnians,

Cithnians, the inhabitants of two little Isles, to have defended the libertie of Greece, than by striving thus with the Spartans, and contesting about the prerogative of command, to shift off and avoid so many combats and so honourable pieces of service. And if they were the Argives, who called the king of Persia into Greece, because their sword was not so sharpe as the Lacedaemonians was, and for that they could not make their part good with them; what is the reason, that when the said king was arrived in Greece, they shewed not themselves openly to band with the Medes and Persians? And if they were unwilling to be seene in the field and campe with the Barbarian king; why did they not, when they staid behinde at home, invade the territory of the Laconians? why entred they not againe upon the Thuriens countrey, or by some other meanes 10 prevented & impeached the Lacedaemonians? for in so doing, they had bene able greatly to have endamaged the Greeks, namely, by hindring them from coming into the field at Plataea with so puissant a power of armed footmen. But the Athenians verily in this service, he highly extolleth and setteth out with glorious titles, naming them, The saviours of Greece; which had bene well done of him and justly, if he had not intermingled with these praises, many blames and reprochfull termes. Howbeit now, when he saith, that the Lacedaemonians were abandoned of the other Greeks, and neverthelesse, thus forsaken and left alone, having undertaken many woorthie exploits, died honourably in the field, foreseeing that the Greeks favouring the Medes, complotted and combined with king Xerxes; is it not evident hereby, that he gave not out those goodly words directly to praise the Athenians, but rather, that he commended them, 20 to the end that he would condemne and defame all other Greeks? For who can now be angry and offended with him, for reviling and reproching in such vile and bitter termes the Thebans and Phocaeans continually as he doth, considering that he condemneth of treason (which never was, but as he guesseth himselfe might have fallen out) even those who were exposed to all perils of death for the liberties of Greece? And as for the Lacedaemonians themselves, he putteth adoubt into our heads, Whether they died manfully in fight, or rather yeelded? making slight arguments, God wot, and frivolous conjectures, to impair their honour, in comparison of others that fought at Thermopylae.

Moreover, in relating the overthrow and shipwracke which hapned to the king of Persia fleet, wherein a mighty and infinit masse of money and money worth was cast away: Aminocles 30 a Magnesian citizen (quoth he) and sonne of Cretines, was mightily enriched; for he met with infinit treasure aswell in coine as in plate both of silver and gold. But he could not passe over so much as this, and let it go, without some biting nip favouring of malice: For this man (quoth he) who otherwise before time was but poore and needy, by these windfalles and unexpected cheats became very wealthy: but there befell unto him also an unhappy accident, which troubled him and disgraced his other good fortune, for that he killed his owne sonne. For who seeth not, that he inserteth in his historie these golden words of wrecks, and of great treasure found floating or cast upon the sands by the tides of the sea, of very purpose, to make a fit roume and a convenient place, wherein he might bestow the murder committed by Aminocles upon the person of his owne sonne. And whereas Aristophanes the Boeotian wrote, that having demanded money of the Thebans, he could receive none of them; and that when he went about 40 to reason and dispute scholastically with the youth of the city in points of learning, the magistrates (such was their rusticitie and hatred of good letters) would not suffer him: other proofe and argument thereof he putteth downe none: but Herodotus gave testimonie with Aristophanes, and whilst those imputations wherewith he chargeth the Thebans, he putteth downe some falsely, others ignorantly, and some againe upon hatred, as one that had a quarrell against them: for he affirmeth, that the Thebans combined and sided with the Medians at the first upon meere necessity, wherein he saith true. And prophesying as it were of other Greeks, as if they minded to betray and forsake the Lacedaemonians, he commeth in afterwards with this shift, that this was not voluntarily and with their good liking, but upon constraint and necessity, be- 50 cause they were surprised city by city, one after another. But yet he alloweth not unto the Thebans the excuse of the same compulsion, albeit they had sent a band of five hundred men under the conduct of captain Ammaeus, for to keepe the streights of Tempe, and likewise unto the passe of Thermopylae, as many as king Leonides demanded, who onely together with the Thebians stucke to him and remained with him, when he was forsaken of all other, after they saw how he was environed round about on every side. But after that the Barbarous king, having gotten all the Avonnes, was entred upon their confines, and Demaratus the Spartan, being in right of

mutuall hospitalitie friendly affected to Apaginus a chiefe upholder and principall pillar of the Oligarchie, or faction of some few, usurping principalltie, wrought so, as that he brought him first acquainted and afterwards into familiar friendship with the Barbarian king, whiles all other Greeks were embarked and at sea, and none scene upon the land to encounter the enemies. By this meanes, at the last driven they were to accept conditions of peace, and to grow into a composition with the Barbarians, finding themselves brought to so hard termes of necessitie: for neither had they sea at hand, nor a navy at command as the Athenians, neither dwelt they farre off from the heart of Greece in a most remote angle thereof, as did the Lacedæmonians, but were not above one daies journey and an halfe from the Medians roiall campe, and had already encountered in the streight passages with the kings power, assisted onely with the Spartans 10 and Thespians, where they had the worfe and were daited. And yet this our historiographer is so just and equall, that he saith, The Lacedæmonians seeing themselves forsaken and abandoned of all their allies, were faine to give care unto any composition whatsoever, & to accept adventure what was offered: and so being not able to abolish nor utterly blot out lo brave and so glorious an act, nor to deny, but that it was achieved; he goeth about to discredit and deface it with this vile imputation and suspition, writing thus: The allies then and the confederats being sent backe, returned into their countreys and obeyed the commandement of Leonidas: only the Thespians and Thebans remained still with the Lacedæmonians: and as for the Thebans, it was full against their willes, for that Leonidas kept them as hostages; but the Thespians were willing thereto, for they said, they would never forsake Leonidas nor his company. Sheweth he not ap- 20 apparently heerein, that he carrieth a spitefull and malicious minde particularly against the Thebans, whereby not onely he slandereth the city fallily and unjustly, but also careth not so much, as to make the imputation seeme probable, no nor to conceale at leastwise unto few men, that he might not be espied to have beene privie unto himselfe of contradictions: for having written a litle before, that Leonidas seeing his confederates and allies out of heart and altogether discouraged to hazard the fortune of the field, commanded them to depart: a litle after, cleane contrary he saith, that he kept the Thebans perforce with him and against their wil, whom by all likelihood he should have driven from him, if they had bene willing to stay, in case that he had them in jealousy and suspition, that they tooke part with the Medians: for seeing he would not have those about him who were cowardly affected, what boot was it to keepe among 30 his soldiers men suspected? For being as he was, a king of the Spartans, and captain general of all the Greeks, he had not bene in his right wits nor found in judgement, if he would have staid with him in hostage foure hundred men well armed, when his owne company were but three hundred in all, especially at such a time when as he saw himselfe hardly beset and beset with enemies, who pressed upon him at once, both before and behind. For how soever before time he had led them about with him as hostages, probable it was that in such an extremity they would either have had no regard of Leonidas and so departed from him, or else that Leonidas might have feared to be environed by them rather then by the Barbarians. Over and besides, had not king Leonidas bene ridiculous and worthy to be laughed at, to bid other Greeks to depart, as if by tarying they should soone after lose their lives: and to forbid the Thebans, to the 40 end that he might keepe them for the behalfe of other Greeces, he I say who was resolved anon to die in the field; for if he led the men about with him in trueth as hostages, or no better than slaves, he never should have kept them still with those who were at the point to perish and be slaine, but rather delivered them unto other Greeks who went from him. Now whereas there remaineth one cause yet, that a man may alledge, why he retained them still with him, for that peradventure they should all die with him, this good writer hath overthrowen that also, in that he writeth thus of the honorable mind & magnanimity of Leonidas, word for word in this wise: Leonidas (quoth he) casting and considering all these matters in his minde, & desiring that this glory might redound unto the Spartans alone, sent away his friendly allies every one into their 50 owne countries, therefore rather than because they were of different minds & opinions: for exceeding folly it had bene of his part, to keepe his enemies for to be perturbors of that glory, fro which he repelled his friends. It appeareth then by the effects, that Leonidas distrusted not the Thebans, nor thought amiss of them, but reputed them for his good and loiall friends: For he marched with his army into the city of Thebes, and at his request obtained that which to no other was ever granted, namely to be lodged all night and sleepe within the temple of Hercules, and the next morning related unto the Thebans, the vision which appeared unto him: For he law as he thought, all the greatest and most principall cities of Greece in a sea, troubled and disquieted with rough windes and violent tempests, wherein they stord and were tossed to and fro. But the city of Thebes surpassed all the rest, for mounted it was on high up to heaven, & afterwards suddenly the sight therof was lost, that it would no more be scene. And verily these things as a type resembled that which long time after befell unto that city. But Herodotus in writing of this conflict, burieth in silence the bravest act of Leonidas himselfe, saying thus much barely: They all lost their lives in the straights, about the top of a certaine hill. But it was far otherwise. For when they were advertised in the night that the enemies had invested them round about, they arose and marched directly to their very campe, yea and advanced so far forth as they came 10 within a litle of the kings roiall pavilion, with a full resolution there to kill him, and to leave their lives all about him. And verily downe they went withall before them, killing, slaying and putting to flight, as many as they met, even as farre as to his tent. But when they could not meet with Xerxes, seeking as they did for him in so vast and spacious a campe, as they wandered up and downe searching for him with much adoe, at the last hewed in peeces they were by the Barbarians, who on every side in great number came about them. And albeit we will write in the life of Leonidas, many other noble acts and worthy sayings of his, which Herodotus hath not once touched, yet it shall not be amisse to quote heere also by the way, some of them. Before that he and his noble troupe departed out of Sparta in this journey, there were exhibited solemne funerall games for his and their sakes, which their fathers and mothers stood to behold: 20 & Leonidas himselfe, when one said unto him, That he led forth very few with him to fight a battell: Yea but they are many enough (quoth he) to die there. His wife asked him when he tooke his leave of her, what he had else to say? No more (quoth he) turning unto her but this, that thou marry againe with some good man, and beare him good children. When he was within the vale or passe of Thermopylae, and there invironed, two there were in his company of his owne race and family, whom he desired to save: So he gave unto one of them a letter to carry whether he directed it, because he would send him away: but the party would not take it at his hands, saying in great cholar and indignation, I am come hither to fight like a warrior, and not to convey letters as a carrier. The other he commanded for to goe with credence, and a message from him unto the magistrates of Sparta: but he made answer not by word of mouth, but 30 by his deed: for he tooke up his shield in hand and went directly to his place, where he was appointed to fight. Would not any man have blamed another for leaving out these things? But this writer having taken the paines to collect and put in writing the bason and close stoole of Amasis, and how he brake winde over it; the comming in of certaine asses which a theefe did drive; the congiary or giving of certaine bottles of wine, and many other matters of such good stufte; can never be thought, to have omitted through negligence, nor by oversight and forgetfullnesse, so many worthy exploits, and notable sayings: but even of peevishnesse, malice and injustice, to some. And thus he saith, that the Thebans at first being with the Greeks, sought indeed, but it was by compulsion, because they were held there by force. For it should seeme forsooth, that not only Xerxes, but Leonidas also, had about him a company that followed 40 the campe with whips, to scourge those I trow, who lagged behinde, and these good fellows held the Thebans to it, and made them to fight against their willes: And thus he saith that they perforce perforce, who might have fled and gone their waies: and that willingly they tooke part with the Medes, whereas there was not one came in to succor them. And a litle after, he writeth, that when others made hast to gaine the hill, the Thebans being disbanded and divided asunder, both stretched forth their hands unto the Barbarians, and as they approached neere unto them, said that which was most true, namely, that they were Medians in heart, and so in token of homage and fealty, gave unto the king water and earth: that being kept by force they were compelled to come into this passe of Thermopylae, and could not doe withall, that their king was wounded, but were altogether innocent therof: By which allegations they went cleare away with 50 their matter: For they had the Thebans witnesses of these their words and reasons. Lo how this apologic and justification of theirs, had audience among those barbarous outries of so many thousand men, in those confused shouts and dissonant noises, where there was nothing but running and flying away of one side, chasing and pursuit of another: See how the witnesses were deposed, heard and examined. The Thebans also amid the throng and rout of those that were knocked downe and killed, and over those heapes of bodies which were troden under foot (for all was done in a very guller and narrow passage) pleaded no doubt very formally for the

Thebans:

Thebans: for that a little before they having conquered by force of armes all Greece, chased them as far as to the city Theſſie, after they had vanquished them in battell, and slaine their leader and captaine Lantamis. For thus much passed even at that very time betweene the Thebans and the Theſſians: whereas otherwise there was not so much as civill love and humanity, that appeared by mutuall offices from one to the other. Besides, how is it possible that the Thebans were saved, by the testimony of the Theſſians? For the Barbarous Medes, as himselfe saith, partly killed outright such as came into their hands: and in part whiles their breath was yet in their bodies, by the commandement of Xerxes, set upon them a number of the kings markes, beginning first at the captaine himselfe Leontides. And yet neither was Leontides the generall of the Thebans at Thermopylae, but Anaxander as Aristophanes writeth out of the Annals, and 10 records in the arches of Thebes, as touching their soveraigne magistrates: and so Nicaner likewise the Colophonian hath put downe in his cronicle: neither was there ever any man before Herodotus who knew that Xerxes marked & branded in that maner any Theban: for this had bin an excellent plea in their defence against the foresaid calumny, and a very good meanes for this city to vaunt and boast of such markes given them, as if king Xerxes meant to punish and plague as his greatest and most mortall enemies, Leonidas and Leontides. For he caused the one to be scourged, and his body to be hanged up when he was dead; and the other to be pricked whiles he was alive. And this our Historiographer hath used this cruelty which they shewed unto Leonidas dead, for a manifest proofe that the Barbarous king hated Leonidas in his life time above all men in the world. And in avouching that the Thebans who sided with the 20 Medes at Thermopylae were thus branded & marked as slaves, and afterwards, being thus marked, fought egerly in the behalfe of the same Barbarians before Platea, me thinks he may well say as Hippocles the feat moriske dancer, unto whom, when at a feast he bestirred his legges, and hopped artificially about the tables, one said unto him, Thou dancest truly. Hippocles answered againe, Hippocles careth not greatly for the truth. In his eighth booke he writeth that the Greeks being affrighted like cowards, entered into a resolution for to flee from Artemisium into Greece: and that when those of Euboea besought them to tarry still awhile, untill such time as they might take order how to bestow their wives, children and familie, they were nothing moved at their priers, nor gave any care unto them, untill such time as Themistocles tooke a peece 30 of many of them, and parted the same betweene Eurybiades and Adimantus the Pretour or captaine of the Corinthians. And then they staid longer, and fought a navall battell with the Barbarians. And verily Pindarus the Poet, albeit he was not of any confederate city, but of that which was suspected and accused to hold of the Medians side, yet when he had occasion to make mention of the battell at Artemisium, brake forth into this exclamation:

*This is the place where Athens youth,
Sometime as writers say,
Did with their bond, of liberty the glorious ground worke lay.*

But Herodotus contrariwise, by whom some give out that Greece hath bene graced and adorned, writeth that the said victory was an act of corruption, bribery and mere theft, and that the 40 Greeks fought against their wils, as being bought and sold by their captaines, who tooke money therefore. Neither is here an end of his malice. For all men in maner doe acknowledge and confesse, that the Greeks having gotten the upper hand in sea fight upon this coast, yet abandoned the cape Artemisium, and yielded it to the Barbarians, upon the newes that they heard of the overthrow received at Thermopylae. For it had bene no boot nor to any purpose, for to have sitten still there, and kept the sea for the behoofe of Greece, considering that now the warre was hard at their dores within those straights, and Xerxes, master of all the Avenies. But Herodotus feigneth, that the Greeks, before they were advertised of Leonidas death, held a counsell and were in deliberation to flee: For these be his words: Being in great distresse (quoth he) and the Athenians especially, who had many of their ships, even the one halfe of their fleet shrewdly 50 brused and shaken, they were in consultation to take their flight into Greece. But let us permit him thus to name or to reproch rather this retreat of theirs before the battell: but he termed it before, a flight: and now at this present he calleth it a flight: and hereafter he will give it the name of flight, so bitterly is he bent to use this vile word, flight. But (quoth he) there came to the Barbarians presently after this, in a barke or light pinnace a man of Ephra, who advertised them, how the Greeks had quit the cape Artemisium and were fledde: which because they could could not beleve, they kept the messenger in ward and safe custody, and thereupon put forth certaine swift soits in espiall to discover the truth. What say you Herodotus? What is it you write? That they fled as vanquished, whom their very enemies themselves after the battell could not beleve that they fled, as supposing them to have had the better hand a great deale? And deserveth this man to have credit given him, when he writeth of one perticular person, or of one city apart by it selfe, who in one bare word, spoileth all Greece of the victory? He overthroweth and demolisheth the very Trophæe and monument, that all Greece erected. He abolisheth those titles and inscriptions, which they set up in the honor of Diana, on the East side of Artimissum, calling all this but pride and vaine glory. And as for the Epigram, it ran to this effect.

*From Asia land, all sorts of nations fount
When Athens youth, sometime in navall fights
Had vanquished, and all these coasts about Disperst their fleets; and therewith put to flight
And slaine the host of Medes: Loe here in sight
What monuments to thee with due respect,
Diana virgin pure, they did erect.*

He described not the order of the battels, and how the Greeks were ranged, neither hath he shewed what place every city of theirs held, during this terrible fight at sea: but in that retreat of their fleet, which he termeth a flight, he saith, that the Corinthians sailed foremost, and the A- 20 thenians in most: he should not then have thus troden under foot, and insulted too much over those Greeks, who tooke part with the Medes: he (I say) who by others is thought to be a Thurian borne, and reckoneth himselfe in the number of the Halicarnassians, and they verily being descended from the Dorians, come with their wives and children to make warre against the Greeks. But this man is so farre off from naming and alledging before the streights and necessities whereto those states were driven, who sided with the Medians, that he reporteth thus much of the Medians, how notwithstanding the Phocæans were their capitall enemies, yet they sent unto them aforehand, that they would spare their country, without doing any harme or damage unto it, if they might receive from them as a reward, fittie talents of silver. And this wrote he as touching the Phocæans in these very termes: The Phocæans (quoth he) were the 30 only men who in these quarters sided not with the Medians, for no other cause as I finde upon mature consideration, but in regard of the hatred which they bare against the Theſſians: for if the Theſſians had bene affected to the Greeks, I suppose the Phocæans would have turned to the Medes. And yet a little after, himselfe will say, that thirteene cities of the Phocæans were set on fire, and burnt to ashes by the Barbarian king, their countrey laid waste, the temple within the citie Abes consumed with fire, their men and women both put to the sword, as many as could not gaine the top of the mount Parnassus: Nevertheless he rangeth them in the number of those that most affectionately tooke part with the Barbarians, who indeed, chose rather to endure all extremities and miseries that warre may bring, than to abandon the defence and maintenance of the honour of Greece. And being not able to reprove the men for any deeds 40 committed, he busied his braines to devise false imputations, forging and framing with his pen divers surmises and suspicions against them, not willing that their intentions should be judged by their acts, if they had not bene of the same minde and affection with the Theſſians, as if they would have renounced the treason, because their countrey was already seized by others. If then, a man, who would goe about to excuse the Theſſians for siding with the Medes, should say, that they were not willing thereto, but for the hatred which they bare unto the Phocæans, seeng them adhere and allied to the Greeks, therefore they tooke the contrary side, and clave to the Medes, even against their will and judgement: might not he seeme to be an egregious flatterer, who thus in favour of others, searching honest pretences to colour and cover foule facts, perverteth the truth? Yes verily, as I thinke. How then can it otherwise be, but that he 50 shall be taken for a plainely cophant, who saith; that the Phocæans followed not the better for vertue, but because they knew the Theſſians were of a contrary minde and judgement? For he doeth not turne and fether this slander and calumny upon others, as his maner is else where to doe, saying, that he heard say, &c. but he affirmeth, that in conferring all things together, himselfe found no other occasion thereof. He ought then to have alledged withall, his preiudgments and proofes; whereby he was perswaded, that they who performe all actions semblable to the best, are yet in will and intention all one with the worst. For the occasion which

which he alledgeth, to wit, enmitie, is frivolous, and to be laughed at, because neither the enmitie that was betwene those of Aegina and the Athenians; nor that which the Chalcidians bare against the Eretrians; nor the Corinthians against the Megarians; was a barre to impeach them for joining together in the league of Greece, for the defence of common libertie: like as on the contrary side, the Macedonians most bitter and mortall enemies unto the Theffalians, and those who plagued them most, diverted them not from the confederacie and alliance with the Barbarians. For the publicke perill, covered and hidde their private quarrels: inso much as abandoning and banishing their passions, they gave their consent, either to honesty for vertue, or to profit for necessitie. And yet beside this necessitie, wherewith they found themselves overtaken, yea, and forced to submit themselves to the Medes, they returned againe to the Greeks side: and heereof Leocrates the Spartane, giveth direct testimonie in their behalfe. Yea and Herodotus himselfe being forced and compelled thereto, confesseth in the description of the affaires that passed at Platea, that the Phocians sided with the Greeks. And no marvel is it, if he be so rough and violent with such as have beene unfortunate; when as, even those who were present in the action, and hazarded their whole estate for the good of the common-wealth, he transposeth into the ranke of enemies and traitors. For the men of Naxos sent three galleies or shippes of warre to aide the Barbarians in their service: but one of the captaines of those vessels named Democritus, perswaded his other two fellowes, to turne, and range rather on the Greeks side. See how he can not for his life, praise, but he must withall dispraise: but looke when some particular person is commended, he must needs by and by condemne a whole citie, and nation: Witnesse heereof, among ancient writers, Hellanicus, and of our moderne authors, Ephorus: for the one faith, that the Naxians came to succour the Greekes with fixe galleies, and the other faith with five: yea and Herodotus himselfe is convinced to have feigned and falsified this: For the particular chroniclers of the Naxians write, that before time they had repulged Megabates the lieutenant of the kings, who with two hundred saile arrived at their Isle, & there ridde at anchor: afterwards drave away Datis another generall of his, who as he passed by, burnt their cities. And if it be so as Herodotus faith elsewhere, that they themselves destroyed their city, by setting it on fire, but the people saved themselves, by flying into the mountaines, had they good cause to send aid unto those, who were the cause of the ruin and destruction of their owne country, and not to joine with them who fought for the common libertie? But that it was not so much to praise Democritus, as to blame the Naxians, that he devised this lie, he sheweth evidently by this, that he concealeth and omitteth to speake of the valiant feats of armes, which at that time captain Democritus exploited, according as Simonides shewed by this Epigram.

*Democritus in third place gave the charge with all his might,
What time as Greeks nere Salamis, with Medes at sea did fight, Five ships of enemies he tooke:
a sixth there chane'd to be,
One of the Greeks in Barbarous hands, and that recovered be.*

But why should any man be angry with him about the Naxians? For if their be any Antipodes, as some say there are, who dwell in the other Hemisphere and goe opposit unto us, I suppose that they also have heard of Themistocles, and the counsell that he gave unto the Greeks for to fight a navall battell before Salamis, who afterwards caused a temple to be built in the Isle of Metite, unto Diana the wise counsellor, after that the Barbarous king was discomfited. Now this kinde and gentle cronicler of ours, refusing as much as lieth in him to avow this exploit, and to transfer the glory thereof unto another, writeth expressly thus. When things stood upon these termes, as Themistocles went a boord into his owne gally, there was a citizen of Athenis named Mnesiphelus, who demanded of him what they had resolved upon in their councill? And when he heard that concluded it was to retire with their fleet unto Isthmus or the streights, there to fight a battell at sea even before Peloponnesus: I say unto you (quoth he) againe that if they remove the navy from Salamis, you shall never fight more upon the sea for any country of your owne: for every man will presently returne home to his owne city. And therefore if there be any device and meanes in the world, goe your waies and indevor to breake this resolution, and if it be possible deale so with Eurybiades, that he may change his minde and tarry here still: And a little after, when he had said that this advice pleased Themistocles wondrous much, & that without making any answer at all he went directly to Eurybiades, he writeth againe in these very termes: And sitting neere unto him, he relateth what counsell he had heard Mnesiphilus to give, taking it upon himselfe, and addeth more things besides. Thus see you not how in some sort he brings Themistocles unto an ill name and opinion of leaudnesse, in that he attributeth unto himselfe a counsell which was none of his owne, but the invention of Mnesiphilus? And afterwards deriding still the Greeks more and more, he faith that Themistocles was no such wise man, as to see what was good and expedient, but failed in his foresight, notwithstanding that for his prudence and cunning he carried the surname of Ulysses. Mary, lady Artemisa borne in the same city that Herodotus was, without the prompting or teaching of any person, but even of her own head, fortold Xerxes that the Greeks could not hold out long, nor make head against him, but would disband and disperse themselves, & every one fle home unto his owne city: Neither it is like (quoth she) if you march with your army by land unto Peloponnesus, that they will be quiet and sit still, and take no care to fight at sea for the Athenians: Whereas, Sir, if you make hast to give them a navall battell, I feare me greatly that if your armada receive any foile or damage, it wil greatly prejudice your land forces. But here Herodotus wanted nothing but his propheticall verses, to make Artemisa another Sibylla, prophesying of things to come so exactly. Well in regard of this advertisement Xerxes gave her commision to carry his children with her to the city of Ephesus: for he had forgotten belike, to bring any women with him from his roiall city of Susa, in case his children needed a convoy of women to conduct them. But I make no account of such lies as these which he hath devised against us: yet let us onely examine a little what slanders he hath raised upon others. He faith that the Athenians give out, how Adimantus the captaine of the Corinthians, when the enemies were at the point of giving the charge, and joining battell, in great feare and astonishment fled, not by shoving the ship backward at the poupe by little and little after a soft maner of retreat, nor yet making way of evasion and escape closely and with silence through his enemies; but hoising up and lpredding full saile, and turning the proes and beake heads about of all his vessels at once. And then there was a fregat or swift pinnace sent out after him, which overtook him about the coasts of Salamis, out of which one cried out unto him: What Adimantus, doe you fle indeed, and have you abandoned and betrayed the Greeks? And yet they have the better hand, according as they made their praieris unto the gods for to vanquish their enemies. Now this tregat, we must thinke verily came downe from heaven: for what need had he to use any such tragique engine, or fabricke to worke such feare, who every where else surpasseth all the Poets tragicall in the world, for lying and vanity. Well Adimantus beleeving the said voice, was reclaimed and returned againe to the armada, when all was done, and the businesse dispatched by others to his hands. Thus goes the bruit and speech among the Athenians. But the Corinthians confesse not so much, laying that they themselves were the formost who in the vaward gave the first onser and charged the enemies in this battell at sea: and on their side beare witnesse all the other Greeks. And thus dealeth this man in many other places: He soweth slanders here and there upon one or other, to the end that he may not misse but light upon some, tall it out as it will, who may appear most wicked. Like as in this place he speedeth very well in his purpose. For if his slander and accusation be beleeved, the Corinthians shall sustaine infamie: if discredited, the Athenians shall beare the dishonor: or if the Athenians have notlied upon the Corinthians, yet himselfe hath spared neither of them, but told a lie of them both. For proove hercof, Thucydides who bringeth in an ambassador of Athenis, to contest against a Corinthian at Lacedamon, and speake bravely of their owne worthy exploits against the Medes, and namely, of the navall battell of Salamis, chargeth upon the Corinthians no matter of treason nor cowardise in abandoning their colours: for there is no likelihood, that the Athenians would have reproched the city of Corinth in such termes, considering that they saw it engraven in the third place after the Lacedæmonians, and those inscriptions of spoiles which woom from the Barbarians, were consecrated to the gods. And at Salamis, they permitted them to interre and bury their dead neere to the citie side, as who were brave warriors, and had borne themselves most valiantly in that service, with an inscription in Elegick verses to this effect:

*Once (passenger) we dwelt in Corinth towne,
Well watered with sea on either side:
And now our bones thus lye of renowne,*

High

*Hight Salamis, within drie mould'orth hide:
Phœnician ships we sunke, that here did ride:
The Medes so stout we flew and Persians brave,
That sacred Greece from bondage we might save.*

But their Cenotaph or imaginary tombe which was erected in Isthmus, carieth this Epitaph:
*Loe heere we lie, who with our lives set free
All Greece, neere brought to shamefull slaverye.*

Likewise over the offerings which Diodorus one of the captaines of the Corinthian gallies, caused to be set up in the temple of Latona, there was this superscription:

*From cruell Medes, these armes which hang in sight,
The mariners of Theodoros won:
And as memorials of their navall fight,
To dame Latona offered them anon.*

Adimantus himselfe, whom Herodotus evermore doth revile and reproch, saying, That he alone of all the captaines, went away with a full purpose to flie from Artemisium, and would not stay untill the conflict: see what honour he had:

*Friend passenger, heere lies sir Adimant Entombed, by whose prowess valiant,
All Greece is crown'd with freedome at this day,
Which els had beene to thraldome brought for ay.*

For neither is it like that such honour should have beene done unto him after his death, if hee had beene a coward and a traitour; neither would he ever have dared to name one of his daughters Nausimice, that is to say, Victorie in battell at sea; another, Acrothion, which is as much, as the First fruits of spoiles won from enemies; and a third, Alexibia, that is to say, Aide against force: also to give unto his sonne the name of Aristeus, which signifieth a brave warrior: if he had not won some glory and reputation by worthy feats of armes. Moreover, it is not credible, I will not say, that Herodotus, but the meanest and most obscure Carian that is, was ignorant of that glorious and memorable praiſe which in those daies the Corinthian dames alone of all other Grecian wives made, That it might please the goddesse Venus to inspire their husbands with the love and desire to give battell unto the Barbarians. For this was a thing commonly known and divulged abroad, inſomuch as Simonides made an Epigram engraven over those their images of braſſe, which are set up in the temple of Venus, which by report was founded in times paſt by Medea, as some say, to this end, that the herselfe might cease to love her husband; but as others, that Jason her husband might give over the love of one Thetis. And the said Epigram goeth in this manner:

*These Ladies here, whose statues stand in place, Did whom priors to goddesse Venus make,
In Grecks behalfe; that it might please her grace
Them to incite, the warres to undertake.
Dame Venus then for those good womens sake
To Median archers expos'd not as a pray
The Grecks, nor would their Citadels betray.*

Such matters as these, he should have written and made mention of, rather than inserted into his historie, how Aminocles killed his owne sonne. Over and besides, after he had satisfied himselfe to the ful with most impudent imputations which he charged upon Themistocles, accusing him, that he ceased not secretly to rob and spoile the Isles, without the knowledge of the other captaines joined in commiſſion with him; in the end, taketh from the Athenians the crowne of principall valiance, and setteth it upon the head of the Aeginets, writing thus: The Grecks having sent the first fruits of their spoiles and pillage unto the temple at Delphos, demanded of Apollo in generall, whether he had sufficient, and stood content with that portion of the bootie: so unto whom he answered, that of all other Grecks, he had received enough, & wherewith he was well pleased: but of the Aeginets not so; at whose hands he required the chiefe prife and honor of prowess, which they woon at the battell of Salamis. Thus you see he fattereth not upon the Scythians, the Persians or Aegyptians his lying tale, which he coggeth and deviseth, as Aelope doth upon crows, ravens and apes; but he useth the very person of god Apollo Pythius, for to disappoint and deprive the Athenians of the first place in honor, at the battell of Salamis; as also

The mistocles of the second, which was adjudged unto him at Isthmus or the streights of Peloponnesus; for that ech captaine there, attributed the highest degree of prowess to himselfe, and the next unto him: and thus the judgement heereof growing to no end and conclusion, by reason of the ambition of the said captaines, he saith, All the Grecks weighed anchor and departed, as not being willing to confere upon Themistocles the soveraigne honour of the victorie. And in his ninth and last booke, having nothing left to wreake his reene upon, and to discharge his malicious and spightfull stomacke, but onely the Lacedæmonians, and that excellent piece of service which they performed against the Barbarians before the city of Platea, he writeth, That the Lacedæmonians, who aforetime feared greatly, that the Athenians being sollicitated and perswaded by Maronius, would forsake all other Grecks: now that the Streights of Isthmus were mured up & their country safe enough, they tooke no further care of others, but left them at six and seven, feasting & making holiday at home, deluding the embassadors of the Athenians, and holding them off with delays, and not giving them their dispatch. And how is it then, that there went to Platea a thousand and five Spartans, having every one of them seven Ilotes about him, for the guard of his person? How is it (I say) that they taking upon them the adventure of so great a perill, vanquished and discomfited so many thousands of Barbarians? But hearken what a probable cause hee alledgeth: There was (quoth he) by chance, a man at Sparta, named Chileus, who came from Tegæa thither, and sojourned there, for that among the Ephori he had some friends, as betweene whom and him there was mutuall hospitalitie: He it was who perswaded them to bring their forces into the field, shewing unto them that the bulwarke and wall for the defence of Peloponnesus would serve in small stead or none, if the Athenians joined once with Maronius; and this was it that drew Pausanias forth with his power to Platea: so that if some particular businesse haply had kept Chileus at home still in Tegæa, Greece had never gotten the victorie. Againe, not knowing another time what to doe with the Athenians: one while he extollet their city on high, and another while he debaseth it as low, tossing it to and fro, saying, that being in question about the second place of honor with the Tegæates, they made mention of the Heracidae, alledging their valiant acts, which before time they had achieved against the Amazones: the sepulchres also of the Peloponnesians, who died under the very wals of the citie Caumes; and finally that they went downe to Marathon vaunting gloriously in words, and taking great joy that they had the conduct of the left wing or point of the battell. Also a little after, he putteth downe, that Pausanias & the Spartans willingly yielded the superiority of command to them, and desired them to take the charge of the right wing themselves, to the end they might confront the Persians, and give them the left; as if they had excused themselves by their disuse, in that they were wont to encounter with the Barbarians. And verily, albeit this is a meere mockerie, to say, that they were unwilling to deal with those enemies, who were not accustomed to fight with them: yet he saith moreover, that all the other Grecks, when their captaines ledde them into another place for to encampe in, so soone as ever their standers marched & advanced forward: The horsemen (quoth he) in generall fled, and would willingly have put themselves within the city Platea, but they fledde indeed as farre as to the temple of Juno. Wherein he accuseth all the Grecks together of disobedience, cowardise, and treason. Finally, he writeth that there were none but the Lacedæmonians and the Tegæates who charged the Barbarians; nor any besides the Athenians, who fought with the Thebans; depriving all other cities equally of their part in the glory of that so noble an exploit: for that there was not one of them who laid hand to worke, but sitting all still, or leaning upon their weapons hard by, abandoning and betraying in the meane time, without doing ought, those who fought for their safetie, untill that the Philiatians, and the Megarians, though long it were first, hearing that Pausanias had the upper hand, ranne in with more haste than good speed, and falling upon the cavallerie of the Thebans, where they were presently defaied and slaine, without any great adoe: But the Corinthians (quoth he) were not at this fray, but after the victorie, keeping above on the high ground among the mountaines, by that meanes met not with the Thebanes horsemen. For the cavallerie of the Thebanes, seeing the Barbarians to fly all in a rout, put themselves forth before them, to make them way, and by this means very affectionately afflicted them in their flight, and all in recompence and by way of thanksgiving, forsooth, (for so you must take it) for those marks which were given them in their faces, within the streight of Thermopila. But in what ranke and place of this battell the Corinthians were ranged, and how they did their devoir, and quit themselves against the Barbarians before Platæa.

see, you may know by that which Simonides writeth of them in these verses :

*Amid the host arranged good,
and in the battell maine,
Those who inhabit Ephyræ, waterd with many a vaine
Of lively springs : Men who in seats of marriall armes excell :
And joinct with them, they that in old for Glaucus citie dwell, Faire Corinth high : and theſe their deeds of prowesse to expresse,
A ſtately gift of precious gold,
did afterwards addreſſe,
And conſecrate to gods above in heav'ns : and by the ſame Much amplified their owne renowne, and their forefathers fame.*

For this wrote he of them, not by way of a scholasticall exercise, as if he taught a schoole in Corinth : nor as one who of purpose made a song or balad in praise of the city, but as a chronicler penning the historie of these affaires in elegiack verses to that effect. But this writer here of ours, preventeth the conviction of a loud lie, lest he might be taken therewith, by those that should demand of him in this manner: How cometh it then to passe that there be so many sepulchres, tombes, graves, and monuments of the dead, upon which the Plateans even to this day doe solemnly celebrate the anniverſarie effuſions, to the ghosts and foules of those that are departed, in the presence of other Greeks assitant with them? And verily in mine opinion he seemeth yet more shamefully to charge these nations with the crime of treason, in these words following: And these sepulchres or places of burial which are scene about Platea, those I meane which their posteritie and successors, being ashamed of this foule fault, that their progeniours were not at this battell, or came too late, cast up, and raised on high, every man for his part in general, for the posteritie sake. As for Herodotus he is the onely man of all others who hath heard of this absence from the battell, which is reputed treason: But Pausanias, Aristides, the Lacedæmonians and the Athenians, never knew of those Greeks who made default, and would not be at this dangerous conflict: And yet the Athenians neither impeached the Aeginetes though they were their adversaries, that they were not comprised within the inscription, nor yet charged and convinced the Corinthians for flying from the battell at Salamis, considering that Greece beareth witnesse against them. And verily as Herodotus himselfe doth testifie, ten yeeres after this warre of the Medes, Cleudes a citizen of Platea, to gratifie and pleasure the Aeginetes as a friend, raised a great mount bearing their name, as if they had bene interred therein. What ailed then the Lacedæmonians and Athenians, or what moved them, being so jealous one of another about this glory as they were, that they had like to have gone together by the eares presently upon the exploit performed, for erecting of a Tropæe or monument of victory, not to deprive them of the price of honor, who upon cowardly feare were either away or else fled from the service, but to suffer their names to be written upon the Tropæes, Colopes and giantlike statues erected in memoriall of them, allowing them their part in the spoiles and pillage, yea and in the end causing this Epigram or superscription to be engraven upon a publicke alter?

*The Greeks in signe of noble victory,
Which they sometimes won of the Persians host,
And to retain the thankfull memory
That they them drove away from Gretian coast,
(So resolute they were or else all had bene lost)
This common alter built to Jupiter Surnamed here upon Deliverer.*

How now Herodotus, was it Cleudes, or some other I pray you, who in flatterie of the Greeks, made this Epigram or Inscription? What need had they then to take such paines & trouble themselves in digging the ground in vain, & by casting up of earth raise such mounts & monuments for for the age to come, when as they might see their glory consecrated and immortalized in these most conspicuous and famous memorials, dedicated to the honor of the gods? And verily Pausanias, when as he intended, as men say to usurpe tyrannical government, in a certaine oblation which he offered in the temple of Apollo at Delphos, set this inscription;

*Paulanias the capitaine generall
Of all the Greeks: when he had conquered
The Medes in fight, for a memoriall
This monument to Phœbeus offered.*

And albeit in some sort he communicated the glory of this execution with the Greeks, whose sovereigne capitaine he termed himselfe, yet the Greeks being not able to endure it, but utterly misliking him therefore, the Lacedæmonians above the rest sent their embassadors unto Delphos, and caused the said Epigram to be cut out with a chizzell, and in lieu thereof, the names of the cities, as good reason was, to be engraven: And yet what likelihood is there, that either the Greeks should take offence and discontentment for being left out in this inscription, in case they were culpable, and privy to themselves, that they were not with others at the battell? or the Lacedæmonians when they raced out and defaced the name of their generall and chiefe commander, cause to be written and engraven their names, who had forsaken and left them in the middelt of danger? For this were a manifest indignity, and most absurd, if when Socharus Dipsius, and all those that performed the best service in that journey, never grieved nor complained that the Cythnians and Melians had their names recorded in those Tropæes, Herodotus in attributing the honor of this battell unto three cities onely, should dash all others out, and not suffer their names to stand upon any Tropæes or consecrated places: For whereas there were foure battels given then unto the Barbarians, he saith, that the Greeks fled from the cape Artemisium: And at the passe or streights of Thermopylae, whilst their king and sovereigne capitaine exposed himselfe to the hazzard of his life, they kept themselves close at home and sat still, taking no thought for the matter, but solemnized their Olympicke games and Carnian feasts.

Moreover when he cometh to describe the battell at Salamis, he speaketh so much of Artemisia, that he spendeth not so many words againe, in all the narration of that navall battell, and the issue thereof. Finally as touching the journey of Platea, he saith that all other Greeks, sitting idly at their ease, knew nothing of the field fought, before all was done, according as Pigres Arimifus being pleasantly disposed to jest, writeth merily in verse, that there was a battell betwene frogs and mice, wherein they were agreed to keepe silence, & make no noise al the whiles they fought; to the end that no others might take any knowledge thereof: also that the Lacedæmonians were no better warriors nor more valiant than the Barbarians: but their hap was to defeat and vanquish them, because they were naked men and disarmed: For Xerxes himselfe being present in person, if they had not bene followed with whips & scourged forward, had never bene able to have made them fight with the Greeks; many in this journey of Platea, having changed their hearts and courages (for needs it must be so) they were nothing inferior in boldnesse of heart, strength of body, and resolution to the Greeks; but it was the apparell, which wanting armes upon it, hurt them so much & marred al, for being themselves lightly appointed and in maner naked, they had to deale with the Lacedæmonians that were heavily armed at all pieces. What honor then or great matter of glory could redound unto the Greeks out of these foure battels, in case it be so that the Lacedæmonians encountered naked and unarmed men? And for the other Greeks although they were in those parts present, yet if they knew not of the combat, untill the service was done to their hands: and if the tombs honored yeerely by the severall cities belonging to them, be emptie, and mockeries onely of monuments and sepulchres; and if the trevers and altars erected before the gods, be full of false titles and inscriptions; and Herodotus onely knew the truth; and all men in the world besides, who have heard of the Greeks, and were quite deceived by the honorable name and opinion that went of them for their singular prowesse and admirable vertue; what is their then to be thought or said of Herodotus? Surely that he is an excellent writer, and depainteth things to the life: he is a fine man; he hath an eloquent tongue: his discourses are full of grace, they are pleasant, beautifull, and artificiall: and as it was said of a Poet or Musician in telling his tale; how ever he hath pronounced his narration and history not with knowledge and learning, yet surely he hath done it elegantly, smoothly, and with an audible and cleare voice. And theſe I wis be the things that move delight and doe affect all that reade him. But like as among roses we must beware of the veni-mous flies Cantharides: even so we ought to take heed of detractions and backbiting of his base penning likewise of things deserving great praise, which insinuate themselves and creepe under his smooth stile, polished phrase and figurative speeches: to the end, that ere we be aware we entertaine not, nor foster in our heads, false conceits and absurd opinions of the bravest men and noblest cities of Greece.

OF MUSIQUE.

A Dialogue.

The persons therein discoursing: O NESICRATES,
SOTERICHS, LYSIAS.

This treatise, little or nothing at all concerneth the Musicke of many voices according and interlaced together, which is in use and request at this day; but rather apperteineth to the ancient fashion, which consisteth in the accord and consonance of song with the sense and measure of the letter, as also with the good grace of gesture: and by the stile and maner of writing, it seemeth not to be of Plutarchs doing.

He wife of that good man Phocion, was wont to say, that the jewels and ornaments wherein he joied, were those stratagemes and worthy feats of armes which her husband Phocion had achieved: but I for my part may well and truly avouch, that the ornaments not onely of my selfe in particular, but also of all my friends and kinsfolke in generall, is the diligence of my schoolemaster and his affection in teaching me good literature. For this we know full well, that the noblest exploits and bravest pieces of service performed by great generals and captaines in the field, can doe no more but onely save from present perill or imminent danger, some small armie, or some one citie, or haply at the most, one entire nation and countrey; but are not able to make either their souldiers, or citizens, or their countrey men, better in any respect: whereas on the other side, good erudition and learning, being the very substance indeed of felicitie, and the efficient cause of prudence and wisdom, is found to be good and profitable not onely to one family, city and nation, but generally to all mankind. By how much therefore the profit and commodity ensuing upon knowledge and good letters is greater than that which proceedeth from all stratagemes or martiall feats; by so much is the remembrance and relation thereof more worthy and commendable. Now it fortuned not long since, that our gentle friend Onesicrates invited unto a feast in his house, the second day of the Saturnall solemnities, certaine persons very expert and skillfull in Musicke, and among the rest, Soterichus of Alexandria, and Lysias, one of those who received a pension from him: and after the ordinary ceremonies and complements of such feasts were performed, he began to make a speech unto his company after this maner: My good friends (quoth he) I suppose, that it would not beleeve a feast or banquet, to search at this time what is the efficient cause of mans voice; for, a question it is, that would require better leisure and more sobrietie: but forasmuch as the best Grammarians define voice, to be the beating or percussion of the aire, perceptible unto the sense of hearing, and because cause that yesterday we enquired and disputed as touching Grammar, and found it to be an art making profession and very meet, to frame and shape voices according to lines and letters, yea, and to lay them up in writing, as in the treasury and storehouse of memorie; let us now see what is the second science next to it, that is meet and agreeable to the voice: and this I take to be Musicke. For a devout and religious thing it is, yea, and a principall duty belonging unto men, for to sing the praises of the gods, who have bestowed upon them alone this gift of a distinct and articulate voice: which Homer also by his testimonie hath declared in these verses:

*Then all day long the Grecian youth
in songs melodious*

Befought god Phoebus of his grace, to be propitiou:

Phoebus I say, who from asfarre doth shoot his arrowes nie,

They chaunt and praise; who takes great joy, to heare such harmony.

Go to therefore my masters, you that are professed Musicians, relate unto this good company here that are your friends, who was the first inventour of Musicke; what it is that time hath added unto it afterwards; who they were that became famous by the exercise and profession of this science; as also, to how many things and to what, is the said study and practise profitable.

Thus much as touching that which Onesicrates our master moved and propounded; whereupon Lysias inferred againe, and said: You demand a question, good Onesicrates, which hath already beene handled and discussed: for the most part of the Platonique Philosophers, and the best sort of the Peripateticks have employed themselves in the writing of the ancient Musicke, and of the corruption that in time crept into it. The best Grammarians also and most cunning Musicians, have taken great paines and travelled much in this argument; and yet there is no small discord and jarre among them, as harmonical otherwise as they be about these points. Heraclides in his Breviary, wherein he hath collected together all the excellent professors of Musicke, writeth that Amphion devised first the maner of singing to the Lute or Cithern, as also the Citharædian poësie; for being the sonne of Aniope and Jupiter, his father taught him that skill. And this may be proved true, by an olde evidence or record enrolled, and diligently kept in the city Sicyone, wherein he nameth certaine Priestresses in Argos, as also Poets and Musicians. In the same age, he saith, there lived Linus also of Eubœa, who composed certaine lamentable and dolefull ditties; Anthes likewise of Anthedon in Boeotia, who made hymnes; and Pierius borne in Pieria, who wrote poëmes upon the Muses: he maketh mention besides of Philammon a Delphian, who reduced into songs and canticles the nativity of Latona, Diana and Apollo; and he it was who instituted first the quires and dances about the temple of Apollo in Delphos. And as for Thamyris a Thracian borne, he reporteth, that of all men living in those daies, he had the sweetest brest, and sung most melodiously, inso much as if we may beleve Poets, hee challenged the Muses, & contended with them in singing. It is written moreover, that this Thamyris compiled in verse the warre of the Titans against the Gods; as also, that Demodocus of Corcyra was an ancient Musician, who ended a poeme of the destruction of Troy, and the marriage betweene Venus and Vulcane: Semblably, that Pheemus of Ithaca wrote in verse of the returne of those Greeks from Troy, who came home againe with Agamemnon. Furthermore, it is said, that the stile of those poemes above said, was not loose and in prose, without metrical numbers, but like unto that of Stesichorus and other old Poets and song-makers, who first made naked ditties in verse, and afterwards arraid them with Muscalle tunes and notes: for the same author reporteth, that Terpander a maker of songs with notes and measures to be sung unto the Lute or Cithern, according to each law and rule of the said measures, adorned both his owne verses and those of Homer also, with harmonical tunes, and sung them accordingly at the solemne games, wherein Musicians sing one against the other for the prize: he affirmeth likewise, that the same Terpander was the first who imposed names and termes to those tunes which are to be sung to the foresaid stringed instruments: and in imitation of Terpander, Clonus first composed songs and set tunes to the fluit and other winde instruments, as also the Proſodies and sonnets sung at the entrie of sacrifices, and that he was a Poet who made Elegiacke and Hexameter verses; also, that Polyphemus the Colophonian, who came after him, used likewise the same poemes. Now the Metrical lawes and songs in measures, called in Greeke Nepai, which these Poets and Musicians used to the pipe, were termed (good Oneferates) in this sort, namely, Apothetos, Elegi, Comarchios, Schanton, Cepion, Dios and Trimeles: but in proceffe of time, were devised others beside, called Polymnasia. As for the Musickall lawes or tunes to be sung unto the stringed instrument, they were invented long time before those other belonging to pipes, by Terpander; for he beforetime named those of the stringed instruments, Bæotius, Aælius, Trochæus, Oxys, Cæpion, Terpanædrius and Tetraædrius. Furthermore, the said Terpander made certaine procesmes or voluntary songs to the Lute, in verse. Now, that the songs or ditties to be sung unto stringed instruments, were composed in olde time of Hexameter verses, Timotheus giveth us to understand; for mingling the first metrickall rules in his verses, he sung the Dithyrambick dirty to the end, that he might not seeme immediatly at the first, to breake the lawes of the ancient Musicke. This Terpander seemeth to have beene excellent in the art of playing upon the Lute and singing to it; for wee finde upon record in ancient tables written, that foure times together, one after another, he caried the prise away at the Pythian games: and no doubt, of great antiquitie he was. Certes, Glaucus the Italian writer, will have him to be more ancient than Archilochus; for so he writeth in a certaine treatise as touching the olde Poets and Musicians, saying, that he followed in the second place after those who instituted first songs unto the flute and other pipes. And Alexander in his Breviarye of the Poets and Musicians of Phrygia, recordeth Olympus to be the first man who brought into Greece the feat and skill of striking the strings of instruments, and besides, those that are called Idæi Dactyli. But Hyagnis was the first by his saying, who plaied upon pipes: after him, his sonne Marsyas and then Olympus: also, that Terpander imitated Homer in verses, and Orpheus in song: as for Orpheus, it should seeme, that he imitated none, considering that before him there was not one, but those Poets who made ditties and songs to pipes, wherewith the works of Orpheus have no resemblance at all. Touching this Clonius a composer of songs and tunes for the pipe, who lived somewhat after the time of Terpander, he was a Tegeæan borne, as the Arcadians say, or rather as the Bæotians give out, a Theban. After Terpander and Clonius, Archilochus is ranged in a third place, howsoever other Chroniclers write, that Ardalus the Troezenian ordeined the Musicke of pipes before Clonius, as also, that there was one Polymnestus a Poet the sonne of Ateles a Colophonian, who made those tunes and songs which carie the name of Polymnestos and Polymneste. True it is, that those who compiled the tables and records of Musicians, make mention that Clonius devised the two songs or tunes named Apothetos and Schæmos. And as for the above named Polymnestus, Pindarus and Aleman both song-makers, made mention of him; and they report besides, that olde Philammon of Delphos composed some of those songs and tunes to the Lute and Harpe, which be attributed unto Terpander. In summe, the song and musicke to the Lute and Harpe, devised by Terpander, continued very plaine and simple, unto the daies of Phrynis: for in olde time, it was not lawfull to sing voluntary, as now they do at their pleasure, to stringed instruments; nor to transference either harmonies or musickall numbers and measures: for according to every song and tune, they kept a proper and peculiar tension or stretching of the strings; which is the reason that they be called Nysææ, as one would say, Lawes, because it was not lawfull to transgresse in any of these songs or tunes, that severall kinde of tension & stretching the strings, which was usual and ordinary. For after that they had performed those songs which apperteyne to the pacifying of Gods wrath, they leapt immediatly to the Poetrie of Homer and of others, at their pleasure, which may evidently appeare, by the procesmes and voluntarie tunes of Terpander. And verily, about this time, according as Cæpion the scholar of Terpander reporteth, was first formed that manner of Lute or Cithern which was called Asia, for that the Lesbian Minstrels and Musicians, who bordered hard upon Asia, used such a forme: and it is said, that Periclitus was the last plaier upon such an instrument, who wan the prise at the Carnian games at Lacedæmon, of all those who were Lesbians borne: after whose death ever after, there failed in Leibos, that continuall succession of such Musicians. But some there be, who are greatly deceived, to thinke that Hippanax was of the same time with Terpander: and it seemeth that even Periclitus was more ancient than Hippanax.

Having thus declared the olde metrickall songs and tunes jointly together, of Musicians to stringed instruments and pipes, let us turne now to such as properly concerne those that pertain to plaiers upon pipes alone: for it is said, that the above-named Olympus being a plaier of the flute and other pipes, and came out of Phrygia, set a song to his instrument in the honor and praise of Apollo, and the same was called Polycephalus: and by report, this Olympus descended lineally lineally from that first Olympus the scholar of Marsyas, who composed ditties, and set tunes for the worship of the gods: for this Olympus being the darling of Marsyas, and singularly loved of him, learned likewise of him to play upon the flute and other pipes, and by that means brought into Greece those harmonickall tunes and songs, which at this day the Greeks use at the solemne feasts of the gods. Others are of opinion, that the foresaid song or tune Polycephalus, is to be ascribed unto Crates a scholar of Olympus: but Pratinas writeth, that this song came from another Olympus of later time; and as for that other kinde of song or tune, named Harmonia, the first Olympus, discipule to Marsyas, by report, composed it. And some there be who holde, that Marsyas was named Maffes: others say no, and that he was called Marsyas onely, being the sonne of Hyagnis, who first devised the art of playing upon the flute. And that this Olympus was the author of the musicke or tune, named Harmonia, appeareth by the table or register of the ancient Poets, collected by Glaucus: and by the same, a man may also learne, that Stesichorus borne in Himera, proposed to himselfe to imitate, neither Terpander, nor Antilochus, ne yet Thales, but Olympus; using altogether the law of Musicke Harmonia, and that forme of measure which is according to Dactylus: and that, some say, ariseth from the loud musicke called Orthia, but others hold, that it was an invention of the Myfians, for that there were certaine ancient pipers of the Myfians. Moreover, there is another antique song or tune, called Cradites, according to which (as Hippanax saith) Mimnermus plaied: for at the beginning, the minstrels and plaiers of pipes, sung certaine Elegies, reduced into measures and metrickall lawes, which appeareth by the tables and registers, that testifie what Musicians they were, that contended at the games of prise, in the festivall Panathenacke solemnities. Moreover, there was one Sacadas of Argos, a Poet that made songs and elegies or ditties, reduced into measures, for to be sung: and reckoned hee is among the better sort of Poets, and as it appeareth upon record in those registers, hee wanne the best game three times at the Pythian solemnities. And Pindarus himselfe maketh mention of him. And whereas there be three kindes of tunes and measures in Musicke, according to Polymnestus and Sacadas, to wit, the Pygrian, Dorian, and the Lydian, they say, that in every one of them Sacadas made a certaine flexion or tune, called Strophe, and taught the Chorus to sing the first according to the Dorian tune; the second after the Phrygian measures; and the third, to the Lydian musicke: and that this manner of song was thereupon called Trimeres, by reason of the three changes or parts: Howbeit, in the tables and registers of the ancient Poets, which are to be seene at Sicyone; it is observed and noted, that it was Clonius who devised this melody or musicke Trimeres. Now the first manner of musicke, ordeined and instituted in the city of Sparta, by Terpander, was in such sort. The second was appointed as it is most generally received, by Thales the Gortynian, by Xenodamus the Cytherian, Xenocritus the Locrian, Polymnestus the Colophonian, and Sacadas the Argive; as the principall authors and directors: for as these were they who instituted first at Lacedæmon the naked daunces called Gymnopedias, so in Aradia they ordeined those that were termed Apothetos; and in Argos the Endymatias. As for Thales, Xenodamus, and Xenocritus, they were the Poets that composed the songs of victorie, named Pæanes: Polymnestus, of the Orthian 40 canticles; and Sacadas of the elegies. Others say, that Xenodamus was the Poet who invented the songs entituled Hyporchemata, at the found whereof, folke danced at the feasts of the gods: but he devised not the Pæanes aforesaid, as Pratinas did. And even at this day, there is a sonet extant of this very fame Xenodamus, which is evidently an Hyporchema; and this kind of poesie of Pindarus useth. Now that there is a difference betweene a Pæan and an Hyporchema, the works of Pindarus sufficiently do shew, for he hath written as wel the one as the other. Polymnestus also made songs and ditties to the flute: and in Orthian canticles, used measures and melody, according as our harmonickall Musicians give it out: As for us, we know not the truth, because our ancients have left nothing in writing thereof. There is some doubt also, whether Thales or Camæ were a Poet that made Pæans: For Glaucus in saying, that he was after Archilochus, writeth indeed, that he imitated his songs; but he extended them farther, and made them longer, inserting the measures Maron and Creticus into his melody, which Archilochus never get, neither Terpander: for it is said, that Thales learned this from Olympus his used, nor Orpheus, nor yet Terpander: for it is said, that Thales learned this from Olympus his playing and piping, and was reputed a good Poet. As touching Xenocritus of Loeres in Italy, it is not yet resolved and for certaine knowne, that he was a maker of Pæanes. Certes, it is confidently said, that he tooke for the subject matter and argument of his Poesie heroicke deeds, in so much as some receive his arguments Dithyrambes. Glaucus assureth us, that Thales was pander and Olympus, and they that followed their sect; for default of skill and experience, cut off the multiplicitie of strings, and their varietie. Wittlesse heereof the Poems of Terpander, Olympus, and all their followers, and such as tooke their course: for being but simple, and having no more than three strings, yet are they more excellent than those which consist of manie strings, and be full of varietie; in such sort, as no man is able to imitate the maner of Olympus; and all those who use many strings and varietie, be farre short, and come behinde him. Now that our ancients in old time abstained from the third, in that Spondeaik kinde, not upon ignorance, they shew sufficiently in the use of striking the strings: for never would they have used the accord and consonance with Pare-hypate, if the use thereof had bene unknowne unto them: but certeine it is, that beauty of affection which is in the Spondeaik kinde, by the third, was it that led their sense to raise & exalt their note and song to Paranete: and the same reason also there is of Nete: For this verily they used to their stroke of the instrument, to wit, unto Paranete in discord, & unto Mese in accord. But in song they seemed not unto them, proper and fit for the Spondeaik kinde. And not onely in these, but also in Nete of the Tetrachord conjunct, all used so to doe: For in the very stoake of the strings, they disaccorded with Paranete, Paramese, and Lichanos, but in song, they were ashamed thereof, for the very affection that resulted thereupon. Moreover, it appeareth manifestly by the Phrygians, that this was not for any ignorance of Olympus, or his sectaries: for they used it not onely in fingring, and in the stroke of the strings, but also in singing at the solemne feasts of the great mother of the gods, Cybele, and in some other Phrygian solemnities. It appeareth also manifestly, by the Hypates, that it was not for ignorance that in the Dorian tunes they forbore this Tetrachord, for incontinently in other tunes they used it: so that it is evident that they did it wittingly but to avoide affection they tooke it out of the Dorique Musicke, honoring the beauty and honesty thereof: as we may observe some such like thing in tragicall Poets. For never yet to this very day, did the tragedy use Chromaticke musicke, nor rhyme: whereas the citherne or lute, which by many ages is more ancient than the tragedy used it even from the very beginning. And evident it is that Chroma is of greater antiquity than is Harmony. For we must account this antiquity, whereby the one is said to be more ancient than another, according to the use & practise of men, because in regard of the nature of the seke kinds one is not elder than another. If then some one would say, that Aeschylus or Phrynicus forbore to use Chromaticke Musicke upon ignorance, & for that they knew it not, were he not thinke you very absurd and much deceived? For the same man might as well say that Panocrates also was ignorant of this Chromaticke kind, because for the most part he forbore to use it: and yet in some places he used it. So that it was not for want of knowledge, but of set purpose, and upon judgement that he abstained from it. He imitated then, as he saith himselfe, the maner of Pindarus and Simonides, and in one word, that which the moderne Musicians call the ancient Musicke. The like reason there is of Tyrtamus the Mantinean, of Andreas the Corinthian, Thrasylus the Phliatian, and of many others whom we know upon good consideration to have abstained from the Chromaticke, from change and multiplicity of strings, yea and many other things interted which are in common use, namely rhymes, harmonies, ditties, songs, and interpretations. And not to goe far for proote hereof, Telephanes the Megarian was so great an enemy to flutes, sifes, and small pipes, that he would never abide the artificers and pipe-makers so much as to set them to the shawme and hautboies; and for this cause especially, he forbore to come unto the Pythicke or Apollonian games of prize. In summe, if a man will conjecture that if a thing be not used, it is long of ignorance, he might condemne of ignorance many of those who live in these daies; as for example the Dorioneans, because they despise the Antigenidian kinde of Musicke, for that they used it not. To the Antigenidians likewise they might impute ignorance of the Dorianian Musicke, for the same cause, as also the minstrels & harpers, as ignorant of the maner of Timothus his Musicke. For they have in maner all betaken themselves to patcheries and fallen to the Poëmes of Polydum. On the other side, if a man consider aright, and with experience make comparison betweene that which then was and that which now is, he shall finde that variety and diversity was in use and request even in those daies also. For the ancient Musicians used in their numbers and measure, their variety, much more diverse & different than now it is. So that we may boldly say that the varietie of rhymes, the difference also and diversity of strokes was then more variable. For men in these daies love skill and knowledge, but in former times they affected numbers and measures. So that it appeareth plainly that the ancients ab-

stained from broken Musicke and song, not because they had no skill, but for that they had no will to approve thereof. And no mervell: for many fashions there be in the world and this our life, which are well enough knowne, though they be not practised: many strange they be by reason of disuse, which grew upon occasion that some thing was observed therein, not decent & seemly. But, that it was not for ignorance, nor want of experience, that Plato rejected other kinds of Musicke, but onely because they were not becoming such a common wealth of his, we will shew hereafter: and withall that he was expert and skillfull in harmony: For in that procreation of the soule which he describeth in the booke of Timæus, he declareth what study he had employed in other Mathematicall studies and in Musicke besides, writing after this maner: Thus in maner (quoth he) did God at the first: And after that, he filled the double and treble intervals, in cutting off one portion from thence, and putting it betweene both of them: in such sort as in everie intervall or distance, there were two moities. Certes, this Exordium or Proeme, is a sufficient proove of skill and experience in harmonie, according as wee will shew hereafter. Three sorts of primitive medieties there be, out of which all other be drawn, to wit, Arithmetically, Geometrically, and Harmonically. Arithmetically is that which surmounteth, and is surmounted in equall number: Geometrically, in even proportion: and Harmonically neither in reason and proportion nor in number. Plato therefore intending to declare harmonically, the harmony of the foure elements of the soule, and the cause why things so divers accorded together: in each intervall hath put downe two medieties of the soule, and that according to musical proportion. For in the accord Diapason in Musicke, two intervals there are betweene two extremities, whereof we will shew the proportion. For the accord Diapason consisteth in a double proportion: as for example, six and twelve, will make a double proportion in number: And this intervall, is from Hypate Meseon, unto Nete Diezeugmenon: Now six and twelve being the two extremities: Hypate Meseon containeth the number of six, and Nete Diezeugmenon that of twelve. It remaineth now, that we ought to take unto these the meane numbers betweene these two extremities; the extreames whereof will be found, the one in proportion Epitritus or sesquitercian, the other Hemiotus, or sesquialterall. And these be numbers eight and nine. For eight is sesquitercian to six and nine, sesquialterall. Thus much as touching one of the extreames. As for the other which is twelve, it is above nine in sesquitercian proportion, and above eight in sesquialterall. These two numbers then, being betweene six and twelve, and the intervall Diapason compounded and consisting of Diatessaron and Diapente, it appeareth that Mese shall have the number of eight, and Paramese, the number of nine: which done there will be the same habitude, from Hypate and Mese, that is from Paramese to Nete, of a disjoint Tetrachord. The same proportion is found also in numbers, for the same reason that is from six to eight, is from nine to twelve, and looke what reason there is betweene six and nine, the same is betweene eight and twelve. Now betweene eight and six the proportion is sesquitercian, as also betweene twelve and nine. But betweene nine and six, sesquialterall, like as betweene twelve and eight. Thus much may serve to shew that Plato was well studied and very expert in the Mathematicks.

Now that harmony is a venerable, worthy and divine thing, Aristotle the discipule of Plato testifieth in these words: Harmony (quoth he) is celestiall, of a beautifull and wonderfull nature and more than humane: which being of it selfe divided into foure, it hath two medieties, the one arithmetically, the other harmonically; and of the parts thereof the magnitudes and extremities are scene according to number and equality of measure: for accords in song are appropriat and fitted in two Tetrachords. These be the words of Aristotle: who said that the body of harmony is composed of parts dislike, and accordant verily one with the other, but yet the medieties of the same agree according to reason arithmetically: for that Nete according to Hypate, by double proportion maketh an accord and consonants of Diapason: For it hath as we pater, in proportion sesquialterall of nine unities. But of Mese, we say, that it hath eight unities: & the principal intervals of Musicke are composed of these: to wit, Diatessaron, which consisteth of a proportion sesquitercian, & of Diapente, which standeth upon a sesquialterall: and Diapason of a double: For to is preserved the proportion sesquioctave, which is according to the proportion Tonizus. Thus you see how the parts of harmony doe both surmount and also are surmounted of other parts, by the same excesse: and the medieties of medieties, as well according to expresse in numbers, as Geometrical puiffance. Thus Aristotle declareth them to have these and such like powers, namely that Nete surmounteth Mese by a third part, and that Hypate is semblably surmounted of Paramese: in such sort as these excesses, are of the kinde of Relatives, which have relation to another: for they surmount and be surmounted by the same parts. And therefore by the same proportion the two extreames of Mese and Paramese, doe surmount, and be surmounted, to wit sesquitercian and sesquialterall. And after this sort is the harmoniack excess. But the excess of Nete and Mese by arithmetically proportion, sheweth the exuperances in equall partie: and even so Paramese in proportion to Hypate: for Paramese surmounteth Mese in proportion sesquioctave: Like as againe Nete is a double proportion of Hypate: and Paramese of Hypate in proportion sesquialterall: and Mese sesquitercian in regard of Hypate. See then how harmony is composed according to Aristotle himselfe, of her parts and numbers. And so verily by him it is composed most naturally of a nature as well finite as infinite: both of even and also of odd, it selfe and all the parts thereof: for it selfe totally and whole is even, as being composed of foure parts or termes: the parts whereof and their proportions, be even, odd, and even not even. For Nete it hath even of twelve unities: Paramese odd of nine unities: Mese even of eight unities, and Hypate even not even of six unities. So that harmony thus composed both it selfe and the parts thereof one to the other, as well in excess as in proportions, the whole accordeth with the whole and the parts together. And that which more is, the very senses being inserted and ingrafted in our bodies by harmony, but principally those which are celestiall and divine, namely sight and hearing, which together with God give understanding and discourse of reason unto men with the voice and the light, doe represent harmony: yea and the other inferior senses which follow them, in as much as they be senses, are likewise composed by harmony: for all their effects they performe not without harmony, and howsoever they be under them and lesse noble, yet they yeeld not for all that: for even they entering into the body accompanied with the presence of a certaine divinity, together with the discourse of reason, obtaine a forcible and excellent nature. By these reasons evident it is that the ancient Greeks, made great account, and not without good cause, of being from their infancy well instructed and trained up in Musicke: for they were of opinion, that they ought to frame and temper the mindes of young folke unto vertue and honesty by the meanes of Musicke, as being right profitable to all honest things, and which wee should have in great recommendation, but especially and principally for the perillous hazzards of warre: In which case some used the Hautboies, as the Lacedæmonians, who chaunted the song called Castorum, to the said instruments, when they marched in ordinance of battell, for to charge their enemies. Others made their approach, for to encounter and give the first onset, with the noise of the Lyra that is to say, the harpe or such like stringed instruments. And this we finde to have bene the practise of the Candiotis for a long time, for to use this kinde of Musicke, when they set forth and advanced forward to the doubtfull dangers of battell. And some againe continue even to our time in the use of Trumpets sound. As for the Argives, they went to wrestle at the solemne games in their city called Sthenia with the sound of the Hautboies. And these games, were by report instituted at first in the honor and memory of their king Danaus: and afterwards againe were consecrated to the honor of Jupiter surnamed Sthenius. And verily even at this day, in the Pentathlian games of prize, the manner and custome is to play upon the Hautboies, and to sing a song thereto, although the same be not antique nor exquisite, nor such as was wont to be played and sung in times past as that Canticle composed sometime by Hierax, for this kinde of combat, and named it was Eudrome. Well though it be a faint and feeble manner of song, yet somewhat, such as it was, they used with the Hautboies. And in the times of greater antiquity it is said that the Greeks did not so much as know Theatricall Musicke, for that they employed all the skill & knowledge thereof in the service and worship of the gods, & in the institution and bringing up of youth, before any Theater was built in Greece by that people: but all the Musicke that yet was, they bestowed to the honor of the gods and their divine service in the temples, also in the praises of valiant and worthy men: So that it is very probable that these termes Theater afterwards, and theatrum, long before were derived of theos, that is to say, God. And verily in our daies, Musicke is grown to such an heighth of difference and diversity, that there is no mention made, nor memory remaining of any kinde of Musicke for youth to be taught, neither doth any man set his minde thereto, or make profession thereof: but looke whosoever are given to Musicke, betake them selves wholly to that of Theaters for their delight. But some man may haply say unto me: What good fir, thinke you that in old time they devised

no new Musicke and added nothing at all to the former: Yes I wis, I confesse they did adjoine thereto some new inventions, but it was with gravity and decency. For the historians who wrote of these matters, attributed unto Terpander the Dorian Nete, which before time they used not in their songs and tunes: And even so it is said that the Myxolidian tune was wholly by him devised to the rest: as also the note of the melody Orthien: and the song named Orthius, by the Trochaus, for founding the al'arme and to encourage unto battell.

And if it be true as Pindarus saith, Terpander was the inventour of those songs called Scolia, which were sung at feasts. Archilochus also adjoined those rhymes or Iambicke measures called Trimetra: the translation also and change into other number and measures of a different kinde, yea, and the manner how to touch and strike them. Moreover, unto him, as first inventour, are attributed the Epodes, Tetrameter, Iambicks, Procritique and Profodiacks; as also, the augmentation of the first, yea, and as some thinke, the Elegie it selfe: over and besides, the intention of Iambus unto Paean Epibatos, & of the Heroous augmented both unto the Profodiaque & also the Creticke. Furthermore, that of Iambicke notes, some be pronounced according to the stroke, others sung out. Archilochus was the man, by report, who shewed all this first, and afterwards, tragicall Poets used the same: likewise it is said, that Crexus receiving it from him, transported it to be used at the Bacchanall songs, called Dithyrambis. And he was the first also, by their saying, who devised the stroke after the song; for that beforetime they used to sing, and strike the strings together. Likewise unto Polymnestus is ascribed all that kinde of note or tune which now is called Hypolydium, and of him they say, that he first made the drawing out of the note longer, and the dissolution and ejection thereof much greater than before. Moreover, that Olympus, upon whom is fathered the invention of the Greeke musicke, that is tied to lawes and rules, was hee who first brought, by their saying, all the kinde of harmonie, and of rhymes or measures, the Profodiaque, wherein is contained the tune and song of Mars; also the Chorios, whereof there is great use in the solemnities of the great mother of the gods: yea, and some there be, who make Olympus the authour also of the measure Bacchius. And thus much concerning every one of the ancient tunes and songs. But Lafus the harmonian, having transferred the rhymes into the order of Dithyrambis, and followed the multiplicitie in voice of hautboies, in using many sounds and those diffused and dispersed to and fro, brought a great change into Musicke, which never was before. Semblably, Melanippides who came after him, contained not himselfe in that manner of Musicke which then was in use, no more than Philoxenus did & Timothæus: for he, whereas beforetime unto the daies of Terpander the Antifæan, the harpe had but seven strings, distinguished it into many more sounds and strings: yea, and the found of the pipe or hautboies, being simple and plaine before, was changed into a Musicke of more distinct varietie. For in olde time, unto the daies of Melanippides a Dithyrambicke Poet, the plaiers of the hautboies were wont to receive their salaries and wages at the hands of Poets, for that Poetrie you must thinke, bare the greatest stroke, and had the principal place in Musicke and acting of plaies, so as the Minstrels before said were but their ministers: but afterwards, this custome was corrupted; upon occasion whereof, Pherecrates the Comickall Poet bringeth in Musicke in forme and habit of a woman, with her bodie piteously scoured and mangled all over: and he deviseth besides, that Dame Justice demandeth of her the cause why, and how she became thus misused; unto whom Poëtic or Musicke maketh answer in this wise:

MUSICKE.

I will gladly tell, since that we pleasure take
 You for to heare, and I to answer make:
 One of the first, who did me thus displesse
 And worke my woe, was Melanippides;
 He with twelve strings my bodie whipt so sore,
 That soft it is, and looser than before.
 Yes was this man unto me tolerable
 And not to these my harmes now, comparable.
 For one of Athick land, Cynethias he,
 Shame come to him, and cursed may he be,
 By making turnes and winding cranks so strange
 In all his strophes, and shew without change

Of harmony, hath me perverted so,
That where I am, unnoted I now do know.
His Dithyrambs are framed in such guise,
That left seeme right, in shield and target wise.
And yet of him, one can not truly say,
That cruelly he meant me for to slay.
Phrynis it was who set to me a wrest
(His owne device) that I could never rest:
Where with he did me winde and writhe so hard,
That I well nere for ever was quite marr'd.
Out of five strings forsooth he would devise
No fewer than twelve harmonies to rise:
Well of this man I cannot most complaine,
For what he mist, he soone repaire'd againe.
Timotheus sweet Lady (out alas)
Hath me undone: Timotheus it was,
Most shamefully who wrought me all despite,
He hath me torne, he hath me buried quite.

JUSTICE.

And who might this Timotheus be (deere hart)
That was the cause of this thy wofull smart?

MUSIQUE.

I meane him of Miletus, Pythias Surname'd, his head and haire so ruddy was.
This fellow brought upon me sorrows more Than all the rest whom I have nam'd before.
A sort he of unpleasant quavers brings,
And running points, when as he plaies or sings:
He never meets me when I walke alone
Upon the way, but me assailes alone.
Off go my robes, and thus devested bare
He teases me with twelve strings, and makes no spare.

Aristophanes also the Comical Poet maketh mention of Philoxenus, and saith, that he brought songs into the dances called Rounds: and in this manner he deviseth, that Musick should speake and complaine:

What with his Exharmonians,
Niglaris and Hyperbolians,
And such loud notes, I wot not what,
He hath me stufte so full, as that
My voice is brittle when I speake,
Like a dish root that soone will breake.

Sensibly, other Comical Poets have blasoned and set out in their colours, our moderne Musicians, for their absurd curiositie, in hewing and cutting Musicke thus by peace-meale, and mincing it so small. But that this science is of great power and efficacie, as well to set strait and reforme, as to pervert, deprave and corrupt youth in their education and learning, Aristoxenus hath made very plaine and evident: for he saith, that of those who lived in his time, Telesius the Theban happened when he was yong, to be brought up and instructed in the most excellent kinde of Musicke, and to learne many notable ditties and songs; among which, those also of Pindarus, of Dionysius the Theban, of Lamprus, Pratinas and other Lyricall Poets, singular men in their facultie, and profession of playing cunningly upon the harpe and other stringed instruments. He had learned likewise to found the hautboies passing well, and was sufficiently exercised and practised in all other parts of good literature: but when he was once past the flower and middle of his age, he became so farre rivished and caried away with this Scenicall musick so full of varietie, that he despised that excellent musick and poesie wherein he was nourted, & all for to learne the ditties and tunes of Philoxenus and Timotheus, and principally such of them as had most varietie and noveltie: and when he betooke himselfe to compose ditties and set songs, making making triall what he could do in both kinds, as well in that of Pindarus and this of Philoxenus, he was able to performe nothing well and to the purpose in that Musicke of Philoxenus: the reason whereof, was his excellent education from his infancie. If then a man be desirous to use musick well and judiciously, let him imitate the olde maner: and yet in the meane while furnish the same with other sciences, learne Philosophie, as a mistresse to guide and leade; for there is able to judge what kinde of measures is meet for musick, and profitable. For whereas three principal points and kinds there be, unto which all musick is universall divided, to wit, Diatonos, Chroma and Harmonie, he ought to be skilfull in Poetrie, which useth these severall kinds, who commeth to learne Musick; and withall, he must attaine to that sufficiencie, as to know how to expresse and couch in writing his poetical inventions. First and formost therefore he is to underfit and, that all musickall science is a certeine custome and usage, which shal not yet attained so farre as the knowledge to what end every thing is to be learned by him that is the scholar. Next to this it would be considered, that to this teaching and instruction, there be not yet adjoined presently the enumeration of the measures & maners of musick. But the most part learnerly and without discretion, that which seemeth good & is pleasant either to the learner or the teacher; as the Lacedaemonians in old time, the Mantineans likewise and the Pellenians: for these, making choise of one maner above the rest, or els of very few, which they tooke to be meet for the reformation and correction of maners, used no other musick but it: which more evidently may appeare, if a man will enquire and consider, what it is that every one of these kindes taketh for the subject matter to handle: for certaine it is, that the Harmonique skill containeth the knowledge of intervals, compositions, founds, notes and mutations of that kinde which is named Hermomenon, that is to say, well besitting and convenient: neither is it possible for it to proceed farther. So that, we must not require nor exact of her, that she should be able to discern whether a Poet hath well, properly and fully used (for example sake in musick) the Hyperdorian tune in his entrance; the Mixolydian and the Dorian at his going forth; and the Phrygian or Hypophrygian in the mids: for this pertaineth not at all to the subject matter of the Harmonique kinde, and hath need of many other things: for he knoweth not well the force of the proprietie. And if he be ignorant of the Chromaticke kinde and Enharmonian, he shall never attaine to have the perfect and absolute power of the proprietie, according to which, the affection of the measures that are made are seene: for this is the office and part of the artificer. And manifest it is, that the voice of the composition called Systema, is one thing; and the melody or song which is framed in the said composition, another: which to teach and whereof to treat, pertaineth not to the facultie of the Harmonique kinde. Thus much also we are to say as touching Rhythme; for no Rhythme will ever come to have in it the power of perfect proprietie: for that alwaies which is said to be proper, is in regard and reference to the affection; whereof we affirme the cause to be either composition or mixture, or els both together: like as with Olympus, the Enharmonian kinde is put in the Phrygian tune, and Pæon mixed with Epibatos: for this affection of the beginning hath it ingendred and brought forth in the song of Mimerus. For when the melody and rhytme or measure was artificially set to, & the number or rhytme alone cunningly transmuted, so as a Trocheus was put in stead of a Pæon. Hereof came the Harmonique kinde of Olympus to be composed. Yet nevertheless, when both the Enharmonique kinde and the Phrygian tune remaine, and beside these, the whole composition also, the affection received a great alteration: for that which is called Harmonie in the song of Mimerus, is farre different from the affection which is in common use and experience. If he then, who is expert and skilfull in Musick, had withall, the facultie to judge, certaine it is, that such an one would be a perfect workman, and a passing good master in Musick. For he who is skilfull in the Dorique musick, and knoweth not how to judge and discern the proprietie, he shall never know what he doth, nor be able to keepe so much as the affection, considering there is some doubt as touching the judgement of Dorian melodies and tunes, whether they appertaine to the subject matter of Harmonie or no? as some Dorians are of opinion. The like reason there is of all the Rhythmicke skill; for he who knoweth Pæon, shall not incontinently know the propriety of the use thereof, so farre as there is some doubt as concerning the making of Pæonik rhytmes, to wit, whether the Rhythmetique matter is able to judge with distinct knowledge of them? or whether as some say, it doe not extend so farre? Of necessitie therefore it followeth, that there must be two knowledges at the least in him, who would make distinction and be able to judge betwene that which is proper and that which is strange: the one of maners and affections, fections, for which all composition is made; the other, of the parts and members of which the composition doth consist. Thus much therefore may suffice, to shew that neither the Harmonique, nor the Rhythmicke, nor any one of these faculties of Musicke, which is named particular, can be sufficient of it selfe alone to judge of the affection, or to discern of other qualities. Whereas therefore, Hermosmenian, which is as one would say, the decent and elegant temperature of voices and sounds, is divided into three kinds, which be equall in the magnitudes of compositions, in puissances of sounds, and likewise of Tetrachords; our ancients have treated but of one: for those who went before us, never considered, either of Chroma, or Diatonos, but onely of Enharmonios, and that onely in a magnitude of a composition, called Diapason: for of the Chroma they were at some variance and difference: but they all in manner did 10 accord to say, that there was no more but this Harmonie alone. And therefore he shall never understand that which pertaineth unto the treatise of Harmonie, who hath proceeded so farre as to this onely knowledge: but apparent it is that he ought to follow both other particular sciences, and also the totall body of Musicke; yea & the mixtions and compositions of the parts: for he that is onely Harmonically, is confined within one kinde and no more. To speake therefore generally and once for all, it behooveth that both outward sense and inward understanding concur to the judgement of the parts in Musicke: Neither is one to prevent & runne before another, as the senses doe, which are more forward and hastie than their fellows; nor to lagge behinde and follow after, as those senses doe which are slowe and heavy of motion. And yet 20 otherwhile in some senses it falleth out upon a naturall inaequalitie which they have, that both happen at once, to wit, they draw backe, and halt forward together: wee must therefore cut off these extremities from the sense, if we would have it runne jointly with the understanding: for necessarie it is, that there be alwaies three things at the least meet together in sense of hearing, to wit, the sound, the time, and the syllable or letter. And come to passe it will, that by the going of the sound, will be knowne the proportionable continuitie, called Hermosmenon; by the gate of time, the Rhythme, and by the passing and proceeding of the syllable or letter, the ditte: Now when they march altogether, there must needs be an incurion of the sense. This also is evident, that the sense not being able to distinguish and discern every one of these three things, and accompany them severally, impossible it is, that it should know or judge 30 that which is well or amisse, in each of them particularly. First and foremost therefore, we are to take knowledge of the coherence and continuation; for necessarie it is, that there should be in the facultie and power of judging, a certaine continuall order, for as much as good and bad be not determinately in such sounds, times, letters or syllables, severed one from the other, but in the continued suite and coherence of them, for there is a certaine mixture or parts which cannot be conjoined in usage. And thus much may suffice for the consequence. After this we are to consider, that men, sufficient otherwise, and skilfull masters in Musicke, are not by and by able to judge: for impossible it is to be a perfect Musician, and a judge withall, of those which seeme to be the parts of totall Musicke, as the science and skill of instruments; likewise of song, as also of the exercise of the senses, I mean that which tendeth to the intelligence & knowledge of the well proportioned Hermosmenon, and of Rhythme. Over and besides, of the 40 Rhythmicke and Harmonique treatise, and of the speculation, touching the stroke and the ditte, and what other soever there are besides. But what the causes should be, that it is not possible for one to be a Critick and able to judge, by means of these things by themselves, let us endeavour to search and know. First, by this supposall, That of those things which are proposed unto us for to be judged of, some be perfect, others imperfect: Perfect, for example, every Poeticall worke, that is either chaunted, or played upon the pipe, or sounded on the lute and stringed instrument; or else the interpretation or elocution of the said Poemes, which they call epithymia: as is the noise of the pipe, or of the voice, and such like: unperfect, as those which tend heereto, and are for them ordeined, as by the parts of that which is called interpretation. Secondly, by Poesie or fiction, whereof the case is alike; because a man may as well judge if hee 50 heare the minstrell play or sing, whether his pipes accord or no, and whether his dialect or dittie be cleere, or contrariwise obscure; for each of these is a part of the foresaid interpretation of pipes, not the end it selfe, but that which respecteth the end; for the affection of the interpretations shall be judged heerby, and by all such causes, whether they be well fitted & accommodate to the Poeme composed, which the agent hath taken in hand to treat of, to handle, to expresse and interpret. Semblable is the reason also of the affections and passions, which are signified nified in the Poemes, by Poesie. Our ancients then, as those who made principall account of the affection, preferred and esteemed best that fashion of antique Musicke, which was grave, not curious nor much affected, For it is said that the Argives did set downe in times past a punishment for those who brake the lawes of Musicke, yea, and condemned him to pay a good fine, who first used more than seven strings, & who went about to bring in the use of the Mixolydian Musicke. But Pythagoras that grave and venerable personage, reprov'd all judgement of Musicke which is by the eare, for he said, that the intelligence and vertue thereof, was verie subtle & slender, and therefore he judged thereof, not by hearing, but by proportionall harmonie: and he thought it sufficient to proceed as farre as to Diapason, and there to stay the knowledge of Musicke: Whereas Musicians in these daies disesteeme and reject wholly that kinde 10 of Musicke which was in greatest reputation among our ancestors, for the gravitie thereof: insomuch as the most part of them make no reckoning of any apprehension of Euharmonian intervals and spaces. So idle and lazie they be, that they thinke and say, the harmonicall diesis giveth no appearance at all, nor representation of those things that fall under the sense of hearing; yea, and banish it quite out of their tunes and songs, counting those no better than prating, vaine, and toyish persons, who have either written or spoken thereof, or used that kinde: and for proove heerof, that they say true, they suppose they have found a doubty good argument and demonstration, drawn from their owne grosse stupiditie and senselesse sense, as it all that which their sense apprehended not, must needs incontinently have no subsistence at all in 20 nature, and be altogether unprofitable. And then moreover they hold, that there can no magnitude be apprehended by symphonie and consonance of voice, as the note, the halfe note, and other such intervals. Meane while they doe not perceive (such is their ignorance) that they may as well banish the third magnitude, the fifth, and the seventh; whereof the first consisteth of three, the second of five, and the third of seven Diesis: and generally they should reject and reprove all the intervals that be odde, as superfluous and good for nothing: inasmuch as none of them can be found by consent or symphonie. And these they may be, which the least Diesis doeth measure in odde number: whereupon it followeth necessarily, that no division of the Tetrachord, is profitable, but this onely, by which we may use all even intervals: and this verily were that of Syntonos, Diatonos, and Tonizian Chroma. But to give out, or to conceive 30 such things, were the part not of those onely who contradicted that which is apparent and evident, but also of such as went against themselves: for they use more than any other such partitions of Tetrachords, wherein all the intervals be either odde or else proportionable to those that be odde: for evermore they mollifie all the notes, called Lichani, and Paraneze: yea, and they let downe a litle, those very notes which are stedfast and firme, by I wot not what intervall, without al reason; and together with them, they let slacke also very absurdly, the Thirds and the Paraneze, & they suppose that the use of such compositions is most commendable, wherein the most part of the intervals, be without al reason & proportion, by letting downe not onely those sounds which naturally are woont to sit & be mooved, but also some of them which are innumerable: as appeareth manifestly to those who are sufficient and able to judge of such things, 40 To come now to the use of Musicke, how meet and seemely it is for a valiant man; gentle Homer hath given us very well to understand: for to proove unto us how commodious Musicke is in many respects, he feigned and devised Achilles to concoit his anger which he had conceived against Agamemnon, by the meanes of Musicke, which he had learned of that most prudent and wise Chiron: for thus he writeth:

*They found him then, within his tent,
With sound of lute so shrill,
His heart that was now discontent,
To solace and so still:
An instrument right faire in sight
This was, and trimly wrought:
The necke with silver richly dight,
Which he himselfe had caught
Out of the spoiles then lately won
Of Thebes, that stately towne,
And citie of Ecton,
When it was rased downe:*

O o o o o

Heaven with

*Heere with I say, he pass'd his time, this was his hearts delight,
He sung withall the praise in hymne of many a valiant knight.*

Note heereby and learne (quoth Homer) what use we ought to make of Musicke: for he sung unto the lute, the noble exploits of brave men, and the glorious acts of woorthies and demigods: a thing that full well befecmed Achilles the sonne of most righteous Peleus. Over and besides, Homer teaching us the proper and convenient time of using Musicke, found out an exercise, both profitable and pleasant for a man at leisure, and not occupied otherwise in affaires. For Achilles being a martiall man of action, yet for the anger that he had conceived against Agamemnon, had no hand in the perils and hazards of warre: Homer thought therefore that it became very well this heroicke and hardy knight, to whet his courage by these excellent songs, to the end that he might be provided and ready against that fallie and skirmish which soone after he undertooke: and this no doubt he performed very well, by calling to remembrance the doubty deeds and feats of armes achieved by others in times past. Such verily was the ancient Musicke, and for this purpose it served. For we doe heare that both Hercules made use of Musicke, and also Achilles, with many other valourous knights, whom Chiron that most sage and learned master and bringer up of youth taught, who was a teacher not of Musicke only, but of iustice beside and Physicke. In summe, a man of wisdom and sound judgement, will thus deeme, that good sciences are not to be blamed, if haply they be not well used, but impute all the fault unto them that abuse the same. And therefore if any one from his childhood, shall be well instructed and trained up in Musicke, and withall employ his labour and diligence therein, he will receive and approve that which is honest and commendable: blame also he will and reject the contrary: not in musicke only, but in all things else: and such a one will decline all dishonest and unworthy actions, and thus reaping from musicke the greatest and best contentment that can be, he may benefit exceeding much, as well himselfe as his whole country, using no word nor deed unseemely, but observing at all times and in every place, that which is befitting, decent, temperate and elegant. Moreover, that cities and states best governed by policie and good lawes, have alwaies had a speciall regard of generous and good musicke, many and sundry testimonies may be alledged: and namely, a man may very well cite to this purpose Terpander, who suppressed in times past, the great sedition and civill discord that was in Lacedaemon: Thales also the Candiot, who went as it is said, by the commandment and oracle of Apollo, to Lacedaemon, and there cured the citizens and delivered them from that great pestilence, which reigned in that citie, and all by the means of musicke, as writeth Plutarchus. Homer also himselfe saith, that the plague which afflicted the Greeks, was by musicke staid and appeased:

*Then all day long, the Grecian youth
in songs melodious, Besought god Phoebus of his grace,
to be propitious:
Phoebus I say, who from a farr
doth shoot his arrowes nie
They chaunt anapraise, who takes great joy, to heare such harmonie.*

with these verses as with Corollarie, good master I will conclude this my discourse of Musicke, and the rather, because you first by the very same verses commended unto us the force and power of Musicke: for in very truth, the principall and most commendable worke thereof, is thanksgiving unto the gods, and the acknowledgement of their grace and favour: the second, and that which next followeth, is a sanctified heart, a pure, consonant and harmoniall estate of the soule. When Soterichus had said: Thus you have (quoth he) my good master heard us discourse of Musicke round about the boord as we sit. And verily Soterichus was highly admired for that which he had delivered: for he shewed evidently both by his voice and visage, how much he was affected unto Musicke, & what study he had employed thereto. Then my master: Over and above other things, this also I commend in you both, that you have kept your owne course and place, the one as well as the other. For Lysias hath furnished our feast with those things which are proper and meet for a Musician, who knoweth only to handle the lute or harpe

harpe, and hath no farther skill than manuell practise. Soterichus also hath taught us whatsoever concerneth both the profit and also the speculation thereof, yea and withall comprehendeth therein the power and use of Musicke, whereby he hath mended our fare and feasted us most sumptuously. And I suppose verily that both of them, have of purpose and that right willingly, left thus much unto me, as to draw Musicke unto feasts and banquets: neither will I condemne them of timidity, as if they were ashamed so to doe: For if in any part of mans life, eentes in such feasts and merry meetings it is right profitable. For according as good Homer saith:

*Both song and dance, delight afford,
And things that well becometh the boord.*

Neither would I have any man to inferre heereupon, that Homer thought Musicke good for nothing else but to delight and content the company at a feast: considering there is in those verses couched and hidden a more deepe and profound meaning. For he brought Musicke to those times and places wherein it might profit and helpe men most, I meane the feasts and meetings of our ancients: and expedient it was to have her company there, for that she is able to diversify and temper the heat and strength of wine, according as our Aristoxenus also else where saith: Musicke (quoth he) is brought in thither, because that whereas wine is wont to pervert & overturne as well the bodies as the minds of those who take it immoderately, Musicke by that order, symmetry, and accord which is in it, reduceth them againe into a contrary temperature, and dulceth all. And therefore Homer reporteth that our ancients used Musicke as a remedy and helpe, at such a time. But that which is principall and maketh Musicke above all things most venerable, you have my good friend let passe and omitted. For Pythagoras, Archibus, Plato, and all the rest of the old Philosophers doe hold that the motion of the whole world, together with the revolution of the starres, is not performed without Musicke: For they teach that God framed all things by harmonie. But to prosecute this matter more at large, this time will not permit: and besides it is a very high point and most Musically to know in every thing how to keepe a meane and competent measure. This said, he sung an hymne, and after he had offered a libation of wine unto Saturne, and to all the gods his children, as also to the Muses, he gave his guests leave to depart

OF THE FORTVNE OR VERTUE OF K. Alexander.

The Summarie.

In this treatise and that which followeth, framed both in forme of a declamation, Plutarch magnifieth Alexander, a praise worthy prince for many good parts that were in him: wherein he sheweth also, that we ought to attribute unto vertue and not to fortune, those brave exploits which he performed. By fortune, he meaneth that course of the affaires in this world, whereby it falleth out many times that the wisest men are not alwaies most happy and best advanced. To prove therefore, that Alexander was endued with exquisite qualities for execution of those enterprises which by him were achieved after wordes and brought to an end, he compareth him in the beginning of this treatise, with the kings of Persia raised up to their greatnesse by fortune: and then sheweth, that Alexander being an excellent Philosopher, we ought not to wonder or be astonished if by his vertue he saw the end of many things which the most fortunate princes of the world durst never take in hand and begin. Now the better to set out the excellencie of this Philosophy of Alexander, he compareth his scholars with the disciples of Plato and

Socrates:

Socrates: proving that those of this prince surpassed the others, as much as a good deed or benefit done to an infinit number of men surmounteth a good speech or instruction given to some particular persons; the most part of whom make no account thereof. He proceedeth forward and describeth the wisdom and sufficiency of Alexander in politicke government, which he amplifieth by the consideration of his amiable behaviour and lovely cariage toward those nations which by him were subdued: also by the recitall of some notable sayings of his: likewise by the love and affection which he carried unto wisdom, and men of knowledge. In briefe his acts; be evident proofes of his vertue, and in no wise of the temerity and rashness of fortune. But even in this very place, Plutarch hath broken off his treatise, leaving the end thereof defectuous: namely where he began to discourse of the contempts of death, and of the constant resolution of Alexander against the most churlish and boisterous assaults of fortune. 10

OF THE FORTUNE OR vertue of K. Alexander.

These are the sayings and allegations of fortune, affirming and proving that Alexander was her owne peculiar peece of worke, and to be ascribed unto her alone. But we must gainesay her in the name and behaile of Philosophy, or rather of Alexander himselfe: who taketh it not well, but is highly displeased, that he should be thought to have received his empire at fortunes hand gratis, and as a meere gift and benefit which he had bought and purchased with shedding much of his owne blood, and receiving many a wound one upon another.

Who many restless nights did passe
Without all sleepe full broad awake:
And many a bloody day there was,
Whiles he in field did skirmish make.

Whiles he fought against forces and armies invincible, against nations innumerable, rivers impassable, rocks inaccessible, and such as no shot of arrow could ever reach; accompanied alwaies with prudent counsell, constant patience, resolute valour, and staid temperance. And verily I am perswaded, that himselfe would fay unto fortune, challenging unto herselfe: he honoret of his haucie & worthy acts, in this manner: Come not heere either to deprave my vertue, or to deprive me of my due honor, in ascribing it unto thy selfe. Darius was indeed a peece of worke made by thee, whom of a base servitor, no better than a currier or lackey to a king, thou diddest advance and make the lord of the Persians. Sardapalus likewise was thy handy worke, upon whose head, when he was carding and spinning fine purple wooll among women, thou diddest set the imperiall diademe. As for me, I mounted up and ascended as farre as to Susa with victory after the battell at Arbela. The conquest of Cilicia made the way open for me to enter into Egypt: and the field that I won at the river Granicus; which I passed over going upon the dead bodies of Mithridates and Spitridates: lieutenants to the king of Persia, gave me entrance into Cilicia. Vaunt now and boast as much as thou wilt of those kings, who never were wounded in fight, nor lost one drop of their blood. These I say may well be counted fortunate and thy derelings, Oebus I meane & Ariaxerxes, whom immediately from the very day of their nativity, thou hast entailed in the roiall throne of Cyrus. But this body of mine carrieth the markes & tokens of fortune not favourable and gracious, but contrariwise adverse and opposit unto me. First in Ilium, I had my head broken with a great stone, and my necke bruted and crushed with a pestill. Afterwards in the journey and battell of Granicus, my head was cloven with a Barbarians cimeter. At the field fought neere Issus, my thigh was run through with a sword: before the city of Gaza, I was (shot through the ancle above my foot with one arrow, and into the shoulder with another, whereupon I was unhorsed, and falling heavy in mine armour out of my saddle, I lay there for dead upon the ground. Among the Maracadarts, my shin bone was cut in sunder with shot of quarels and arrowes. Besides many a knocke & wound which I gat among the Indians: and every where I met with hot service among them, untill I was shot quite through the shoulder. Another time as I fought against the Gandridæ I had the bone of my leg cut in twaine, with with another (shot likewise in a skirmish with the Mallotæ, I caught an arrow in my brest and bosome, which went so farre and sticke so fast that it left the head behinde: and with the rap and knocke of an iron pestill my necke bone was crushed. And at what time as the skaling ladders reared against the wals brake, fortune enclosed and shut me up alone to fight and maintaine combat, not against noble concurrents and renowned enemies, but obscure and simple Barbarous soldiers, gracing and gratifying them thus farre forth, as that they went with in a little taking away my life: And had not Ptolemæ come betwene and covered me with his target; had not Limnæ in defence of me opposed his owne body and received many a thousand darts; and there lost his life in the place for me; had not I say the Macedonians by force of armes and resolute courage broken downe the wall and laid it along, certes that base village, that Barbarous buttrow of no name, had bene at this day the sepulcher of Alexander. Furthermore, all that journey and expedition of mine, what was it else but tempestuous stormes, exceeding heat and drought, rivers of an infinit depth, mountaines too exceeding high, as no bird could flie over them; monstrous beasts and so huge withall, as they were hideous and terrible to be seene, strange and savage fashions of life, revolts of disloyall states and governours, yea and afterwards their open treasons and rebellions? And as for that which went before his voiage: all Greece panting still and trembling for remembrance of the warres which they endured under his father Philip, now put up their head. The city of Athens now shaking off from their armour the dust of the battell at Charonea, began to rise againe and recover themselves after that overthrow. To it joined Thebes and put forth their helping hand. All Macedonia was suspected, and stood in doubtfull termes, as enclining to Amyntas and the children of Acropus. The Illyrians brake out into open warres and made hostile invasions. The Scythians hung in equall ballance uncertaine which side to take, expecting what their neighbours would doe, that began to stir and revolt. Besides the good gold of Persia which had found the way into the purses of orators and governors of every citie, made all Peloponnesus to rise in armes. The coffers of Philip his father were empty and had no treasure in them: but instead thereof they were indebted and paid interest as Onesicritus writeth for * two hundred talents. In these great wants, in such poverty and so troubled a state, see a yong man newly come out of his infancie and childhood, durst hope and assuredly looke, for to be lord of Babylon and Susa: nay to speake more truly and in a word, he intended in his designements the conquest of the whole world; and that with a power onely of thirty thousand footmen, and foure thousand horse: for no greater forces brought he into the field as Aristobulus reporteth: or according asking Ptolemæ writeth, they were thirty thousand foot and five thousand men of armes: or as Amasimenus putteth it downe, his army amounted to forty thousand three hundred footmen and five thousand five hundred horsemen. Now all the glorious meanes and great provision for the maintenance and entertainment of this power more or lesse, which fortune had prepared for him, came to seventy talents: as Aristobulus hath set it downe in writing, or as Darius recordeth he was furnished with money and victuals to serve for thirty daies and no longer. How then was Alexander so inconsiderate, rash and void of counsell, as to enterprife warre with so small meanes, against so puissant an armie of the Persians? No I wis: for never was their capitaine, that went forth to warre better appointed and with greater and more sufficient helpes than he, to wit, magnanimity, prudence, temperance, & fortitude, wherewith Philosophy had furnished him, as with munition for his voiage: as being better provided for this enterprife against the Persians by that which he had learned of his master and teacher Aristotle, than by all the patrimonie and revenewes which his father Philip had left him: Well, to beleve those who write, that Alexander himselfe would otherwhiles say, that the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer accompanied him alwaies as his voiage provision to the warres, we may be easily induced, for the reverence and honor which we owe unto Homer: but if a man should say, that Homers Iliad and Odyssey, were unto him an easement of his travels, or an honest pastime and recreation at his leisure, and that the true munition and voiage provision indeed for the maintenance of his wars, were the discourses & precepts which he had learned out of Philosophy, and the treatises or commentaries as touching confidence & feareless resolution of prowesse, valour, magnanimity and temperance, we are ready to mocke and deride him: and why for because forthwith he hath written nothing of Syllogismes, of Axiomes, or of the elements and principles of Geometry; because he hath not used to walke in the schoole of Zeno, nor held positions and disputed of questions in the Academie: for these be the things whereby they measure and define Philosophy, who thinke that it consisteth in words and not in deeds. And yet Pythagoras never writ ought, nor Socrates, nor Arcesflaus, no nor Carnades: who all, no doubt, were most renowned Philosophers: neither were they imploied and occupied in so great warres, in reducing Barbarous kings to civillity, or in founding and building great cities, among savage nations: neither travelled they through the world visiting lawlesse and cruell people, to teach them to live peaceably and in order, who had never heard of peace or of lawes: but these great and famous personages, for all the leisure and rest that they had from imployments and busie affaires, left all writing for Sophisters only. How came it then, that they were reputed Philosophers? Surely it arose either upon their sayings which they delivered, or the manner of life that they led, and the actions which they did, or else the doctrine which they taught. Let us now therefore judge of Alexander also accordingly, by the same: for it will be found and scene by the words which he said, the deeds that he wrought, and the lessons which he taught, that he was some great Philosopher: and in the first place, if you thinke good, consider (which at first sight may seeme most strange and wonderfull) what disciples Alexander had; and compare them with the scholars of Plato or of Socrates. These men taught those, who were of quick wit, and spake the same language that they did; and if they had nothing else, yet understood they at leastwise the Greeke tongue: howbeit for all this, many of their auditours and disciples there were whom they could never persuade to their rules and precepts: but such as Critias, Alcibiades and Clesthon, rejected and shoke off all their doctrine, as the bitte of a bridle, and turned another way. Whereas, if you marke and consider the discipline of Alexander, you shall finde, that he taught the Hyrcanians to contract marriage and live in wedlocke; the Archians to till the ground and follow husbandrie; the Sogdians he perswaded to nourish their aged fathers, and not to kill them; the Persians to reverence and honour their mothers, and not to marry them as they did before. O the admirable Philosophie of this prince! by means whereof, the Indians adore and worship the gods of Greece: the Scythians burie their dead and eate them not. We wonder at the powerfull and effectuell speech of Carnades, for that he knew how to make Clitomachus, named before Asdrubal, and a Carthaginian borne, to conforme himselfe to the Greeke fashions and language. Wee admire the emphaticall gift of Zeno, who was able to persuade Diogenes the Babylonian, to give himselfe to the studie of Philosophie. But while Alexander conquered Asia, and reduced it to civillitie, Homer was read ordinarily: the sonnes of the Persians, Sustans, and Gedrosians, chanted the tragedies of Euripides and Sophocles. As for Socrates, condemned hee was and put to death by the Athenians; at the fure of sycophants and promoters, who enforced against him, that he had brought into Athens new gods: whereas by the meanes of Alexander, the inhabitants of Bactra and the mountaine Caucasus, even at this present, adore the gods of Greece. Plato hath left in writing one forme of policie and government of common-wealth, but he could never persuade so much as one man to use and follow it, so harsh and austere it was found to be. But Alexander having founded above threecore and ten cities among the barbarous nations, and sowed throughout all Asia, the mysteries, sacrifices, and ceremonies of Divine service which were used in Greece, reclaimed them from their savage and brutish life. And verily, few there be among us, who read and peruse the lawes of Plato: whereas there be infinit thousands and millions of men, who have used, and doe at this day practise those of Alexanders ordering: and such nations were much more happy whom he conquered and subdued, than they that elaped his puillance. For these had never any person who eased and delivered them out of their miserable life, but the other were forced by the conquerour to lead a blessed life; in such sort, as that which Themistocles sometime said, when being banished out of Athens, and fled to the king of Persia, at whose hands having received rich gifts, and the donation besides of three cities which paid him yeerely tribute, one for bread, another for wine, and the third for his meat and other viands; he spake thus unto his sonnes: Oh, how had we bene undone, if we had not benee undone! The same may more justly be verified of those who were then subdued by Alexander: Never had they benee civilized, if by him they had not benee vanquished and brought under his subjection: there had benee no citie Alexandria built in Egypt, no Selucia in Mesopotamia; no Prophthasia in the Sogdians country; no Bucephalia among the Indians; neither should the mountaine Caucasus have had nere unto it the citie Hellas, inhabited and peopled; by the meanes of which cities, their rude bestiality being first staid and held under, by little and little was extinct, and by custome of the better, changed the woofe. To conclude therefore, if Philosophers stand most upon this point, and beare themselves aloft, that that they are able to dulce and reforme rude manners, and not polished before by any doctrine. And if it be scene that Alexander hath altered and brought into order an infinite number of wilde nations, and beastly natures; good reason there is, that he should be esteemed an excellent Philosopher.

Moreover, that policie and forme of government so highly esteemed, which Zeno the first founder of the Stoicks first devised, tendeth to this one principall point, that we who are men, should not live divided by cities, towns & divers countries, separated by distinct laws, rights, & customs in severall, but thinke all men our fellow citizens, & of the same country: also that there ought to be but one kind of life, like as there is but one world, as if we were all of the same flocke under one herdman, feeding in a common pasture. Zeno hath set this downe in writing, as a very dreame & imaginarie Idea, of a common-wealth well governed by Philosophicall lawes; but Alexander hath put that in reall execution and practise, which the other had figured and drawn out in words: for he did not as his master Aristotle gave him counsell to doe: namely, to cary himselfe toward the Greeks as a father; and toward the Barbarians as a lord: likewise, to have regard and care of some, as of his friends and kinsfolke; but to make use of others, as if they were brute beasts or plants, and no better: for in so doing, he should have pestered his dominions and empire with banishments; which are evermore the secret seeds of warre, of factions and siftings most dangerous: but taking himselfe to be sent downe from heaven, as a common reformer, reconciler, and governour of the whole world; such as he could not draw to accord and agreement, by reason and speech, he compelled by force of armes, and so from every side reduced all into one; causing them to drinke round (as one would say) of one and the same cup of amitie and good fellowship, wherein he tempered and mixed together, their lives and manners, their marriages and fashions of life, commanding all men living to thinke the whole earth habitable, to be their country; his campe their citadell and castle of defence; all good men to be their kinsfolke and allies; all leude persons, strangers and aliens. He commanded them moreover, to distinguish Greeks and Barbarians, not by their mantle, round target, cimeter, turbans, or high crowned chaplets; but to marke and discern Greece by vertue; Barbarie by vice: in reputed all vertuous folke Greeks, and all vicious persons Barbarians: to thinke also their habiliments and apparell common, their tables common, their marriages besides and common, as being united all, by the mixture of bloud and communion of children. Demetrius verily the Corinthian, one of the friends that used to give intertainment to king Philip, when he saw Alexander in the citie of Susa, greatly rejoiced thereat, inso much as for very joy of heart, the teares ranne downe his cheeks, and he brake forth into these words: That the Greeks, before departed out of this life, were deprived of exceeding contentment, and heards delight; in that they had not scene Alexander sitting upon the regall throne of Darius. For mine owne part verily, I would not repute them very happy, for seeing such a sight as that, considering it is the gift of fortune, and as much as that befallerth ordinarily to meaner kings; but I assure you, much pleasure could I have taken, if I had beheld those goodly and faired espousals, when under the rooffe of one pavilion, seeled all over, and wrought with gold, he entertained at once, all at one common feast and table, a hundred Persian Brides, married to an hundred Bridegrooms of Greece and Macedonie: at which solemnitie himselfe being crowned with a chaplet of flowers, was the first that began to sing the nuptiall song Hymeneus, as a canicle of general amitie, when two of the greatest and most puissant nations of the world came to be joined in alliance together by marriage, being himselfe spouse unto one, but the maker of all their marriages, yea, and the common father and mediator to them all, being the means of that knot and conjunction. For willingly I would have said; O barbarous, senselesse and blockish Xerxes, that tookest so great paines, and all to no purpose, about making a bridge over Hellepont. For after this manner should wise kings and prudent princes, conjoine Europe and Asia together, not with wood and timber; not with boates and barges, nor with thole links and bonds which have neither life nor mutuall affection; but by lawfull love, by chaste and honest wedlocke, by communication also of children, to unite and associate two nations together. To this comely ornament Alexander had an eye, when he would not admit the habiliments and robes of the Medes, but the attire and apparell of the Persians, as being farre more sober, modest and decent than the other: for rejecting & casting aside that outlandish, unusefull pompeous and tragical excesse in the barbarous habit, to wit, the copped turbant Tiara, the side and superfluous purple mantell Candys, their wide breeches and slacke sloppes Anaxyrides he

he wore himselfe a certaine kinde of robe, composed partly of the Macedonian, and in part of the Persian habit, according as Erastophenes hath written. As a Philosopher he made use of things indifferent, neither good simply, nor ill: and as a gracious ruler and courteous king, he wanne the love and heart of those whom he had subdued, by gracing and honouring upon his owne person their apparell: to the end that they should continue fast unto him, and firme in loialtie; loving the Macedonians as their naturall lords, and not hating them, as tyrannizing enemies. For it would have bewraied a foolish minde, and withall disdainfull and proud, to have made great account of a selfe-coloured homely mantell, and withall, to have taken offence at a rich coate, embrodered all over with purple; or contrariwise, to have had this in admiration, and the other in contempt; like unto some infant or little childe, keeping still precisely to that apparell, which the custome of the country as a nurse or foster-mother hath once put on: whereas we see, that huntsmen who use to choose deere, are wont to clad themselves with the skinned and hides of those wilde beasts which they have taken; as for example, of staggas and hindes: fowlers also, that lie for to catch birds, cast upon themselves, gabardines, and coates of fetherworke, or beset with wings and fethers. Those who wear red clothes, beware how they come in the way of buls: and such as be clothed in white, are as careful not to be seene of elephants; for that these beasts fare as though they were wood and mad at the sight of such colours. Now if so great a king as Alexander was, minding to tame warlike nations, like unto wilde beasts, or to dulce and keepe them gentle, who were so fierce and untractable, used those robes and habilliments which were proper, usual, and familiar to them; and all to gaine their hearts by little and little, mollifying by that meanes the fiercenesse of their courage, pacifying their displeasure, and dulcing their grimmesse and austeritie: would any man blame or reprove, and not rather honour and admire his politike wisdom, in that with a little change and altering of his garments, he had the dexteritie and skill to gaine all Asia, and lead it as he would, making himselfe, thus by his armour, master and lord of their bodies; and by his apparell alluring and winning their hearts. And yet these men commend Aristippus the Philosopher, and disciple of Socrates, for that one while wearing a poore, thimne and thred-bare cloke, and another while putting on a rich mantell of tiffew wrought and died as Aleius, he knew how to keepe decorum, and decently to behave himselfe, as well in the one garment as the other: meane while, they blame and condemne Alexander, in that as he honored the habit of his owne country, so he disdained not the apparell of another, which he had conquered by armes, intending thereby to lay the ground-works & foundation of greater matters: for his desire and purpose was not to over-runne and waste Asia, as a captaine and ring-leader of a rabble of thieves and robbers would doe, nor to sacke and racke, harry and worrie it, as the prairie and booty of unexpected and unhoped for felicity: like as afterwards Anniball did by Italy; and before time, the Tricians delt by Ionia; and the Scythians by Asia, who made havocke and waste as they went: but as one, who meant to range all the nations upon earth, under the obedience of one and the same reason, and to reduce all men to the same policie, as citizens under government of a common-weale, therefore thus he composed and transformed himselfe in his raiment and habit. And if that great God, who sent the soule of Alexander from heaven to earth below, had not so suddenly called it away againe unto himselfe; peradventure there had bene but one law to rule and overlooke all men living, the whole world haply had bene governed by one and the same justice, as a common light to illustrate all places: whereas now, those parts of the earth, which never had a sight of Alexander, remaine in the shadow of darkness, as destitute of the very light of the sunne: and therefore the very first project of his expedition and voyage sheweth, that he caried the minde of a true Philosopher indeed, who aimed not at the gaining for himselfe daintie delights, and costly pleasures, but intended to procure and compasse an universall peace, concord, unitie and societie of all men living one with another.

In the second place consider we his words and sentences; for that in other kings and potentates also, their maners and intentions of their minde, are principally bewraied by their speeches. Antigonus the elder, when a certaine Sophister upon a time presented and pronounced unto him certaine commentaries and treatises which he had composed as touching justice: Good fellow (quoth he) thou art a foole, to come and preach unto one of justice, when thou seekest me bending mine ordinance against the cities of other princes, and battering their walls as I do. Darius also the tyrant was wont to say, that we should deceive children with dyes and cockall bones, bones, but beguile men with othes: And upon the tombe of Sardanapalus was engraven this epitaph:

*What I did eat and drinke, I have:
the sports also remaine Which lady Venus did vouchsafe, all else I count but vaine.*

Who can denie, but that by the last of those speeches and apophthegmes, sensuall lust and voluptuousnesse was authorized; by the second, Atheisme and impietie; and by the first, injustice and avarice? Now if you take away from the sayings of Alexander his roiall crowne and diademe, the addition of Jupiter Ammon whose sonne he was stiled to be, and the nobility of his birth, certes you would say they were the sage sentences of Socrates, Plato or Pythagoras. For we must not stand upon the brave titles and proud inscriptions which Poets have devised to be imprinted or engraven upon his pictures, images and statues, having an eie and regard not to shew the modestie, but to magnifie the puissance of Alexander: as for example;

*This image here that stands in brasse so bright,
Of Alexander is the portraitt right:
Up toward heaven he both his eies doth cast,
And unto Jove seems thus to speake at last:
Mine is the earth, by conquest I it hold:
Thou Jupiter in heaven mayst be bold.*

And another:

*Of Jupiter that heavenly God of might,
The sonne am I (Great Alexander might.)*

These were the glorious titles which glaving Poets I say, in flattery of his fortune fattered upon him. But if a man would recount the true apophthegmes indeed of Alexander, he may doe well to beginne first at those which he delivered in his childhood: for being in footmanship the swiftest of all other young lads of his age, when his familiar play-ferees and mates were in hand with him very earnestly to runne a course at the Olympian games for a prize, he demanded of them againe, whether he should meet with kings there for his concurrents in the race: and when they answered, No: Then were the match (quoth he) not equally nor indifferently made, wherein if I have the worste, a king shall be foiled; and if I gaine the victorie, I shall but conquer private persons. When his father Philip chanced in a battell against the Triballians to be runne thorow the thigh with a lance; and albeit, that he escaped danger of death, yet was much grieved and dismayed to limpe and halt thereupon as he did: Be of good cheere good father (quoth he) and go abroad hardly in the sight of the whole world, that at every step you tread and set forward, you may be put in minde of your valour and vertue. How say you now, proceed not these answers from a Philosophicall minde? and shew they not an heart, which being ravished with a divine instinct and ardent love of good and honest things, careth not for the defects of the bodie? for how greatly thinke you joyed and gloried he in the wounds that he received in his owne person, who in every one of them bare the testimony and memoriall of some nation subdued, some battell won, of some cities forced by assaile, or of some kings that yielded to his mercie? Certes, he never tooke care to cover and hide his scarres, but caried them about him, and shewed them where ever he went, as so many marks and tokens engraved, to testifie his vertue and prowess. And if at any time there grew some comparison, either by way of serious disputation in points of learning, or in table talk, as touching the verses of Homer, which of them were best: when some seemed to commend this verse, others that, he would evermore preferre this, above all other:

αἰφύπνης, βασιλῆς τ' ἀγαθῆς, κρατερῆς τ' αἰσχροῦ.
*A prince right good and gracious,
A knight withall most valourous.*

And making this account, that the praise which another had given to king Agamemnon before time, stood for a law unto himselfe; in so much, as he would say, that Homer in that one verse had recommended the vertue of Agamemnon, and prophesied the prowess of Alexander. And therefore, so often as he passed over the Streight of Hellefont, his maner was to goe and visit Troy, where he represented unto his owne minde, the woorthy feats of armes which those brave princes and noble worthies performed, who fought there. And when one of that country promised mised to bestow upon him in free gift, if he would accept it, the harpe of Paris: I have no need (quoth he) of it, for I have already, that of Achilles: to the sound whereof he was wont for his recreation,

*The praises for to sing and chant,
Of dowie knights and valiant;*

whereas this here of Paris, warbled a wanton and feminine harmony, to which he used to sing sonnets and balads of Love.

Now most certaine it is, that to love wisdom, and to have in esteeme, sages and learned persons is an infallible signe of a philosophicall spirit. And this was in Alexander, if ever in any other prince: for what kinnesse and affection he caried to his tuteur and master, Aristotle; also, that hee did as great honour unto Anaxarchus the skilfull Musician, as to no favourite and familiar friend the like; I have already shewed elsewhere. The first time that ever Pyrho the Elian talked and conferred with him, hee gave unto the man tenne thousand pieces of golde. unto Xenocrates one of Platoes disciples, he sent a present of fiftie talents. And as most historiographers doe report, he made Oenipartus, one of Diogenes his scholars, his admiral at sea. And himselfe meeting upon a time with Diogenes at Corinth, where he communed with him, he so woondered at his maner of life, and had his gravitie in such admiration, that many a time after, in speaking of him, he would say: Were I not Alexander, I would be Diogenes: which was as much to say, as thus: I could willingly employ my whole life and spend my time at my booke and in contemplation, but that I am determined to be a Philosopher in deed and action. He said not: If I were not a king, I could finde in mine heart to be Diogenes: nor, If I were not rich, and one that loved to go gay and in sumptuous robes, &c. For he never in his life preferred fortune before wisdom; nor the purple mantle of estate, or the roiall diademe, before a scrip and a poore threadbare Philosophers cloake; but simply this was his saying: Were I not Alexander, I would be Diogenes: that is to say, Had I not proposed to my selfe to joine together in mutual societie, Barbarous nations with the Greeks, and by travelling in voiage thorow the earth, to polish and make civill what savage people soever I find, searching from one end of the world to another, and visiting all the coasts of the sea, to joine Macedonie unto the Ocean, to sow as it were, Greece in all parts, and to spread thorowout all nations peace and justice, yet would I not sit still idle in delights, and take my pleasure, but imitate the simplicity and frugality of Diogenes. But now pardon me, I pray thee, Diogenes: I follow Hercules, I take the way of Perseus, I tread the trace of god Bacchus, my stocke-father and author of my race and progeny; I would gladly, that the Greeks might once more dance with victory among the Indians, and reduce into the memory and remembrance of those mountainers and savage nations who dwell beyond the mountaine Caucasus, the joyly feasts and merriments of the Bacchanales. And even there, by report, there be those who follow a certaine strict, austere, and naked profession of wisdom, called thereupon Gymnosophists, holy men, living according to their owne lawes, devoted altogether to a contemplative service of God, making lesse account of this life than Diogenes doth, and living more barely, as having no need at all of bagge and wallet; for, no provision make they of victuals, because the earth furnisheth them alwaies with that which is new and fresh to their hand: the rivers afford them drinke; the leaves falling from trees and the Greene grasse of the earth together, serve for their beds: by my meanes that they know Diogenes, and Diogenes them. I must also alter the stampe of the coine, and in stead of a Barbarian marke, signe it after the Greeke maner and according to their common wealth. Well, thus much of his words and sayings: come we now to his deeds. And doe they seeme to cary before them the blinde rashnesse and temerity of Fortune, and bare force of armes and violences of the hand? or rather, of the one side, great prowessse and justice; on the other side, much clemency and lenity, together with good order and rare prudence, of one managing all things by sober, discreet and considerate judgement? Certes, I am not able to say and discern in all his acts thus much, as to pronounce, That this was a deed of valour; that, of humanity; and another, of patience or continence: but every exploit of his, seemeth to have beene mingled and compounded of all vertues in one, to confirme the famous sentence and opinion of the Stoicks, That every act, a wife man doth effect by all vertues jointly together. True it is indeed, that in each action there is one vertue or other, eminent and predominant alwaies above others; but the same inciteth and directeth the rest to the same end: and even so we may see in the acts of Alexander, That as his martiall valour is humane, so his humanitie is valourous; his bounty is thrifflie, his liberality frugally; frugally; his choler soone appeased, his heat quickly cold; his loves temperate, his pastimes not idle; and his travels not without their solace and recreation; who, evermore tempered feasts with warre, military expeditions with games, masks and sports; who, interlaced among his sieges of cities, warlike exploits and executions, festivall Bacchanales, wedding and nuptiall songs of Hymenaeus. Who was there ever greater enemy to those that doe wrong, or more mercifull and gracious to the afflicted? Who ever caried himselfe more heave to stiffe-necked and obstinate persons; and more friendly againe, to humble suppliants? And heere in this place it comes into my minde, for to alledge and cite the saying of king Porus, who being brought prisoner before king Alexander, and demanded by him, in what maner he wished that he should use him: Roially (quoth he) Diogenes. And when Alexander replied againe, and asked what he had els to say: Nothing, quoth Porus; for in that one word [Roially] is comprised all. And even so me thinks, that in all the actions of Alexander, a man may use this for a reffrein or furburden, All Philosophically. For this in deed containeth all. He was enamoured of Roxane the daughter of Oxiathres, by occasion that he saw her to dance with a good grace among other captive ladies: howbeit, he would not force her, nor offer any violence to her dishonour; but elpoused her for his wife: wherein hee did as a Philosopher. When he saw his enemy Darius lying dead, with many an arrow and dart sticking in his body, he neither sacrificed to the gods, nor founded the triumph for joy, that so long a war by his death was come to an end; but taking the mantle from his owne shoulders, cast it over the dead corps, as if he would thereby have covered and hidden the wofull destiny of a king. And this also was done like a Philosopher. He received one day a letter of secrets from his owne mother, which whiles he perused, it chanced that Hephestion also sitting at that time by him, read it simply together with him, and thought nothing, Alexander debarred him not; onely he tooke the signet from his owne finger, let it to his mouth, sealing as it were his silence, by the faith that he owed unto a friend. See how herein he shewed the part of a Philosopher: for if these be not Philosophicall acts; I know not what els be. Socrates was well enough content, that faire Alcibiades should lie with him; but Alexander, when Philoxenus his lieutenant generall over the sea coasts of Asia, wrote unto him, that there was a yong boy within his government in Ionia, for sweet favour and beauty incomparable, demanding of him by his letters to know his pleasure, whether he should send the said youth unto him, he wrote sharply unto him, in this wise: What hast thou known by me, most leaud and wicked varlet as thou art, that thou shouldest presume thus to allure and entice me with such pleasures? Xenocrates we have in admiration, for turning backe a present of fifty talents, which Alexander sent unto him; and shall we not wonder as well at the giver? shall we not thinke, that he made as small account of money, who gave so liberally, as he who refused it? Xenocrates had no need of riches, professing as he did Philosophy; but Alexander had use therefore, even in regard of Philosophy, because he might exercise his liberality in bestowing the same so bountifully upon such persons. We honour the remembrance of those, who have left behinde them testimonies of their contempt of death: and how often thinke you, hath Alexander delivered as much, when he saw the darts and arrowes flying so thicke about his eares; and himselfe pressed hard upon by the violence of enemies? We are perswaded verily, that there is in all men whatsoever, some light of sound judgement, for that nature herselfe frameth them to discern that which is good and honest: but a difference there is betweene the common sort and Philosophers, for that Philosophers excell the rest in this, that their judgements be more firme, settled and resolute in dangers than others; whereas the vulgar sort are not armed and fortified beforehand with such deepe impressions and resolutions as these:

*The best presage by augury and bird flight,
Is, in defence of country for to fight.*

Again:

*This full account all men must make,
By death one day their end to take.*

But the occurrences and occasions of perils presented unto them, doe breake their discourse of reason, and the imaginations of dangers imminent, doe drive out all counsell and considerate judgement. For feare doth not only mask and astonish the memory, as Thucydides saith, but also driveth out every good intention, all motions and endeavors of well doing: whereas Philosophy bindeth them fast with cords round about, that they cannot stirre.

The end of this treatise is lost.

The Summarie.

Lutarch doth prosecute in this declamation, the argument and discourse begun in the former: the some whereof is this, that the vertue of Alexander surmounted his fortune, which was alwaies in maner contrary unto him. But before that he entere into this matter he opposeth unto the sufficiency and singular parts of this prince, the base demeanour and brutish villany of certain other kings and potentates, adjoining over and besides thus much, that at his exercises and imployments, are proofes every one of his haughty courage and magnanimity. Then discourseth he particularly, in what account and reputation good workemen were with Alexander, and what his selfe conceit was of his owne workes in comparison of theirs. Afterwards he commeth to shew, that if Alexander be considered from his very first beginning to his last end, he will be found, to be the very handy worke of valour and fortitude. In proceeding forward, he saith, that fortune received more honor by Alexander than he by her. The which is verified by considering the state of his armie, after his death. Upon this, he entere into a common place of mans greatnesse, which serveth to cleere and illustrate the former points and matters handled. And by the consideration of the evill carriage and government of many other princes, as by a foile, he giveth a most beautifull lustre unto the vertues of Alexander, which he deciphereth in particular. Thus done, he answereth those, who object that fortune raised Alexander to that greatnesse. And give the mightier force and weight to the reasons by him produced, he disputeth against fortune her selfe: wherein he examineth his severall exploits, wherein as vertue is evidently scene to accompany and assist, so fortune to oppose her selfe and resist him. And this doth he particularize at large. After this digression, he commeth againe to his precedent matter, and bringeth out new proofes of the vertue and magnanimity of this mighty Monarch, even from his youth unto his dying day, comparing him as a Paragon, with the wisest Sages, and most valiant warriors both of Persia and of Greece.

Shewing also that he surpassed them all, in cominency, liberality, piety, prudence, justice, beneficence and valour. For the last point, he relateth the great jeopardy wherein

Alexander was plunged one time among the rest, out of which, vertue caused him to retire safe as it were, in despite of fortune: which is the very conclusion of this treatise, confirming the principall intention of our author, which is to proove that the fore-said grandeur of Alexander ought not to be ascribed unto fortune, but to vertue.

THE FORTUNE OR vertue of K. Alexander.

The second Oration.

We forgot yesterday (as it should seeme) among other matters to say, that the age wherein Alexander lived was in this respect happy, for that it brought forth many excellent arts, and as many great and singular wits: or rather it may be said, that this was not so much the good fortune of Alexander, as of those cunning artificians and rare spirits, to have for their witness & spectator such a personage, who both knew best how to judge truly of good workmanship, and also was most able to reward the same as liberally. And verily to this purpose reported it is, that sometime after, in the age ensuing, when

Archestratus a fine headed Poet and a pleasant, lived in great want and penury, for that no man made any reckoning of him to his desert, there came one unto him and said: Had it bene thy hap Archestratus to have lived in the daies of Alexander, he would for every verse of thine have bestowed upon thee either Cyprus or Phoenice. Certes for mine owne part thus I conceive of it, that the artificers and workemen living in that age, became so famous and excellent not so much under Alexander and by Alexander. For it is the good temperature of the weather and subtilty of the ambient aire, that causeth abundance and plenty of fruits: but the gracious countenance, the favor, honor, bounty and humanity of a prince, is it that provoketh and stirreth up good arts, yea and advanceth excellent wits: whereas contrariwise all the same languisheth, decayeth, is extinguished and perissheth cleane by the envie, avarice, spary pinching, and peevish frowardnesse of rulers and those in authority. And heere I must call to minde the report that goeth of Dionysius the tyrant, who hearing one day a famous minstrell playing pailing well upon the lute and as sweet singing thereto, said openly, that he would bestow upon him for a reward a talent of silver. The morrow after comes this musician to call for the money according to promise: unto whom Dionysius made this answer: Sirrha (quoth he) yesterday as I tooke contentment by thee so long as I heard thee play and sing, so I am sure I did thee a pleasure againe in the hope of this promise: thou wert paid therefore presently for the delight which thou gavest me, by the joy that thou receivedst from me: goe thy waies therefore, thou hast thy reward already. Alexander, the tyrant of Persia, (whom indeed I should call by this addition onely [tyrant] and not steine and contaminate to good a name as Alexander, by stiling therewith so wicked a wretch:) this tyrant I say, whiles he beheld one day an excellent plaier acting in a tragedy, was so much moved with a certaine tickling delight comming upon him, that his heart began to relent even upon a tender commiseration and pitie: whereupon he suddenly left the theater, made haste away, & went faster than an ordinary pace untill he was out of sight, saying withall, that it was a great indignity for him to be scene for to weepe and shed teares, in compassion of the miseries and calamities of queene Hecuba or lady Polyxena, who every day caused so many citizens and subjects throats to be cut. This monstrous tyrant was so mischievously bent, that he went within a litle of punishing that excellent actour most grievously, because he had mollified his hard heart and made it melt like a peece of iron in the furnace. Archelus king of Macedonia seemed to be not very free of gift, whereupon Timotheus the musician singing to the harpe, would enviously glance at him, and iterate this pretty scoffe as the foot of his song:

Thou earth's brad mettall, silver bright,

*Thou * praise sir, as your whole delight.*

But Archelaus met with him, extempore againe, and replied not unwittily, in this wise,

And thou as faine would'st silver have,

*And dost as shamelessly it * crave.*

Alex a king of the Scythians, having taken prisoner in warre, that famous minstrell Ismenias, commanded him to found upon his flute or pipe, whiles he sat at dinner. Now when all the company besides wondered at this excellent musick, and applauded him for his good playing, he

he himselfe sware a great oth, that he tooke more pleasure to heare his horse neigh, so unmusical were his cares and so farre removed from the Mules : so much also was his minde set upon the stable and manger, fitter indeed to heare asses bray than horses neigh. What honour then or advancement may a cunning artisan, or so absolute a master in musick hope for at the hands of such kings? Certes no more than from those who would seeme themselves to be skilful, yea and dare contend with professors in the sufficiency of their arte : and therefore upon envie or malice seeke to overthrow and deprave those that indeed be excellent artists. Such an one was Dionysius above named (whom heere I must bring in againe) who caused the Poet Philoxenus to be cast into the prison or dungeon called Latomie, that is to say, the Quarries, because when Dionysius had put into his hands a tragedy of his owne making, commanding him to review it and correct the same, he dashed it out and interlined it all from the beginning to the end. And even Philip altho king of Macedonie for that late it was ere he gave his minde to musick, was in this behalfe unlike himselfe and not answerable to his greatnesse otherwise. Howbeit upon an opinion that he had of his owne skill that way, he would needs (as the report goes) enter into disputation with a professed musician and plaier of instruments, and argue about the strokes and stops, points and notes and such like terms, yea and seeme forthwith to controule him in his owne art ; whereat the minstrell smiling pleasantly upon him : God forbid sir (quoth he) that you a king, should ever be so unfortunate and at so low an eb, as to have more skill in these matters than I. But Alexander knowing full well what things he should be a spectator and auditour of, as also what he ought himselfe to practise and execute with his owne hand, studied continually to be expert and accomplished in feates of armes, endeavouring, as the Poet Aeschylus saith,

And terribly to force his foes to quake.

And this indeed was the hereditarie art which he received by succession from his auncestors the Acacidæ, and Hercules : as for other sciences, he honored them in other men, without any emulation at all for their profession : and as he highly commended any excellency or grace therein, so for no pleasure & delight that he tooke thereby, was he easily surprized with any affection for to follow the same. In his time there flourished two noble Tragedians above the rest Thesphalus and Athenodorus ; who when they contended one against another for the prise, who could act the better, the kings of Cyprus defraied the charges belonging to this solemne spectacle, so and pageant ; but the principall and most renowned captaines, were judges to decide the quarrell. In the end, when Athenodorus was declared victour ; Alexander who stood better affected to Thesphalus : I would I had (quoth he) lost the one halfe of my kingdome, so I had not seeme Thesphalus take the foile : howbeit, he neither expostulated with the umpiers, nor complained of their judgement ; for howsoever he thought that himselfe ought in other respects to outgoe all, yet he was to yeeld and give place to justice. Among Comedians in those daies, there was one Lycan a Scarphean : this actour in playing his part before him in a comedie, had interlarded handfomly a verse, wherein he seemed cleanly to crave some reward : Alexander laughed at the conceit of the fellow, and gave him ten tallents. Many excellent harpers there were, and plaiers of the lute, and one Aristonius among others, who in a certaine battell running in to rescue and succour him, fought manfully, and there was slaine, and fell dead at his foot : Alexander heereupon caused his statue to be made in bras, and to be set up in the temple of Apollo Pythius holding a lute in the one hand, and a lance in the other. In so doing he not onely honored the man, but also Musick, as being an art which breedeth animosity in mens hearts, filling those with a certaine ravishment of spirit and couragious heart to fight valiantly, who are naturally framed and bred up to action : for even himselfe one day, when Antigenides sounded the battell with his flute, and singing thereto a militarie song, called Harmation, was thereat so much moved, and set in such an heat by his warlike tune, that he started out of the place where he sat, and caught up the armes that hung up thereby, ready to brandish them and to fight, bearing witness thereby to the Spartans, chaunting thus :

Sweetly to play on Lute and Harpe ;

To sing thereto as pleasantly :

Be seerneth those that love at sharpe,

To fight it out right valiantly.

There lived also in the time of Alexander, Apelles the Painter, and Lyfippus the Imager : the former of these two, painted Alexander holding a thunderbolt in his hand, but so exquisitely to the life, and so like unto himselfe, that it was a common saying ; Of two Alexanders, the one, king Philips sonne, was invincible ; the other of Apelles drawing, was inimitable. As for Lyfippus, when he had cast the first image of Alexander, with his face up toward heaven, expressing thereby the very countenance of Alexander, who was wont so to looke, and withall, to turne his necke somewhat at one side ; there comes me one and fetcheth over it this epigram, alluding very prettily to the said portraiture :

This image beere that stands in bras all bright,

The portraict is of Alexander, right :

Up toward heaven, he both his eyes doth cast,

And unto Jove, seemes thus to speake at last :

Thou Jupiter in heav'n maist well be bold :

Mine is the earth, by conquest I it hold.

And therefore Alexander gave commandment, that no other brasse founder, should cast his image, but only Lyfippus : for he alone it was (as it should seeme) that had the feat to represent his naturall disposition in bras, and to expresse his vertue answerable to the lineaments and proportion of his shape. As for others, howsoever they might be thought to resemble the bending of his necke, the cheerefull cast & amiable volubility of his quicke eye ; yet could they never observe and keepe that virilitie of visage and lion-like looke of his. In the ranke of other rare workmen, may be ranged a famous Architect, named Strafarates, who would not seeme to busie himselfe in making any thing, that was either gallant & pleasant, or delectable and gracious to the eye ; but intended some great matter, and such a piece of worke, and of that argument, as would require no lesse then the riches and treasure of a king to furnish and set forth. This fellow comes up to Alexander, being in the high countries and provinces of his dominion, where before him he found fault with all his images, as well painted, and engraven, as cast and pourtrayed any way ; saying, they were the hand-works of base minded and mechanical artificers : But I (quoth he) if it may please your majestie, know how, and doe intend to found and establish the similitude of your roiall person, in a matter that is living and immortal, grounded upon eternall roots, the weight and ponderositie whereof is immovable, and can not be shaken : For the mountaine Athos (quoth he) in Thracia, whereas it is greatest, and riseth to a most conspicuous height ; where the broad plaines and high tops are proportionate to it selfe every waie ; having in it, members, lims, joints, distances, and intervals, resembling for all the world, the forme of mans body, may be wrought and framed so, as it would serve verie well both to be called, and to be indeed, the statue of Alexander, and worthy his Greatnesse : the foote and base whereof, shall touch the sea ; in one of the hands comprehending and holding a great citie peopled and inhabited by an infinit number of men : and in the right, a running river, with a perpetuall current, which it powreth as it were out of a great pot into the sea : as for all these petty images and puppets made of gold, bras, and ivory, these wodden tables with pictures, away with them all, as little paltrey portraicts, which may be bought and sold, these stollen and melted, defaced and marred. Alexander having heard the man speake, highly praised him, as admiring his haucie minde, his bold courage, the conceit of his extraordinary invention : Good fellow (quoth he) let Athos alone, and permit it to stand a Gods name, in the place where it doth, and never alter the forme of it : it sufficeth that it is the monument of the outrageous pride, insolent vanitie and folly of one king already : and as for me, the mountaine Caucasus, the hilles Emodi, the river Tanais, and the Caspian sea, shall be the images and statues to represent my acts. But let the case I pray you, that such a piece of worke had bene made & finished as this great architecte talked of : is there any man thinke you, seeing it in that forme, disposition, and fashion, that would thinke it grew fo by chance & adventure? No I warrant you. What say we now to his image called Ceramophorus, that is to say, the thunder-bolt-bearer? what say we to another named Antiphon, that is to say, leaning upon a lance? Can not the greatnesse & majestie of such a statue be performed by fortune, without the artificial hand of man, howsoever it conferre and allow thereto great store of gold, bras, and all manner of rich & precious matter : and shall we thinke it then possible, that a great personage, may rather the greatest that ever the world saw, was made & perfected by fortune without vertue? and that it was fortune onely who made for him that provision of armes, of money, of men, cities, and hostes : all which things, bring perill to those that know not how to use them well ; and neither honour and credit, nor puillance, but rather argue their feeblenesse and impuillance. Antiphon

Antisthenes said, very well and truly, that we should wish unto our enemies all the good things in the world, save onely valour and fortitude: for by that meanes they be not theirs who are in present possession of them, but become theirs who are the conquerors. And th is is the reason men say, that nature hath set upon the head of an Hart for his defence, the most heartlesse and cowardly beast that is, woonderfull hornes for bignesse, and most dangerous by reason of their sharpe and branching knagges: teaching us by this example, that bodily strength and armour, serveth them in no stead, who have not the courage and resolution to stand their ground and fight it out. And even thus we see, that fortune many times by heaping upon heartlesse cowards, and widele fooles, a great estate of riches and dominion; which they know not how to weld, and wherewith they discredit themselves, doeth honour and grace vertue, as upon which onely dependeth all the puissance, all the worship, glory, and reputation of men: for if as Epicharmus saith,

The minde it is that seeth cleare:

And 't is the minde that eke doeth heare.

then all the rest are blinde and deafe, which be void of reason: for the senses seeme verilie to have their proper and peculiar functions. Now, that the minde is all in all, that the minde is available in all things, that the minde dispolet every thing in good order, that it is the minde which conquereth, which ruleth & reigneth over all; & whatsoever beside, blind, deafe, & without life, do hinder, depreffe, and dishonor the possessors thereof, if vertue be away, may be proved and exemplified by the experience and coule of wordly affaires: for by the same puissance and command, Semiramis being but a woman, rigged and manned armadoes at sea, leaved and armed maine batels of land forces, built Babylon, scoured and conquered all the coast of the red sea, subdued and brought to her obedience the Arabians and Aethiopians: whereas Sardanapalus, a man borne, far within house at home, carding and spinning purple, tumbling and lying along, waltzing among a forth of concubines: and when he was dead, they made for him a statue in stone, dauncing by himselfe alone after the Barbarian fashion, and knocking (as it were) with his fingers over his head, like an antique, with this epigram set over it:

Eat, drinke, the wanton lecher play,

For nothing els is ought, if I say.

Crates the Philosopher seeing upon a time within the temple of Apollo Pythius at Delphi, the image of Phryne the curtisan, thinned all in golde, cried out: Behold heere stands the triumphant Trophæe, over the loofe and lascivious life of the Greeks. But whofoever beholdeth the life or sepulture, whether you will (for in mine opinion there is no difference) of Sardanapalus, he may well and truly say to the Trophæe of fortunes goods. What then? shall we suffer fortune after Sardanapalus to meddle with Alexander, and to challenge unto herselfe any part of his mightnesse and puissance? That were no reason at all: for what gave she ever unto him more than other kings have received at her hands? whether it were armour, horses, weapons, monie, soldiers, and a guard about their persons? Well, let her by these meanes make Aridanus great if she can; let her magnifie (Hay) by these meanes Amasis, Ochus, Ourses, Tigranes the Armenian, and Nicomedes the Bithynian: of whom the one, to wit, Tigranes, slung downe his crowne and diadem at the feet of Pompeius, and shamefully lost his kingdome, as a pray or efcheat fallen into his enemies hand: the other, namely Nicomedes, having shaven his head, and wearing a cap upon it, declared himselfe thereby, to be an enfranchised vassall of the Romans? What? Say we then, that fortune maketh men cowards, fearefull, and base minded? Surely, it were no reason to impute cowardise upon infortunitie, no more than to attribute valour and wisdom to prosperitie. But well and truly may one say, that fortune herselfe was great, in regard of her lord and master Alexander: for in him she was glorious, invincible and magnanimous; not proud nor insolent, but full of clemencie and humanitie: no sooner was the breath out of his body, but presently her power, that is to say, his armie and forces, as Teofthenes said wandering up and downe stragling and running upon it selfe, resembled that 50 same Cyclops Polyphemus, who after his eie was out of his head, went groping all about, putting forth his hands before him, but not knowing where to lay them: For even the greatnesse of her puissance, after he was once dead, went to and fro, wandering it wist not where, and stumbling ever and anon, wanting a directour and governour, as in time of Anarchie, when there is no sovereign ruler knownen: or rather it might be compared unto dead bodies when the life is newly departed out of them. For like as the parts are not knit together, nor hold one to another any any longer, but fall away one from the other, and loosely withdraw themselves apart: even so the armie of Alexander after it had loofed and forgone him, did no more but sprunt, part, struggle and strive for life, tosse and tumble to and fro, under the Perdiccas, the Meleagers, the Selucii, the Antegoni, and I wot not whom, like unto some small vial spirits, yet remaining hot and beating within the arteries heere and there disorderly, and now and then like intermitting pulses, untill such time as at the last it grew to putrefaction and corruption in maner of a dead carcase, and engendred wormes crawling within it: I meane such base kings, degenerate rulers & captaines who had no generositi nor heart in them. Certes, Alexander himselfe in his lifetime rebuking Hephestion when he quarelled with Craterus, wanted him & tooke him up in this wise: What power 10 hast thou of thy selfe? what couldest thou do, and where wouldest thou be, if a man should take Alexander from thee? Semblably, I will not sticke to say thus unto the fortune of that time: What is thy greatnesse? what is thy glory? where is thy puissance? where is thine invincible power, if one should bereave thee of Alexander? That is as much to say, as if one should deprive thine armes & weapons, of skill and experience to use them; thy riches, of liberality; thy sumptuosity and magnificence, of temperance; thy fights & combats, of resolute valor; thy victories and superiorities, of mildenesse and lenity. Make any other great if thou canst, who bestoweth not his goods bountifully, who in the forefront of the battell hazzardeth not his owne person first before his armie, who honoreth not nor regardeth his friends, who taketh no pite of his enemies captive, who is not in his pleasures continent, in his occasions & affaires vigilant, in his 20 victories soone pacified and easie to be compounded with, and last of all, who in his prosperity and good successe is not kind and courteous. How can a man possibly be great, what power and authority fo ever he have, if he be foolish, vicious, & wicked withal: for in one word, take vertue from a man otherwise fortunate, he is every way meane and of base account; meane in his gifts & donations, by reason of nigardise; meane in his travels, in regard of his cowardise and tender- 30 nes; meane in the sight of the gods, because of his superstition; meane among good men, for his envie; meane with valiant warriors, in respect of his timorousnesse; and meane in the conceit of honest women, considering his dissolute voluptuousnesse. For like as unskillfull workemen who fet little statues upon great bales and large pedestals, shew thereby the smallnesse of their statues so much the more: even so when fortune raiseth up a man of base minde into high 30 place and to an estate wherein he is to be seene of the whole world, she discovereth his wants, she discrediteth and dishonoreth him the rather, waving and shaking every way through his leviite. So that, by this we must confesse, that greatnesse lieth not in the bare possession, but in the well using of good things: For many times it falleth out that very infants even from their cradle, inherit the realmes and seignories of their fathers; like as Charillus did, whom Lycorgus his uncle broght in his swadling bands into the common hall Phiditium, where the lords of Sparta were wont to dine together, set him in the roiall throne, and in the stead of himselfe, declared and proclaimed him king of Lacedæmon. Now was not this babe for all this, great: but he rather might be accounted a great person, who rending unto the new borne infant his fathers honor due unto him, would not intervert and derive it upon himselfe, and so defraud his 40 nephew thereof. As for Aridanus, who could make him a great man, whom differing indeed nothing from a babe, Meleager swaddled indeed and enwrapped onely within a purple robe and roiall mantell of estate, and so entialed him in the throne of Alexander: wherein he did very well, to give the world to understand within a few daies after, how men reigne by vertue; and how by fortune: for he subrogated in the place of a true prince that managed the empire indeed, a very counterfeit plaier and actor of a kings part; or to speake more truly, he brought a mute and dumbe diademe to walke through the world for a time, as it were upon a stage. The comicall * Poet said:

A very woman may well a burden beare,

If first a man upon her doe is reare.

50 But a man may contrariwise say, that a silly woman or a yong child may take up, yea and charge upon the shoulders of another, a seignory, a realme, a great estate and empire, as Bagoas the Eunuch tooke and laid upon Ourses and Darius the kingdome of the Persians. Mary when as one hath taken upon him a mighty power and dominion, so beare, to weld & manage the same, and not under the weight and heavy load of affaires belonging thereto, to be overwhelmed, brused, or wrestled away: that is the act of a man endued with vertue understanding and courage, such an one as Alexander was: howsoever some there be who reproch him that he loved wine to well and would be drunke. But this great gift he had, that in his important affaires he was sober, neither was he drunke and overseene, nor ever forgot himselfe and grew to any outrage, for all the puiffance, authority and liberty that he had: whereof others when they had some part and little taft, could not hold and containe themselves: For

No sooner are their purfes stuf
With coine: or they to honor brought,
But they anon with pride are puff,
And soone bewray that they be naught:
They kicke, they winke, they fling and prance,
No one may stand safely in their way,
If fortune once their house advance
Some unexpected power to sway.

Clytus for having sunke three or foure galleies of the Greeks, nere the Isle Amorgus, would needs be filed with the name of Neptune, and a three tined mace caried before him. Demetrius, upon whom fortune had bestowed a little skirt or lapper (as it were) which he tare from Alexander's dominion, was well content to heare himselfe called Jupiter Karuadans, that is to say, the vawter. Cities sent unto him not embassadors, but Theores, forsooth, that is to say, especiall persons deputed for to consult with the gods: and his answers to them, must be termed (I would not else) Oracles. And Lysimachus who held the coasts of Thracia, which was but the border or edge of Alexander's kingdom, grew to that heigh of surly pride & intollerable arrogancy, that he would breake out into these words: Now the Bizantines come to doe homage unto me, seeing how I reach and touch the skie with my lance. At which speech of his, Pasfides standing by, could not forbear, but say unto the company: Let us be gone my masters, with all speed, lest this man bore an hole in heaven with the point of his lance. But what should we speake more of these persons? who might be allowed in some sort to cary an haughty minde and beare their heads aloft, in regard of Alexander, whose souldiers they were? seeing that Clearchus the tyrant of Heraclea, caried upon his scepter as his device, the resemblance of lightning, and one of his sonnes he named Zeus, that is to say, a thunderbolt. And Dennis the younger, called himselfe the sonne of Apollon, in a certaine Epigram to this effect:

Doris the Nymph, by Phœbus did conceive,
And from them both my birth I do derive.

And in truth, Dennis, the elder, the naturall father of this man, who put to death ten thousand of his owne citizens and subjects (if not more) who for very envie betraied his owne brother into the hands of his enemies; who had not the patience to stay for his owne mothers death, an aged woman, and who by the course of nature would have died within few daies after, but snothered and stopped her breath; who also himselfe wrote in a tragedy of his owne making,

For why? know this, that lordly tyranny
The mother is of wrong and villany.

yet forsooth, of three daughters which he had, named one Arete, that is to say, Vertue; another, Sophrosyne, that is to say, Temperance; and a third, Dicaeosyne, that is to say, Justice. Some there were, who needs would be surnamed Euergetas, that is to say, Benefactors; others, Soteres, that is to say, Saviours. Some called themselves Callinici, that is to say, Victorious; others, Megalis, that is to say, Great. And yet as glorious additions as they caried in their stiles, who is able to expresse in words, their marriages following thicke one in the necke of another, spending the long day continually, like a sort of stallions among a number of women; as if they had beene a stud of so many mares; their unkind abusing of faire boies, their violent rapes and enforcements of yong damocels, their drumming and tabouring with a sort of effeminate & womanlike wantons, their dice playing in the day time, their piping and founding the flute in open Theaters, their nights spent in suppers, and whole daies in long dinners? But Alexander gat up, and sat to his dinner by the breake of day, and went not to supper before it was late in the evening; he dranke and made good cheere when he had first sacrificed to the gods; he played at dice with Midias, one time, whiles he had a fever upon him; his pastimes and recreations were, to rattell and march upon the way, and withall, to learne how to shoot an arrow, how to launce a dart, how to mount a chariot nimbly, and dismount againe with facility. Roxane he elpoused and wedded, onely for pure love, and to content his fancy and affection; but Statira the daughter of Darius he tooke to wife upon pollicy, because the state of his kingdome and affaires required such

such a match; for expedient it was, thus to mix and unite two nations together. As for other ladies and women of Persia, he went as farre beyond them in chastity and continence, as he did the Persian men in valour and fortitude; for he never would so much as see one of them against her will; and those whom he saw, he lesse regarded than such as he never let eie upon: and whereas otherwise to all persons he was courteous and popular, to such onely as were faire and beautifull he shewed himselfe strange, and used them in some sort proudly. As touching the wife of Darius, a lady of surpassing beauty, he would not endure so much as one word that tended to the praise thereof; yet when she was dead, he performed her funerals with so sumptuous and princelike obsequies, he mourned and bewailed her death so piteously, that as his kindeesse in that behalfe made the world mistrust and suspect his chastity, so his bountifull courtesie incurred the obloquy and imputation of injustice. And verily, Darius was at the first mooved to conceive jealousie and a sinister opinion of him that way, considering he had the woman in his hands, and was besides, a gallant and yong prince: for he also was one of them, who were persuaded that Alexander held the tenure of his mighty dominion and monarchy, by the goodnesse and favour of Fortune; but after he knew the truth once, upon diligent search and inquisition by all circumstances into the thing: Well (quoth he) the Persians itate I perceive is not utterly overthrowen, neither will any man repare us plaine cowards and effeminate persons, for being vanquished by such an enemy: for mine owne part, my first wish and principall prier unto the gods is, that they would vouchsafe me fortunate successe, and at the last, an happy victory of this warre, to the end that I may surmount Alexander in beneficence; for an earnest desire I have and an emulation, to shew my selfe more milde and gracious toward him, than he is to me ward: but if all be gone with me and my house, then, O Jupiter, the protectour of the Persians, and ye other tutelars gods and patrons of kings and kingdomes, suffer not any other but him, to be enthroned in the roiall seat of Cyrus. Certes, this was a very adoption of Alexander, that passed in the presence and by the testimony of the gods. See what victories are achieved by vertue.

Ascribe now (if you will) unto Fortune, the journey of Arbela, the battell fought in Cilicia, and all other such like exploits performed by force of armes: let it be, that the fortune it was of warre which shooke the city of Tyrrus, and made it quake before him, and opened Aegypt unto him; grant, that by the helpe of Fortune Halicarnassus fell to the ground, and Miletus was forced and won; that Mazæus abandoned the river Euphrates, and left it disurnished of garisons; and that all the plaines about Babylon were overflut with dead bodies: yet it was not Fortune that made him temperant, neither was he continent by the meanes of Fortune; Fortune it was not, that kept and preserved his soule as within a fortresse inexpugnable, so as neither pleasures could it surprize and captivate, nor lusts and fleshly desires wound or touch. And these were the very meanes whereby he vanquished and put to flight the person of Darius himselfe. All the rest were, the discomfiture of his great barbe-horses, the overthrow and losse of his armour, skirmishes, battels, murders, executions, massacres and flights of his men. But the great foile and defaiture indeed, most confessed, and against which least exception can be taken, was that wherein Darius himselfe was overthrowen; namely, when as he yielded unto the vertue of Alexander, to his magnanimity, fortitude and justice, admiring that heart of his, invincible of pleasure, unconquered by travels, and in gratuities and liberality immatchable. For in shields and speeres, in pikes and targuets, in shouts and alarmes, in giving the charge and in buckling together with the clattering of armour, right hardie and undaunted, as well as he, were Tarrius the sonne of Dinomenes, Antigones of Pellen, and Philotas the sonne of Parmeno: but against tickling pleasures, against the attractive allurements of women, against flattering silver and golde, they were no better, nor had more rule of themselves than slaves and captives. For Tarrius at what time as Alexander undertooke to pay all the debts of the Macedonians, and to make satisfaction unto all those who had lent them any money, falsly belied himselfe, saying, he was indebted; and withall suborned and brought forth a certaine usurer, to the verie table where this discharge was made, who tooke it upon him, that he was a creditor of his. And afterwards when Tarrius was detected and convicted hereof, he had made himselfe away for very shame and compunction of heart, but that Alexander being advertised thereof, pardoned his fault, yea and permitted him also to keepe the silver still, that he had disbursed for his counterfet debt; calling to minde, how at what time as his father Philip laid siege to the citie Perinthus, the said Tarrius in a skirmish was shot into the eie, and would not suffer the fame to be dressed, nor the shaft to be plucked well and would be drunke. But this great gift he had, that in his important affaires he was sober, neither was he drunke and overseene, nor ever forgot himselfe and grew to any outrage, for all the puiffance, authority and liberty that he had: whereof others when they had some part and little tast, could not hold and containe themselves: For

With coine: or they to honor brought,
But they anon with pride are pift,
And soone bewray that they be naught:
They kicke, they winke, they sling and prance,
None may stand safely in their way,
If fortune once their house advance
Some unexpected power to sway.*

Chytus for having funke three or foure galleies of the Greeks, nere the Isle Amorgus, would needs be stiled with the name of Neptune, and a three tined mace caried before him. Demetrius, upon whom fortune had bestowed a little skirt or lappet (as it were) which he tare from Alexanders dominion, was well content to heare himselfe called Jupiter Karuodans, that is to say, the vawter. And Lysimachus who held the coasts of Thracia, which was but the border or edge of Alexanders kingdom, grew to that heigh of surly pride & intollerable arrogancy, that he would breake out into these words: Now the Bizantines come to doe homage unto me, seeing how I reach and touch the skie with my lance. At which speech of his, Pasides standing by, could not forbear, but say unto the company: Let us be gone my masters, with all speed, lest this man bore an hole in heaven with the point of his lance. But what should we speake more of these persons? who might be allowed in some sort to cary an hauty minde and beare their heads aloft, in regard of Alexander, whose souldiers they were? seeing that Clearchus the tyrant of Heraclea, caried upon his scepter as his device, the resemblance of lightning, and one of his sonnes he named Zeus, that is to say, a thunderbolt. And Dennis the younger, called himselfe the sonne of Apollo, in a certaine Epigram to this effect:

*Doris the Nymph, by Phoebus did conceive,
And from them both my birth I do derive.*

And in truth, Dennis the elder, the naturall father of this man, who put to death ten thousand of his owne citizens and subjects (if not more) who for very envie betrayed his owne brother into the hands of his enemies; who had not the patience to stay for his owne mothers death, an aged woman, and who by the course of nature would have died within few daies after, but smothered and stopped her breath; who also himselfe wrote in a tragedy of his owne making,

*For why? know this, that lordly tyranny
The mother is of wrong and villany.*

yet forsooth, of three daughters which he had, named one Arete, that is to say, Vertue; another, Sophrosyne, that is to say, Temperance; and a third, Dicaeosyne, that is to say, Justice. Some there were, who needs would be surnamed Euergetes, that is to say, Benefactors; others, Soteres, that is to say, Saviours. Some called themselves Callinici, that is to say, Victorious; others, Megalis, that is to say, Great. And yet as glorious additions as they caried in their stiles, who is able to expresse in words, their marriages following thicke one in the necke of another, spending the long day continually, like a sort of stallions among a number of women, as if they had beene a stud of so many mares; their unkind abusing of faire boies, their violent rapes and enforcements of yong damosels, their drumming and tabouring with a sort of effeminate & womanlike wantons, their dice playing in the day time, their piping and founding the flute in open Theaters, their nights spent in suppers, and whole daies in long dinners? But Alexander gat up, and sat to his dinner by the breake of day, and went not to supper before it was late in the evening; he drank and made good cheere when he had first sacrificed to the gods; he played at dice with Midias, one time, whiles he had a fever upon him; his pastimes and recreations were, to ravel and march upon the way, and withall, to learne how to shoot an arrow, how to lance a dart, how to mount a chariot nimbly, and to dismount againe with facility. Roxane he espoused and wedded, onely for pure love, and to content his fancy and affection; but Statira the daughter of Darius he tooke to wife upon pollicy, because the state of his kingdome and affaires required such

such a match; for expedient it was, thus to mix and unite two nations together. As for other ladies and women of Persia, he went as farre beyond them in chastity and continence, as he did the Persian men in valour and fortitude; for he never would so much as see one of them against her will; and those whom he saw, he lesse regarded than such as he never set eie upon: and whereas otherwise to all persons he was courteous and popular, to such onely as were faire and beautifull he shewed himselfe strange, and used them in some sort proudly. As touching the wife of Darius, a lady of surpassing beauty, he would not endure so much as one word that tended to the praise thereof; yet when she was dead, he performed her funerals with so sumptuous and princelike obsequies, he mourned and bewailed her death so piteously, that as his kindeuee in that behalfe made the world mistrust and suspect his chastity, so his bountifull courtesie incurred the obloquy and imputation of injustice. And verily, Darius was at the first mooved to conceive jealousy and a sinister opinion of him that way, considering he had the woman in his hands, and was besides, a gallant and yong prince: for he also was one of them, who were perswaded that Alexander held the tenure of his mighty dominion and monarchy, by the goodnesse and favour of Fortune; but after he knewe the truth once, upon diligent search and inquisition by all circumstances into the thing: VVell (quoth he) the Persians itate I perceive is not utterly overthrowen, neither will any man repute us plaine cowards and effeminate persons, for being vanquished by such an enemy: for mine owne part, my first wish and principall priar unto the gods is, that they would vouchsafe me fortunate successe, and at the last, an happy victory of this warre, to the end that I may surmount Alexander in beneficence; for an earnest desire I have and an emulation, to shew my selfe more milde and gracious toward him, than he is to me ward: but if all be gone with me and my house, then, O Jupiter, the protectour of the Persians, and ye other tutelare gods and patrons of kings and kingdomes, suffer not any other but him, to be enthroned in the roiall seat of Cyrus. Certes, this was a very adoption of Alexander, that passed in the presence and by the testimony of the gods. See what victories are achieved by vertue.

Ascribe now (if you will) unto Fortune, the journey of Arbela, the battell fought in Cilicia, and all other such like exploits performed by force of armes: let it be, that the fortune it was of warre which shooke the city of Tyrrus, and made it quake before him, and opened Aegypt unto him; grant, that by the helpe of Fortune Halicarnassus fell to the ground, and Miletus was forced and won; that Mazæus abandoned the river Euphrates, and left it disurnished of garisons; and that all the plaines about Babylon were oversifted with dead bodies: yet it was not Fortune that made him temperant, neither was he continent by the meanes of Fortune; Fortune it was not, that kept and preserved his soule as within a fortresse inexpugnable, so as neither pleasures could it surprize and captivate, nor lusts and fleshly desires wound or touch. And these were the very meanes whereby he vanquished and put to flight the person of Darius himselfe. All the rest were, the discomfiture of his great barbe-horses, the overthrow and losse of his armour, skirmishes, battells, murders, executions, massacres and flights of his men. But the great foile and defeatire indeed, most confessed, and against which least exception can be taken, was that wherein Darius himselfe was overthrowen; namely, when as he yielded unto the vertue of Alexander to his magnanimity, fortitude and justice, admiring that heart of his, invincible of pleasure, unconquered by travels, and in gratuities and liberality immatchable. For in shields and speeres, in pikes and targuets, in shouts and alarms, in giving the charge and in buckling together with the clattering of armour, right hardie and undaunted, as well as he, were Tarrius the sonne of Dionomenes, Antigones of Pellen, and Philotas the sonne of Parmenio: but against tickling pleasures, against the attractive allurements of women, against flattering silver and golde, they were no betters, nor had more rule of themselves than slaves and captives. For Tarrius at what time as Alexander undertooke to pay all the debts of the Macedonians, and to make satisfaction unto all those who had lent them any money, falsely belied himselfe, saying, he was indebted, and withall suborned and brought forth a certaine usurer, to the verie table where this discharge was made, who tooke it upon him, that he was a creditor of his. And afterwards when Tarrius was detected and convicted hereof, he had made himselfe away for very shame and compunction of heart, but that Alexander being advertised thereof, pardoned his fault, yea and permitted him also to keepe the silver still, that he had disbursed for his counterfeiter debt; calling to minde, how at what time as his father Philip laid siege to the cite Perinthus, the said Tarrius in a skirmish was shot into the eie, and would not suffer the same to be dressed, nor the thrust to be plucked plucked forth, before the enemies were put to flight. Antigenes causing himselfe to be enrolled, and his name registred among others who were sent backe againe from the campe into Acadonia, by occasion of sicknesse or maime, whereby they were not serviceable: being found afterwards to aile nothing, but to counterfet sicknesse, who otherwife was a good souldior, and carried the marks of many a scarre in his body to be seene, offended Alexander heereby; and when the king demanded the reason, why he had so done; he confessed by and by, that he was in love with a yong woman named Teleppa, whom he purposed to follow and accompanie, being minded to goe to the sea-coast, for that he could not find in his heart to be far from her. Then Alexander asked him, to whom the wench appertained, & who was to be dealt with, for to make her free: Antigenes answered, she was her owne woman, & of free condition: Why then (quoth Alexander) let us perswade her to tary stil by faire promises & good gifts; for in no wise force her we may. So easie was he to pardon and beare with love, in any other rather than in himselfe. The first cause of the infortunate fall of Philotas the sonne of Parmenio, was in some sort his owne intemperance: for there was a yong woman borne in the citie of Pella, named Antigona, who in the faggage of the citie of Damascus, was taken prisoner among other captives, and indeed had bene thither brought before by Antiochus, who surprisid her at sea, as she failed from the coast of Asserdomes, toward the Isle Samotrace: faire she was, & well favored to see to; and so far had she entangled Philotas with her love, after he came once to be acquainted with her, that being a man otherwife as hard as iron, and Steele to the very backe, she had so mollified and made him pliable, that in the mids of his pleasures, poore man he, he was not master of himselfe and his owne heart, but lying open unto the woman, revealed many secrets unto her, and let fall foolish words in her hearing: For what had that Philip beene (would he sometimes say) but for Parmenio; and what were this Alexander heere, without Philotas? what would become of his high addition, Jupiter Ammonius, where were those dragons of his, if we were not well pleased with him? Antigona told these speeches unto another woman one of her familiar friends; and she reported them againe to Craterus: Craterus brought Antigona herselfe secretly unto Alexander: and verily Alexander touched not her body, but abstained from her: howbeit, by her meanes, founding Philotas, & comming within him, he discovered fully what he was: yet in seven yeeres space and more, he never either at any feast where he dranke wine liberally, & was thought otherwhiles to be drunke, made he shew of this suspition conceived of him, or in his anger, being of nature hottie and cholericke; or to his friend Hephestion, unto whom he was wont to disclose all, and make partaker otherwife of his secrets: for one day by report, having opened a letter of secrets, sent from his owne mother, as he read it to himselfe, Hephestion held his head close to, and read it gently together with him; neither had he the heart to forbid him: onely after he had suffred him to read it through, he tooke the signet from his owne finger, set it to his mouth, as it were to seale up his lips, that he should say nothing. But if a man should goe about to rehearse at large all the notable examples, whereby it might be proved that this prince used the greatnesse of his power exceeding well, and as most woorthily became a kings; his strength and voice would faile him: for say, that by the goodnesse and favour of Fortune he became great: yet greater he is, in that he used his fortune aright, and wisely as he should: 40 and the more that a man extolleth his good fortune, the more doeth he amplify that vertue of his, for which he was woorthy of such fortune.

But now it is high time that I should proceed to the beginning of his growth, and the first entry of his mightie power: wherein I consider and looke every way about me, what act of fortune is therein, whereby men should suppose and mainteine, that Alexander arose to such greatesse? How now? Tell me I beseech you for the love of God, placed he him in the regal throne of Cyprus, without drawing a sword, without striking one stroke, without bloodshed, without wounds, without a field fought, or expedition of armes made? by the neighing (forth) of an horse, as sometime she did by that first Darius, the sonne of Histaspes? or was it some kinde husband wonne by the flattering perswasion of his wife, that crowned him king; 50 like as the same Darius made Xerxes king, induced by his wife Atossa; or haply the roiall diademe came of it selfe to his very gates, as it came unto Parysatis, by the meanes of Bagoas the eunuch; who did no more for it, but change and put off his lackies mandilion, put himselfe presently into the roiall robe, and set upon his head the pointed turbant, named Cydrus: or all on a sudden, beyond all expectation, by the fortunate fall of a lot, and the meere benefit of fortune, he became the monarch of the whole earth; like as at Athenes their officers Themothetes, and and Archontes are created by lotterie. But would you know how men come to be kings by the meanes of Fortune? This one example will tell you. The race of the Heraclides, descending lineally from Heraclides, out of which they were wont at Argos from time to time to elect their kings, chaunced to faile, and be utterly extinct: whereupon, when they had sent out to the oracle of Apollo, for to demand and enquire what to do in this case; this answer was made, That an eagle should direct them what was to be done. Some few daies after, an eagle was seene soaring aloft in the aire, and at length to settle upon the house of one named Aegon: and thus was Aegon declared for their king. Will you have another? He who reigned for the time in the citie 10 of Paphos, was found to be wicked, unjust, violent, and a great oppressour of his people: whereupon Alexander deposed him from his regall state and dignitie; and when he had so done, sought for another to rule in his stead, out of the house & familie of the Cinyradae, which was thought in manner to be worne out, and utterly extinct: howbeit, advertised hee was; that there remained of that race no more but one obscure and poore man, of whom there was no reckoning in the world nide; and he dwelt in a certaine garden unregarded, where he lived in verie meane estate. Presently he sent forth to seeke for this man: they who were put in commission heere- 20 about, found him there indeed, watering certaine beds of leeks, and such like worts and pot-herbs: The man was woonderfully troubled and affrighted to see these souldiers come toward him; and especially when they saide that he must come and speake with Alexander the king: thus he was brought unto him, in a simple thin linnen wastcoat, and presently proclaimed king of Paphos, received the purple roiall robe, and was reckoned in the number of those who are called the kings Minions: and his name was Alynomus. Lo how Fortune makes men kings, onely by altering their robes, by potmutation of their names, and changing their copies a little, all on a sudden, quickly in a trice, with great facilitie, beyond all hope, and without any expectation at all. Come now unto Alexander, what great matter did he ever attaine unto without his desert? what hapned unto him without the sweat of his browes, nay without the effusion of his blood? what had he gratia, that he paid not for? what got he, that did not cost him paines and travell? Drunke he hath of rivers steined and coloured with blood; passed he hath over them upon bridges made of dead bodies; for very hunger he hath bene glad to eat of grasse and greene herbes, the first hee could finde growing; he hath with much digging and 30 searching, discovered nations buried under deepe snow, and cities lying in caves within the ground: failed he hath upon seas, warring and fighting against him: and traveling over the dry lands of the Gedrosians and Arachosians, he saw trees and plants growing within the sea, before any upon the land. Now if a man might be allowed to addresse his speech unto Fortune, as unto some person in the defence of Alexander, might not one say unto her? When and where was it, that thou ever madest way for the affaires of Alexander? what fortresse wanne he through thy favour, without the losse of blood? what citie or towne didst thou cause to be yeelded unto him without a garrison? or what army, without their weapons? where found he ever through thy grace any kings sluggish and slothfull; any captaine carelesse and negligent; any 40 warder or porter of the gates drowsie and sleepey? nay, he never met with river that had farre passable, Winter that was tolerable, or Summer that was not painfull and inkesome. Goethy waies, goe, to Antiochus the sonne of Seleucus; to Artaxerxes the brother of Cyrus; to Plotomachus Philadelphus. These were they, whom their fathers in their life time declared heires apparent, yea, and crowned them kings: these wonne fields and battels, for which never eie shed teare: these kept holiday continually: these celebrated festivall solemnities daily in theaters, with all manner of pompes and goodly fights: every one of these reigned in all prosperitie, untill they were very aged: whereas Alexander (if there were nothing else) lo how his body is wounded and pitcoully mangled, from the crowne of his head, to the sole of his foot, gashed heere, thrust in there, drie beaten, brused and broken with all manner of hostile weapons,

With lance and speare, with sword most keene,

With stones that bigge an adamastie beene.

50 At the river Granicus, his armor or morion was cleft with a curtelace, as farre as to the haire of his head: before the towne of Gaza he was shot into the shoulder with a dart: in the Maragandians countrey his shin was wounded with a javelin, in so much as the greater bone thereof was so broken and shattered, that it came out at the wound: in Hircania he gat a knocke with a great stone behinde in his necke, which thooke his head so, as that his eie-sight was dimmed thereby, so as for certaine daies, he was afraid that he should have bene starke blinde for ever: in a skirmish

with the Afficans, his ancle was wounded with an Indian dart: at what time when he saw it to bleed, he turned unto his flatterers and parasites, and shewing them the place, smiled and said: This is very bloud indeed,

*And not thus humour, say all what you will,
Which from the gods most blessed doth desill.*

At the battell of Issus his thigh was pierced with a sword, even by king Darius himselfe, as Chares writeth, who came to close with him at hand fight. And Alexander himselfe writing simply and the plaine truth to Antipater, I my selfe also caught a stab with a short sword in my thigh, but thanked be God (quoth he) I had no great hurt thereby: either at the present or afterwards, Fighting against the Mallians he was wounded with a dart two cubits long, that being driven through his cuirace entred in at his brest and came out againe at his necke, according as Aristobulus hath left in writing. Having passed over the river Tanis for to march against the Scythians, when he had defeated them in battell, he followed the chase and pursued them on horsebacke for a hundred and fifty stadia, notwithstanding all the while he was troubled with a sore laske or flux of the belly. Now truly fortune, much beholden is Alexander unto thee for advancing his estate: Is this thy making of him great, by suffering him thus to be pierced through on every side? Here is a faire upholding of him indeed to lay open thus all the parts of his bodie: cleane contrary to that which Minerva did unto Menelaus, who with her hand turned aside all the shot of the enemies, and made them light upon his armour where it was most sure and of the best proofe, to wit, upon his cuirace, his bawdricke or belt, or upon his helmet; and by that meanes brake the force of the stroke before it could come to the bare bodie, so as all the harme it could do, was but a little to rafe the skin and let out some final shew and a few drops of blood: but thou contrariwise, hast exposed his naked and unarmed parts and those most dangerous to be wounded, causing the shot to enter so farre as to goe through the very bone, environing and hemming in his body round, besetting his eies and feet, impeaching him for chasing his enemies, diverting the traine of his victories, and overturning all his hopes. Certes I am of this opinion, that there never was king who had fortune more adverse & a shrewder stepdame than he; although he hath bene curst, envious and spitefull enough to many besides: for whereas the hath fallen upon others violently like a thunderbolt or shot of lightning, whom she hath cut off and distroied right out at once; her malice and hatred unto Alexander hath bene cankred obdurate and implacable even as it was before him unto Hercules. For what Typhons or monstrous Giants of prodigious stature hath he not raised up as concurrents to fight with him? What enemies hath not she fortified and furnished against him with infinit store of armes, with deepe rivers, with preupt and craggy rocks, or with extraordinary strength of most savage beasts? Now if the courage of Alexander had not bene undaunted, and the same arising from exceeding great vertue, firmly grounded and settled thereupon to encounter fortune, how could it otherwise have bene, but the same should have failed and given over, as being wearied and toiled out with setting for many battels in array, arming his soldiers so daily, laying seige for many times unto cities and townes, chasing and pursuing his enemies so often, checked with so many revolts and rebellions, crossed so commonly with infinit treasons, conspiracies and insurrections of nations; troubled with such a sort of stiffe necked kings who shooke off the yoke of allegiance? and in one word, whiles he conquered Bactra, Macedonia and the Sogdians, among faithlesse and trecherous nations who waited alwaies to spie some opportunity and occasion to do him a displeasure, & who like to the serpent Hydra, as fast as one head was cut off, put forth another, and so continually raised fresh and new warres? I shall seeme to tell you one thing very strange and incredible, howbeit most true: Fortune it was and nothing but fortune by whose maligne and crosse aspect, he went very neere of losing that opinion that went of him, namely, that he was the sonne of Jupiter Ammon. For what man was there ever extract and descended from the seed of the gods, who exploited more laborious, more difficult and dangerous combates? unlesse it were Hercules againe the sonne of Jupiter? And yet one outrageous and violent man there was who set him a worke, enjoining him to take fell lions, to hunt wilde bores, to chase away ravenous fowles, to the end that he should have no time to be employed in greater affaires whiles he visited the world, namely, in punishing such as Anteus, and in repressing the ordinary murders which that tyrant Bastis and such like committed upon the persons of guests and travellers. But it was no other thing than vertue alone that commanded Alexander to enterprize and exploit such a peece of worke as becomed so great a king and one derived from from a divine race: the end whereof was not a masse of gold to be caried along after him upon ten thousand camels backs, nor the superfluous delights of Media, nor sumptuous and delicate tables, nor faire and beautifull ladies, nor the good and pleasant wines of Calydonia, nor the dainty fish of Hyrcania out of the Caspian sea: but to reduce the whole world to be governed in one and the same order, to be obedient to one empire, and to be ruled by the same maner of life. And verily this desire was inbred in him, this was nourished and grew up with him from his very infancie. There came embassadors upon a time from the king of Persia to his father Philip, who at the same time was not in the country but gone forth: Alexander gave them honorable intertainment very courteously as became his fathers sonne: but this especially was observed in him, that he did not aske them childish questions as other boies did, to wit, about golden vines trailed from one tree to another, nor of the pendant gardens at Babylon hanging above in the aire, ne yet what robes and sumptuous habiliments their king did weare? but all his talke and conference with them was concerning matters most important for the state of an empire: inquisitive he was, what forces and power of men the king of Persia could bring out into the field and maintaine; in what ward of the battell the king himselfe was arranged when he fought a field: much like unto that Ulysses in Homer, who demanded of Dolon (as touching Hector)

His martiall armes, where doth he lay?

His horses, tell me, where stand they?

Which be the readiest and shortest waies for those who would travel from the coasts of the Mediterranean sea up into the high countries: in so much as these strangers, the embassadors wondered exceedingly and said: Now surely this child is the * great king, and ours the rich. No sooner was his father Philip departed this life, but presently his heart served him to passe over the Straights of Helle spout, and being already fed with his hopes, and forward in the preparation and provision of his voiage, he made what speed he could to set foot in Asia. But see hee how fortune crossed his designs: she averted him quite and drew him backe againe, raising a thousand troubles and busie occasions to stay & hinder his intended course. First she caused those barbarous nations bordering and adjoining upon him, to rise up in armes, and thereby held him occupied in the warres against the Illyrians and Triballians: by the meanes whereof he was haled away as farre as to Scythia and the nations inhabiting along the river Danubie, who diverted him cleane from his affaires intended in the high provinces of Asia. Howbeit having overrunne these countries and dispatched all difficulties with great perils and most dangerous battels, he set in hand againe with his former enterprize, and made haste to his passage & voiage a second time. But lo, even there also fortune excited the city of Thebes against him, and laid the warre of the Greeks in his way to stop his expedition, driving him to extreame streights and to a very hard exigent, by fire and sword to be revenged of a people that were his owne countrymen, and of the same kined and nation, the issue whereof was most grievous and lamentable. Having exploited this, he crossed the seas at the last, furnished with provision of money and victuals as Phylarchus writeth: to serve for thirty daies and no longer, or as Aristobulus reporteth having onely seventy talents of silver to defray the whole charges of the voiage. For of his owne demaine and possessions at home, as also of the crowne revenues, he had bestowed the most part upon his friends and followers: onely Perdiccas would receive nothing at his hands, but when he made offer to give him his part with the rest, demanded thus of him: But what reserve dost thou reserve, Alexander? VVho answered, My hopes. Why then (quoth he) I will take part thereof: for it is not reason that we should receive your goods, but wait for the pillage of Darius. And what were those hopes of Alexander, upon which he passed over into Asia? Surely not a power measured by the strong wals of many rich & populous cities, not fleets of ships sailing through the mountaines, not whips and fetters, testifying the folly and madnesse of barbarous princes; who thought thereby to punish and chastise the raging sea. But for external meanes without himselfe, a resolution of prowesse in a small power of armed men well trusted and compact together, an emulation to excell one another among young men of the same age, a competition and strife for vertue and glory in those that were his minions about him: But the great hopes indeed and most assured were in his owne person, to wit, his devout religion to Godward, his trusty confidence and affiance that he had in his friends, frugality, continence, bounty, contempt of death, magnanimity and resolution, humanity, courtly, affable intertainment, a simple nature; plaine without plaits, not fained and counterfeit, constancie in his counsell, celerity in his execution, soveraignty and priority in honor, and a resolute purpose to accomplish any any honest duty and office. For Homer did not well and decently, to compose and frame the beautifull personage of Agamemnon, as the patternne of a per fect prince out of three images, after this maner,

* For the king of Persia was called the great king.

*For eyes and head, much like he was in fight
To Jove, who takes in lightning such delight:
God Mars in waist and loines resembled he:
In brest compar'd to Neptune he may be.*

But the nature of Alexander (in case that God who made or created him, formed and con-pounded it of many vertues) may we not well and truly say, that he ended with the courageous spirit of Cyrus, the sober temperance of Ageſtlaus, the quick wit and pregnant conceit of The-mistocles, the approved skill and experience of Philip, the valourous boldnesse of Braſidas, the rare eloquence and ſufficiencie of Pericles in State matters and politicke government? For to ſpeake of thoſe in ancient times, more continent he was and chaſt, than Agamemnon, who preferred a captive concubine before his owne elcouſed and lawfull wife: as for Alexander, he ab-ſteined from thoſe women whom he tooke priſoners in warre, and would not touch one of them before he had wedded her: more magnanimous than Achilles, who for a little money yielded the dead corps of Hector to be ranſomed; whereas Alexander deſtroyed great ſummes in the funerals and interring of Darius bodie. Again, Achilles ſtooke of his friends, for the appealing of his choler, gifts and preſents after a mercenary maner: but Alexander enriched his very enemies, when he had gotten the victorie. More religious he was than Dionysius, a man who was evermore ready to fight againſt the gods: whereas he, thought that all victory & happy ſucceſſe came by the grace and favour of the gods. Deerer he was to his neere kinſfolke and friends, and more entirely beloved than Ulyſſes, whoſe mother died for ſorrow and griefe of heart: whereas when Alexander died, his very enemies mother, for kinde affection and good will died with him for company. In ſumme, if it was by the indulgence of Fortune, that Solon eſtabliſhed the common-wealth of Athens ſo well at home, that Miltiades conducted the armies ſo happily abroad;
if it was by the benefit and favour of fortune, that Arifides was ſo juſt: then farewell vertue for ever; then is there no worke at all effected by her; but only it is a vaine name and ſpeech that goeth other, paſſing with ſome ſhew of glorie and reputation thorow the life of man; ſeined and deviſed by theſe prating Sophiſters, cunning Law-givers and Statiſts. Now if every one of theſe perſons, and ſuch like, was poore or rich, feeble or ſtrong, ſoule or faire, of long life or ſhort, by the meanes of fortune; againe, in caſe of them ſhewed himſelfe a great captaine in the field, a great politician or wiſe law-giver, a great governour and ruler in the city and common-wealth, by their vertue and the direction of reaſon within them; then conſider (I pray you) what Alexander was in compariſon of them all: Solon intituled at Athens, a general cutting off and cancelling of all debts, which he called Severities, which is as much to ſay, as a diſ-charge of burdens; but Alexander out of his owne purſe paid all debts in the name of debtors, due unto their creditors. Pericles having impoſed a tax and tribute upon the Greeks; with the money raiſed by that levie, beautified the citadell or caſtle of Athens with temples and chapels; whereas Alexander ſent of the pillage and treaſure which he gat from the Barbarians, to the number of tenne thouſand talents into Greece, with commandement to build therewith ſacred temples to the honour of the gods. Braſidas was a great name and reputation of valour among the Greeks, for that he paſſed from one end to another thorow his enemies campe, pitched along the ſea ſide before the towne Marthon: but that wonderfull leape that Alexander made into a towne of the Oxydrakes, which to them that heare it, is incredible, and to as many as ſaw it, was moſt fearefull; namely, at what time as he caſt himſelfe from the bailements of the walles among his enemies, ready to receive him with pikes, with javelins, with darts and naked ſwords; whereto may a man compare, but unto a very flaſh of lightning breaking violently out of a cloud, and being carried with the winde lighteth upon the ground, reſembling a ſpirit or apparition reſplendent all about with flaming and burning armours? in ſomuch as: at the firſt fight, men that ſaw it were ſo affrighted, as they ran backward and fled: but after that they beheld it was but one man ſetting upon many, then they came againe, and made head againſt him.
Heere Fortune ſhewed (no doubt) many plaine and evident proofs of her ſpeciall good will to Alexander; namely, firſt when he put him into an ignoble, baſe and barbarous towne, and there incloſed him ſure enough within the walles thereof; then, after that thoſe without made haſte to reſcue him, and reared their ſcaling ladders againſt the walles for to get over and come unto him.

him, the caused them all to breake & fall in pieces, whereby the overthrow and cast them downe who were climbed halfe way up: againe, of those three onely whose hap it was to mount up to the top before the ladders brake, and who flang themselves desperately downe, and stood about the king, to guard his person, the fell upon one immediately and killed him in the place, before he could do his master any service: a second, overwhelmed with a cloud of arrowes and darts, was so neere death, that he could do no more, but onely see and feeble. All this while, the Macedonians without, ranne to the walles with a great noise and outcry, but all in vaine, for arillerie they had none, nor any ordinance or engins of battery; onely they laied at the walles with their naked swordes and bare hands: and so earnest they were to get in, that they would have made 10 way with their very teeth, if it had beene possible. Meane while, this fortunate prince, upon whom Fortune attended at an inch, ready now to accompany and defend him, you may be sure, as at all times els, was taken and caught as a wilde beast within toiles, abandoned and left alone, without aide and succour, not wis to win the city of Susa or of Babylon, nor to conquer the province of Bactra, nor to seize upon that mighty body of king Porus: for of great and renowned attempts, although the end alwaies prove not happy, yet there can redound no infamy. But to say a truth, Fortune was on his behalfe so spitefull and envious, but on the other side, so good and gracious to the Barbarians, so adverse I say she was to Alexander, that the went about as much as lay in her, to make him not onely lose his life and body, but also to forfeit his honour and glory: for if he had bene left lying dead along the river Euphrates, or Hyaspes, it had bene
20 no great desaire and indignitie: neither had it bene so dishonorable unto him, when he came to joine with Darius hand to hand, if he had bene massacred among a number of great horses, with the swordes, glawes, & battle-axes of the Persians fighting for the empire: no, nor when he was mounted upon the wals of Babylon, if he had taken the soile and bene put by his great hope of forcing the city: for in that sort, lost Pelopidas and Eparminondas their lives; and their death was rather an act of vertue, than an accident of infortunie, whiles they gave the attempt to execute so great exploits, and to gaine so worthy a prise. But as touching fortune, which now we examine and consider; what piece of worke effected she? In a Barbarous countrey farre removed, on the further side of a river, within the walles of a base village in comparison, to shut up and enclose the king and soveraigne lord of the earth, that he might perish there shamefully, by 30 the hands & rude weapons of a multitude of Barbarous rascals, who should knocke him downe with clubs and staves, and pelt him with whatsoever came next hand; for wounded he was in the head with a bill that clove his helmet quite thorow, and with a mighty arrow which one discharged out of a bow, his brest-place was pierced quite thorow, whereof the steile that was without his bodie weighed him downe heavily: but the yron head which flucke fast in the bones about one of his paps, was foure fingers broad and five long. And to make up the full measure of all mischiefe, whiles he defended himselfe right manfully before, and when the fellow who had throt the foresaid arrow adventured to approach him with his sword, to dispatch him outright with a dead thrust, him he got within, and with his dagger gave him such a stabbe, as he laied him along and killed him out of hand: but see the malice of Fortune, there runnes me forth out of a 40 milhouse or backhouse thereby, another villaine with a pistle, and coming behinde him, gave him such a soule upon the very necke bone, that he was astonished therewith, and there lay along in a swoone, having lost his sight and other senses for a time. But vertue it was that assisted him, which gave both unto himselfe a good heart, and also unto his friends strength, resolution and diligence to succour him: for Linnæus, Ptolemæus, and Leonnatus, with as many besides, as either had clambred over the walles or broken thorow, came in and put themselves betwene him and his enemies: they with their valour were to him in stead of a wall and rampier; they for mere affection and love unto their king, exposed their bodies, their forces and their lives betwene him, unto all dangers whatsoever. For it is not by fortune, that there be men who voluntarily present themselves to present death; but it is for the love of vertue; like as bees having 50 dunke (as it were) the amatorious potion of naturall love and affection, are alwaies about their king, and flie close unto him. Now say there had bene one there without the danger of shot, to have seened this sight at his pleasure, would not he have said, that he had beheld a notable combat of fortune against vertue? wherein the Barbarians by the helpe of fortune prevailed above her desert; and the Greeks by means of vertue resisted above their power: and if the former get the better hand, it would be thought the worke of fortune and of some malicious and envious spirit; but if these become superior, vertue, fortune, faith and friendship should cary away the honour

*The selfe same parents they both had, one native soile them bred,
But Jupiter the elder was,
and had the wiser head.*

whereby he affirmeth, that the preeminence and rule of Jupiter, being the elder, was more venerable, sacred and fuller of majestie, for his knowledge and wisdom. And of this opinion I assure you am I, that the beatitude and felicitie of eternall life, which Jupiter enioieth, consisteth herein, that he is ignorant of nothing that is done: as also, that immortalitie if it be depouled of the knowledge and intelligence of all things that be, and are done, is not life indeed, but bare time. And therefore we may very well say, that the desire of deitie and divinity is all one with the love of truth, and especially of that truth which concerneth the nature of the gods; the study wherof, and the searching after such science, is as it were a profession and entrance into religion, yea, and a worke more holy than is the vow or obligation of all the chastity & purity in the world, or than the cloister or sanctuarie of any temple whatsoever: right acceptable. So is this *goddesse whom you serve, considering that she is most wise, & full of knowledge, according as the very derivation of her name doth imply, that skill & cunning apperteineth unto her more than to any other: for Isis is a meere Greeke word; like as Typhon also the very adversary and enemy opposite unto this goddesse, as one puffed up and swollen by his ignorance and error, dissipating, defacing, and blotting out the sacred word and doctrine, which this goddesse collecteth, composeth, and delivereth unto those who are initiated and professed in this divine religion, by a continuall precise observance of a sober and holy life, in abstaining from many meats, in depriving themselves of all fleshly pleasures, for to repress lust and intemperance; and in being acquainted long before to abide and endure within temples and churches, hard and painfull services performed unto the gods: of all which abstinences, paines, and sufferances, the end is the knowledge of that first prince and lord, who is apprehended onely by intelligence and understanding, whom the goddesse exhorteth to search and seeke after, as conversing and companying with her. And verily, the name of her temple, doth manifestly promise an intelligence or knowledge of that which is, for Ison it is called, which is as much to say, as * εἰσόν to be in, for that, if we enter into that sacred place and holy religion of this goddesse, with reason and devotion, as we ought to doe, we shall attaine to the understanding of all things whatsoever. Moreover, many have written, that she is the daughter of Mercurius, others of Prometheus, of which twaine, the one is reputed the author of wisdom and providence, and the other, namely Mercurius, the inventor of Grammar and Musick. And hereupon it is, that in the city Hermopolis, they call the former of the Muses, both Isis and also Justice; as being wisdom herselfe, (according as hath elsewhere beene said) and shewing divine things to them who are justly surnamed Hierophori, and Hierosoli, that is to say, religious, and wearing the habits of holinesse and religion. And these be they that cary in their minde, and keepe enclosed as within a box or casket, the holy doctrine of the gods, pure and clesned from all superstition and affected curiositie: who also of that opinion which is held of the gods, declare some things which are obscure & darke, others also which be cleere and lightsome; like as be those, which are reported as touching their holy and religious habit. And therefore whereas the religious priests of Isis, after they be dead, are thus clad with these holy habiliments; it is a marke and signe witnessing unto us, that this sacred doctrine is with them, and that they be departed out of this world into another, and carie nothing with them but it: for neither to wear a long beard, nor to put on a frize rugg and course gabardine (dame Clea) makes a Philosopher; no more doth the surplice and linnen vestment or shaven, an Isiaque priest. But he indeed is a priest of Isis, who after he hath scene and received by law and custome, those things which are shewed and practised in the religious ceremonies about these gods, searcheth and diligently enquireth, by the means of this holy doctrine, and discourse of reason, into the truth of the said ceremonies. For very few there be who among them, who understand and know the cause of this ceremony, which is of all other the smallest, and yet most commonly observed; namely, why the Isiaque priests have their heads, and wear no haire upon them; as also, wherefore they goe in vestments of Line? And some of them there be, who care not at all for any knowledge of such matters: yet others say, they forbore to put on any garments of wooll, like as they doe to eat the flesh of those sheepe which carie the said wooll, upon a reverence they beare unto them: semblably, that they cause their heads to be shaven in token of dole and sorrow: likewife that they weare surplices and vestments of linnen, in regard of the colour that the flower of line or flaxe beareth, which resembleth properly that celestiall azure skie, that environeth the whole world. But to say a trueth, there is but one cause indeed of all: for lawfull it is, not for a man who is pure and cleane, to touch any thing (as Plato saith) which is impure and un-cleane. Now it is well knownen, that all the superfluities and excrements of our food and nourishment, be foule and impure, and of such be engendered and grow, wooll, haire, shagge and nailes: and therefore a meere ridiculous mockerie it were, if when in their expiatorie sanctifications and divine services, they cast off their haire, being shaven and made smooth all their bodies over, they should then be clad and arrayed with the superfluous excrements of beasts: for 10 we must thinke that Hesiodus the Poet when he writeth thus,

*At feasts of gods and sacred merriment,
Take heed with knife, thy nailes thou do not pare,
To cut I say, that dry dead excrement,
From lively flesh of fingers five, beware.*

teacheth us, that we ought first to be clesned and purified, then to solemnise festivall holidays, and not at the very time of celebration and performance of holie rites and divine service, to use such clesning and ridding away of superfluous excrements. Now the herbe Line groweth out of the earth which is immortal, bringeth forth a frute good to be eaten, and furnisheth us wherewith to make a simple, plaine, and slender vestment, which sitteth light upon his backe 20 that weareth it, is meet for all seasons of the yeece; and of all others, (as men say) least breedeth lice or vermine; whereof I am to discourse else where. Now these Isiaque priests so much abhorre the nature and generation of all superfluities and excrements, that they not onely refuse to eate most part of pulse, and of flesh meats, mutton and porke, for that sheepe and swine breed much excrement, but also upon their daies of sanctification and expiatorie solemnities, they will not allow any salt to be eaten with their viands; among many other reasons, because it whereth the appetite, and giveth an edge to our stomacke, provoking us to eate and drinke more liberally: for to say as Aristagoras did, That salt was by them reputed uncleane, because when it is congealed and grown hard, many little animals or living creatures, which were caught within it, die withall, is a very foolerie. Furthermore, it is said, that the Aegyptian 30 priests have a certeine pit or well apart, out of which they water their bull or beefe Apis: and be very precise in any wise not to let him drinke of Nilus, not for that they thinke the water of that river uncleane, in regard of the crocodiles which are in it, as some be of opinion (for contrariwise, there is nothing so much honored among the Aegyptians as the river Nilus) but it seemeth that the water of Nilus doth fatten exceeding much, and breed flesh over fast, and they would not in any case that their Apis should be fat, or themselves grosse and corpulent: but that their foules might be clothed with light, nimble, and delicate bodies; so as the divine part in them should not be oppressed or weighed downe, by the force and ponderositie of that which is mortall. In Heliopolis, which is the citie of the Sunne, those who serve and minister unto their god, never bring wine into the temple, as thinking it not convenient in the day time to drinke 40 in the sight of their lord and king: otherwise the priests drinke thereof, but sparily: and besides many purgations and expiations they have, wherein they abstaine wholly from wine; and during those daies, they give themselves wholly to their studies and meditations, learning and tearing holy things: even their very kings are not allowed to drinke wine their fill, but are stinted to the gage of a certeine measure, according as it is prescribed in their holy writings, and those kings also were priests, as Hecataeus writeth. And they began to drinke it after the daies of king Pjammetichus; for before his time they dranke it not at all, neither made they libaments thereof 50 of unto their gods, supposing it not acceptable unto them; for they tooke it to be the verie bloud of those giants which in times past warred against the gods; of whom after they were slaine, when their bloud was mixed with the earth, the vine tree sprang: and this is the cause, say they, why those who be drunke, lose the use of their wit & reason, as being full of the bloud of their progenitors. Now that the Aegyptian priests both hold and affirme thus much, Endoxus hath delivered in the second booke of his Geographic. As concerning fishes of the sea, they doe not every one of them abstaine from all indifferently; but some forbore one kind, & some another: as for example, the Oxyrynches will eate of none that is taken with an hook; for adoring as they doe, a fish named Oxyrynchos, they are in doubt and feare lest the hook should be uncleane, if haply the said fish swallowed it downe with the baite. The Sienites will not touch the fish. Phagus, for it should seeme that it is found, what time as Nilus begins to flow; and therefore the laid fish by his appearing, signifieth the rising and inundation of Nilus, whereof they be exceeding joious, holding him for a certaine and sure benefeger. But the priests abstaine from all fishes ingenerall: and whereas upon the ninth daie of the first moneth, all other inhabitants of Aegypt, feede upon a certaine broiled or roasted fish before their dores; the priests in no wise talke thereof; many they burne fishes before the gates of their houses; and two reasons they have: the one holy, fine and fubtile, which I will deliver hereafter: as that which accordeth and agreeth very well to the sacred discourses: as touching Osiris and Typhon: the other plaine; vulgar and common: represented by the fish, which is none of the viands that be necessary, rare and exquisite, according as Flower beareth witness, when he brings to not in the Phicacians delicate men & loving to feed daintily, nor the Ithacians, Ilanders, to eat fish at their feasts: no nor the mates and fellow travellers with Ulysses, during the time of their long navigation and voyage by sea, before they were brought to extreame necessity. To be briefe, the very fea it selfe they thinke to be produced a part by fire, without the bounds & limits of nature, as being no portion nor element of the world, but a strange excrement, a corrupt superfluity and unkinde maladie: For nothing absurd and against reason, nothing fabulous and superstitious, (as some untruly thinke) was inferred or served as a sacred signe in their ceremonies, but they were all markes grounded upon causes and reasons morall, and the same profitable for this life, or else not without some historical or naturall elegancy. As for example, that which is said of the opinion; for that Diclys the foster father of Isis, fell into the river of Nilus, and was there drowned, as he was reaching at onions and could not come by them, it is a more fable and carieth no sence or probability in the world: but the truth is this, the priests of Isis hate the onion and avoid it as a thing abominable, because they have observed, that it never groweth nor thrive well to any biggesse but in the decrease and waine of the Moone: Neither is it meet and fit for those who would lead an holy and sanctified life, or for such as celebrate sollemne feasts and holidays, because it provoketh thirst in the former; and in the other causeth reares, if they feed thereupon. And for the same reason they take the sow to be a prophane and unclean beast, for that ordinarily she goeth a brimming and admitteth the bore, when the Moone is past the full: and looke how many drinke of her milke, they breake out into a kinde of leprosie or drie scurfe all over their bodies. As touching the tale which they inferre, who once 30 in their lives doe sacrifice a sow when the Moone is in the full, and then eat her flesh: namely that Typhon hunting and chafing the wilde swine at the full of the Moone, chanced to light upon an aike or coffin of wood, wherein was the body of Osiris which he dismembred and threw away by peece meale, all men admit not thereof, supposing that it is a fable as many others be, misheard and misunderstood. But this for certaine is held, that our ancients in old time so much hated and abhorred all excessive delicacy, superfluous and costly delights and voluptuous pleasures, that they laid within the temple of the city of Thebes in Aegypt there stood a square colunne or pillar, wherein were engraven certaine curses and execrations against their king Minis, who was the first that turned and averted the Aegyptians quite from their simple and frugal manner of life, without mony, without sumptuous fare & chargeable delights. It is said also 40 that Techmatis the father of Bocchorus, in an expedition or journey against the Arabians, when it chaunced that his cartages were far behind and came not in due time to the place where he incamped, was content to make his supper of whatsoever he could get, & so to take up with a very small and simple pittance, yea and after supper to lie upon a coustie and homely pallet, where he slept all night very soundly and never awoke: whereupon, he ever after loved sobriety of life & frugality, & cursed the foresaid king Minis: which malediction of his being by the priests of that time approved, he caused to be engraven upon the pillar above said. Now their kings were created either out of the order of their priests, or else out of the degree of knights and warriors; for that the one estate was honored and accounted noble for valour, the other for wisdom and knowledge. And looke whomsoever they chose from out of the order of knighthood, presently 50 after his election he was admitted unto the collidge of priests, and unto him were disclosed and communicated the secrets of their Philosophy, which under the vail of fables and darke speeches conched and covered many mysteries, through which the light of the truth in some sort though dimly appeare. And this themselves seeme to signifie and give us to understand, by setting up ordinarily before the porches and gates of their temples, certaine Sphinges: meaning thereby, that all their Theologie containeth under enigmaticall and covert words, the secrets ving alwaies diligently the accustomed rites ordained for the sacred service of the gods, and beleeving firmly, that you can not performe any sacrifice or liturgy more pleasing unto them, than to study for to have a sound and true opinion of them: by this meanes you shall avoid superstition, which is as great a sinne as impietie and Atheisme. Now the fable of Isis and Osiris, is as briefly as may be, by cutting off many superfluous matters that serve to no purpose, delivered in this wise: It is said, that dame Rhea, at what time as Saturne lay secretly with her, was espoused by the Sunne, who cursed her; and among other maledictions, praied that she might not be delivered, nor bring forth child, neither in any moneth nor yeere: but Mercurie being inamoured of this goddesse, companied likewise with her; and afterwards, as he plaied at dice with the Moone and won from her the seventieth part of every one of her illuminations, which being all put together, make five entire daies, he added the same unto the three hundred and threescore daies of the yeere; and those odde daies the Aegyptians do call at this present, the daies of the Epact, celebrating and solemnizing them as the birthdaies of their gods: for that when the full time of Rhea was expired, upon the first day of them was Osiris borne; at whose birth a voice was heard, That the lord of the whole world now came into light: and some say, that a certaine woman named Pamyle, as she went to fetch water for the temple of Jupiter in the city of Thebes, heard this voice, commanding her to proclaime aloud, That the Great King and Benefactor Osiris was now borne: also, for that Saturne committed this babe Osiris into her hands for to be nourished, therefore in honour of her there was a festivall day solemnized, named thereupon Pamylia, much like unto that which is named Phallopheoria, unto Priapus. On the second day she was delivered of Aroneris, who is Apollo, whom some likewise call the elder Orus. Upon the third day she brought forth Typhon, but he came not at the just time nor at the right place, but brake thorow his mothers side, and issued forth at the wound. On the fourth day was Isis borne, in a watery place called Panhydra. And the fifth day she was delivered of * Nephthe, who of some is named also Telente and Venna; others call her Nice. Now it is said, that the conceived Osiris and Aroneris by the Sunne, Isis by Mercurie, Typhon and Nephthe by Saturne, which is the cause that the kings reputed the third of these intercalary daies to be defausterous and difmall, dispatched no affaires thereupon, neither did they cherish themselves by meat and drinke or otherwise, untill night: that Nephthe was honoured by Typhon; that Isis and Osiris were in love in their mothers bellie before they were borne, and lay together secretly and by stealth; and some give out, that by this meanes Aroneris was begotten and borne, who by the Aegyptians is called Orus the elder, and by the Greeks, Apollo. Well, during the time that Osiris reigned king in Aegypt, immediately he brought the Aegyptians from their needy, poore and savage kinde of life, by teaching them how to sow and plant their grounds, by establishing good lawes among them, and by shewing how they should worship and serve God. Afterwards, he travelled thorowout the world, reducing the whole earth to civility, by force of armes least of all, but winning and gaining the most nations by effectual remonitances & sweet persuasion couched in songs, and with all manner of Musicke: whereupon the Greeks were of opinion, that he and Bacchus were both one. Furthermore, the tale goes, that in the absence of Osiris, Typhon stirred not, nor made any commotion, for that Isis gave good order to the contrary, and was of sufficient power to prevent and withstand all innovations; but when he was returned, Typhon conspired a conspiracy against him, having drawn into his confederacy seventy two accomplices, besides a certaine queene of Aethiopia, who likewise combined with him, and her name was Afo. Now when he had secretly taken the just measure and proportion of Osiris body, he caused a coffer or hutch to be made of the same length, and that most curiously and artificially wrought and set out to the eie, he tooke order, that it should be brought into the hall, where he made a great feast unto the whole company. Every man tooke great pleasure with admiration, to behold such a singular exquisite piece of work; and Typhon in a meriment, stood up and promised that he would bestow it upon him, whose body was meet & fit for it: hereupon, all the company one after another assaied whose body would fit it; but it was not found proportionate nor of a just size to any of all the rest: at length, Osiris gat up into it, and laied him there along; with that, the conspirators ran to it, and let downe the lidde and cover thereof upon him, and partly with nailes, and partly with melted lead which they powred aloft, they made it sure enough; and when they had so done, caried it forth to the river side, and let it downe into the sea, at the verie mouth of Nilus named Taniticus; which is the reason, that the said mouth is even to this day odious and execrable among the Aegyptians, inasmuch as they call it Catapheston, that is to say, say, Abominable, or to be spit at. Over and besides, it is said, that this fell out to be done upon the seventeenth day of the moneth named Athy, during which moneth, the Sunne enueth in to the signe Scorpius; and in the eight and twentieth yeere of Osiris reigne: howbeit, others affirme, that he lived in deed, but reigned not so long. Now the first that had an inckling and intelligence of this hainous act, were the Panes and Satyres inhabiting about Chennis, who began to whisper one unto another, & to talke thereof; which is the reason, that all sudden tumults and troubles of the multitude and common people, be called Panique affrights. Moreover, it followeth on in the tale, that Isis being advertised hereof, immediately cut off one of the tresses of her haire, and put on mourning weeds in that place which now is called the city Coptus, in remembrance thereof; howsoever others say, that this word Coptus, betokeneth Privation, for that Isis in Greeke, signifieth as much as to deprive. In this dolefull habit she wandred up and downe in great perplexity to heare tidings of Osiris, and whomsoever she met withall, she asked not to enquire of them; and she missed not so much as little children playing together, but asked them, whether they had seene any such coffer: at length, the light of those children who had seene it indeed, and they directed her to the mouth of the river Nilus, where the complices and associats of Typhon had let the said vessell into the sea. And ever since that time, the Aegyptians are of opinion, that young children have the gift of revealing secrets, and they take all their words which they passe in play and sport, as omens and presages, but especially within the temples, what matter soever it be that they prattle of. Moreover, when Isis understood that Osiris fell in love with her sister Nephthe, thinking she was Isis and so carnally companied with her, and withall, found a good token thereof, to wit, a chaplet or garland of Mellot which he had left with Nephthe, she went for to seeke her babe (for presently upon the birth of the infant, for feare of Typhon he hid it) and when with much adoe and with great paines taken, Isis had found it, by the meanes of certaine hounds which brought her to the place where he was, she reared and brought it up, in such sort, as when he came to some bignesse, he became her guide and squire, named Anubis, who also is said to keepe the gods, like as dogs guard men. After this, she heard newes of the foresaid coffer, and namely, that the waves of the sea had by rides cast it upon the coast of Byblus, where, by a billow of water it was gently brought close to the foot of a shrubbe or plant called * Erice: now this Erice or Tamarix in a small time grew to faire, and spread forth so large and big branches withall, that it * compassed, enclosed and covered the said coffer all over, so as it could not be seene. The king of Byblus wondring to see this plant so big, caused the branches to be lopped off, that covered the foresaid coffin not seene, and of the trunk or body thereof, made a pillar to sustaine the rooofe of his house: whereof Isis by report being advertised by a certaine divine spirit or winde of flying fame, came to Byblus, where she sat her downe by a certaine fountaine, all heave and in distresse, pitiouly weeping to herselfe; neither spake she a word unto any creature, onely the Queenes waiting maids and women that came by, she saluted and made much of, plaiting and broiding the tresses of their haire most exquisitely, and casting from her into them a marvellous sweet and pleasant sent illuving from her body, whiles she dressed them. The queene perceiving her women thus curiously and trimly set out, had an earnest desire to see this stranger, as well for that she yielded such an odiferous smell from her body, as because she was so skillfull in dressing their heads: so she sent for the woman, and being grown into some familiar acquaintance with her, made her the nurse and governeesse of her young sonne: now the kings name himselfe was Alexander, and the queenes, Astarte, or rather Sais, or as some will have it, Chemanus, which is as much as to say in the Greeke tongue, as Athenas. And the speech goes, that Isis suckled and nourished this infant, by putting her finger in stead of the breast-head or nipple, into the mouth thereof; also, that in the night season she burnt all away that was mortall of his body: and in the end, was herselfe metamorphized and turned into a swallow, flying, and lamenting after a moaning manner about the pillar aforelaid, untill such time as the queene observing this, and crying out when she saw the body of her child on a light fire, bereaved it of immortality. Then Isis being discovered to be a goddesse, craved the pillar of wood: which she cut downe with facility, and tooke from underneath the trunk of the Tamarix or Erice, which she anointed with perfumed oile, and enwrapped within a linnen cloth, and gave it to the kings for to be kept: whereof it cometh, that the Byblians even at this day reverence this piece of wood, which lieth consecrate within the temple of Isis. Furthermore, it is said, that in the end she * light upon the coffer, over which she wept and lamented so much, that the youngest of the kings sonnes died for very pity of her; but but the herselfe accompanied with the eldest of them, together with the coffer, embarked, took sea & departed. But when the river Pachrus turned the wind somewhat roughly, about the dawning of the day, Isis was so much displeased and angry, that she dried it quite. And so foone as she came unto a solitary place, where she was by herselfe alone, she opened the coffer, where finding the corps of Osiris, she laid her face close to his, embraced it and wept. Herewith came the child suddenly behinde and espied what she was doing: whom when she perceived, she looked backe, casting an untoward eie, and beheld him with such an angry aspect, that the poore infant not able to endure so terrible a looke, died upon it. Some say it was not so; but that he fell into the sea, in maner aforesaid, and was honored for the goddesse sake, and that he is the same whom the Aegyptians chaunt at their feasts, under the name of Maneros. But others give out, that this child was named Palestinus, and that the city Pelusium was built in remembrance of him by the goddesse Isis and so tooke the name after him; and how this Maneros whom they to celebrate in their songs, was the first inventour of musicke. Howbeit others there are againe, who affirme, that this was the name of no person, but a kinde of dialect or language, proper and agreeable unto those who drinke and banquet together, as if a man should say, In good houre and happily may this or that come. For the Aegyptians were wont ordinarily to use this terme Maneros in such a sence: like as no doubt the drie skeletons or dead corps of a man which they used to ca-rie about and shew in a bierre or coffin at the table, was not the representation or memoriall of this accident which befell unto Osiris, as some doe imagine, but served as an admonition to put the guests in minde to be merry and take their pleasure and joy in those things that were present; for that soone after they should be like unto it. This I say was the reason that it was brought in at their feasts and mery meetings. Furthermore when Isis was gone to see her sonne Horus who was fostered and brought up in the city Busiris, and had laid the foresaid coffer with Osiris body out of the way, Typhon fortunated as he hunted in a cleere moone-shine night to meet with it, and taking knowledge of the body, cut it into foureteene peeces and flung them here and there one from another: which when Isis understood, she searched for them in a boote or punt made of papyr reed, all over the moores and marshes: whereof it comes that the Crocodiles never hurt those who saile or row in vessels made of that plant, whether it be that they are afraid of it, or reverence it for this goddesse sake I know not. And thus you may know the reason, why there be found many sepulchres of Osiris in the country of Aegypt, for ever as the found any peece of him, she caused a tombe to be made for it: others say no: but that she made many images of him, which she left in every city, as if he had bestowed among them his very body indeed: to the end that in many places he might be honored: and that if happily Typhon when he sought for the true sepulcher of Osiris (having vanquished and overcome Horus) many of them being reported and shewed, he might not know which was it, and so give over seeking farther. Over and besides, the report goes, that Isis found all other parts of Osiris body but onely his privy member, for that it was immediately cast into a river and the fishes named Lepidotus, Phagrus and Oxyrynchus devoured it: for which cause Isis detesteth them above all other fishes:

but in sted of that natural part, she made a counterfet one, called Phallus, which she consecrated:
and in the honor thereof the Aegyptians hold a solemne feast. After all this it followeth in the fable, that Osiris being returned out of the infernall parts, appeared unto Horus, for to exercise, instruct and traine him against the battell: of whom he demanded what he thought to be the most beautiful thing in the world: who answered, To be revenged of the wrong and injury which had bene done to a mans parents. Secondly, what beast he thought most profitable to goe into the field withall: unto whom Horus should make answer, The horse: whereas Osiris marvelled, and asked him why he named the horse and not the lion rather: Because (quoth Ho-rus) the lion serveth him in good sted, who stands upon his owne guard and defense onely and hath need of aid: but the horse is good to defeat the enemy quite, to follow him in chace and take him prisoner. When Osiris heard him say so, he tooke great pleasure and contentment heerein, judging heereby that his sonne was sufficiently appointed and prepared to give battell unto his enemies. And verily it is said that among many that daily revolted from Typhon and sided with Horus, even the very concubine of Typhon named Thueris was one, who came to him:
and when a certaine * serpent followed after and pursued her, the same was cut in peeces by the guard about Horus: in remembrance whereof, at this very day they bring forth a certaine cord, which likewise they chop in peeces. Well, they say the battell continued many daies: but in the end Horus had the victory: As also that Isis having Typhon prisoner fast bound in her hands, killed killed him not: but loosed him and let him goe: which Horus not able to endure with patience, laid violent hands upon his mother, and plucked from her head the roiall ornament that she had thereon: in sted whereof, Mercury set one a morion made in maner of a coves head. Then Typhon called Horus judicially into question, charging him that he was a bastard; but by the helpe of Mercury who pleaded his cause, he was judged by the gods, legitimate: who also in two other battels vanquished Typhon. And more than all this, the tale saith, that Isis after death, was with child by Osiris, by whom she had Heliotimus and Harpoerates who wanted his nether parts.

Thus you see what be in maner all the principall points of this fable, setting aside and excepting those which are most execrable, to wit, the dismembing of Horus and the beheading of Isis.
Now, that, if any there be who hold and affirme such fables as these touching the blessed and immortal nature, whereby especially we conceived in our minde the deity, to be true and that such things were really done or hapned so indeed,

We ought to speake upon their face

And curse such monthes with all disgrace.

as Aeschylus saith, I need not say unto you, for that you hate and detest those enough already of your selfe, who conceive so barbarous and absurd opinions of the gods. And yet you see ve-rie well, that these be not narrations like unto old wives tales, or vaine and foolish fictions, which Poets or other idle writers devise out of their owne fingers ends, after the maner of spiders, which of themselves without any precedent, & subject matter, spin their threds, weave and stretch out their webbes: for evident it is that they conteine some difficulties and the memorials of certaine accidents. And like as the Mathematicians say, that the rainbow is a representation of the Sunne, and the same distinguished by sundry colours, by the refraction of our eie-sight against a cloud: even so this fable, is an apparence of some doctrine or learning, which doeth reflect and send backe our understanding, to the consideration of some other truth; much after the maner of sacrifices, wherein there is mingled a kinde of lamentable dole, and sorrowfull heaviness. Semblably, the making and disposition of temples, which in some places have faire open Isles and pleasant allies open over head: and in other, darke caves vaults, and shrouds under the earth, resembling properly caves, sepulchers, or charnell vaults, wherein they put the bodies of the dead; especially the opinion of the Osirians: for albeit the bodie of Osiris, be said to be in many places, yet they name haply Abydos the towne, or Memphis a little citie, where they affirme that his true body lieth, in such fort, as the greatest and welthiest persons in Aegypt usually doe ordeine and take order, that their bodies be interred in Abydos, to the end they may lie in the same sepulchre with Osiris: and at Memphis was kept the beeste
Apis, which is the image and figure of his soule, and they will have his body also to be there.
Some likewise there be, who interpret the name of this towne, as if it should signifie the haven and harbour of good men: others, that it betokeneth the tombe of Osiris: and there is before the gate of the citie, a little Isle, which to all others is inaccessible, and admitteth no entrance, inasmuch, as neither fowles of the aire will there light, nor fishes of the sea approach thither:
onely at one certaine time, the priests may come in, and there they offer sacrifices, and present oblations to the dead; where also they crowne and adorne with flowers the monument of one Mediphthe, which is overlshadowed and covered with a certaine plant, greater and taller than any olive tree. Eudoxus writeth, that how many sepulchres soever there be in Aegypt wherein the corps of Osiris should lie, yet it is in the citie Busiris; for that it was the countrey and place of his nativitie: so that now there is no need to speake of Taphosiris, for that the very name it selfe saith enough, signifying as it doeth, the sepulchre of Osiris. Well, I approve the cutting of the wood, and renting of the linnen, the effusions also and funerals libaments there performed, because there be many mysteries mingled among. And so the priests of Aegypt affirme, that the bodies not of these gods onely, but also of all others, who have bene engendered, and are not incorruptible, remaine among them where they honoured and revered; but their soules became starres, and shine in heaven: and as for that of Isis, it is the same which the Greekes call Cyon, that is to say, the dogge-starre, but the Aegyptians Sathis: that of Orus is Orion, and that of Typhon, the Beare. But whereas all other cities and states in Aegypt contribute a certaine tribute imposed upon them, for to portray, draw and paint such beasts as are honored among them, those onely who inhabit the countrey Thebaïs, of all others give nothing thereto, being of opinion, that no mortall thing, subject to death, can be a god: as for him alone, whom they call Emph, as he was never borne, so shall he never die. Whereas therefore

fore many such things as these, be reported and shewed in Aegypt, they who thinke, that all is no more but to perpetuate and eternize the memorie of marvelous deeds and strange accidents of some princes, kings, or tyrants, who for their excellent vertue & mighty puissance, have adjoined to their owne glory, the authoritie of deitie, unto whom, a while after, there befell calamities; use heerein a very cleanly shift, and expedite evasion, transferring handfomly from the gods unto men, all sinister infamie that is in these fable, and helpe themselves by the testimonies which they finde and read in histories: for the Aegyptians write, that Mercurie was but small of stature, and slender limmed: that Typhon was of a ruddy colour; Orus white; Osiris of a blackish hew, as who indeed were naturally men. Moreover, they call Osiris, capitaine or generall, Canobus pilot or governor of a ship, after whose name they have named a starre: and as for to the shippe which the Greeks name Argo, they hold that it was the very resemblance of Osiris ship, which for the honour of him, being numbered among the starres, is so situate in heaven, as that it mooveth and keepeth his course not farre from that of Orion, and the Cyon or dogge-starre; of which twaine, the one is consecrate unto Horus, the other to Isis. But I feare me, that this were to flurre and remoove those sacred things which are not to be touched and medled withall, and as much as to fight against, not continuance of time onely and antiquitie, as Simonides saith, but also the religion of many sorts of people and nations, who are long since possessed with a devotion toward these gods: I doubt (I say) left in so doing they faile not to transfer to great names as these out of heaven to earth, and so goe very neere and misse but a little to overthrow and abolishe that honour and belief, which is ingenerate and imprinted in the hearts of all men, even from their very first nativitie: which were even to set the gates wide open for a multitude of miscreants and Atheists, who would bring all divinity to humanity, and deitie to mans nature; yea and to give a manifest overture and libertie for all the impostures and juggling cuts of Eumenius the Messenian, who having himselfe coined and devised the originals of fables, grounded upon no probability nor subject matter, but even against the course of reason and nature, spread and scattered abroad throughout the world all impietic, transmuting and changing all those whom we repute as gods, into the names of admirals, capitaines generall, and kings, who had lived in times past, according as they stand upon record, by his saying, written in golden letters, within the citie * Panchon, (which never Græcian nor Barbarian save himselfe saw) as having failed unto the countreies of the Panchonians and Triphylians; nation so forsooth that neither are, nor ever were in this world. And yet verily, a great name there goeth among the Assyrians, of the woorthy and renowned acts of Semiramis; as also in Aegypt of Sesostrius. As for the Phrygians, even at this day they terme noble exploits and admirable enterprises, by the name Manica, of one of their ancient kings, whom they called Manis, who in his time was a most prudent and valiant prince, and whom others named Mafdes. Cyrus led the Persians, and Alexander the Macedonians, with conquest still and victory, from one end of the world in manner to another: and yet for all these brave acts, no otherwise renowned they are, nor remembered, but onely for puissant and good kings: and say, there were haply some of them who upon an overweening and high conceit of themselves, helped forward with youth, and want of experience, as Plato saith, and whose mindes were puffed up and inflamed with pride and vain-glory, tooke upon them the surnames of gods, and had temples founded in their names, yet this glory of theirs lasted but a while, and soon after being condemned by the posterity, of vanitie, and arrogancie together, with impietic and injustice,

Were quickly gone, like smoke which mounting hie, Into the aire, doth vanish by and by.

and now as fugitive slaves that may be brought backe againe where ever they be found, they are haled and pulled away from their temples and altars, and nothing remaineth for them but their tombs & sepulchers: and therefore that old king Antigonus, when a certaine Poet named Hermodotus, in his verses called him the sonne of the Sun, yea, & a god, Well quoth he, my groomer that daily voideth my clofe stoole, knowes no such matter by me. Lysippus also the Imager did very well to reprove Apelles the painter, for that, when he drew the picture of Alexander, hee portraied him with lightning in his hand; whereas Lysippus put in his hand a lance, the glory and renowne whereof, as due and proper unto him, yea, and befitting his person indeed, no time nor age should ever be able to abolishe. In which regard, I hold better with them who thinke that the things which be written of Typhon, Osiris, and Isis, were no accidents or passions incident to gods or to men; but rather to some great Dæmons: of which kinde were Pythagoras, Plato,

Plato, Xenocrates, and Chrysippus, following heerein the opinions of the ancient Theologians, who hold, that they were farre stronger than men, and that in puissance they much surmounted our nature: but that divinitie which they had, was not pure and simple; but they were compounded of a nature corporall and spirituall, capable of pleasure, of griefe, and other passions and affections, which accompanying these mutations, trouble some more, others lesse. For in these Dæmons, there is like, as also among men, a diversitie and difference of vice and of vertue. For the acts of Giants and Titans, so much chaunted in every Greeke song, the abominable deeds likewise and practises of one Saturne, the resistance also of Pytho against Apollo, the founds of Bacchus, and the wanderings of Ceres, differ in no respect from the accidents of Osiris and Typhon, and of all other such like fabulous tales, which every man may heare as much as he list: as also whatsoever lying covered and hidden under the vaile of mystical sacrifices and ceremonies, is kept close not uttered nor shewed to the vulgar people, is of the same sort. And according hereto, we may heare Homer how he calleth good men, and such as excell others diversly, one while θεοειδης, that is to say, like unto the gods; otherwhile, ανθρωπος, that is to say, comparable to the gods: sometimes δειν αυτο γυμν εργασιας, that is to say, having their wildome and counsell from the gods. But the denomination or addition drawn from the Dæmons, he useth commonly as well to the good as the bad; indifferent to valiant persons and to cowards: to a timorous and fearefull soldior thus:

Δαίμονες γαβύ ἐνδὲ, τῶ δειδωκόσιν ἄνθρωποι, ἀππειλῶ.

Dæmonian, approach thou neare:

The Greeks why dost thou so much feare?

On the other side, of an hardy soldior:

αὐτὸν ὅτι δὴ τὸ τίμησθαι ἔκαστον, δαίμονι τῶν,

When he the charge in field the fourth time gave,

Like to some Demon he did himselfe behave.

And againe, in the woofe sense,

Δαίμονος, πῦρ τὸ ἱελαῖος, Παναῖος τὸ μῦθος, &c.

\ Dæmonian, what is that great offence,*

Which Priam and his sonnes committed have

Against thee, for to make thy just pretence,

In wrathfull rearmes upon them thus to rave,

And them no grace and mercy so vouchsafe,

Nor rest, untill thou see'st the stately towne,

Of Ilium destroyed and raised downe?

Giving us heereby thus much to understand, that the Dæmons have a mixt nature, and a will or affection which is not equall, nor alwaies alike. And heereupon it is, that Plato verily attributeth unto the Olympian and celestiall gods, all that which is dexterous and odde: but unto the Dæmons, whatsoever is sinister and even. And Xenocrates holdeth, that those daies which are unlucky and distill, those festivall solemnities likewise, which have any beatings or knocking and thumping of breasts, or fasting, or otherwise any cursed speeches and filthy words, are not meet for the honour & worship either of gods or of good Dæmons: but he suppoeth that there be in the aire about us, certaine natures great & puissant; howbeit, shrewd, malicious and unfociable, which take some pleasure in such matters: and when they have obtained and gotten so much to be done for their sake, they goe about no farther mischief, nor wait any shrewdeturnes: whereas contrariwise, both Hesiodus calleth the pure and holy Dæmons, such also as be the good angels and keepers of men,

*Givers of wealth and opulence, as whom
This regal gift and honour doth become.*

And Plato also termeth this kinde of Dæmons or angels Mercuriall, that is to say, expositours or interpretours, and ministeriall, having a middle nature betwene gods and men, who as mediators, present the prayers and petitions of men heere unto the gods in heaven, and from thence transmit and convey unto us upon earth, the oracles and revelations of hidden and future things, as also their donations of goods and riches. As for Empedocles, he saith, that these Dæmons or fiends, are punished and tormented for their finnes and offences which they have committed, as may appeere by these his verses:

* That is to say, wicked or cruel Jupiter, so Μητις.

For why? the power of aire and skie,
did to the sea them chase:
The sea them cast up, of the earth,
even to the outward face:
The earth them sends unto the beames, of never-tired Sunne,
The Sunne to aire, whence first they came,
doth fling them downe anon:
Thus possesto and fro, twist seas beneath, and heav'n above,
From one they to another passe:
not one yet doth them love.

untill such time as being thus in this purgatory chastised and clemented, they recover againe that place estate and degree which is meet for them and according to their nature. These things and such like for all the world they say, are reported of Typhon, who upon envy and malice committed many outrages; and having thus made a trouble and confusion in all things, filled sea and land with wofull calamities and miseries, but was punished for it in the end. For Isis the wife and sister of Osiris in revenge, plagued him in extinguishing and repressing his fury and rage: and yet neglected not the travels and paines of her owne which she endured, her tugging also and wandering to and fro, nor many other acts of great wisdom and prowess suffered so to be buried in silence and oblivion: but inserting the same among the most holy ceremonies of sacrifices, as examples, images, memorials and resemblances of the accidents hapning in those times, she consecrated an ensignement, instruction and consolation of piety and devout religion to godward, as well for men as women afflicted with miseries. By reason whereof she and her husband Osiris of good Daemons were transmuted for their vertue into gods, like as afterwards were Hercules and Bacchus, who in regard thereof, and not without reason, have honours decreed for them both of gods and also of Daemons intermingled together, as those who in all places were puissant, but most powerfull both upon and also under the earth. For they say that Sarapis is nothing else but Pluto, and Isis the same that Proserpina, as Archemachus of Euboea and Heraclitus of Pontus testifie and he thinketh that the oracle in the city Canobus, is that of father Diu or Pluto. King Ptolemæus surnamed Soter that is to say, saviour, caused that huge statue or colosse of Pluto which was in the city Sinope, to be taken from thence, not knowing, nor having scene before of what forme and shape it was, but only that as he dreamed he thought that he saw Serapis, commanding him withall speed possible to transport him into Alexandria. Now the king not knowing where this statue was, nor where to finde it, in this doubtful perplexity related his vision aforesaid unto his friends about him, and chanced to meet with one Sophism a great traveller and a man who had bene in many places, and he said that in the city of Sinope he had scene such a statue as the king described unto them. Whereupon Ptolemæus sent Soteles and Dionysius, who in long time, and with great travell, and not without the especiall grace of the divine providence, stole away the said colosse and brought it with them: Now when it was cometo Alexandria, and there scene, Timotheus the great Cosmographer and Antiquary, and Manethon of the province Sebennitis, guessed it by all conjectures to be the image of Pluto, and namely by Cerberus the hel-dog and the dragon about him, perswading the king that it could be the image of no other god but of Serapis. For it came not from thence with that name; but being brought into Alexandria, it tooke the name Serapis, by which the Aegyptians doe name Pluto. And yet Heraclitus verily the Naturalist faith, that Hades and Dionysius, that is to say, Pluto and Bacchus, be the same. And in truth when they are disposed to play the foolles and be mad, they are caried away to this opinion. For they who suppose that Hades, that is to say, Pluto, is said to be the body and as it were the sepulcher of the soule, as if it seemed to be foolish and drunken all the while she is within it, me thinkes they doe allegorize but very baldly. And better it were yet to bring Osiris and Bacchus together, yea and to reconcile Sarapis unto Osiris, in saying that after he hath changed his nature, he became to have this denomination. And therefore this name Sarapis is common to all, as they know very well who are professed in the sacred religion of Osiris. For we ought not to give eare and credit to the bookes and writings of the Phrygians, wherein we finde, that there was one Charpos the daughter of Hercules, and that of Janus a sonne of Hercules was engendred Typhon: neither yet to make make account of Phylarchus who writeth, that Bacchus was the first, who from the Indians drave two beeces, whereof the one was named Apis, and the other Osiris: That Sarapis is the proper name of him who ruleth and embelisheth the universall world, and is derived of the word Sairein, which some say, signifieth as much as to beautifie and adorne. For these be absurd toies delivered by Phylarchus: but more monstrous and senselesse are their absurdities who write, that Sarapis is no god, but that it is the coffin or sepulcher of Apis that is so called: as also that there be certain two leaved brassen gates in Memphis, bearing the names of Lethæ & Cocytus, that is to say, oblivion and wailing, which being set open when they interre and bury Apis, in the opening make a great sound and rude noise: which is the cause that we lay hand upon every copper or 10 brassen vessell when it resoundeth so, to stay the noise thereof. Yet is their more apparence of truth and reason in their opinion, who hold that it was derived of these verbes αἰεῖν, and οἰεῖν, which signifieth to move, as being that which moveth the whole frame of the world. The priests for the most part hold, that Sarapis is a word compounded of Osiris and Apis together, giving this exposition withall and teaching us, that we ought to beleve Apis to be an elegant image of the soule of Osiris. For mine owne part, if Sarapis be an Aegyptian name, I suppose rather that it betokeneth joy and mirth: And I ground my conjecture upon this, that the Aegyptians ordinarily call the feast of joy and gladnesse termed among the Athenians Charmosyna, by the name of Sairei. For Plato himselfe saith, that Hades which signifieth Pluto, being the sonne of Aidos, that is to say, of shamefastnesse and reverence, is a milde and gracious god to 20 those who are toward him. And very true it is, that in the Aegyptians language, many other proper names are significant and carry their reason with them: as namely that infernall place under the earth, into which they imagine the soules of the dead doe descend after they be departed, they call Amenthes, which terme is as much to say, as taking and giving; but whether this word be one of those, which in old time came out of Greece and were transpotted thither, we will consider and discusse better hereafter: Now for this present let us prosecute that which remaineth of this opinion now in hand. For Osiris and Isis of good Daemons were translated into the number of the gods: And as for the puissance of Typhon oppressed and quelled, howbeit panting as yet at the last gaspe and striving as it were with the pangs of death, they have certain ceremonies and sacrifices, to pacify and appease. Other feasts also there be againe on the 30 contrary side wherein they insult over him, debate and defame him what they can: In so much as men of a ruddy colour they deride & make of them a laughing stocke. And as for the inhabitants of Coptos, they use at a certaine feast to throw an asse headlong downe from the pitch of an high rocke, because Typhon was ruddy and of a red asses colour. The Busritants and Lycopolites forbore to sound any trumpets, because they resemble the braying of an asse: and generally they take an asse to be an unclean beast and demonically, for the resemblance in hiew that it hath with him: and when they make certaine cakes in their sacrifices of the moneths, Payni and Phaophi, they worke them in paistry with the print upon them of an asse bound. Also in their solemne sacrifice to the Sun, they command as many as will be there to worship that god, 40 not to weare any brooches or jewels of gold about their bodies, nor to give any meat or provender unto an asse what need soever he have thereof. It seemeth also, that the Pythagoreans themselves were of opinion, that Typhon was some fiend or demonically power: for they say that Typhon was borne in the even number of six and fity: againe, that the triangular number or figure, is the puissance of Pluto, Bacchus and Mars: of the quadrangle, is the power of Rhea, Venus, Ceres, Vesta, and Juno: that of twelve angles belongeth to the might of Jupiter: but that of fity six angles is the force of Typhon, as Eudoxus hath left in writing. But the Aegyptians supposing that Typhon was of a reddish colour, doe kill for sacrifice unto him, kine and oxen of the same colour, observing withall so precisely, that if they have but one haire blacke or white, they be not sacrificeable: for they thinke such sacrifices not acceptable, but contrariwise displeasing unto the gods, imagining they be the bodies which have received the soules of leaud and wicked 50 persons, transformed into other creatures. And therefore after they have cursed the head of such a sacrifice, they cut it off and cast it into the river, at least waies in old time: but now they give it unto strangers. But the ox which they meane to sacrifice indeed, the priests called Sphragiste, that is to say, the sealers, come & make it with their seale, which as Cassor writeth, was the image of a man kneeling, with his hands drawn backe and bound behinde him, and having a sword set to his throat: Semblably they use the name of an asse also, as hath bene said, for his uncivill rudenesse and insolency, no lesse than in regard of his colour, wherein he resemblith

Typhon;

Typhon; and therefore the Egyptians gave unto Ochus a king of the Persians, whom they hated above all others as most curled and abominable, the surname of asse: whereof Ochus being advertised and saying withall, This asse shall devour your ox; caused presently their beefe Asse to be killed and sacrificed, as Dion hath left in writing. As for those who say, that Typhon after he had lost the field, fled six daies journey upon an asse backe, and having by this means escaped, begat two sonnes, Hieroglymus and Judau; evident it is herein that they would draw the story of the Jewes into this fable. And thus much of the allegorick conjectures which this tale doth afford. But now from another head, let us (of those who are able to discourse somewhat Philosophically and with reason) consider first and formost such as deale most simply in this behalfe. And these be they that say, like as the Greeks allegorize that Saturne is time, Juno the aire, and the generation of Vulcan, is the transmutation of aire into fire; even so they give out that by Osiris the Egyptians meane Nilus, which lieth and keepeth company with Isis, that is to say, the earth: That Typhon is the sea, into which Nilus falling loseth himselfe, and is dispatched here and there, unlesse it be that portion thereof, which the earth receiveth and whereby it is made fertill. And upon the river Nilus there is a sacred lamentation, even from the daies of Saturne: wherein there is lamenting, how Nilus springing and growing on the left hand, decaith and is lost on the right: For the Egyptians doe thinke, that the east parts where the day appeareth, be the forefront and face of the world, that the North part is the right hand & the South part the left. This Nilus therefore, arising on the left hand, and lost in the sea on the right hand, is said truly to have his birth and generation in the left side, but his death and corruption in the right. And this is the reason why the priests of Aegypt have the sea in abomination, and terme salt the some and froth of Typhon. And among those things which are interdicted and forbidden this is one, that no salt be used at the boord: by reason whereof they never salute any pilots or sailors, for that they keepe ordinarily in the sea, and get their living by it. This also is one of the principall causes, why they abhorre fishes; in such sort as when they would describe hatred, they draw or portray a fish: like as in the porch before the temple of Minerva within the city Sai, there was portrayed and engraven, an infant, an old man; after them a falcon or some such hawke, and close thereto a fish, and last of all a river-horse: which Hieroglyphicks, doe symbolize and signifie thus much in effect. O all yea that come into the world and goe out of it: God hateth shamelesse injustice. For by the hawke they understand God, by the fish hatred, and by the river-horse impudent violence and vilany, because it is said that he killeth his father, and after that, forceth his owne mother and covereth her. And fensibably it should seeme, that the saying of the Pythagoreans, who give out that the sea is a reare of Saturne, under covert words doe meane, that it is impure and uncleane. Thus have I bene willing by the way to alledge thus much, although it be without the traine of our fable, because they fall within the compasse of a vulgar and common received history. But to returne to our matter: the priests as many as be of the wiser and more learned sort, understand by Osiris, not onely the river Nilus, and by Typhon the sea: but also by the former, they signifie in one word and simply, all vertue and power that produceth moisture and water, taking it to be the materiall cause of generation, and the nature generative of feed: and by Typhon they represent all desiccative vertue, all heat of fire & drinnesse, as the very thing that is fully opposite and adverse to humidity: and hereupon it is, that they hold Typhon to be red of haire and of skin yellow: and by the same reason they willingly would not encounter or meet upon the way men of that hew, no nor delight to speake unto such. Contrariwise they feigne Osiris to be of a blacke colour, because all water, causeth the earth, clothes and cloudes to appeare blacke with which it is mingled. Also the moisture, that is in young folke maketh their haire blacke; but grised hoarinesse, which seemeth to be a pale yellow, cometh by reason of scicity unto those who be past their flower, and now in their declining age: also the Spring time is Greene, fresh, pleasant, and generative: but the latter season of Autumne, for want of moisture, is an enemy to plants, and breedeth diseases in man and beast.

To speake also of that ox or beefe named Mnevis, which is kept and nourished in Heliopolis at the common charges of the city, consecrated unto Osiris, and which some say, was the fire of Apis; blacke he is of haire, and honored in a second degree after Apis. Moreover, the whole land of Aegypt is of all others exceeding blacke, such a blacke I meane, as that is of the cle, which they call Chemia, and they liken it to the heart; for hote and moist it is, and enclineth to the left and South parts of the earth, like as the heart lieth most to the left side of a man. They

affirme also, that the Sunne and Moone are not mounted upon chariots, but within barges or boates continually do moove and saile as it were round about the world; giving us thereby covertly to understand, that they be bred and nourished by moisture. Furthermore, they thinke, that Homer (like as Thales also) being taught out of the Egyptians learning, doth hold and set downe this position, That water is the element and principle that engendereth all things: for they say, that Osiris is the Ocean, and Isis, Typhis, as one would say, the nourfe that suckleth and feedeth the whole world. For the Greeks call the ejaculation or casting forth of naturall feed, Arctia, like as the conjunction of male and female Sexus; likewise Uter, which in Greeke signifieth a son, is derived of the word Uter, that is to say, water, and Uter betokeneth also to raine. Moreover, Bacchus they surname Hyes, as one would say, the lord and ruler of the moist nature; and he is no other than Osiris. Furthermore, whereas we pronounce his name Osiris, Hellanicus putteth it downe Hyfiris, saying, that he heard the very priests themselves of Aegypt to pronounce it so. And thus verily calleth he the said god in every place, not without good shew of reason, having regard unto his nature and invention. But that Osiris is the same god that Bacchus, who should in all reason better know than your selfe (ô Cles) considering that in the city of Delphi you are the mistresse and lady Prioresse as it were of the religious Thyans, and from your infancy have bene a votary and Nun consecrated by your father and mother to the service of Osiris. But if in regard of others, we must alledge testimonies, let us not meddle with their hidden secrets; howbeit, that which the priests do in publicke when the inter Apis, having brought his corps in a boat or punt, differeth not at all from the ceremonies of Bacchus: for, clad they be in stags skinner, they cary javelins in their hands, they keepe a loud crying, and shaking of their bodies very unquietly, much after the maner of those who are transported with the fanaticall and sacred fancy of Bacchus. And what reason els should there be, that many nations of Greece portray the statue of Bacchus with a bulles head? and the dames among the Elians in their praier and invocations do call vnto him, beseeching this god to come unto them with his bulles foot? yea, and the Argives commonly surname Bacchus, Bugenes, which is as much to say, as the sonne of a Cow, or engendered by a bull: and that which more is, they invoke and call upon him out of the water with found of trumpets, casting into a deepe gulf, a lambe, as to the Portier, under the name of Pylaeochori. Their trumpets they hide within their javelins, called Thyrri, according as Socrates hath written in his books of sacred ceremonies. Moreover, the Titanical acts, and that whole, entier and sacred night, accord with that which is reported as touching the dismembred of Osiris, and the resurrection or renovation of his life: in like manner, those matters which concerne his buriall. For the Egyptians shew in many places the sepulchres of Osiris: and the Delphians thinke, they have the bones and reliques of Bacchus among them, intred and bestowed neere unto the oracle: and his religious priests celebrate unto him a secret sacrifice within the temple of Apollo, when the Thyades who are the Priestesses begin to chaunt the sonnet Licmies. Now that the Greeks are of opinion, that Bacchus is the lord and governour, not of wine liquor onely, but also of every other nature which is moist and liquid, the testimony of Pindarus is sufficient, when he saith thus: Bacchus

* One of the surnames of Bacchus.

Taking the charge of trees that grow,
Doth cause them for to bud and blow:
The verdure fresh and beauty pure
Of lovely fruits he doth procure.

And therefore it is, that those who serve and worship Osiris are streightly forbidden and charged, not to destroy any fruitfull tree, nor to stop the head of any fountaine. And not onely the river Nilus, but all water and moisture whatsoever in generally, they call the effluence of Osiris: by reason whereof, before their sacrifices they cary alwaies in procession a pot or pitcher of water, in honour of the said god.

They describe also a king and the Southern or meridional climat of the world, by a figtree leafe, which fig leafe signifieth the imbibition and motion of all things: and besides, it seemeth naturally to resemble the member of generation. Also, when they solemnize the feast called Pamyrsia, which as before hath bene said, was instituted in the honour of Priapus, they shew and cary about in procession an image or statue, the genital member whereof, is thrice as bigge as the ordinary: for this god of theirs is the beginning of all things; and every such principle, by generation multiplieth it selfe. Now, we are wont moreover to say, Thrice, for many times; to wit, a finite number for an infinite; as when we use the word, Trisagios, that is to say, Thrice

happy, for most happy; and Three bonds, for infinite; unless peradventure this ternary or threefold number was expressly and properly chosen by our ancients. For the nature of moisture being the principle that engendred all things, from the beginning hath engendred these three elements or primitive bodies, Earth, Aire and Fire. For that branch which is set unto the fable, to wit, that Typhon flung the genital member of Osiris into the river, that Isis could not finde it, but caused one to be made to resemble it; and when she was provided thereof, ordeined that it should be honoured and caried in a solempne pompe; tendeth to this, for to teach us, that the generative and productive vertue of god, had moisture at the first for the matter, and by the meanes of the said humidity, was mixed with those things that were apt for generation. Another branch there is yet, growing to this fable, namely, that one Appis brother to the Sunne, warred against Jupiter; that Osiris aided Jupiter and helped him to defeat his enemy; in regard of which merit he adopted him for his sonne, and named him Diomysus, that is to say, Bacchus. Now the Mythology of this fable, as it evidently appeareth, accordeth covertly, with the truth of Nature: for the Aegyptians call the winde, Jupiter, unto which nothing is more contrary, than siccity and that which is fire: and that is not the Sunne, although some confanguinity it hath unto it: but moisture comming to extinguish the extremity of that drinnesse, fortifieth and augmenteth those vapors, which nourish the wind and keepe it in force. Moreover, the Greeks consecrate the Ivie unto Bacchus, and the same is named among the Aegyptians, Chenosis, which word, (as they say) signifieth in the Aegyptian tongue, the plant of Osiris: at leastwise Ariston who enrolled a colonic of the Athenians, affirmeth that he light upon an epistle of Anaxarchus, wherein he found as much; as also, that Bacchus was the sonne of a water nymph, Naxos. Other Aegyptians also there be, who hold, that Bacchus was the sonne of Isis, and that he was not called Osiris, but Asaphes, in the letter Alpha, which word signifieth prowesse or valour. And thus much giveth Hermes to understand, in his first booke of Aegyptian acts; where he saith also, that Osiris by interpretation, is as much, as *flour or mightie. Heere I beare to alledge Atanasius, who referreth and ascribeth unto Epaphus, Bacchus, Osiris, and Sarapis. I overpasse Anticlistides likewise, who affirmeth, that Isis was the daughter of Prometheus, and married unto Bacchus. For the very particular properties that we have said were in their feasts and sacrifices, yeld a more cleere evidence and prooffe, than any allegations of witnesse whatsoever. Also they hold, that among the starrs, the dogge or Sirius was consecrate unto Isis, the which starre draweth the water. And they honour the lion, with whose heads and having the mouth gaping and wide open, they adorne the doores and gates of their temples, for that the river Nilus riseth

So soone as in the circle Zodiacke,

The Sunne and Leo signe, encounter make.

And as they both hold and affirme, Nilus to be the effluence of Osiris; even so they are of opinion, that the body of Isis is the earth or land of Aegypt; and yet not all of it, but so much as Nilus overfloweth, and by commixtion maketh fertile and fruitfull: of which conjunction, they say, that Orus was engendred, which is nothing else but the temperature and disposition of the aire, nourishing and maintaining all things. They say also, that this Orus was nourished within the mores neere unto the citie Buto, by the goddesse Latona; for that the earth being well drenched and watered, bringeth forth and nourisheth vapors, which overcome, extinguish, and repress (nothing so much) great siccity and drinnesse. Furthermore, they call the marches and borders of the land, the confines also of the coasts which touch the sea, Nephtys: and this is the reason why they name Nephtys, Telenta, that is to say, small or last; and say that she was married unto Typhon. And when Nilus breaketh out and overrunneth his banks so, as he approacheth these borders, they call the unlawfull conjunction or adultery of Osiris with Nephtys, the which is knownen by certaine plants growing there, among which is the Melilot: by the seed whereof, saith the tale, when it was shedde and left behinde, began Typhon to perceive the wrong that was done unto him in his marriage. And heereupon they say, that Orus was the legitime sonne of Isis, but Anubis was borne by Nephtys in bastardie. And verily in the succession of kings they record Nephtys married unto Typhon, to have beene at first barren. Now if this be not meant of a woman, but of a goddesse, they understand under these enigmaticall speeches, a land altogether barren and unfruitfull, by reason of hardnesse and stiffe soliditie. The lying in wait of Typhon to surpris Osiris, his usurped rule and tyranny, is nothing else but the force of drinnesse, which was very mightie, which dissipated also and spent all that humidity

ditie that both engendred and also encrease Nilus to that height. As for that queene of Aethiopia, who came to aid & assist him, the brokeneth the Southerly winds coming from Aethiopia: for when these have the upper hand of the Etesian winds, which blow from the North, and drive the clouds into Aethiopia, and so hinders those showers and gluts of raine which power out of the clouds, and make the river Nilus to swell: then Typhon that is to say, drought, is said to winne the better, and to burne up all; and so having gotten the matter cleane of Nilus, who by reason of his weaknesse and feeblenesse, is drivning and forced to retire a contrary way, he chafeth him, poore and low into the sea. For whereas the fable saith, that Osiris was thus fast within an arke or coffer, there is no other thing signified thereby; but this departure backe of the water, and the hiding thereof within the sea: which is the cause also, that they say Osiris went out of sight in the moneth Athy, and was no more seene; at what tyme as when all the Etesian winds are laid and given over to blow, Nilus returneth into his chanel, leaving the land discovered and bare. And now by this time as the night groweth longer, the darknesse encrease, like as the force of the light doth diminish and is impaired: and then the priests among many other ceremonies, testifying their sadnesse and heave cheere, bring forth and shew a beefe with golden hornes, whom they cover all over with a fine vail of blacke silke, thereby to represent the heavy dole and mourning of the goddesse for Osiris: (for thus they thinke, that the said beefe is the image of Osiris: and the vestment of blacke afore said, testifying the earth, doth signifie Isis) and this shew exhibit they foure daies together; to wit, from the seventh unto the tenth following: And why? Foure things there be for which they make demonstration of griefe & sorrow: the first is the river Nilus, for that he seemeth to retire and faile: the second are the North-windes, which now are hushed and still, by reason of the Southern winds, that gaine the masteire over them: the third is the day, for that now it waxeth shorter than the night: and last of all, the discovering and nakednesse of the earth, together with the develling of trees, which at the very same time begin to shed and lose their leaves. After this, upon the nineteenth day at night, they goe downe to the sea side, and then the priests reveled in their sacred Stoles and habits, carie forth with them, a consecrated chest, wherein there is a vessell of gold, into which they take and powre fresh and potable water; and with that, all those who are present set up a note and shout, as if they had found Osiris againe: then they take a piece of fatty and fertile earth, and together with the water, knead and worke it into a paste, mixing therewith most precious odors, perfumes and spices, whereof they make a little image in forme of the Moone croissant, which they decke with robes and adorne, shewing thereby evidently that they take these gods to be the substance of water and earth.

Thus when Isis had recovered Osiris, nourished Orus, and brought him up to some growth, so that he now became strengthened & fortified by exhalations, vapors, mists and clouds, Typhon verily was vanquished, howbeit, not finally, for that the goddesse, which is the ladie of the earth; would not permit & suffer, that the power or nature which is contrary unto moisture, should be utterly abolished: onely she did slacken and let downe the vehement force thereof, willing that this combat and strife should still continue; because the world would not have beene entirc and perfect, if the nature of fire had beene once extinct & gone. And if this goe not currant among them, there is no reason and probability, that any one should project this assertion also, namely, that Typhon in times past overcame one part of Osiris: for that in olde time, Aegypt was sea: whereupon it is, that even at this day, within the mines wherein men dig for mettals, yea, and among the mountaines, there is found great store of sea fish. Likewise, all the fountaines, welles and pits (and those are many in number) carry a brackish, saltish and bitter water, as if some remnant or residue of the olde sea were reserved, which ranne thither. But in proceesse of time, Orus subdued Typhon, that is to say, when the seasonable raine came, which tempered the excessive heat, Nilus expelled and drave forth the sea, discovered the champion ground, and filled it continually more and more by new deluges and inundations, that laied somewhat still unto it. And hereof, the daily experience is presented to our eyes; for we perceive even at this day, that the overflows and rising of the river, bringing new mud, and adding fresh earth still by little and little, the sea giveth place and retirith: and as the deepe in it is filled more and more, so the superfluouses riseth higher, by the continuall shelves that the Nile calls up; by which meane, the sea runneth backward: yea, the very Isle Pharos, which Homer knew by his daies to lie farre within the sea even a daies sailing from the continent & firme land of Aegypt, is now a very part thereof: not for that it is removed and approached neerer and neerer to the land; but because the sea

which was betwene, gave place unto the river that continually made new earth with the mudd that it brought, and so maintained and augmented the maine land. But these things resemble very neere, the Theologicall interpretations that the Stoicks give out: for they holde, that the generative and nutritive Spirit, is Bacchus; but that which striketh and divideth, is Hercules; that which receiveth, is Ammon; that which entrencheth and pierceth into the earth, is Ceres; and Proserpina; and that which doth penetrate farther and passe thorow the sea, is Neptune. Others, who mingle among naturall causes and reasons, some drawn from the Mathematicks, and principally from Astrology, thinke that Typhon is the Solare circle or sphere of the Sunne; and that Osiris is that of the Moone; inasmuch as the Moone hath a generative and vegetable light, multiplying that sweet and comfortable moisture which is so meet for the generation of living creatures, of trees and plants: but the Sunne having in it a pure fiery flame indeed without any mixture or rebatement at all, heateth and drieth that which the earth bringeth forth, yea, and whatsoever is verdant and in the flower; inasmuch, as by his inflammation he causeth the greater part of the earth to be wholly desert and inhabitable, and many times subdueth the very Moone. And therefore the Aegyptians evermore name Typhon, Seth, which is as much to say, as ruling lordly, and oppressing with violence. And after their fabulous manner they say, that Hercules fitting as it were upon the Sunne, goeth about the world with him; and Mercurius likewise with the Moone: by reason whereof, the works and effects of the Moone resemble those acts which are performed by eloquence and wisdom: but those of the Sunne are compared to such as are exploited by force and puissance. And the Stoicks say, that the Sunne is lighted and set on fire by the Sea, and therewith nourished: but they be the fountaines and lakes which send up unto the Moone a milde, sweet and delicate vapour. The Aegyptians saie, that the death of Osiris happened on the seventeenth day of the moneth, on which day, better than upon any other, he is judged to be at the full: and this is the reason why the Pythagoreans call this day, The obscuration, and of all other numbers they most abhorre and detest it: for whereas sixteene is a number quadrangular or foure-square, and eightene longer one way than another; which numbers only of those that be plaine, happen for to have the ambient unities, that environ them equal to the spaces contained and comprehended within them; seventene, which falleth betwene, separateth and disjoineeth the one from the other, and being cut into unequal intervals, distrusteth the proportion sesquioctave. And some there be who say, that Osiris lived, others that he reigned, eight and twenty yeeres: for so many lights there be of the Moone, and so many daies doth she turne about her owne circle: and therefore in those ceremonies which they call The sepulture of Osiris, they cut a piece of wood, and make a certaine coffin or case in manner of the Moone croissant, for that as she approacheth neerer to the Sunne, she becommeth pointed and cornered, untill in the end she come to nothing, and is no more scene. And as for the dismembred of Osiris into foureteeen pieces, they signifie unto us under the covert vail of these words, The daies wherein the said planet is in the wane, and decreaseth even unto the change, when she is renewed againe. And that day on which she first appeareth, by passing by and escaping the raies of the Sunne, they call an imperfect good: for Osiris is a doer of good: and this name signifieth many things, but principally an active and beneficiall power, as they say: and as for the other name Omphis, Hermas saith, that it betokeneth as much as a benefactor. Also, they are of opinion, that the risings and inundations of the river Nilus, answer in proportion to the course of the Moone; for the greatest heigh that it groweth unto in the countrey Elephantine, is eight and twenty cubits; for so many illuminations there be, or daies, in every revolution of the Moone: and the lowest gage about Atendes and Xois, fixe cubits, which answereth to the first quarter: but the meane betwene, about the city Memphis, when it is just at the full, cometh to foureteeen cubits, correspondent to the full Moone. They holde moreover, Apis to be the lively image of Osiris, and that he is ingendred and bred at what time as the generative light descendeth from the Moone and toucheth the Cow desirous of the male: and therefore Apis resembleth the formes of the Moone, having many white spots obscured and darkened with the shadowes of blacke. And this is the reason, why they solemnize a feast in the new Moone of the moneth Phamenoth, which they call The ingresse or entrance of Osiris to the Moone; and this is the beginning of the Spring season: and thus they put the power of Osiris in the Moone. They say also, that Isis (which is no other thing but generation) lieth with him; and so they name the Moone, Mother of the world; saying, that she is a double nature, male and female: female, in that she doth conceive and is replenished by the Sunne: and male, in this regard, that she

she sendeth forth and sprinkleth in the aire, the seeds and principles of generation: for that the drie distemperature and corruption of Typhon is not alwaies superior, but often times vanquished by generation, and howsoever tied it be and bound, yet it riseth fresh againe, and fighteth against Orus, who is nothing els but the terrestriall world, which is not altogether free from corruption, nor yet exempt from generation. Others there be, who would have all this fiction covertly to represent no other thing but the eclipses: for the Moone is eclipsed, when she is at the full directly opposite to the Sunne, and cometh to fall upon the shadow of the earth: like as they say, Osiris was put into the chest or coffer above said. On the other side, she seemeth to hide and darken the light of the Sunne, upon certaine thirtieth daies, but yet doth not wholly abolish the Sunne, no more than Isis doth kill Typhon: but when Nephthys bringeth forth Anubis, Isis putteth herselfe in place: for Nephthys is that which is under the earth and unscene; but Isis, that which is above, and appeareth unto us: and the circle named Horizon, which is common to them both, and parteth the two hemispheres, is named Anubis, and in forme resembleth a dogge: for why? a dogge seeth awell by night as by day: so that it should seeme, that Anubis among the Aegyptians hath the like power that Proserpina among the Greeks, being both terrestriall and coelestiall. Others there be, who thinke, that Anubis is Saturne, and because he is conceived with all things, and bringeth them forth, which in Greeke the word γενναι signifieth, therefore he is surnamed Kuon, that is to say, A dogge. So that there is some hidden and mystical secret in it, that causeth some, even still to reverence and adore A dogge: for the time was, when more worship was done unto it in Aegypt, than to any other beast; but after that Cambyses had killed Apis cut him in pieces, and flung the same heere and there, no other creature would come neerer to taste thereof, save the dogge only; whereupon he lost that prerogative and preeminence to be more honoured than other beasts. Others there are, who would have the shadow of the earth, which causeth the Moone to be eclipsed when she entrencheth into it, to be named Typhon. And therefore me thinks, it were not amisse to say, that in particular there is not any one of these expositions and interpretations perfect by it selfe and right, but all of them together cary some good construction: for it is neither drought alone, nor winde, nor sea, yet darkness; but all that is noisome and hurtfull whatsoever, and which hath a speciall part to hurt and destroy, is called Typhon. Neither must we put the principles of the whole world into bodies that have no life and soule, as Democritus and Epicurus doe: nor yet set downe for the workman and framer of the first matter, a certaine reason and providence, without quality (as do the Stoicks:) such a thing as hath a subsistence before and above all, and commandeth all: for impossible it is, that one sole cause, good or bad, should be the beginning of all things together; for God is not the cause of any evill, and the coagmentation of the world bendeth contrary waies, like as the composition of a lute or bow, as Heraclitus saith, and according to Empiricus,

No things can be by themselves good or bad:

That things do well, a mixture must be had.

And therefore this opinion so very auncient, is descended from Theologians and Law-givers unto Poets and Philosophers, the certaine author and beginning whereof, is not yet known: howbeit, so firmly grounded in the persuasion and beliefe of men, that hard it is to suppress or abolish the same; so commonly divulged not onely in conferences, disputations, and ordinary speeches abroad, but also in the sacrifices and divine ceremonies of gods service, in many places, as well among the Barbarians as Greeks, to wit, that neither this world steth and wavereth at adventure, without the government of providence and reason, nor reason only it is that guideth, directeth, and holdeth it (as it were) with certaine helmes or bits of obedience, but manie things there be confused and mixed, good and bad together: or to speake more plainly, there is nothing heere beneath that nature produceth and bringeth forth, which of it selfe is pure and simple: neither is there one drawer of two tunnes, to disperse and distribute abroad the affaires of this world, like as a taverne or vintner doeth his wines or other liquors, brewing and tempering one with another. But this life is conducted by two principles and powers, adverse one unto another; for the one leadeth us to the right hand directly, the other contrariwise turneth us aside and putteth us backe: and so this life is mixt, and the verie world it selfe, if not all throughout, yet at leastwise, this beneath about the earth, and under the Moone, is unequal, variable, and subject to all mutations that possibly may be. For if nothing there is, that can be without a precedent cause, and that which of it selfe is good can never minister cause of evill; necessarie it is, that nature hath some peculiar cause and beginning by it selfe, selfe, of good as well as of bad. And of this opinion are the most part of the ancients, and those of the wisest sort. For some thinke there be two gods as it were of a contrary mystery & profession; the one, author of all good things, and the other of bad. Others there be who call the better of them god; and the other Dæmon, that is to say, diuell, as Zoroastres the Magician did, who by report, was five thousand yeeres before the warre of Troy. This Zoroastres (I say) named the good god Oromazes, and the other Arimanius. Moreover, he gave out, that the one resembled light, more than any sensible thing else whatsoever: the other darknesse and ignorance: also that there is one in the middes betweene them, named Mithres: (and heereupon it is, that the Persians call an intercessor or mediator, Mithres.) He teacheth us also to sacrifice unto the one of them, for petition of good things, and for thanksgiving: but to the other, for to divert and turne away sinister and evill accidents. To which purpose they used to stampe in a mortar a certaine herbe which they call Omoni, calling upon Pluto and the darknesse: then temper they it with the blood of a wolfe which they have killed in sacrifice: this done, they carie it away, and throw it into a darke corner, where the Sunne never shineth. For this conceit they have, that of herbes and plants, some appertaine unto the good god, and others to the evill dæmon or diuell. Sensibly, of living creatures, dogs, birds, and land urchins, belong to their good god: but those of the water, to the evill fiend. And for this cause they repute those very happy, who can kill the greatest number of them. Howbeit these Sages and wise men report many fabulous things of the gods: as for example, that Oromazes is engendered of the clearest and purest light, and Arimanius of deepe darknesse: also that they warre one upon another. And the former of these created sixe other gods, the first of Benevolence; the second of Verity; the third of good discipline and publike Law; and of the rest behinde, one of Wisedome, another of Riches; and the sixth, which also is the last, the maker of joy for good and honest deeds. But the *later produceth as many other in number, concurrents as it were and of adverse operation to the former above named. Afterwards when Oromazes had augmented and amplified himselfe three times, he remooved as farre from the Sunne, as the Sunne is distant from the earth, adorning and embellishing the heaven with starres: and one starre above the rest he ordeined to be the guide, mistresse, and overseer of them all, to wit, Sirius, that is to say, the Dogge-starre. Then, after he had made foure and twentie other gods, he enclosed them all with in an egge. But the other, brought forth by Arimanius, who were also in equall number, never ceased untill they had pierced and made a hole into the said smooth and polished egge: and so affected that, evill things became mingled pell-mell with good. But there will a time come predestined fatally, when this Arimanius who brings into the world plague and famine, shall of necessity be rooted out and utterly destroyed for ever, even by them; and the earth shall become plaine, even, and uniforme: neither shall there be any other but one life, and one common-wealth of men, all happy and speaking one and the same language. Theopompus also writeth, that according to the wife Magi, these two gods must for three thousand yeeres, conquer one after another, and for three thousand yeeres be conquered againe by turnes; and then for the space of another three thousand yeeres, levie mutuall warres, and fight battels one against the other, whiles the one shall subvert and overthrow that which the other hath set up: untill the end Pluto shall faint, give over, and perish: then shall men be all in happy estate, they shall need no more food, nor cast any shadow from them; and that god who hath wrought and effected all this, shall repose himselfe, and rest in quiet, not long (I say) for a god, but a moderate time as one would say for a man taking his sleepe and rest. And thus much as touching the fable devised by the Magi. But the Chaldeans affirme that of the gods, whom they call Planets or wandering starres, two there be that are beneficiall and doers of good; two againe mischievous and workers of evill; and three which are of a meane nature and common. As for the opinion of the Greeks, concerning this point, there is no man I suppose ignorant thereof: namely, that there be two portions or parts of the world, the one good, allotted unto Jupiter Olympius, that is to say, Celestiall; another bad, appertaining to Pluto infernall. They fable moreover, and feigne, that the goddess Harmonia, that is to say, Accord, was engendered of whom, the one is cruell, grim, and quarrellous; the other milde, lovely, and generative. Now consider the Philosophers themselves, how they agree heerein: For Heraclitus directly and diversly nameth warre, the Father, King, and Lord of all the world; saying, that Homer when he wisheth and praicheth,

Both out of heaven and earth so banish warre,

That

That god and men, no more might be at jarre.

wilt not how (ere he was aware) he cursed the generation and production of all things, which indeed have their essence and being by the fight and antipathie in nature. He was ignorant that the Sunne would not passe the bounds and limits appointed unto him; for otherwise the furies and cursed tongues which are the minitresses and coadjutresses of justice would finde him out. As for Empedocles, he saith, that the beginning and principle which worketh good, is love and amity, yea, and otherwhiles is called Harmonie by Mercops: but the cause of evill,

Malice, hatred, enkindred fight,
Quarrell, debate, and bloody fight.

- 10 Come now to the Pythagoreans, they demonstrate and specifye the same by many names: for they call the good principle, One, finite, permanent or quiet, straight or direct, odde, quadrat or square, right and lightsome: but the bad, twaine, infinite, moving, crooked, even, longer one way than another, unequall, left and darke, as if these were the fountaines of generation. Anaxagoras calleth them the minde or understanding and infinity. Aristotle termeth the one forme, the other privation. And Plato under darke and covert termes hiding his opinion, in many places calleth the former of these two contrary principles, The Same, and the later, The other. But in the bookes of his lawes, which he wrote when he was now well slept in yeeres, he giveth them no more any obscure and ambiguous names, neither describeth he them symbolically and by enigmaticall and intricate names, but in proper and plaine termes, he saith, that this worke is not moved and managed by one sole cause, but haply by many, or at leastwise no fewer than twaine: whereof the one is the creatour and worker of good, the other opposit unto it and operative of contrary effects. He leaveth also and alloweth a third cause betweene, which is neither without soule nor reasonlesse ne yet unmoovable of it selfe, as some thinke, but adjacent and adherent to the other twaine, howbeit enclining alwaies to the better, as having a desire and appetite thereto, which it pursueth and followeth, as that which heereafter we will deliver shall shew more manifestly, which treatise shall reconcile the Aegyptian Theologie with the Greeks Philosophy, and reduce them to a very good concordance: for that the generation, composition, and constitution of this world is mingled of contrary powers, howbeit the same not of equal force: for the better is predominant: but impossible it is that the evill should inter-
- 30 ly perish and be abolished, so deeply is it imprinted in the body & so far inbred in the soule of the universall world, in opposition alwaies to the better, and to warre against it. Now then, in the soule, reason and understanding, which is the guide, and mistresse of all the best things, is Osiris. Also in the earth, in the windes, in water, skie and the starres, that which is well ordeined, staid, disposed and digested in good sort, by temperate seasons and revolutions, the same is called the deluxion of Osiris, and the very apparent image of him: Contrariwise, the passionate, violent, unreasonable, brutish, rash and foolish part of the soule, is Typhon: Semblably in the bodily nature, that which is extraordinarily adventitious, unholsome & diseased, as for example, the troubled aire and tempestuous indispositions of the weather, the obscuration or eclipse of the Sunne, the defect of the Moone and her occultation, be as it were the excursions, deviations
- 40 out of course, and disparations: and all of them be Typhons; as the very interpretation of the Aegyptian word signifieth no lesse: for Typhon, they name Seth, which is as much to say, as violent and oppressing after a lordly manner. It importeth also many times reversion, & otherwhiles an insultation or supplantation. Moreover some there be who say, that one of Typhons familiar friends was named Beban. But Manethos affirmeth, that Typhon himselfe was called Beban, which word by interpretation is as much as cohibition, restraint or impeachment, as if the puillance and power of Typhon were to stay and withstand the affaires that are in good way of proceeding, and tend as they should doe, to a good end. And heereupon it is that of tame beasts they dedicate and attribute unto him, the most grosse and indocible of all others, namely an asse: but of wilde beasts the most cruell and savage of all others, as the crocodiles and river
- 50 horses. As for the asse, we have spoken before of him. In the city of Mercury, named Hermopolis, they shew unto us the image of Typhon, purtraied under the forme of a river-horse, upon whom sitteth an hauke, fighting with a serpent. By the foresaid horse they represent Typhon: and by the hauke, the power and authority which Typhon having gotten by force, maketh no care oftentimes, both to be troubled and also to trouble others by his malice. And therefore when they solemnize a sacrifice, the seventh day of the moneth Tybi, which they call the coming of Isis out of Phanicia, they devise upon their halowed cakes for sacrifice, a river-horse, as if he were were tied and bound. In the city of Apollo the maner and custome confirmed by law was, that every one must eat of a crocodile : and upon a certaine day they have a solemne chase and hunting of them, when they kill as many of them as they can, and then cast them all before the temple : and they say, that Typhon being become a crocodile hath escaped from Orus : attributing all dangerous wicked beaſts, all hurtfull plants and violent paſſions unto Typhon, as if they were his workes, his parts or motions. Contrariwise they putray and depaint unto us Ofiris, by a ſepter and an eie upon it : meaning by the eie foresight and providence, by the ſepter authority and puiſſance : like as Homer nameth Jupiter who is the prince, lord and ruler of all the world, Hypatos, that is, ſovereigne, and Meſſor, that is, foreſeeing : giving us to underſtand, by ſovereigne, his ſupreme power, by foreſeeing his prudence and wildome. They repreſent Ofiris alſo 10 ſo many times by an hauke, for that he hath a wonderfull cleere and quicke ſight, her flight alſo is as ſwift, and ſhe is wont naturally to ſuſtaine her ſelfe with very little food. And more than that (by report) when the ſlieht over dead bodies unburied, he caſteth mould and earth upon their eies. And looke whenſoever the ſlieht downe to the river for to drinke the ſetteth up her ſethers ſtraight upright, but when ſhe hath drunke ſhe laieth them plaine and even againe, by which it appeareth that ſafe ſhe is and hath eſcaped the crocodile : For if the crocodile ſeiſe upon her and catch her up, her pennace abideth ſtiſſe and upright as before. But generally throughout whereſoever the image of Ofiris is exhibited in the forme of a man, they putray him with the naturall member of generation ſtiſſe and ſtraight, prefiguring thereby the generative and nutritive vertue. The habitall alſo, wherewith they clad his images is bright, ſhining like fire : For they repute the * Sunne to be a body repreſenting the power of goodneſſe, 20 as being the viſible matter of a ſpiritual and intellectuall ſubſtance. And therefore their opinion deſerveth to be rejected who attribute unto Typhon the ſphere of the Sunne, conſidering that unto him properly appertained nothing that is reſplendent, healthfull and comfortable, no diſpoſition, no generation or motion which is ordered with meaſure or digeſted by reaſon : But if either in the aire or upon the earth there be any unreaſonable diſpoſition of windes, of weather, or water, it hapneth when the primitive cauſe of a diſordinate and indeterminate power cometh to extinguiſh the kinde vapours and exhalations. Moreover in the ſacred hymnes of Ofiris, they invoke and call upon him who lieth at repoſe hidden within the armes of the Sunne. Alſo upon the thirtieth day of the moneth Epphi, they ſolemnize the feaſt of the nativity 30 or birth of Orus eies : at what time as the Sunne and Moone be in the ſame direct line : as being perſwaded that not onely the Moone but the Sunne alſo is the eie and light of Horus : Likewise upon the twenty eight day of the moneth Phaopi they celebrate another feaſt of the Sunnes balons or ſlaves, and that is after the Aequinox in Autumne, giving covertly thereby to underſtand that the Sunne hath need of an appuy or ſupporter to reſt upon and to ſtrengthen him, becauſe his heat beſinnes then to decay and languish ſenſibly, his light alſo to diminiſh and decline obliquely from us. Moreover about the ſolstice or middle of winter, they carry about his temple ſeven times a cow : and this proceſſion is called the ſeeking of Ofiris, or the revolution of the Sunne, as if the goddeſſe then deſired the waters of winter : And ſo many times they doe it, for that the courſe of the Sunne, from the Winter ſolstice unto the Summer ſolstice 40 is performed in the ſeventh moneth. It is ſaid moreover, that * Horus the ſonne of Isis was the firſt who ſacrificed unto the Sun, the fourteenth day of the moneth, according as it is written in a certaine booke as touching the nativity of Horus : howſoever every day they offer incenſe and ſweet odors to the Sunne three times : Firſt at the Sunne riſing, Roſin : ſecondly about noone, Myrrh : and thirdly at the Sunne ſetting, a certaine compoſition named Kiphi. The myſticall meaning of which perfumes and odors I will hereafter declare : but they are perſwaded that in all this they worſhip and honor the Sunne. But what need is there to gather and collect a number of ſuch matters as theſe ? ſeeing there be ſome who openly maintaine that Ofiris is the Sunne, and that the Greeks call him Sirus, but the article which the Aegyptians put before, to wit, [O] is the cauſe that ſo much is not evidently perceived : as alſo that Isis is 50 nothing elſe but the Moone : and of her images thoſe that have hornes upon them, ſignifie no other thing but the Moone croiſſant : but ſuch as are covered and clad in blacke, be token thoſe daies wherein ſhe is hidden or darkened, namely, when ſhe runneth after the Sunne : which is the reaſon that in love matters they invoke the Moone. And Endoxus himſelfe ſaith, that Isis is the preſident over amatorious folke. And verily in all theſe ceremonies there is ſome probability and likelihood of truth. But to ſay that Typhon is the Sunne, is ſo abſurd, that we ought ought not ſo much as give care to thoſe who affirme ſo. But returne we now to our former matter. For Isis is the feminine part of nature, apt to receive all generation, upon which occaſion called ſhe is by Plato, the nurſe and Pandebes, that is to ſay, capable of all : yea and the common ſort name her Myrionymus, which is as much to ſay, as having an infinite number of names, for that ſhe receiveth all formes and ſhapes, according as it pleaſeth that firſt reaſon to convert and turne her. Moreover, there is imprinted in her naturally, a love of the firſt and principall eſſence, which is nothing elſe but the ſovereigne good, and it ſhe deſireth, ſecketh, and purſueth after. Contrariwise, ſhe ſlieht and repelleth from her, any part and portion that proceedeth from ill. And howſoever ſhe be the ſubject matter, and meet place apt to receive as 10 well the one as the other, yet of it ſelfe, enclined ſhe is alwaies rather to the better, and applieth herſelfe to engender the ſame, yea, and to diſſeminate and ſowe the deſluxions and ſimilitudes thereof, wherein ſhe taketh pleaſure and reioiceth, when ſhe hath conceived and is great therewith, ready to be delivered. For this is a representation and deſcription of the ſubſtance engendered in matter, and nothing elſe but an imitation of that which is. And therefore you may ſee it is not beſides the purpoſe, that they imagine and deviſe the ſoule of Ofiris to be eternall and immortall : but as for the body, that Typhon many times doth teare, mangle, and aboliſh it, that it cannot be ſcene : and that Isis goeth up and downe, wandring heere and there, gathering together the diſmembred pieces thereof, for that which is good and ſpiritual, by conſequence is not any waies ſubject to change and alteration : but that which is ſenſible and materiall, doth 20 yeeld from it ſelfe certaine images, admitting withall and receiving ſundry proportions, formes, and ſimilitudes, like as the prints and ſtamps of ſcales ſet upon waxe, doe not continue and remaine alwaies, but are ſubject to change, alteration, diſorder and trouble, and this ſame was chaſed from the ſuperior region, and ſent downe hither, where it fighteth againſt Horus whom Isis engendered ſenſible, as being the very image of the ſpiritual and intellectuall world. And heereupon it is, that Typhon is ſaid to accuſe him of baſtardie, as being nothing pure and ſincere, like unto his father, to wit, reaſon, and underſtanding ; which of it ſelfe is ſimple, and not medled with any paſſion : but in the matter adulterate and degenerate, by the reaſon that it is corporall. Howbeit, in the end the victorie is on Mercuries ſide, for hee is the diſcourſe of reaſon, which teſtiſtieth unto us, and ſheweth, that nature hath produced this world materiall 30 metamorphozed to the ſpiritual forme : for the nativity of Apollo, engendered betwene Isis & Ofiris, whiles the gods were yet in the belly of Rhea, ſymbolizeth ſuch much, that before the world was evidently brought to light and fully accompliſhed, the matter of reaſon, being found naturally of it ſelfe rude and unperfect, brought forth the firſt generation : for which cauſe they ſay, that god being as yet lame, was borne and begotten in darkeneſſe, whom they call the elder Horus. For the world yet it was not, but an image onely and deſigne of the world, and a bare fantaſie of that which ſhould be. But this Horus heere is determinate, definit and perfect, who killeth not Typhon right out, but taketh from him his force and puiſſance that he can doe little or nothing. And heereupon it is, that (by report) in the citie Coptus, the image of Horus holdeth in one hand the generall member of Typhon : and they ſable beſides, that Mercurie having bereft him of his ſinewes, made thereof ſtrings for his harpe, and ſo uſed them. Heereby 40 they teach, that reaſon framing the whole world, ſet it in tune, and brought it to accord, framing it of thoſe parts which before were at jarre and diſcord : howbeit remooved not, nor aboliſhed altogether the pernicious and hurtfull nature, but accompliſhed the vertue thereof. And therefore it is, that it being feeble and weak, wrought alſo (as it were) and intermingled or inteliſed with thoſe parts and members which be ſubject to paſſions and mutations, cauſeth earthquakes and tremblings, exceſſive heates, and extreame drineſſe, with extraordinary windes in the aire, beſides thunder, lightning and fire tempeſts. It impoſſoneth moreover the waters and windes, infecting them with peſtilence, reaching up and bearing the head aloft, as farre as to the Moone, obſcuring and darkning many times even that which is by nature cleane 50 and ſhining. And thus the Aegyptians do both thinke and ſay, that Typhon ſometime ſtrooke the eie of Horus, and another while plucked it out of his head and devoured it, and then afterwards delivered it againe unto the Sunne. By the ſtriking aforeſaid, they meane anigmatically the wane or decreaſe of the Moone monthly : by the totall privation of the eie, they underſtand her eclipſe and defect of light : which the Sunne doth remedy by reillumination of her ſtreight waies, as ſoone as ſhe is gotten paſt the ſhade of the earth. But the principall and more divine nature is compoſed and conſiſteth of three things, to wit, of an intellectuall nature, of matter, and a compound of them both, which we call the world. Now, that intellectuall part, Plato nameth Idea, the patterne also of the father: as for matter, he termeth it another, nurse, a foundation also and a plot or place for generation: and that which is produced of both, he is wont to call the issue and thing procreated. And a man may very well conjecture, that the Egyptians compared the nature of the whole world, especially to this, as the fairest triangle of all other. And Plato in his books of policy or common wealth, seemeth also to have used the same, when he composeth and describeth his nuptial figure: which triangle is of this sort: that the side which maketh the right angle, is of three, the basis of foure, and the third line called Hypotenusa of five, equivalent in power to the other two that comprehend it: so that the line which directly falleth plumb upon the base, must answer proportionably to the male; the base to the female, and the Hypotenusa to the issue of them both. And verily, Osiris representeth the beginning and principle: Isis that which receiveth; and Horus the compound of both. For the number of three is the first odde and perfect: the quaternarie is the first square or quadrate number, composed of the first even number, which is two; and five resembbeth partly the father, and in part the mother, as consisting both of two and three. And it should seeme also that the very name Idea, which is the universall world, was derived of Idea that is to say, five, and so in Greeke πεντα, in old time signified as much as to number: and that which more is, five being multiplied in it selfe, maketh a quadrat number, to wit, twentie five, which is just as many letters as the Egyptians have in their alphabet, and so many yeeres Apis also lived. And as for Horus, they used to call him Kuimin, which is as much to say, as seene, for that this word is sensible and visible. Isis likewise is sometime called Mouth, otherwhiles Athyri or Methyer. And by the first of these names, they signifie a Mother: by the second, the faire house of Horus, like as Plato termeth it to be the place capable of generation: the third is compounded of Full and the cause: for Matter is full of the world, as being married and keeping companie with the first principle, which is good, pure, and beautifully adorned. It should seeme haply also, that the Poet Hesiodus, when he saith, that all things at the first, were Chaos, Earth, Tartarus and Love, grounded upon no other principles than those, which are signified by these names, meaning by the Earth Isis; by Love Osiris; and by Tartarus Typhon; as we have made demonstration. For by Chaos it seemes that he would understand some place & receptacle of the world. Moreover, in some sort these matters require the fable of Plato, which in his booke entituled Symposium, Socrates inferred, namely, wherein he setteth downe the generation of Love: saying that Penia, that is to say, povertie, desirous to have children, went and lay with Porus, that is to say, riches, and slept with him, by whom she conceived with childe, and brought forth Love; who naturally is long and variable; and begotten of a father who is good, wife, and al-sufficient; and of a mother who is poore, needy, and for want, desirous of another, and evermore seeking and following after it. For the foresaid Porus, is no other, but the first thing amiable, desirable, perfect and sufficient. As for Penia, it is matter, which of it selfe is evermore bare and needy, wanting that which is good, whereby at length she is conceived with childe, after whom she hath a longing desire, and evermore ready to receive somewhat of him. Now Horus engendred betweene them (which is the world) is not eternall, nor impassible, nor incorruptible, but being evermore in generation, he endevoreth by vicissitude of mutations, and by periodical passion, to continue alwaies young, as if he should never die and perish. But of such fables as these we must make use, not as of reasons altogether really subsisting: but so, as we take out of each of them, that which is meet and convenient to our purpose. When as therefore we say Matter, we are not to rely upon the opinions of some Philosophers, and to thinke it for to be a bodie without soule, without qualitie, continuing in it selfe idle, and without all action whatsoever: for we call oile the matter of a perfume or ornament; and gold the matter of an image or statue, which notwithstanding is not voide of all similitude: and even so we say, that the very soule and understanding of a man, is the matter of vertue and of science, which we give unto reason, for to bring into order, and adorne. And some there were, who affirmed the minde or understanding to be the proper place of formes, and as it were, the expresse mould of intelligible things: like as there be Naturalists who hold, that the seed of a woman hath not the power of a principle serving to the generation of man, but standeth in stead of matter and nourishment onely: according unto whom, we also being grounded heerein, are to thinke that this goddesse having the fruition of the first and chiefe god, and conversing with him continually, for the love of those good things & vertues which are in him, is nothing adverse unto him, but loveth him him as her true spouse and lawfull husband: and like as we say, that an honest wife who enioieth ordinarily the company of her husband, loveth him neverthelesse, but hath still a minde unto him; even so giveth not the over to be enamoured upon him, although she be continually where he is, and replenished with his principall and most sincere parts. But when and where as Typhon in the end thrusteth himselfe betweene, and setteth upon the extreme parts, then and there the seemeth to be sadde and heavy, and thereupon is laid to mourne and lament, yea and to seeke up certeine reliques and pieces of Osiris, and ever as she can finde any, she receiveth and arraich them with all diligence, and as they are ready to perish and corrupt, she carefully tendeth and keepeth them close, like as againe she produceth and bringeth forth other things to light of her selfe. For the reasons, the Idea, and the influences of God which are in heaven and among the starres, doe there continue and remaine; but those which be diffaminate among the sensible and passible bodies, in the earth and in the sea, diffused in the plants and living creatures, the same dying and being buried, doe many times revive and rise againe fresh by the meanes of generations. And heereupon the fable faith thus much more, that Typhon cohabiteth and lieth with Nephthys, and that Osiris also by stealth and secretly, keepeth company with her: for the corruptive and destroying power, doeth principally possesse the extreme parts of that matter which they name Nephthys and death: and the generative & preserving vertue, conferreth into it little seed, & the same weak and feeble, as being marred and destroyed by Typhon: unless it be so much as Isis gathereth up & saveth, which she also nourisheth & maintaineth. But in one word, & to speake more generally, he is still better, as Plato & Aristotle are of opinion: for the naturall puissance to engender & to preserve, moveth toward him as to a subsistence and being: whereas that force of killing & destroying moveth behind, toward non subsistence: which is the reason, that they call the one Isis, that is to say, a motion animate and wife; as if the word were derived of εἶς, which signifieth to move by a certeine science and reason, for a barbarous word it is not. But like as the generall name of all gods and goddeses, to wit, Theos, is derived of θεω, that is to say, of visible, and θεω is derived of τρέω, that is to say, of running; even so, both we and also the Egyptians have called this goddesse Isis, and Isis, of intelligence and motion together. Semblably Plato saith, that in old time, when they said Isis, they meant Osiris, that is to say, sacred; like as Noësis also and Phronesis, quasi νοεσις, that is to say, the stirring and motion of the understanding, being caried and going forward: and they imposed this word θεωσις to those who have found out and discovered goodnesse and vertue: but contrariwise, have by reprochfull names noted such things as impeach hinder and stay the course of natural things, binding them so, as they can not go forward, to wit, αἰδω, vice, αἰδω, indigence, δουλος, cowardise, and αἰδω, griefe, as if they kept them from εἶς, or εἶς, that is to say, free progresse and proceeding forward. As for Osiris, a word it is composed of οὐρανός and εἶς, that is to say, holy and sacred; for he is the common reason or Idea, of things above in heaven, and beneath: of which, our ancients were wont to call the one fort, εἶς, that is to say, sacred; and the other, οὐρανός, that is to say, holy. The reason also which sheweth celestiall things, and such as move upward, is called Anubis, and otherwhiles Hermanubis; as if the one name were meet for those above, and the other for them beneath: whereupon they sacrificed unto the former a white cocke, and to the other a yellow or of fasson colour; for that they thought those things above, pure, simple and thining; but those beneath, mixed of a medley colour. Neither are we to marvell, that these termes are disfigured to the fashion of Greeke words; for an infinit number of more there be, which have bene transported out of Greece with those men who departed from thence in exile, and there remaine untill this day as strangers without their native countrey: whereof some there be which cause Poetry to be slandered, for calling them into use, as if it spake barbarously, namely, by those who terme such Poeticall and obscure words, Glosses. But in the books of Herimenes or Mercurius, so called, there is written by report, thus much concerning sacred names, namely, that the power ordeined over the circular motion and revolution of the Sunne, the Egyptians call Horus, and the Greeks Apollon: that which is over the wind, some name Osiris, others Sarapis, & some againe in the Egyptian language Sothi, which signifieth as much as conception or to be with childe: and thereupon it is, that by a little deflexion of the name, in the Greeke tongue that Canticular or Dogge itare is called Κουρ, which is thought appropriate unto Isis. Well I wote, that we are not to strive as touching names, yet would I rather give place unto the Egyptians about the name Sarapis than Osiris; for this is a meere Greeke word, whereas the other is a stranger: but as well the one as the other signifieth the same power of Divinity. And heereunto accordeth

the Aegyptian languages; for many times they terme Isis by the name of Minerva, which in their tongue signifieth as much, as I am come of my selfe. And Typhon, as we have already said, is named Seth, Babon and Smy, which words betoken all, a violent stay and impeachment, a contrariety and a diversion or turning aside another way. Moreover, they call the loadstone or Sederitis, the bone of Horus; like as iron, the bone of Typhon, as Manethos is mine author: for as the iron seemeth otherwhiles to follow the said loadstone, and suffereth it selfe to be drawn by it, and many times for it againe, returneth backe and is repelled to the contrary: even so, the good and comfortable motion of the world endued with reason, by perswasive speeches doeth convert, draw into it, and mollifie that hardnesse of Typhon: but otherwhiles againe, the same returneth backe into it selfe, and is hidden in the depth of penurie and impossibility. Over and besides, Eudoxus saith, that the Aegyptians devise of Jupiter this fiction, that both his legs being so grown together in one, that he could not goe at all, for very shame he kept in a desert wilderness: but Isis, by cutting and dividing the same parts of his body, brought him to his sound and upright going againe. Which fable giveth us covertly thus to understand, that the understanding and reason of God in it selfe going invisibly, and after an unscene manner, proceedeth to generation by the means of motion. And verily, that brazen Timbrel which they founde and rung at the sacrifices of Isis, named Sistrum, sheweth evidently, that all things ought <sup>to move</sup>, that is to say, to bestirre and shake, and never cease moving, but to be awakened and raised, as if otherwise they were drowlie, lay asleepe and languished: for it is said, that they turne backe and repulse Typhon with their Timbrels aforesaid, meaning thereby, that whereas corruption doth bind and stay nature, generation againe unbindeth and setteth it a worke by the means of motion. Now the said Sistrum being in the upper part round, the curvature and Abiss thereof comprehendeth foure things that are stirred and mooved: for that part of the world which is subject to generation and corruption, is comprehended under the sphere of the Moone, within which all things move and alter by the means of the foure elements, Fire, Earth, Water and Aire, upon the Abiss or rundle of the Sistrum toward the toppe, they engrave the forme of a cat with a mans face; but beneath, under those things which are shaken, one while they engrave the visage of Isis, another while of Nephthys; signifying by these two faces, nativity and death: for these be the motions and mutations of the elements. By the cat, they understand the Moone, for the variety of the skin, for the operation and worke in the night season, and for the fruitfulness of this creature: for it is said, that at first she beareth one kidling, at the second time two, the third time three, then foure, afterwards five, and so to seven; so that in all she brings forth 28, which are the daies of every Moone. And howsoever this may seeme fabulous, yet for certaine it is true, that the appuls or sights of these cats are full and large when the Moone is at full; but contrariwise, draw in and become smaller as the Moone is in the wane. As for the visage of a man, which they attribute unto the cat, they represent thereby the witty subtilty and reason about the mutations of the Moone. But to knit up all this matter in few words, reason would, that wee should thinke neither the Sunne nor the water, neither earth nor heaven to be Isis or Osiris; no more than exceeding drouth, extreame heat, fire and sea, is Typhon: but simply, whatsoever in such things is out of measure & extraordinary either in excessse or defect, we ought to attribute it unto Typhon: contrariwise, all that is well disposed, ordered, good and profitable, we must believe it to be the worke verily of Isis, but the image, example and reason of Osiris: which if we honour and adore in this sort, we shall not sinne or do amisse: and that which more is, we shall remoove and stay the unbelieve and doubtfull scrupulosity of Eudoxus, who asked the reason, why Ceres had no charge and superintendence over Love matters, but all that care lay upon Isis, and why Bacchus could neither make the river Nilus to swell and overflow, nor governe and rule the dead: for if we should alledge one general and common reason for all, we deeme these gods to have bene ordeined for the portion and dispensation of good things, and whatsoever in nature is good and beautifull, it is by the grace and means of these deities: whiles the one yieldeth the first principles, and the other receiveth and distributeth the same: by which means we shall be able to satisfie the multitude, and meet with those mechanickall and odious fellows; whether they delight in the change & variety of the aire, according to the seasons of the yere, or in the procreation of fruits, or in feednesse and tillings, appropriating and applying thereto what hath bene delivered of these gods; wherein they take pleasure, saying, that Osiris is interred, when the seed is covered in the ground; that he reviveth and riseth againe to light, when it becometh to spurt. And hereupon it is said, that Isis when she perceiveth herselfe to be concei-

ved and with childe, hangeth about her necke a preservative the sixth day of the moneth Phaophi, and is delivered of Harpoocrates about the Solstice of Winter, being as yet imperfect, and come to no maturity in the prime of the first flowers and buds: which is the reason that they offer unto her the first fruits of Lentils new sprung, and solemnize the feast and holidays of her childbirth and lying in after the Aquinox of the Spring: for when the vulgar sort heare this, they rest therein, take contentment, and beleve it straightwaies, drawing a probability for beleefe, out of ordinary things which are daily ready at hand. And verily, here in there is no inconvenience, if first and formost they make these gods common, and not proper and peculiar unto the Aegyptians, neither comprise Nilus only and the land which Nilus watereth, under these names, nor in naming their Meeres, Lakes and Lotes, and the nativity of their gods, deprive all other men of those great gods, among whom there is neither Nilus, nor Butus, nor Memphis; yet nevertheless acknowledge and have in reverence the goddesse Isis and other gods about her, of whom they have learned not long since to name some with the Aegyptian appellations: but time out of minde they knew their vertue and power, in regard whereof they have honoured and adored them. Secondly, which is a faire greater matter, to the end they should take heed and be affraid, lest ere they be aware, they dissolve and dissipate these divine powers in rivers, winds, plowing, plowing and other passions and alterations of the earth; as they do, who holde, that Bacchus is wine, Vulcan the flame of fire, and Proserpina (as Clement has said in one place) the spirit that bloweth and pierceth thorow the fruits of the earth. A Poet there was, who writing of reapers and mowers, said:

*What time young men their hands to Ceres put,
And her with books and fishes by piecemeale cut.*

And in no respect differ they from those, who thinke the sailes, cables, cordage and anchor, are the pilot; or that the thred and yarne, the warpe and woole, be the weaver; or that the goblet and potion cup, the Pistane or the Mede and honied water, is the Physician. But verily in so doing, they imprint absurd and blasphemous opinions of the gods, tending to Atheisme and impiety, attributing the names of gods unto natures and things senselesse, livelesse and corruptible, which of necessity men use as the need them, and can not chuse but marre and destroy the same. For we must in no wise thinke, that these very things be gods; for nothing can be a god which hath no soule, and is subject to man and under his hand: but thereby we know, that they be gods who give us them to use, and for to be perdurable and sufficient: not these in one place, and those in another, neither Barbarians nor Greeks, neither Meridionall nor Septentrionall; but like as the Sunne and Moone, the heaven, earth and sea, are common unto all, but yet in divers places called by sundry names: even so of one and the same intelligence that ordereth the whole world, of the same providence which dispenseth and governeth all, of the ministeriall powers subordinate over all, sundry honors and appellations according to the diversity of lawes have bene appointed. And the priests and religious, professed in such ceremonies, use mysteries and sacraments, some obscure, others more plaine and evident, to traine our understanding to the knowledge of the Deity: howbeit, not without perill and danger; for that some missing the right way, are fallen into superstition; and others avoiding superstition as it were a bogge or quagmire, have run before they could take heed, upon the rocke of impiety. And therefore, it becometh us in this case especially to be inducted by the direction of Philosophy, which may guide us in these holy contemplations, that we may worthily and religiously thinke of every thing said and done; to the end, that it befall not unto us as unto Theodorus, who said, that the doctrine which he rendered and reached out with the right hand, some of his scholars received and tooke with the left; even so, by taking in a wrong sense and otherwise than is meet and convenient, that which the lawes have ordeined touching feasts and sacrifices, we grossly offend. For, that all things ought to have a reference unto reason, a man may see and know by themselves: for celebrating a feast unto Mercurie the nineteenth day of the first moneth, they eat hony and figges, saying withall, this Mot, Sweet is the truth. As to that Phylactery or preservative, which they saie Isis to weare when she is with childe, by interpretation it signifieth, A true voice. As for Harpoocrates, we must not imagine him to be some young god, and not come to ripe yeeres, nor yet a man: but that he is the superintendant and reformer of mens language as touching the gods, being yet new, imperfect, and not distinct nor articulate; which is the reason, that he holdeth a scale-ring before his mouth, as a signe and marke of taciturnity and silence. Also in the moneth Mesori, they present unto him certaine kinds of Pulse, saying

saying withall, The tongue is Fortune: The tongue is Dæmon. Now of all plants which Aegypt bringeth forth, they consecrate the Peach tree unto him especially, because the fruit resembleth an heart, and the leafe a tongue: For of all those things which naturally are in man, there is nothing more divine than the tongue and speech, as touching the gods principally, neither in any thing cometh he neerer unto beatitude: and therefore I advise and require every man who repaired hither and cometh downe to this Oracle, to entertaine holy thoughts in his heart, and to utter seemly words with his tongue, whereas the common sort of people in their publicke feasts and solemne processions doe many ridiculous things, notwithstanding they proclaime and pronounce formally by the voice of the Crier and Bedil in the beginning of such solemnities, to keepe silence or speake none but good words: and yet afterwards they cease not but to give out most blasphemous speeches and to thinke as basely of the gods. How then shall men behave and demean themselves in those heavy and mournfull sacrifices from whence all mirth, and laughter is banished: if it be not lawfull either to omit any thing of the accustomed and usuall ceremonies, or to confound and mingle the opinions of the gods with absurd and false suspitions? The Greeks doe many semblable things unto the Aegyptians even in manner at the very same time: For at Athens in the feast called Thesophoria to the honor of Ceres, the women doe fast, sitting upon the ground: And the Beotians make a rising and remooving of the houses of Achæa, naming this feast εσπερα, that is to say, odious: as if Ceres were in heaviness and sorrow for the descent of her daughter Proserpina into hell: and this is that month wherein the starres called Pleiades appeare, and when the husbandmen begin to sow, which the Aegyptians name Atthy, the Athenians Pyæpseion, and the Beotians Dumatrios, as one would say Cerealis. And Thesopompus writeth, that the people inhabiting westward, doe both thinke and also call the Winter Saturne, the Summer Venus, and the Spring Proserpina: and that of Saturne and Venus all things be engendered. The Phrygians also imagining that God slepeeth all Winter, and lieth awake in Summer; thereupon celebrate in the one season, the feast of lying in bed and sleeping; in the other of expedition or waking, and that with much drinking & belly chere. But the Paphlagonians say, that he is bound and kept in ward as a prisoner during Winter, & in the Spring enlarged againe and set at liberty when he beginneth to stir and move. Now the very time giveth us occasion to suspect, that the heavy countenance & austeritie which they thew, is because the fruits of the earth be the hidden: which fruits our ancients in times past never thought to be gods, but the profitable and necessary gifts of the gods, availing much to live civilly, and not after a savage and beastly manner. But at what time of the yeere as they saw the fruits from the trees to fall and faile at once; and those which themselves had sown, with much adoe, by little and little opening and cleaving the earth with their owne hands and so covering and hilling the same, without any assured hope what would betide thereupon, and whether the same would come to any prooffe and perfection or no, they did many things like unto those that commit dead bodies to the earth, and mourne therefore. Moreover, like as we say, that he who buieth the bookes of Plato, buieth Plato: and who is the actor of Alexandres comedies, is said to act and play Alexander: Semblably, they did not spare and forbore to give the names of the celestiall gods unto their gifts and inventions, honouring the same with all reverence, for the use and need they had of them. But they who come after taking this grossely and foolishly, and upon ignorance unskillfully returning upon the gods the accidents of their fruits; not onely called their preface and fruition, the nativity of the gods; and their absence or want of them, the death and departure of the gods; but also beleev'd so much and were perswaded fully so: In such wise, as they have filled themselves with many absurd, leaud and confused opinions of the said gods. And yet verily, the error and absurdity of their opinions they had evidently before their eyes presented by Xenophanes the Colophonian, or other Philosophers after him, who admonished the Aegyptians, that if they repaire to them gods, they should not lament for them: and if they mournd, they should not take them for gods: as also that it was a ridiculous mockery, in their lamentations to pray unto them for to produce new fruits and bring them unto perfection for them, to the end that they might be consumed againe, & lamented for. But the case stands not so: for they bewaile the fruits that are gone and spent, but they pray unto the gods the authors and givers thereof, that they would vouchsafe to bestow upon them new, and make them grow in supply of those which were perished & lost. Right well therefore was it said of the Philosophers, that those who have not learned to heare and take words aright, receive also and use the things themselves amisse:

as for example, the Greeks who were not taught nor accustomed to call the statues of brasse and stone or painted images, the statues and images made to the honor of the gods, but the gods themselves: and afterwards were so bolde, as to say, that Lachares despoiled and stripped Minerva out of her clothes, and that Dionysius the tyrant polled Apollo who had a peruke or bush of golden haire; also that Jupiter Capitolinus during the civill warres was burnt and consumed with fire. And thus they see not, how in so doing they draw & admit false and erroneous opinions which follow upon such manner of speeches. And herein the Aegyptians of all other nations, have faulted most, about the beasts which they honor & worship. For the Greeks verily in this point both beleve and also speake well, saying that the dove is a bird sacred unto Venus, the dragon to Minerva, the raven or crow to Apollo, and the dog to Diana, according to that which Euripides said;

*The goddesse Diana shining by night,
In a dogs portraict will take much delight.*

But the Aegyptians, at least wise the common sort of them, worshipping and honoring these very beasts as if they were gods themselves, have not onely pestered with laughter and ridiculous mockery their Leiturgie and divine service, (for ignorance and folly in this case is the least fault) but also there is crept into the midst of men a strong opinion, which hath both farre posseed the simple and weaker sort, as that it bringeth them to more superstition. And as for such as be of more quicke and witty capacity, and who besides are more audacious, those it driveth headlong into beastly cogitations and Atheistall discourses: And therefore I hold it not amisse, curiously and by the way to annexe hereto such things as carry some probability and likelihood with them. For to say, that the gods for feare of Typhon were turned into these creatures, as if they thought to hide themselves within the bodies of the blacke storkes called Hides, of dogges and haukes, passeth all the monstrous woonders and fixions of tales that can be devised. Likewise to hold, that the soules of those who are departed, so many as remaine still in being, are regenerate againe onely in the bodies of these beasts, is as absurd and incredible as the other. And as for those who will seeme to render a civill and politicke reason hereof; some give out that Osiris in a great expedition or voiage of his, having divided his armie into many parts (such as in Greeke are called ταγματα and μικτα, that is to say, bands and companies) he gave unto every of them for their severall ensignes the portraictures and images of beasts: and each band afterwards honored their owne & had in reverence as some holy and sacred thing. Others affirme, that the kings who succeeded after Osiris, for to terrify their enemies went forth to battell, carrying before them, the heads of such beasts made in gold and silver, vpon their armes. Some there be againe, who alledge, that there was one of these their subtle and fine headed kings, who knowing that the Aegyptians of their owne nature were lightly disposed, ready to revolt and given to change and innovations, also that by reason of their great multitude, their power was hardly to be restrained and in manner invincible, in case they joined together in counsell and drew jointly in one common line, therefore he sowed among them a perpetuall superstition, which gave occasion of dissention and enmity among them that never could be appeased: For when he had given commandement unto them, for to have in reverence those beasts which naturally disagreed and warred together, even such as were ready to eat and devour one another, whiles every one endeavored alwaies to succor and maintaine their owne, and were moved to anger if any wrong or displeasure were done to those which they affected; they fell together themselves by the eares ere they were aware and killed one another, for the enmity and quarrell which was betwene those beasts whom they adored, and so fostered mutuall and mortall hatred. For even at this day, of all the Aegyptians the Lycopolitans onely, eat mutten, because the wolfe whom they adore as a god is enemy unto sleepe. And verily in this our age, the Oxyrinchites, because the *Cynopolites, that is to say, the inhabitants of the city Cynopolis, * Who wor- eat the fish named Oxyrinchos, that is to say, with the sharpe becke, whensoever they can entrap ship the dog, do or catch a dogge, make no more adoe but kill him for a sacrifice and eat him when they have done. Vpon which occasion having levied warre one against the other, and done much mischief reciprocally, after they had bene well chastised and plagued by the Romans, they grew to attonement and composition. And for as much as many of them doe say, that the soule of Typhon, departed into these beasts, it seemeth that this fiction importeth thus much, that every brutish and beastly nature, cometh and proceedeth from some evill dæmon, and therefore to pacifie him that he doe no mischief, they worship and adore these beasts. And if paraven-

ture there happen any great drowght or contagious heat which causeth pestilent maladies or other unusuall and extraordinary calamities, the priests bring forth some of those beasts which they serue and honor in the darke night, without any noise in great silence, menasing them at the first and putting them in fright. Now if the plague or calamity continue still, they kill and sacrifice them, thinking this to be a punishment and chastisement of the said evilly daemon, or else some great expiation for notable finnes and transgressions. For in the city verily of Jaditha, as Manethos maketh report, the manner is to burne men alive, whom they called Typhon; whose ashes when they had boyled through a ramise, they scattered abroad, untill they were reduced to nothing: But this was done openly at a certaine time in those daies which are called Cynades or Canicular. Many the immolation of these beasts, which they accounted sacred, was performed secretly and not at a certaine time or upon perfixed daies, but according to the occurrences of those accidents which happened. And therefore the common people neither knew nor saw ought, but when they solemnize their obsequies and funerals for them, in the presence of all the people they shew some of the other beasts and throw them together into the sepulcher, supposing thereby to vex and gall Typhon, and to repress the joy that he hath in doing mischief. For it seemeth that Apis with some other few beasts was consecrated to Osiris: howsoever they attribute many more unto him. And if this be true, I suppose it importeth that which we seeke and search all this while, as touching those which are confessed by all, and have common honors; as the foresaid storke Ibis, the hawke and the Babian or Cyncephalus, yea and Apis himselfe, for so they call the goat in the city Mendes. Now their remaineth the utility and symbolization hereof: considering that some participate of the one, but the most part of both. For as touching the goat, the sheepe and the Ichneumon, certaine it is, they honor them for the use and profit they receive by them: like as the inhabitants of Lemnos honor the birds called Corydalis, because they finde out the locusts nests and quash their egges. The Thessalians also have the storkes in great account, because whereas their country is given to breed a number of serpents, the said storkes when they come, kill them up all. By reason whereof they made an edict, with an intimation, that whosoever killed a storke should be banished his country. The serpent Apis also, the wezill and the fie called the bettill, they reverence, because they observe in them I wot not what little slender images (like as in drops of water we perceive the resemblance of the Sunne) of the divine power. For many there be even yet, who both thinke and say, that the male wezill engendred with the female by her care, and that she bringeth forth her yoong at the mouth: which symbolizeth as they say, and representeth the making and generation of speech. As for the beetils, they hold, that throughout all their kinde there is no female, but all the males doe blow or cast their seed into a certaine globus or round matter in forme of bals which they drive from them and roll to and fro contrary waies, like as the Sunne, when he moveth himselfe from the west to the east, seemeth to turne about the heaven cleane contrary. The Apis also they compare to the planet of the Sunne, because he doth never age and wax old, but mooveth in all facility, readinesse and celerity without the meanes of any instruments of motion. Neither is the crocodile set so much by among them, without some probable cause: For they say that in some respect he is the very image representing god: as being the onely creature in the world which hath no tongue: for as much as divine speech needeth neither voice nor tongue:

*But through the paths of Justice walks with still and silent pace:
Directing right all mortall things, in their due time and place.*

And of all beasts living within the water, the crocodile onely (as men say) hath over his eies a certaine thinne filme or transparent webbe to cover them, which cometh downe from his forehead in such sort, as that he can see and not be seene: wherein he is conformable and like unto the soveraigne of all the gods. Moreover looke in what place the female is discharged of her spawne, there is the utmost marke and limit of the rising and inundation of Nylus: for being not able to lay their egges in the water, and affraid withall to sit far off, they have a most perfect and exquisite foresight of that which will be; insomuch as they make use of the rivers approach when they lay: and whilst they sit and cove, their egges be preserved drie, and are never drenched with the water. A hundred egges they lay, in so many daies they hatch, and as many yecres live they, which are longest lived: And this is the first and principall number

that

that they use who treat of celestiall matters. Moreover, as touching those beasts which are honored for both causes, we have spoken before of the dogge: but the Ibis or blacke storke, besides that it killeth those serpents whose pricke and sting is deadly, the was the first that taught us the use of that evacuation or cleansing the body by clistre, which is so ordinarie in Physicke: for perceived the is to purge, cleanse, and mundifie her selfe in that sort: whereupon the most religious priests, and those who are of greatest experience, when they would be purified, take for their holy water to sprinckle themselves with, the very same out of which the Ibis drinketh, for she never drinks of empoisoned and infected water, neither will she come neere unto it. Moreover, with her two legges standing at large one from the other, and her bill together, she maketh an absolute triangle with three even sides, besides, the varietie and speckled mixture of her plume, consisting of white feathers and blacke, representeth the Moone when she is past the full. Now we must not marvell at the Aegyptians, for pleasing and contenting themselves in such slight representations and similitudes, for even the Greeks themselves as well in their pictures as other images of the gods, melted and wrought to any mould, used many times such resemblances: for one statue in Creta they had of Jupiter without eares, because it is not meant for him who is lord & governour of all, to have any instruction by the hearing of others. Unto the image of Pallas, Phidias the Imager set a dragon; like as to that of Venus in the city of Elys a Tortoise: giving us by this to understand, that maidens had need of guidance and good custodie, and that married woman ought to keepe the house and be silent. The three-forked mace of Neptune, signifieth the third place, which the sea and element of water holdeth, under heaven and aire; for which cause they called the sea Amphitrite, and the petie sea gods Tritons. Also the Pythagoreans have highly honored the numbers and figures Geometrical, by the gods names: for the triangle with three equal sides, they called Pallas, borne out of Jupiter's braine, and Trigonia, for that it is equally divided with three right lines, from three angles drawn by the plumb. One or unitie they named Apollo,
As well for his perswasive grace;
as plaine simplicitie,
That doeth appeere in youthfull face, and this is unitie.

Two, they termed Contention and Boldnesse: and three Justice. For whereas to offend and be offended, to doe and to suffer wrong, come the one by excessse, and the other by defect, just remaineth equally betweene in the middes. That famous quaternarie of theirs, named Tetractys, which consisteth of foure nines, and amounteth to thirtie fixe, was their greatest oth, to rise in every mans mouth, & they called it the World, as being accomplished of the first foure even numbers, and the first foure odde, compounded into one together. If then the most excellent and best renowned Philosophers, perceiving in things which have neither body nor soule, some type and figure of deitie, have not thought it good to neglect or despise any thing herein, or passe it over without due honour, I suppose we ought much lesse so to doe in those properties and qualities which are in natures sensitive, having life, and being capable of passions and affections, according to their inclinations and conditions. And therefore we must not content our selves and rest in the worshipping of these and such like beasts, but by them adore the divinitie that shineth in them, as in most cleere and bright mirrors, according to nature, reputed them alwaies as the instrument and artificiall workmanship of God, who ruleth and governeth the universall world: neither ought we to thinke, that any thing void of life, and destitute of sense, can be more woorthy or excellent than that which is endued with life and senses; no not although a man hung never so much gold or a number of rich emeralds about it: for it is neither colours nor figures, nor polished bodies, that deitie doeth inhabit in: but whatsoever doeth not participate life, nor is by nature capable thereof, is of a more bale and abject condition than the very dead. But that nature which liveth and seeth, which also in it selfe hath the beginning of motion and knowledge of that which is proper and meet, as also of that which is strange unto it, the same (I say) hath drawn some influence and portion of that wise providence, whereby the universall world is governed, as Heracitus saith. And therefore the deitie is no lesse represented in such natures, than in works made of brasse and stone, which are likewise subject to corruption and alteration, but over and besides, they are naturally voide of all sense and understanding. Thus much of that opinion, as touching the worthip of beasts, which I approve for best.

Moreover

Moreover the habilliments of Isis be of different tinctures and colours: for her whole power consisteth and is employed in matter which receiveth all formes, and becometh all manner of things, to wit, light, darknesse, day, night, fire, water, life, death, beginning and end. But the robes of Osiris, have neither shade nor varietie, but are of one simple colour, even that which is lightsome and bright. For the first & primitive cause is simple; the principle or beginning, is without all mixture, as being spiritual & intelligible. Whereupon it is that they make shew but once for all of his habilliments, which when they have done they lay them up againe and bestow them safe and keepe them so straightly, that no man may see or handle them: whereas contrariwise they use those of Isis many times: For that sensible things be in usage, and seeing they are ready and ever in hand, and be subject evermore to alternative alterations, therefore they be laid abroad and displayed, for to be seene often. But the intelligence of that which is spiritual and intellectuall, pure, simple, and holy, shining as a flash of lightning, offereth it selfe unto the soule but once, for to be touched and seene. And therefore Plato and Aristotle call this part of Philosophie Transcendens, for that those who discourse of reason, have passed beyond all matters subject to mingled & variable opinions, leape at length to the contemplation of this first principle, which is simple, and not materiall: and after they have in some sort attained to the pure and sincere truth of it, they suppose that their Philosophy as now accomplished is come to small perfection. And that which the priests in these daies are very precise and wary to shew, keeping it hidden and secret with great care and diligence, allowing not so much as a sight thereof secretly & by the way also that this god reigneth & ruleth over the dead, and is no other than he whom the Greeks name Hades and Pluto: the common people not understanding how this is true, are much troubled; thinking it very strange that the holy & sacred Osiris should dwell within or under the earth, where their bodies lie who are thought to be come unto their finall end. But he verily is most farre removed from the earth, without staine or pollution, pure and void of all substance or matter, that may admit death or any corruption whatsoever. Howbeit the soules of men, so long as they be heere beneath clad within bodies and passions, can have no participation of God, unlesse it be so much onely as they may attaine unto the intelligence of, by the study of Philosophy, and the same is but in manner of a darke dreame. But when they shall be delivered from these bonds, and passe into this holy place, where there is no passion, nor possible forme: then, the same god is their conductour and king: then they cleave unto him, as much as possible they can: him they contemplate and behold without fatietie: desiring that beautie, which it is not possible for men to utter and expresse: whereof according to the old tales, Isis was alwaies enamoured: and having pursued after it untill she enjoined the same, she afterwards became replenished with all goodnesse and beautie that heere may be engendered. And thus much may suffice for that sense and interpretation which is most becomming the gods. Now it we must besides speake as I promised before, of the incense and odors which are burnt every day: let a man consider first in his minde and take this with him, that the Egyptians were men evermore most studious in those matters which made for the health of their bodies, but principally in this regard, they had in recommendation those that concerned the ceremonies of divine service in their sanctifications and in their ordinary life, and conversation; wherein they have no lesse regard unto holiness than to holinesse: For they thinke it neither lawfull nor becomming to serve that essence which is altogether pure, every way found and unpolluted, either with bodies or soules corrupt with inward forces and subject to secret maladies. Seeing then, that the aire, which we most commonly use, and within which we alwaies converse, is not evermore alike disposed nor in the same temperature: but in the night is thickened and made grosse, whereby it compresseth and draweth the body into a kind of sadnesse and pensivenesse, as if it were overcast with darke mists and waighed downe: so soone as ever they be up in a morning, they burne incense by kindling Rosin, for to cleanse and purifie the aire by this rarefaction and subtilization, awaking as it were and raising by this meanes, the inbred spirits of our bodies which were languishing and drowie: for that in this odor there is a forcible vertue which vehemently striketh upon the senses. Again, about noone, perceiving that the Sunne draweth forcibly out of the earth by his heat, great quantity of strong vapours, which be intermingled with the aire, then they burne myrrh: For the heat of this aromaticall gum and odor is such, as that it dissipeth & dispatcheth whatsoever is grosse, thicke and muddy in the aire. And verily in the time of pestilence Physicians thinke to remedy the same by making great fires, being of this opinion, that the flame doth sublimate and rarefie the aire: which which it effecteth no doubt the better in case they burne sweet wood, as of the Cypresse trees, of Juniper, or * Pitch tree. And heereupon reported it is that the Physician Acrion, when there reigned a grievous plague at Athens, was a great name and reputation, by causing good fires to be made about the sicke persons: For he saved many by that meanes. And Aristotle writeth that the sweet scents and good smells of perfumes, ointments, flowers and fragrant meadows, serve no lesse for health than for delight and pleasure. For that by their heat and mildenesse they gently dissolve and open the substance of the braine, which naturally is cold and as it were congealed. Again, if it be so that the Egyptians call myrrh, in their language Bal, which if a man interpret signifieth as much as the discussing and chasing away of idle talke and ravings this also may serve for a testimonie to confirme that which we say. As for that composition among them named Cyphi, it is a confection or mixture receiving sixteene ingredients. For there enter into it, hony, wine, raisins, cyperous, rosin, myrrh, aspalathus & fesseli. Moreover, the sweet rush Schanos, Bitumen, Mosse, and the docke: Besides two sorts of the juniper berries, the greater & the lesse, Cardamomum and Calamus. All these speeches are compounded together not at a venture and as it cometh into their heads: but there be read certaine sacred writings unto the Apothecaries and Perfumers, all the while that they mix them. As for this number, although it be quadrate, and made of a square, and onely of the numbers equal, maketh the space contained within equal to his circumference, we are not to thinke that this is any way materiall to the vertue thereof: but most of the simples that goe to this composition being aromaticall, cast a pleasant breath from them and yeeld a delectable and holisome vapour, by which the aire is altered: and withall, the body being mooved with this evaporation, is gently prepared to repose, and taketh an attractive temperature of sleepe, in letting slacke and unbinding the bonds of cares, wearinesse and sorrowes incident in the day time, and that without the helpe of surfer and drunkenesse: polishing and smoothing the imaginative part of the braine which receiveth dreames in manner of a mirror, causing the same to be pure and neat, as much or rather more, than the sound of harpe, lute, viole, or any other instruments of musicke; which the Pythagoreans used for to procure sleepe, enchanting by that device, and dulcing the unreasonable part of the soule which is subject to passions. For sweet odors, as they doe many times excite and stirre up the sense when it is dull and beginneth to faile: so contrariwise they make the same as often drowie and heavy, yea and bring it to quietnesse, whiles those aromaticall smells by reason of their smoothnesse are spread and diffused in the bodie: According as some Physicians say, that sleepe is engendered in us, when the vapour of the food which we have received, creepeth gently along the noble parts and principall bowels, and as it toucheth them, causeth a kinde of tickling which lullet them asleepe. This Cyphi they use in drinke, as a composition to season their cups and as an ointment besides: for they hold, that being taken in drinke, it scowereth the guttes within and maketh the belly laxative: and being applied outwardly as a liniment, it mollifieth the bodie. Over and above all this, Rosin is the worke of the Sunne: but Myrrh they gather by the Moone light, out of those plants from which it doth deffill: But of those simples whereof Cyphi is compounded, some there be which love the night better, as many I meane as be nourished by cold windes, shadows, dewes, and moisture: For the brightness and light of the day is one and simple: and Pindarus saith that the Sunne is seene through the pure and solitarie aire: whereas the aire of the night is a compound and mixture of many lights and powers, as if there were a confluence of many seeds from every starre running into one. By good right therefore they burne these simple perfumes in the day as those which are engendered by the vertue of the Sunne: but this being mingled of all sorts and of divers qualities, they set on fire about the evening, and beginning of the night.

OF THE ORACLES THAT HAVE CEASED TO GIVE ANSWERE.

The Summarie.

His spirit of error hath endeavored alwaies and assailed the best he can, to maintaine his power and dominion in the world, having after the revolt and fall of Adam bene furnished with instruments of all sorts, to tyrannize over his slaves. In which number we are to range the oracles and predictions of certaine idoles erected in many places by his instigation; by means whereof, this sworne enemy to the glory of the true God, hath much prevailed. But when it pleased our heavenly father to give us his sonne for to be our Saviour, who descending from heaven to earth, sooke upon him our humane nature, wherein he sustained the paine and punishment due for our sinnes, to deliver us out of hell, and by vertue of his merits, to give us entrance into the kingdom of heaven, the truth of his grace being published and made knownen in the world by the preaching of the Apostles and their faithful successeurs; the Diuill and his angels, who had in many parts and places of the world abused and deceived poore idolaters, were forced to acknowledge their Sovereigne, and to keepe silence, and suffer him to speake unto those whom he meant to call unto salvation or els to make them unexcusable, if they refused to heare his voice. This cessation of the Oracles put the priests and sacrificers of the the Paimins to great trouble and wonderfull perplexitie, in the time of the Romane Emperours: whiles some imputed the cause to this, others to that. But our author in this Treatise discouerseth upon this question, shewing thereby, how great and lamentable is the blindness of mans reason and wisdom, when it thinketh to attaine unto the secrets of God. For all the speeches of the Philosophers, whom he bringeth in here as interlocutors, are mere tales and fables devised for the nonce, which every Christian man of any meane judgement will at the first sight condemne. Yet thus much good there is in this discourse, that the Epicureans are here taxed and condemned in sundry passages. As touching the contents of this conference, the occasion thereof ariseth from the speech of Demetrius and Cleombrotus, who were come unto the Temple of Apollo: for the one of them having rehearsed a wonder as touching the Temple of Jupiter Ammon, mooveth thereby a further desire of disputation: but before they enter into it, they continue still: the former speech, of the course and motion of the Sunne. Afterwards, they come to the maine point, namely, Why all the Oracles of Greece (excepting that onely of Lebadaia) ceased? To which demand, Planetusdes a Cynique Philosopher answereth, That the wickednesse of men is the cause thereof. Ammonius another wife attributeth all unto the warres which had consumed the Pilgrims that used to resort unto the said Oracles. Lamprias propoeth his opinion, and Cleombrotus inferring another of his, fall into a discourse and common place as touching Demons, whom he verily raungeth betwene gods and men, disputing of their nature, according to the Philosophie of the Greeks. Then he proveth, that these Demons have the charge of Oracles, but by reason that they departed out of one countrey into another, or died, these Oracles gave over. To this purpose he telleth a notable tale as touching the death of the great Pan, concluding thus, that seeing Demons be mortall, we ought not to wonder at the cessation of Oracles. After this, Ammonius consureth the Epicureans, who holde, That there be no Demons. And upon the confirmation of the former positions, they enter together into the examination of the opinions of the Epicureans and Platonists concerning the number of the worlds, to wit, whether they be many or infinit? growing to this resolution after long dispute, that there be many, and namely, to the number of five. Which done, Demetrius reviving the principall question, mooveth also a new one, Why the Demons have this power to speake by Oracles? Unto which there be many and divers answers made, which determine all in one Treatise according to the Platonists Philosophie, of the principall, efficient and finall cause, of those things that are effected by reason, and particularly of divinations and predictions:

predictions: for which, he maketh to concurre, the Earth, the Sunne, Exhalations, Demons, and the Soule of man. Now all the intention and drift of Plutarch groweth to this point, that the earth being incited and moved by a naturall vertue, and that which is proper unto it, and in no wise divine and perdurable, hath brought forth certaine powers of divination: that these inspirations breaching and arising out of the earth, have touched the under standings of men with such efficacy, as that they have caused them to foresee future things as farre off and long ere they hapned; yea, and have addressed and framed them to give answers both in verse and prose. Item, that like as there be certaine grounds and lands more fertile one than the other, or producing some particular things according to the divers and peculiar proprietie of each: there be also certaine places and traicts of the world endued with this temperature, which both ingender and also incite these Enthusiasticke and divining spirits. Furthermore, that this puissance is meere divine indeed, howbeit, not per se, eternall, unmoveable, nor that which is for ever perdurable: but by proceffe and succession of time, doth diminish and decay by little and little, untill at length through age it consume to nothing. Semblably, that this great number of spirits are not engendered incessantly, neither proceed they forward or retire backe continually; but this vertue of the earth moveth of it selfe in certaine revolutions, and by that means is enshaded and puffed up: and after that in time it hath gathered abundance of new vapours, it filleth the caves and holes so full untill they discharge & send them up againe. Whereupon it cometh to passe, that the exhalations stirred in the said caves, and desirous to issue forth, after that they have bene beaten backe againe, violently assaile the foundations, and stirre the temples built upon them in such sort, as being shaken as it were by earthquakes, more or lesse in one place than another, according to the acervures and passages made for the exhalation, they finde issue through the treighths, brake forth with forcible violence, and so produce these Oracles. In summe, the intention and minde of Plutarch is to prove, that the beginning, progresse and end of these Oracles proceed all from naturall causes, to wit, the exhalations of the earth. Wherein he is fully and grossly deceived, considering that such Oracles in Greece have bene inspired by the diuill, who hath kept an open shop there of imposture, deceits, and the most horrible seducements that can be devised. For mine owne part, I impute this whole discourse of Plutarch unto the ignorance of the true God, the very mother of this dispright, which bringeth forth this present treatise, saved by the Pagans, for to darken the resplendent light of that great King of the world and his truth: which hath dissembled and brought to nothing all the subtill devices of Saran, who triumphed over all Greece by the means of his Oracles. Thus after large discourses upon these matters, Plutarch concludeth the whole disputation: the conclusion whereof he enricheth with an accident that befel unto the Prophetesse of Delphi; where a man may evidently see the imposture and fraud of diuels and of malicious spirits: and those be the Demons which Plutarch would designe, and their horrible tyranny over men destitute of Gods grace.

OF THE ORACLES THAT have ceased to give answers.

Here goeth a tale, my friend Terentius Priscus, that in times past certaine Eagles, or els Swannes, flying from the utmost ends of the earth opposit one unto the other, toward the mids thereof encountered & met together at the very place where the temple of Apollo Pythius was built, even that which is called Omphalos, that is to say, the Navill. And that afterwards, Epimenides the Phaeitian being desirous to know whether this fable was true, fought unto the Oracle for to be resolved: but having received from the god a doubtfull and uncerteine answer; by reason thereof, made these verses:

Now sure in mids of land or sea,
there is no Navill such;
Or if there be, the gods it know:
men must not see so much.

And verily the god Apollo chastised and punished him well enough, for being so curious as to search into the truth or proofe of an olde received tale, as if it had bene some antique picture. But true it is, that in our daies, a little before the solemnity of the Pythique games, which were held

* That is to lay, England.

held during the magistracy of Callistratus, there were two devout & holy personages, who coming from the contrary ends of the earth, met together in the city of Delphi: the one was Demetrius the Grammarian, who came from as farre as * Britaine, minding to returne unto Tarsus in Cilicia, the city of his nativity; and the other, Cleombrotus the Lacedæmonian, who had travelled and wandered long time in Aegypt within the Troglodytique province, and failed a good way up into the Red sea, not for any traffique or negotiation of merchandize, but onely as a traveller that desired to see the world and to learne new fashions abroad. For having wherewith sufficiently to mainteine himselfe, and not caring to gather more than might serve his owne turne, he employed that time which he had, this waies, and gathered together a certeine history, as the subject, matter and ground of that Philosophy, which propofed for the end thereof (as he himselfe said) Theologie. This man having not long before bene at the temple and Oracle of Jupiter Ammon, made semblance as if he woondered not much at any thing that he saw there; only he reported unto us a strange thing, worth the observation, and better to be considered of, which he learned of the Priests there, as touching the burning lampe that never goeth out: for by their saying, every yeere it spendeth lesse oile than other. Whereby they gather certainly (quoth he) the inequality of the yeeres, whereby the latter is evermore shorter than the former: for great probability there is, that seeing lesse oile is consumed, the time also is in proportion so much lesse. Now when all the company there present made a woonder heereat, Demetrius among the rest made a very jest of it, and said it was a meere mockery to search into the knowledge of matters so high, by such slight and small presumptions: for this was not, as Alcæus said, to paint a lion by measure of his claw or paw, but to move and alter heaven, and earth, and all the world, by the conjecture onely of a weeke and lampe; yea, and to overthrow at once all the Mathematicall sciences. It is neither to nor fo, good sir, quoth Cleombrotus; for neither the one nor the other will trouble these men. For first, they will never yeeld and give place unto the Mathematicians in the certitude of their proofs; for looner may the Mathematicians misreckon the time, and misse in their calculation and accounts, in such long motions and revolutions so farre remote and distant, than they faile in the measure of the oile which they observe continually and marke most precisely, in regard of that which they see so strange and against all discourse of reason. Again, not to grant and allow (o Demetrius) that petie things may many times serve for signes and arguments of great and important matters, would hinder and prejudice many arts, considering that it is as much as to take away the proofs from many demonstrations, conclusions and predictions. And verily, even you that are Grammarians, will seeme to verifie and avow one point which is not of the least consequence: namely, that those heroique princes and VVorthies, who were at the Trojane warre, used to have their haire, and keepe their skin smooth with the rasour; because forsooth in reading of Homer you meet with some place where he maketh mention barely of the rasour. Semblably, that in those daies men used to put forth their money upon usury, for that in one passage the said Poet writeth thus:

Whereas my debt is neither new nor small:

But as daies come and goe, it grows withall.

Meaning by the verbe αὐξάνει, that his debt did grow unto him by the interest for use. Furthermore, because ever and anon the same Homer attributeth unto the night, the epithet βαρὴ, which signifieth Quicke and sharpe; you Grammarians are much affected to this word, saying: He understandeth thereby, that the shadow of the earth being round, groweth point-wife or sharp at the end, in manner of a cone or pyramis. And what is he, who standing upon this point, that small things may not be the proofes and signes of greater matters; will approve this argument in Physicke: namely, that when there is a multitude of spiders seene, it doeth prognosticate a pestilent Summer: or in the Spring season, when the leaves of the olive tree resemble the crows-feet? VVho (I say) will ever abide to take the measure of the Sunnes body, by clepsydras or water-dials, with a gallon or pinte of water; or that a tyle-formed tablet, making a sharpe angle by the plumb, enclining upon a plaine superficies, should shew the just measure of the elevation of pole from the Horizon, which alwaies is to be seene in our Hemisphere? Lo, what the priests and prophets in those parts may alledge and say. And therefore we ought to produce some other reasons against them, in case we would mainteine the course of the Sunne to be constant and unvariable, as we hold here in these countries. And not of the Sunne onely, (cried out with a loud voice Ammonius the Philosopher, who was then in place) but also of the whole heaven, which by this reckoning commeth in question. For if it be granted, that the

yeeres decrease: the race of the Sunne which he runneth betweene the one Tropique and the other, must of necessity be cut shorter, and that it taketh not up so great a part of the Horizon, as the Mathematicians set downe; but that it becommeth shorter, and lesse according as the Southern or Meridionall parts be contracted, and gather alwaies toward the Septentrionall and Northerne. Whereupon it will ensue that our Summer will be shorter, and the temperature of the aire by consequence colder; by reason that the Sunne turneth more inwardly, and descenbeth greater paralelles, or equidistant circles, than those be about the Tropicks, at the longest and shortest daies of the yeere. Moreover, this would follow heereupon, that the Gnomons in the dials at Syene in Aegypt, will be no more shadowlesse at the Summer Tropique or Solstice: and many of the fixed starres will runne under one another; some also of them will be forced for want of roome to runne one upon another, and be huddled pell-mell together. And if they shall say, that when other starres hold their owne, and keepe their ordinary courses, the Sunne onely observeth no order in his motions, they cannot alledge any cause that should so much as hasten his motion alone among so many others as there be, but they shall trouble and disquiet most of those things which are seene evidently above: and namely, those generally which happen unto the Moone in regard of the Sunne. So that we shall have no need of those, who observe the measures of oile, for to proove the diversitie of the yeeres; because the eclipses both of the Moone and Sun will sufficiently shew if there be any at all, for that the Sun shall many times meet with the Moone, and the Moone reciprocally fall as often within the shadow of the earth: so as we shall need no more to display and discover the vanity and fallshipe of this reason. Yea, but I my selfe (quoth Cleombrotus) have seene the said measure of oile, for they thewed many of them unto me; and that of this present yeere when I was with them, appeared to be much lesse than those in yeeres past. So that Ammonius made answer in this wise: And how is it that other men who adore the inextinguible fires, who keepe and preserve the same religiously for the space of an infinit number of yeeres, one after another, could not as well perceive and observe so much? And say that a man should admit this report of yours to be true, as touching the measures of the oile: were it not much better to ascribe the cause thereof unto some coldnesse or moisture of the aire; or rather contrariwise to some drinck and heat, by reason whereof, the fire in the lampe being enfeeblled is not able to spend so much nutriment, and therefore hath no need thereof? For I have heard it many times affirmed by some: That in Winter the fire burneth much better, as being more stronger & more fortified, by reason that the heat thereof is drawn in, more united and driven closer by the exterior colde: whereas great heats and droughts doe weaken the strength thereof, so as it becommeth faint, loose, and rawe without any great vehemencie and vigour; nay, if a man kinde it against the Sunne-shine, the operation of it is lesse, hardly catcheth it hold of the wood or fawell, and more slowly consumeth it the same. But most of all, a man may lay the cause upon the oile it selfe; for it goeth not against reason to say, that in old time the oile was of lesse nutriment, and stood more upon the waterish substance than now it doth, as pressed out of olives which grew upon young trees: but afterwards being better concocted, and riper in the fruit, coming of plants more perfect and fully grown in the same quantity, was more effectually, and able longer to nourish and mainteine the fire. Thus you see how a man may save and save that supposition of the Ammonian priests, although it seeme very strange and wonderfully extravagant. After that Ammonius had finished his speech: Nay rather (quoth I) Cleombrotus, I beseech you tell us somewhat of the oracle: for there hath gone a great name, time out of minde of the deity resident there; but now it seemeth that the reputation thereof is cleane gone. And when Cleombrotus made no answer heereunto, but held downe his head, and cast his eyes upon the ground: There is no neede (quoth Demetrius) to demand or make any question of the oracles there, when as we see the oracles in these parts to faile, or rather indeed (all save one or two) brought to nothing. This rather would be enquired into, what the cause should be, that generally they all doe cease? For to what purpose should we speake of others, considering that Boetia it selfe, which heerebefore in old time resounded and rung againe with oracles; now is quite voide of them, as if the springs and fountaines were dried up, and a great ficcitie and drought of oracles had come over the whole land? For there is not at this day, goe throughout all Boetia, (unlesse it be onely in Lebadia) one place where a man may, would he never to faine, draw any divination, what need forever he hath of any oracle: for all other parts are either mute, or altogether desolate and forlorne. And yet in the time of the Medes warre, the oracle of Ptoles Apollo

was in great request, and that of Amphiarus was in no lesse reputation; for both the one and the other was sought unto. And in that of Ptoles Apollo when the priest or prophet who served in the oracle, used the Aetolian language, and made answer unto those who were sent thither from the Barbarians, inasmuch as none of the assistants understood one word: This Enthusiasm or divine inspiration, covertly gave thereby thus much to understand, that these oracles pertained nothing unto the Barbarians, neither were they permitted to have the ordinary Greeke language at their command. As for that of Amphiarus, the servant who was thither sent, falling a sleepe within the sanctuary, thought as he dreamed, that he saw and heard the minister of the god, as if with his word and voice he seemed at the first to drive him out, and command him to depart forth of the temple, saying, that his god was not there; but afterwards to thrust him away with both his hands: but in the end, seeing that he staid still, tooke up a great stone, and therewith smot him upon the head. And verily all this answered just to that which afterwards befell, and was a very prediction and denunciation of a future accident: for Mardonius was vanquished not by the king himselfe, but by the Tutor and lieutenant of the king of Lacedaemon, who at that time had the conduct and command of the Grecks armie; yea and with a stone felled to the ground, according as the Lydian servant aforesaid imagined in his sleepe that he was smitten with a stone. There flourished likewise about the same time the Oracle of Tegyra, where the report goeth that the god Apollo himselfe was borne: and verily two rivers there are that runne neere one to the other, whereof the one some at this day call Phanix, that is to say, the date tree; the other Elas, that is to say, the olive tree. At this Oracle, during the time of the Medes warre, when the prophet Echecrates there served, god Apollo answered by his mouth, that the Grecks should have the honour of the victory in this warre, and continue superior. Also in the time of the Peloponnesiaque warre, when the Delians were driven out of their Island, there was brought unto them an answer from the Oracle at Delphi; by vertue whereof, commanded they were, to search and seeke out the place where Apollo was borne, and there to performe certaine sacrifices: whereat, when they marvelled, and in great perplexity demanded againe, whether Apollo were borne any where else, but among them? the propheticke Pythia added moreover & said: That a crow should tell them the place. Whereupon these deputies who were sent unto the Oracle, in their returne homeward chanced to passe through the city Charonea, where they heard their hostesse in whose house they lodged, talking with some passengers and guests (who were going to Tegyra) as touching the Oracle; and when they departed and tooke their leave, they saluted her, and had her farewell in these termes: Adieu dame Cornice, for that was the womans name, which signifieth as much as Crow. By this meanes they understood the meaning of the foresaid Oracle or answer of Pythia: and so when they had sacrificed at Tegyra, not long after they were restored and returned into their native country. Moreover, there were other apparitions besides of Oracles, more fresh and later, than those which we have alledged; but now they are altogether ceased: so that it were not amisse, considering that we are met neere unto Apollo Pythius, for to enquire into the cause of this so great change & alteration. As we thus communed & talked together, we were now by this time gone out of the temple, so farre as to the very gates of the Gnidian hall: and when we were entered into it, we found those friends of ours sitting there within, whom we desired to meet withall, and who attended our coming. Now when all the rest were at leisure, and had nothing else to doe (being at such a time of the day) but either to anoint their bodies, or else looke upon the champions and wrestlers, who there exercised themselves; Demetrius after a smiling manner began and said:

*What? were I best to tell some lie,
Or make report of truth shall I?*

It seemeth as farre as I can perceive, that you have in hand no matter of great consequence: for I saw you sitting at your ease, and it appeared by your cheerefull and pleasant looks, that you have no busie thoughts hammering in your heads. True it is indeed (quoth Heraclius the Megarian:) for we are not in serious argument & disputation about the verbe βελτίον, whether in the Future tense it should lose one of the two Lamdaes: neither reason we about these two comparatives πείσι and βέλτερον (that is to say, Worfe and better) of what Positives they should come: nor of what Primitives these two Superlatives πείσιον & βέλτιστον (that is to say, Worst and best) be derived? For these questions & such like, are those that make men knit and bend their brows: but of all other matters we may reason and Philosophize well enough and quietly, without making any any furrowes in our foreheads, and looking with an austere and sower countenance for the matter upon the companie present with us. Why then (quoth Demetrius) admit and receive us into your societie, and together with us, entertaine the question also, which erewhile was moved among us, being as it is, meet for this place, and in regard of god Apollo, pertinent unto us all as many as we be: but I beseech you of all loves, let us have no frowning nor knitting of browses whiles we reason upon the point. Now when we were set intermingled one with another, and that Demetrius had propounded the foresaid question, immediately Didymus the Cynique Philosopher, surnamed Planetiades, started up, and stood upon his feete; and after he had stamped with his staffe twice or thrice upon the floore, cried out in this manner: O God! Come you hither with this question indeed, as if it were a matter so hard to be decided, and had need of some long and deepe inquisition? for a great marvel I no doubt it is, if seeing so much sinne and wickednesse is spread over the face of the whole world at this day, not onely shame and just indignation or Nemesis (according as Hesiodus prophesied before) have abandoned mans life; but also the providence of God being dislodged and carrying away with it all the Oracles that be, is cleane departed and gone for ever? But contrariwise I will put forth unto you another matter to be debated of: namely, how it comes to passe, that they have not rather already given over every one? and why Hercules is not come againe, or some other of the gods, and hath not long since plucked up and carried away the three-footed table and all, being so full ordinarily of shamefull, villanous and impious demands, proposed there daily to Apollo? whiles some preferre matters unto him as a Sophister, to trie what he can say; others aske him concerning treasure hidden; some againe would be resolved of succession in heritages, and of incestuous and unlawfull marriages? Inasmuch as now Pythagoras is manifestly convinced of error and lesing, who said, that men were then best, and excelled in goodnesse, when they presented themselves before the gods: for such things as it would well beseme to hide and conceale in the presence onely of some ancient personage (I meane the foule maladies and passions of the foule) the same they discover and lay abroad naked before Apollo. And as he would have gone forward still, and prosecuted this theme, both Heraclius plucked him by the cloke, and I also (who of all the company was most familiar & inward with him) Peace (quoth I) my good friend Planetiades, and cease to provoke Apollo against you: for a cholerick and restless god he is, and not milde and gracious; but according as Pindarus laid very well:

Misdeem'd he is, and thought amisse: To be Most kinde to men, and full of lenitie.

And were he either the Sunne, or the lord and father of the Sunne, or a substance beyond all visible natures, it is not like and probable, that he would disdain to speake any more unto men at this day living, of whose generation, nativity, nourishment, being, and understanding, he is the cause and author: neither is it credible, that the divine providence, which is a good, kinde, and tender mother, produceth and preserveth all things for our use, should shew herselfe to be malicious, in this matter onely of divination and prophesie; and upon an old grudge and rancor, to bereave us of that which at first she gave us, as if forsooth even then when Oracles were rise in all parts of the world, there was not in so mightie a multitude of men, the greater number of wicked. And therefore make Pythick truce (as they say) for the while with vice and wickednesse, which you are ever wont to chastice and rebuke in all your speeches, and come and sit downe heere by us againe, that together with us you may leache out some other cause of this generall eclipse and cessation of Oracles, which now is in question: but withall remember that you keepe this god Apollo propitious, and move him not to wrath and displeasure.

But these words of mine wrought to with Planetiades, that without any word replying, out of the doores he went his waies. Now when the company sat still for a pretty while in great silence, Ammonius at length directing his speech to me: I beseech you (quoth he) Lamprias, take better heed unto that which we doe, and looke more neerely into the matter of this our disputation, to the end that we cleere not the god altogether, and make him to be no cause at all that the Oracles doe cease. For he who attributeth this cessation unto any other cause than the will and ordinance of God, giveth us occasion to suspect him also, that he thinketh they never were nor be at this present by his disposition, but rather by some other meanes: for no other cause and puissance there is, more noble, more mighty, or more excellent, which might be able to destroy and abolish divination, if it were the worke of God. And as touching the discourse that Planetiades made, it please me never a whit: neither can I approve thereof, as well for other causes, as for that he admitteth a certaine inequality and inconstance in the god. For one while he maketh him to deserve and abhorre vice, and another while to allow and accept thereof: much like unto some king or tyrant rather, who at one gate driveth out wicked persons, and receiving them in at another doth negotiate with them. But seeing it is so, that the greatest worke which can be, sufficient in it selfe, nothing superfluous, but fully accomplished every way is most becoming the dignity and majesty of the gods, let this principle be supposed and laied for a ground, and then a man in mine opinion may very well say, that of this generall defect and common scarcity of men, which civill seditions and warres before time have brought generally into the world, Greece hath felt the greatest part: inasmuch as at this very day, hardly is all Greece able to make three thousand men for the warres, which are no more in number than one city in times past (to wit, Megara) set forth and sent to the battell of Platas: and therefore, whereas the god Apollo in this our age hath left many oracles, which in ancient time were much frequented, if one should inferre hereupon and say, that this argueth no other thing but that Greece is now much depopulated & dispeopled, in comparison of that which it was in old time, I would like well of his invention; and furnish him sufficiently with matter to discourse upon. For what would it boot, and what good would come of it, if there were now an Oracle at Tegyra as sometime there was, or about Proum? whereas all the day long a man shall peradventure meet with one, and that is all, keeping and feeding cattell there. And verily it is found written in histories, that this very place of the Oracle where now we are, which of all others in Greece is for antiquity right ancient, and for reputation most noble and renowned, was in times past for a great while desert and unfrequented; nay unaccessable altogether, in regard of a most venomous and dangerous beast, even a dragon which haunted it. But those who write this, doe not collect hereupon the cessation of the Oracle aright, but argue cleane contrary: for it was the solitude and infrequency of the place that brought the dragon thither, rather than the dragon that caused the said desert solitariness. But afterwards when it pleased God, that Greece was fortified againe and replenished with many cities, and this place well peopled and frequented, they used two Prophetesses, who one after the other in their course descended into the cave and there sat; yea and a third there was besides chosen, as a suffragane or assistant to sit by them and helpe if need were: but now there is but one Prophetesse in all, and yet we complain not; for the onely is sufficient for all comers that have any occasion to use the Oracle. And therefore we are in no wise to blame or accuse the god: for that divination and spirit of prophesie which remaineth there at this day, is sufficient for all, and sendeth all suiters away well contented, as having their full dispatch and answer for whatsoever they demand. Like as therefore Agamemnon in Homer had nine Heraults or Criers about him, and yet hardly with them could he containe and keepe in order the assembly of the Greeks being so frequent as then it was; but now within these few daies you shall see heere the voice of one man alone able to resound over the whole Theater, and to reach unto all the people their contained: even so, we must thinke, that this divination and spirit of prophesie in those daies used many organs and voices to speake unto the people, being a greater multitude than now there be. And therefore we should on the other side rather wonder, if God would suffer to run in vaine like waste water, this propheticall divination: or to resound againe, like as the desert rockes in the wide fields and mountaines ring with the resonance and echoes of heard-mens hollaing, and beasts bellowing. When Ammonius had thus said, and I held my peace, Cleombrotus addressing his speech unto me: And grant you indeed (quoth he) thus much, that it is the god Apollo, who is the author and overthrower also of these Oracles? Not so, answered I, for I maintaine and hold, that God was never the cause of abolishing any Oracle or divination whatsoever: but contrariwise, like as where he produceth and prepareth many other things for one use and behoofe, nature bringeth in the corruption and utter privation of some; or to say more truly, matter being it selfe privation, or subject thereto, avoideth many times and dissolveth that which a more excellent cause hath composed: even so I suppose there be some other causes, which darken and abolish the verue of divination, considering that God bestoweth upon men many faire & goodly gifts, but nothing perdurable & immortall: in such sort as the very workes of the gods do die, but not themselves, according as Sophocles saith. And verily the Philosophers and naturalists, who are well exercised in the knowledge of nature and the primitive matter, ought indeed to search into the substance, property and puissance of Oracles, but to reserve the originall and principall cause for God, as very meet and requisite it is that it should so be. For very foolish and childish it is that the god himselfe, like unto those spirits speaking within the bellies of possessed folkes, such as in old time they called Eugastimichi, and Euryclees, and be now termed Pythons, entered into the bodies of Prophets, spake by their mouthes, and used their tongues and voices as organs and instruments of speech: for he that thus intermedleth God among the occasions and necessities of men, maketh no spare as he ought of his majesty, neither careth he that respect as is meet, to the preservation of the dignity and greatness of his power and vertue. Then Cleombrotus: You say very well and truly (quoth he:) but for as much as it is a difficult matter to comprise and define in what maner, and how farre forth, and to what point we ought to employ this divine providence: in my conceit, they who are of this minde, that simply God is cause of nothing at all in the world, and they againe, that make him wholly the author of all things; hold not a meane and indifferent course, but both of them misse the very point of decent mediocrity. Certes as they say passing well, who hold that Plato having invented and devised that element or subject, upon which grow and be engendered qualities, the which one while is called the primitive matter, and otherwhile nature, delivered Philosophers from many great difficulties: even so methinks, they who ordained a certaine kinde by themselves of Dæmons betweene god and men, have alsoiled many more doubts and greater ambiguities by finding out that bond and linke (as it were) which joineeth us and them together in society: Were it the opinion that came from the ancient Magi and Zoroastries, or rather a Thracian doctrine delivered by Orpheus; or els an Aegyptian or Phrygian tradition, as we may conjecture by seeing the same critics both in the one countrey and the other: wherein, among other holy and divine ceremonies, it seemeth there were certaine dolefull ceremonies of mourning and sorrow intermingled, favouring of mortality. And verily of the Greeks, Homer hath used these two names indifferently, terming the Gods Dæmons, and the Dæmons likewise Gods. But Hesiodus was the first who purely & distinctly hath set downe four kinds of reasonable natures, to wit, the Gods: then the Dæmons, and those many in number and all good: the Heroes and Men; and the Dæmi-gods are ranged in the number of those Heroicke worthies. But others hold, that there is a transmutation aswell of bodies as soules: and like as we may observe, that of earth is ingendered water, of water aire, and of aire fire, whiles the nature of the substance still mounteth on high: even so the better soules are changed, first from men to Heroes or Dæmi-gods, and afterwards from them to Dæmons, and of Dæmons some few after long time, being well refined and purified by vertue, came to participate the divination of the gods. Yet unto some it befalleth, that being not able to holde and conteine, they suffer themselves to slide and fall into mortall bodies againe, where they lead an obscure and darke life, like unto a smoaky vapour. As for Hesiodus, he thinketh verily, that even the Dæmons also, after certaine revolutions of time, shall die: for speaking in the person of one of their Nymphs called Xarades, covertly and under anigmatical termes he designeth their time, in this wise:

*Nine* ages of men* in their flower, doth live
The* railing Crow: fower times the Stags surmount
The life of Crows: to Ravens doth nature give
At threefold age of Stags, by true account:
One Phoenix lives as long as Ravens nine:
But you faire Nymphs, as the daughters verily
Of mighty Jove and of nature divine,
The Phoenix yeeres ten fold do multiply.*

But they that understand not well, what the Poet meaneth by this word yeeres, make the totall sum of this time to amount unto an exceeding great number of yeeres. For in truth it is but one yeere and no more. And so by that reckning, the whole arithem in all to nine thousand seven hundred and twenty yeeres just; which is the very life of the Dæmons. And many Mathematicians there be, by whose computation it is lesse. But more than so Pindarus would not have it, when he saith, that the Nymphs age is limited equal to trees; whereupon they be named Hæmædrades, as one would say, living and dying with Okes. As he was about to say more, Demetrius interrupted his speech, and taking the words out of his mouth: How is it possible, quoth he, o Cleombrotus, that you should make good and mainteine, that the Poet called the age of man, a yeere onely and no more? for it is not the space either of his flower and best time, nor of his olde age, according as some reade it in Hesiodus: for as one reads ἡλικίαν, that is say, flourishing; so, another readeth γῆρας, that is to say, aged. Now they that would have it to be * γῆρας.

* ἀρκητύς, or εἰς τὴν γῆν.

ἡλικίαν.

Heaven, put downe for the age of man, thirty yeeres, according to the opinion of Heraclitus, which is the very time that a father hath begotten a sonne able to beget another of his owne: but such as follow the reading that hath Pythagoras attribute unto the age of man an hundred and eight yeeres, saying that foure and fifty is the just moiety or one halfe of a mans life: which number is composed of an unitie; the two first plaines, two squares, and two cubiques: which numbers Plato also tooke to the procreation of the soule which he describeth. But it seemeth verily, that Hesiodus by these words covertly did signifie that generall conflagration of the world; at what time, it is very probable, that the Nymphs together with all humors and liquid matters shall perishe:

*Those Nymphs I meane, which many a tree and plant
In forests faire and goodly groves do haunt,
Or neere to springs and river streames are seen,
Or keepe about the medowes gay and greene.*

10

Then Cleombrotus: I have heard many (quoth he) talke hereof, and I perceive very well how this conflagration which the Stoicks have devised, as it hath crept into the Poems of Heraclitus and Orpheus, and so perverted their verses: so it hath seized upon and caught hold of Hesiodus, and given a perverse interpretation of him as well as of others. But neither can I endure to admit this consummation and end of the world, which they talke of, nor any such impossible matters; and namely, those speeches as touching the life of the Crow and the Stag or Hinde, which yeeres, if they were summed together, would grow to an excessive number. Moreover, a yeere containing 10 in it the beginning and the end of all things which the seasons thereof doe produce, and the earth bring forth, may in mine opinion not impertinently be called Pyra, that is to say, the age of men: for even you selves confesse, that Hesiodus in one passage called mans life Pyra. How say you, is it not so? Then Demetrius avowed as much. This also (quoth Cleombrotus) is as certaine, that both the measure, and also the things which be measured, are called by one and the same names: as it appeareth by Corymbus, Chenix, Amphora and Medimnus. Like as therefore we name unitie, a number, which in deed of all numbers is the least measure and beginning onely of them: (semblably, Hesiodus termed Yeere the age of man, for that with it principally we measure his age, and so communicate that word with the thing that it measurith: as for those numbers which they make, there is no singularity at all or matter of importance in them as touching 30 the renowned numbers indeed. But the number of 9720 hath a speciall ground and beginning, as being composed of the foure first numbers arising in order from one and the same, added together or multiplied by foure, every way arise to fortie. Now if * these be reduced into triangles five times, they make the just summe of the number before named. But as touching these matters, what need I to contend with Demetrius? for whether there be meant thereby a longer time or a shorter, a certaine or uncerteine, wherein Hesiodus would have the soule of a Daemon to change, or the life of a Demi god or Heros to end, it killeth not; for he prooveth nevertheless that which he would, and that by the evidence of most ancient and wise witnesses, that there be certaine natures neuter and meane (as it were) situate in the confines betweene gods and men, and the same subject to mortall passions, and apt to receive necessarie changes and mutations: 40 on which natures according to the traditions & examples of our forefathers, meet it is that we call Daemons, and honour them accordingly. And to this purpose, Xenocrates one of the familiar friends of Plato, was wont to bring in the demonstration and example of triangles, which agreed very well to the present matter in hand: for that triangle which had * three sides and angles equall, he compared unto the nature divine and immortal; that which had * all sides unequal, unto the humane and mortall nature; and that which had * two equal and one unequal, unto the nature of the Daemons: for the first is every way equal, the second on every side unequal, and the last in some sort equal and in other unequal; like unto the nature of the Daemons, having humane passions and affections, yet withall, the divine power of some god. But nature herselfe hath propoed unto us sensible figures and similitudes visible above; of gods v 50 verily the Sunne and other starres; but of mortall men, sudden lights and flashes in the night, blazing comets, and shooting of starres: for unto such Euripides compared them, when he said:

*Who was ere while and lately in the flower,
Of his fresh youth, at sudden in an hour, Become extinct (as starre which seems to fall
From skie) and into aire seem breath and all.*

Now

Now for a mixt body, representing the nature of Daemons or Angels, there is the Moone: which they seeing to be subject to growing and decreasing, yea and to perishing altogether, and departing out of sight, thought to accord very well, and to be sortable unto the mutability of the Daemons kinde. For which cause, some have called her a terrestriall starre: others an Olympian or celestially earth; and there be againe who have named her The heritage and possession of Proserpina, both heavenly and earthly. Like as therefore, if one tooke the aire out of the world, and remooved it from betweene the Moone and the earth, he should dissolve the continuation, coherence and composition of the whole universall frame, by leaving a void and empty place in the middes, without any bond to joine and linke the extremes together: 10 even so, they who admit not the nation and kind of the Daemons, abolish all communication, convers and conference betweene gods and men, considering they take away that nature which serveth as a hanchman, interpreter, and minister betweene both, as Plato said: or rather they would drive us to confound and huddle together, yea and to jumble all in one, if we came to intermingle the divine nature and deity among humane passions and actions, and so plucke it out of heaven, for to make it intermeddle in the negocies and affaires of men; like as they saie, the wives of Thesalia draw downe the Moone from heaven. Which devise & fiction hath taken roote, and is believed among women, by reason that Aglaonice, the daughter of Agetor (by report) being a wife dame, and well scene in Astrologie, made semblance and periwaded the vulgar sort; that in every eclipse of the Moone, she used alwaies some charmes and enchant- 20 ments; by vertue whereof, she fetched the Moone out of heaven. As for us, give we no care and credit unto them, who say, there be some Oracles and divinations without a deity, or that the gods regard not sacrifices, divine services, and other sacred ceremonies, exhibited unto them: neither on the other side let us beleeve, that God is present to intermeddle or employ himselfe in person, but betaking and referring that charge unto the ministers of the gods, as it is meet and just; like as if they were deputies, officers, and secretaries: let us constantly hold, that those be the Daemons which are their elpses and escouts, going too and fro throughout all parts, some to oversee and direct the sacrifices, and sacred rites and ceremonies performed to the gods: others to chastise and punish the enormous and outrageous offences and wrongs committed by men: and others there are besides, of whom the Poet Hesiodus speaketh most re- 30 verently, saying:

*Pure, holy, and sincere they be,
The Donors of good things:
This honour is allotted them,
Beeseming noble kings.*

Giving us by the way thus much to understand, that to doe good and be beneficiall is a roiall office and function: for a difference there is, and sundry degrees there be in the gifts and virtues of Daemons, like as among men. For in some of them there remaine still certaine small reliques (and the same verie feeble and scarce sensible) of that passionate and sensitive part of the soule which is not reasonable, even as a very excrement and superfluitie left behind of the rest: 40 but in others againe, there abideth a great deale, and the same hardly to be extinguished, whereof we may feel lively the works and evident tokens in many places, disseminate in some sacrifices, feasts and ceremonies celebrated unto them; yea, and in the tales reported by them. Howbeit, as touching the mysteries and sacred services (by which & through which a man may more cleerely perceive than by any other means whatsoever, the true nature of the gods) I will not speake a word: let them lie close and hidden still for me, as Herodotus saith. But as for certaine festivall solemnities and sacrifices, which are held as dismall, unfortunate and heavy daies; when sometimes they use to eat raw flesh, and tear humane bodies piece-meale; or other- while to fast and knocke their breasts; and in many places utter most filthy and beastly words during the sacrifices:

*Wagging their heads in frantike wise,
With strange all- armes and bidoous cries.*

I will never beleeve that this is done for any of the gods: but will say rather, it is to avert the ire and appease the furie of some maligne divels. Neither carieth it any likelihood and probability, that ever any god would require men to be sacrificed unto them, as they were in old time: or stand well pleased with any such sacrifices. Neither was it for nought that kings and great captaines gave their owne children thus to be slaine; yea, and with their owne hands killed them for sacrifice:

sacrifice: but we are to belevee that it was to turne away and divert the rankor and wrath of some perverse spirits and malicious fiends, or to satisfie such hurtfull divels; yea, and to fulfill the violent, furious and tyrannicall lusts of some, who either could not, or would not enjoy them with their bodies, or by their bodies. But like as Hercules besieged the city of Oechalia, for a virgins sake who was within: even so these powerfull and outrageous fiends, demanding some humane soule clad and compassed within a body, to be given unto them, and yet not able to fulfill their lust by the body, bring pestilence, famine, dearth, and sterility of the ground upon cities, raise wars and civill dissensions, untill such time as they come to have and enjoy that which they loved: and some doe cleane contrary; as it was my hap to observe in Candie, (where I abode a long time) how they celebrated a certaine monstrous feast, in which they made shew of a headlesse mans image, saying it was Molus, the father of Meriones: for having forced or deflowered a Nymph, he was afterwards found without an head. Moreover, what ravishment, soever, what wandering voiajes, what occultations, flights, banishments, ministeries and services of the gods be reported and sung in fables or hymnes, certes they be all of them no passions and accidents that befell to gods indeed, but to some Dæmons, whose fortunes were recorded in memoriall of their vertue & puissance: neither meant the Poet Aeschylus (a god) when he said:

*Apollo chaist, who now is fled,
And out of heaven banished;*

Nor Admetus in Sophocles:

*My chaunting cocke that crows so shrill,
Hath raised him and brought to mill.*

Also the Divines and Theologians of Delphi, are in a great error, and farre from the truth, who thinke, that sometimes in this place, there was a combat betwene Apollo and a dragon, about the hold and possession of this Oracle. They are to blame also, who suffer Poets and Oratours, striving one against another in their Theatres, to act or relate such matters; as if of purpose and expressly they contradicted and condemned those things which themselves performe in their most sacred solemnities. Heereat, when Philippus wondered much (for the Historiographer of that name was present in this companie) & demanded withall, what divine rites and ceremonies they might be, which were contradicted and testified against by these who contended in the Theaters? Many even thole (quoth Cleombrotus) which concerne this very Oracle of Delphi, and by which this citie not long since hath admitted and received into the sacred profession of holy mysteries, all the Greeks without Thermopylae, and excluded those that dwell as farre as the vale of Tempe. For the tabernacle or cottage heere of boughes (which is erected and set up every ninth yeere, within the court-yard of this temple) is not a representation of the dragons cave or denne, but rather of some tyrants or kings house: as also the assault or surprize thereof in great silence, by the way called Dolonia. Likewise, that a little after they bring thither a boy who hath both father and mother living, with torches light burning: and when they have set the said tabernacle or tent on fire, and overthrowne the table, runne away as hard as they can through the dores of the temple, and never looke behinde them. And finally, the wanderings of this boy in divers places, and his servile ministeries, together with the expiatory sacrifices and ceremonies about Tempe, move suspicion that there should be represented thereby some notorious outrage, and audacious fact perpetrated there in old time. For it were a meere mockery (my friend Philippus) to say, that Apollo for killing the dragon, fled as farre as to the unmoilt coasts and marches of Greece, for to be purified and affoiled: also, that he offered thereon certaine expiatory libations and effusions, and performed all such duties and services which men doe, when they would appease the wrath and indignation of such Dæmons and curst fiends, whom we call Alaisteras and Palammas, as one would say, The revengers of such enormities and crimes as could not be forgotten, and those who bare still in minde some old sinnes, and pursued the same. As for that tale, which I my selfe of late have heard as touching this sight and banishment, it is wonderfull strange and prodigious: but if it containe some truth among, we must not thinke, that it was a small and ordinary matter that befell in those daies about the said Oracle. But for feare I might be thought as Empedocles sometimes said:

*To stich the heads of sundry tales together,
And goe in divers pathes I know not whether:*

Suffer me I beseech you to make a convenient end heere of my light discourses. For now are wee just come so farre, as we may also be bold after many others to affirme and pronounce, that that seeing the Dæmons ordained for the prefidence and superintendence of prophesies and Oracles doe faile, of necessity these Oracles also and divinations must cease with them; and when they be fled and gone, or change their residence, it cannot chuse but the former places must loose their prophetical power and verue: also, that when after long time they be returned thither, the said places will begin againe to speake and sound, like unto instruments of musike; namely, if they be present who have the skill to handle and use them accordingly. After that Cleombrotus had thus discoursed: There is not (quoth Heracleon) any one of this companie that is a prophane miscreant and infidell, not professed in our religion, or who holdeth any opinions as touching the gods, discordant from us. Howbeit, let us take heed our selves & Philippus, 10 lest ere we be aware, we doe not in our discourse & disputation put downe some erroneous suppositions and such as may make great ground-worke of impiety. You say very well (quoth Philippus) but what point is it of all those that Cleombrotus hath put downe, that is so offensive and scandalizeth you most? Then Heracleon: That they be not gods indeed who are the presidents of Oracles (because we ought to belevee of them, that they be exempt from all terrestrial affaires) but that they be Dæmons rather, or the angels and miniters of the gods; in my conceit is no bad nor impertinent supposall: but all at once & abruptly, by occasion of Empedocles his verses, to attribute unto these Dæmons crimes, plagues, calamities, transgressions, inquietudes and errors lent from the gods above, and in the end to make them for to die, as mortall men; this I take to be somewhat to presumptuously spoken, and to smell of barbarous audacity. Then Cleombrotus asked Philippus, who this young man was, and from whence he came? And when he had heard his name and his country, he answered in this wise: We are not ignorant our selves (ô Heracleon) that we are fallen into a speech favoring somewhat of absurdity: but a man cannot possibly discourse of great matters, without he lay as great foundations at the beginning, for to proceed unto probability and prove his opinion. And as for your selfe, you are not aware, how you overthrow even that which you grant: for confesse you doe, that there be Dæmons; but when you will needs maintaine that they be neither lewd nor mortall, you cannot make it good that they be at all. For wherein I pray you doe they differ from gods, in case they be in substance incorruptible, and in vertue impassible, or not subject to sinne? Heereupon Heracleon, when he had mused with himselfe not saying a word, and studied what answer to 30 make, Cleombrotus went on and said: It is not Empedocles alone who hath given out there were evil Dæmons, but Plato also himselfe, Xenocratus also and Chrysippus; yea and Democritus when he wished and prayed that he might meet with lucky images, both knew and gave us (no doubt) thereby to understand, that he thought there were others of them crooked and threwd, and such as were badly affected and had evil intentions. But as touching the death of such, and how they are mortall, I have heard it reported by a man who was no fool nor a vaine lying person: and that was Epitherses the father of Aemilianus the oratour, whom some of you (I dare well say) have heard to plead & declaine. This Epitherses was my fellow-citizen and had bene my schoolemaster in grammar, and this narration he related: That minding upon a time to make a voiage by sea into Italy, he was embarked in a ship fraught with much marchandize 40 and having many passengers beside aboard. Now when it drew toward the evening, they happened (as he said) to be calmed about the Isles Echinades; by occasion whereof their ship bulled with the tides untill at length it was brought neere unto the Islands Paxa, whiles most of the passengers were awake, and many of them still drinking after supper: but then, all on a sudden there was heard a voice from one of the Islands of Paxa, calling aloud unto one Thamus; inso-much as there was not one of all our company but he wondered thereat. Now this Thamus was a Pilot and an Aegyptian borne: but known he was not to many of them in the ship by that name. At the two first calles, he made no answer; but at the third time he obeyed the voice, and answered: Here I am. Then he who spake, strained his voice and said unto him: When thou art come to * Palodes, publish thou and make it known: That the Great Pan is Dead. And as Epitherses made report unto us, as many as heard this voice were wonderfully amazed thereat, and entred into a discourse and disputation about the point, whether it were best to doe according to this commandement, or rather to let it passe and not curiously to meddle withall; but neglected it: As for Thamus, of this minde he was and relolved: If the winde served, to saile by the place quietly and say nothing; but if the windes were laid and that their ensued a calme, to crie and pronounce with a loud voice that which he heard. Well, when they were come to Palodes afore said the winde was downe and they were becalmed, so as the sea was very still without waves, 50 Whereupon

* Some take it to be a place of manie shelter and small-waves.

Whereupon Thamus looking from the poupe of the ship toward the land, pronounced with a loud voice that which he had heard, and said: The great Pan is Dead. He had no sooner spoken the word but there was heard a mighty noise, not of one but of many together, who seemed to groane and lament, and withall to make a great wonder. And as it falleth commonly out when as many be present, the newes thereof was soone spread and divulged through the city of Rome, in such sort as Tiberius Caesar the emperor sent for Thamus: and Tiberius verily gave so good credit unto his wordes, that he searched and enquired with all diligence who that Pan might be. Now the great clerks and learned men (of whom he had many about him) gave their conjecture that it might be he, who was the sonne of Mercurie by Penelope. And verily Philippus had some of the companie present to beare witnesse with him, such as had bene Ac- 01 milianus scholars and heard as much. Then Demetrius made report, that many little desert and desolate Isles there were lying disperfed and scattering in the sea about Britaine, like unto those which the Greeks call Sporades; whereof some were named the Isles of Dæmons, and Heroes or Demi-gods: also that himselve by commission and commandement from the emperor, failed toward the nearest of those desert Isles for to know and see somewhat; which he found to have very few inhabitants, and those all were by the Britaines, held for sacrosanct and inviolable. Now within a while after he was arrived thither, the aire and weather was mightily troubled, many portentous signes were given by terrible tempests and stormes, with extraordinary windes, thunders, lightnings, and fire impressions: but after that these tempests were ceased, the Ilanders assured him, that one of those Dæmons or Demi-gods (who surmounted the na- 20 ture of man) was departed. For like as a lampe (say they) or candle, so long as it burneth light offendeth no bodie; but when it is put out or goeth forth, it maketh a stinke offensive unto many about it: even so, these great Soules whiles they shine and give light, be milde, gracious, and harmlesse; but when they come to be extinct or to perish, they raise (even as at that present) outrageous tempests, yea and oftentimes infect the aire with contagious and pestilent maladies. They reported moreover, that in one of those Ilands Briareus kept Saturne prisoner in a sound sleepe (for that was the devise to hold him captive) about whose person there were many other Dæmons of his traine and his servitours. Cleombrotus then taking occasion for to speake: I am able my selfe also (quoth he) to alledge many such examples if I list; but it may suffice for this present matter in hand, that this is nothing contrary nor opposit unto that 30 which by us hath bene delivered. And verily we know full well, that the Stoicks hold the same opinion not onely of Dæmons that we doe, but also of the gods: that there being so great a multitude of them, yet there is but one alone immortall and eternall; whereas all the rest had their beginning by nativity and shall have an end by death. And as for the scoffes, scornes, and mockeries that the Epicureans make, we ought not to regard them, nor be affraid of them: for so audacious they are, that they use the same even in the divine providence, terming it a very fable and oldwives tale. But we contrariwise hold, that their infinity of worldes is a fable indeed: as also to say, that among those innumerable worlds, there is not so much as one governed by reason or the providence of God; but that all things were first made and afterwards maintained by mere chance and fortune. Certes, if it be lawfull to laugh, and that we must needs make 40 game in matters of Philosophy, we should rather mocke those who bring into their disputations of naturall questions, I wot not what deafe, blinde, dumbe and inanimate images; retaining I know not where, and continuing in appearance infinit revolutions of yeeres, wandering round about and going to and fro: which say they, issue and flowe from bodies partly yet living, and partly from those who long agoe were dead, burnt, yea and rotten and putrified to nothing. These men (I say) we should doe well to laugh at, who draw such ridiculous toies and vaine shadowes as these, into the serious disputations of nature.

Meanwhile forsooth, offended they are and angry, if a man should say there be Dæmons; and that not onely in nature but in reason also it standeth with good congruity, they should continue and endure a long time. These speeches thus passed, Ammonius began in this wise: **Cleombrotus* 50 in mine opinion (quoth he) hath spoken very well: and what should impeach us, but that we may admit and receive his sentence, being so graves as it is, and most befitting a Philosopher? For reject it once, we shall be forced to reject also and denie many things which are, and usually happen, whereof no certaine cause and reason can be delivered: and if it be admitted, it draweth after it no traine and consequence of any impossibility whatsoever, nor of that which is not subsistent. But as touching that one point, which I have heard the Epicureans alledge against

Empedocles, and the Dæmons which he bringeth in, namely: That they cannot possibly be happy and long lived, being evill and finfull as they are, for that vice by nature is blind, and of it selfe falleth ordinarily headlong into perils and inconveniences which destroy the life; this is a very foolish opposition: for by the same reason they must confesse, that Epicurus was worse than Gorgias the Sophister; and Metrodorus, than Alexis the Comickall Poet: for this Poet lived twice as long as Metrodorus; and that Sophister, longer than Epicurus, by a third part of his age. For it is in another respect, that we say Vertue is puissant, and vice feeble, not in regard of the lasting continuance or dissolution of the bodie: for we see, that of beafts there be many dull, slow and blockish of spirit; many also by nature libidinous, unruly and disordered, which live longer 10 than those that are full of wit, wily, wary and wise. And therefore they conclude not aright, in saying, that the divine nature enioieth immortality, by taking heed and avoiding those things that be noisome and mischievous. For it behooved, in the divine nature which is blessed and happy, to have set downe an impossibility of being subject to all corruption and alteration, and that it standeth in no need of care and labour to maintaine the said nature. But peradventure it seemeth not to stand with good maners and civility, to dispute thus against those that are not present to make answer for themselves: it were meet therefore, that Cleombrotus would resume and take in hand that speech againe, which he gave over and laied aside of late, as touching the departure and translation of these Dæmons from one place to another. Then Cleombrotus: Yes mary, quoth he: but I would marvell, if this discourse of mine would not seeme unto you 20 much more absurd than the former delivered already: and yet it seemeth to be grounded upon naturall reason, and Plato himselve hath made the overturre thereto, not absolutely pronouncing and affirming so much; but after the maner of a doubtfull opinion and under covert words, casting out a certaine wary conjecture tending that way, although among other Philosphers it hath bene disclaimed and cried out against. But forasmuch as there is set a cup on the boord, full of reasons and tales mingled together, and for that a man shall hardly meet in any place againe with more courteous and gracious hearers, among whom he may passe and put away such narrations, as pieces of forren coine, and strange money: I will not dunke much to gratifie you this farre forth, as to acquaint you with a narration that I heard a stranger and a Barbarian relate: whom (after many a journey made to and fro for to finde him out, and much money given 30 by me for to heare where he was) I met with at length by good hap, neere unto the Red Sea. His maner was to speake and converse with men but once in the yeere; all the rest of his time (as he said himselve) he spent among the Nymphs, Nomades and Dæmons. Well, with much adoe I light upon him, I communed with him, and he used me courteously. The fairest man he was to see to, of all that ever I set eie on: neither was he subject to any discale: once every moneth he fed upon a medicinable and bitter fruit of a certaine herbe: and this was the fare he lived upon. A good linguist he was, and used to speake many languages; but with me he talked commonly in Greeke, after the Doricke dialect. His speech differed not much from song and mee- 40 ter: and whensoever he opened his mouth for to speake, there issued forth of it sweet and fragrant a breath, that all the place about was filled therewith and smelled most pleasantly. As for his other learning and knowledge, yea, the skill of all histories, he had the same all the yeere long: but as touching the gift of divination, he was inspired therewith one day every yeere, and no more; and then he went downe to the sea side and prophesied of things to come: and thither resorted unto him the Princes and great Lords of that country, yea and Secretaries of forren kings, who there attended his coming at a day prefixed: which done, he returned. This performance then attributed unto Dæmons the spirit of divination and prophesie: most pleasure tooke he in hearing and speaking of Delphi: and looke whatsoever we hold here as touching Bacchus, what adventures befall unto him, & what sacrifices are performed by us in his honor, he had bene informed thereof, and knew all well enough, saying withall: That as these were great accidents, that hapned to Dæmons; so likewise was that, which men reported of the serpent Python: whom 50 he that slew, was neither banished for nine yeeres, nor fled into the valley of Tempe, but was chased out of this world, and went into another; from whence (after nine revolutions of the great yeeres) being returned all purified and Phœbus indeed, that is to say, cleere and bright, he recovered the superintendence of the Delphicke Oracle, which during that while was left to the custody of Themis. The same was the case (said he) of the Titons and Typhons. For he affirmed, they were the battels of Dæmons against Dæmons: the flights and banishments also of those who were vanquished: or rather the punishments inflicted by the gods upon as many as had <sup>1</sup> O, Caelum, committed such outrages as Typhon had done against Osiris, and Saturne against <sup>2</sup> Cælus or the heaven: whose honours were the more obscure or abolished altogether, by reason that themselves were translated into another world. For I understand and heare, that the Solymanians who border hard upon the Lycians, highly honoured Saturne when the time was: but after that he having slain their princes, Aspalus, Dryus, and Trofolobus, fled & departed into some other country (for whither he went they knew not) they made no more any reckoning of him: but Aspalus and the other, they termed by the name of Scleroi, that is to say, severe gods: and in truth, the Lycians at this day, as well in publicke as private, utter and recite the forme of all their curses and execrations in their names.

COMMENTS

Many other semblable examples a man may draw out of Theologicall writings, as touching the gods. Now if we call some of these Demons by the usuall and ordinary names of the gods, we ought not to marvell thereat (quoth this stranger unto me:) for looke unto which of the gods they do receive, upon whom they depend, and by whose means they have honour and puissance; by their names they love to be called: like as heere among us men, one is called Jovius of Jupiter; another, Palladius or Athenus of Minerva; a third, Apollonius of Apollon; or Dionysius and Hermæus of Bacchus and Mercurie. And verily, some there be who although they be named thus at adventure, yet answer very fitly to such denominations; but many have gotten the denominations of the gods, which agree not unto them, but are transposed wrong and misgiven. Herewith Cleombrotus paused: and the speech that he had delivered seemed very strange unto all the company. Then Heracleon demanded of him, whether this doctrine concerned Plato? <sup>10</sup> Plato had given the overture and beginning of such matter? You doe well (quoth Cleombrotus) to put me in minde heereof, and to reduce it into my memory. First and foremost therefore, he condemneth evermore the infinity of worlds: many about the just and precise number of them he doubteth; and howsoever he seemes to yeeld a probability and appearance of truth unto those who have set downe five, and attributed to every element one; yet himselfe sticketh still to one, which seemeth indeed to be the peculiar opinion of Plato: whereas other Philosophers also have alwaies mightily feared to admit a multitude of worlds; as if necessarie it were, that those who staid not by the means of matter in one, but went out of it once, could not chuse but fall presently into this indeterminate and troublefoule infinity. But this your stranger, (quoth I) determined he nothing of this multitude of worlds, otherwise than Plato? <sup>20</sup> Plato did? or all the whiles that you conversed with him, did you never move the question thereof unto him, to know what his opinion was thereof? Think you (quoth Cleombrotus) that I failed herein, and was not (howsoever otherwise I behaved my selfe) a diligent scholar and affectionate auditor of his in these matters, especially seeing he was so affable, and shewed himselfe so courteous unto me? But as touching this point, he said: That neither the number of the worlds was infinit, nor yet true it was, that there were no more but one, or five in all: for there were 183, and those ordeined and ranged in a forme triangular; of which triangle, every side contained threecore worlds; and of the three remaining still, every corner thereof had one: that they were so ordered, as one touched and inteiined another round, in manner of those who are in a ring dance: that the plaine within the triangle, is as it were the foundation and altar <sup>30</sup> common to all the worlds, which is called The Plaine or Field of Truth: and within it lie immovable the designes, reasons, formes, ideas and examples of all things that ever were or shall be: and about them is eternitie, wherof time is a portion, which as a river runneth from thence to those things that are done in time. Now the sight and contemplation of these things was presented unto the foules of men, if they lived well in this world, and that but once in ten thousand yeeres: as for our mysteries heere beneath, and all our best and most sacred ceremonies, they were but a dramatic in comparisn of that spectacle and holy ceremonies. Moreover, he said: That for the good things there, and for to enjoy the sight of those beauties, men employed their study in Philosophy here: or els all their paines taken was but in vaine, and their travellost. And verily (quoth he) I heard him discourse of these matters plainly and without any art, no <sup>40</sup> otherwise than if it had beene some religion wherein I was to be professed, in which he instructed me without using any prooffe and demonstration of his doctrine. Then I (turning to Demetrius) called unto him, and asked what were the words that the woers of Penelope spake, when they beheld with admiration Ulysses handling his bow? And when Demetrius had prompted unto me the verse out of Homer: Surely (quoth I) it comes into my minde to say the very same of this stranger:

Surely

Surely, this fellow as I weene,
Some* prying spie or theefe hath bene, not of bowes, as he said of Ulysses, but of sentences, resolutions and discourses of Philosophie: he hath bene conversant, I say, no doubt in all manner of literature: and I want you, no stranger nor Barbarian borne, but a Grecian, thorowly furnished with all knowledge and doctrine of the Greeks. And verily, this number of the worlds whereof he talketh, bewraieih not an Aegyptian nor an Indian, but favoureth of some Dorian out of Sicilie, and namely, of Peiron, borne in the city of Himera, who wrote a little booke of this argument; which I have not read my selfe, neither doe I know whether it be now extant: but Hippys the Rhegine (of whom Phariss the E-<sup>10</sup> restian maketh mention) writeth, that this was the opinion and doctrine of Peiron; namely, that there were 183 worlds, which taught one another in order and traine: but what he meant by this Reaching one another in order or traine, he declared not; neither annexed he any other probable reason thereof. Then Demetrius: And what likelihood or probability (quoth he) may there be in such matters, considering that Plato himselfe alledging no argument or conjecture that carrieth with it any shew of truth and reason, hath by that meanes overthrowen that opinion? And yet (quoth Heracleon) we have heard you Grammarians say, that Homer was the first authour of this opinion, as if he divided the universall frame of All into five worlds; to wit, Heaven, Water, Aire, Earth, and Olympus: of which, he leaveth two to be common, namely, Earth, to All beneath; and Olympus, to All above: but the three in the mids betwene them, hee attributeth unto three gods. Semblably, it seemeth that Plato allotting unto the principall parts and members of the said universall nature, the first formes and most excellent figures of the bodies, called them five worlds; to wit, of the Earth, the Water, the Aire, the Fire, and finally, of that which comprehendeth the other; and that hee called the forme of Dodecaedron, that is to say, with twelve bales or faces, which amply extendeth it selfe, is very capable and mooveable, as being a figure proper and meet for the animall motions and revolutions of the foules. What need we at this present (quoth Demetrius) to meddle with Homer? wee have had fables enough already, if that be good. As for Plato, hee is farre enough off from naming those five different substances of the world, five worlds: considering that even in that very place where he disputeth against those who maintain an infinit number of worlds, he affirmeth there is but one created by God, and beloved by him, as his onely begotten <sup>20</sup> childe, composed of all nature, having one entier bodie, sufficient in it selfe, and standing in need of nothing else. Whereupon a man may very well wonder and thinke it strange, that having himselfe delivered a truth, he should give occasion to others thereby, to take hold of a false opinion, and wherein there is no apparence of reason. For, if he had not stucke hard to this unity of the world, in some sort he might have laid the foundation for those who hold them to be infinit: but that he should precisely affirme there were five, and neither more nor fewer, is exceeding absurd, and farre from all probabilitie; unlesse haply, you (quoth he, casting his eie upon me) can say somewhat to this point. How now (quoth I then) are you minded thus to leave your first disputation of Oracles, as if it were fully finished and ended, and to enter upon another matter of such difficulty? Nay (quoth Demetrius) we will not passe it over so; but this here <sup>30</sup> that presenteth it selfe now, and taketh us as it were by the hand, we cannot put by: for we will not dwell long upon it, but onely touch it so, and handle it by the way, as that we may finde out some probability, and then will we presently returne unto our former question proposed in the beginning. First and foremost therefore, I say: The reasons which permit us not to allow an infinit number of worlds, impeach us not, but that we admit more than one. For as well in many worlds as in one, there may be divination, there may be providence, and the least intercur-<sup>40</sup> rence of fortune: but the most part of the greatest and principall things shall have and take their generations, changes and mutations ordinarily: which cannot possibly be in that infinity of worlds. Over and besides, more consonant it is to reason, and accordeth better with the nature of God, to say, that the world is not created by him, one onely and solitary: for being (as he is) perfectly and absolutely good, there is no vertue wanting in him, and least of all others that which concerneth justice and amity; which as they be of themselves most beautifull, so they are best besitting the gods. Now such is the nature of God, that he hath nothing either unprofitable or in vaine and without use: and therefore needs there must be beside and without him, other gods and other worlds, unto whom and which he may extend those sociall vertues that he hath. For neither in regard of himselfe, nor of any part in him, needeth he to use, justice, stice, stice, gracious favour and bounty, but unto others. So that it is not likely that this world do teeth and mooveth without a friend, without a neighbour, and without any societie and communication, in a vast and infinit voidnesse; especially seeing we behold how nature enloseth, environeth, and comprehendeth all things, in their severall genders and distinct kinds, as it were within vessels or the husks and covertures of their feeds. For looke throughout the uni-versall nature, there is nothing to be found one in number, but it hath the notion and reason of the essence and being thereof, common to others: neither hath any thing such and such a denomination, but beside the common notion it is by some particular qualities distinct from others of the same kind. Now the world is not called so in common: then must it be such in particular: and qualified it is in particular, and distinguished by certaine differences, from other 10 worlds of the same kinde, and yet hath a peculiar forme of the owne. Moreover, considering there is in the whole world, neither man alone, nor horse, nor starre, ne yet God or Dæ-mon solitarie: what should hinder us to say, that nature admitteth not one onely world, but hath many? Now if any man shall object unto me and say, that in nature there is but one earth, or one sea: I answer, that he is much deceived and overseene, in not perceiving the evidence that is of similitude parts: for we divide the earth into parts similitude, that it is to say, of the semblable and the same denomination, like as we doe the sea also; for all the parts of the earth are called earth, and of the sea likewise: but no part of the world is world, for that it is composed of divers and different natures. For as touching that inconvenience which some especially feare, who spend all matter within one world, lest forsooth if there remained any thing without, it should 20 trouble the composition and frame thereof, by the juries and resistances that it would make:

 surely there is no such cause why they should feare; for when there be many worlds, and ech of them particularly having one definite and determinate measure and limit of their substance and matter, no part thereof will be without order and good disposition, nothing will remaine superfluous, as an excrement without, to hinder or impeach; for that the reason which belongeth to ech world, being able to rule and governe the matter that is allotted thereto, will not suffer any thing to goe out of course and order, and wandering to and fro, for to hit and run upon another world; nor likewise that from another ought should come for to rush upon it because in nature there is nothing in quantity infinit & inordinate, nor in motion without reason & order. 30
 But say there should happily be some fluxus or effluence that passeth from one world to another, the same is a brotherly sweet and amiable communication, and such as very well agreeth to all: much like unto the lights of starres, and the influences of their temperatures, which are the cause that they themselves doe joy in beholding one another with a kinde and favourable aspect; yea and yeeld unto the gods, which in every starre be many (and those good) meanes to intertaine and embrace one another most friendly. For in all this, verily, there is nothing impossible, nothing fabulous nor contrary unto reason: unlesse peradventure some there be who will suspect and feare the reason and sentence of Aristotle, as consonant unto nature. For if as he saith, every body hath a proper and naturall place of the owne; by reason thereof necessarily it must be, that the earth from all parts should tend toward the midst, and the wat. after- 40 wards upon it, serving (by meanes of their weight and ponderosity) in stead of a foundation to other elements of a lighter substance. And therefore (quoth he) if there were many worlds, it would fall out oftentimes that the earth should be found situate above aire and fire, and as often under them: likewise the aire and fire sometime under, otherwhiles in their naturall places, and againe in others contrary to their nature. Which being impossible, as he thinketh, it must follow of necessity, that there be neither two nor more worlds, but one alone, to wit, this which we visibly see composed of all sorts of substance, and disposed according to nature, as is meet and convenient for diversity of bodies. But in all this there is more apparent probability than verity indeed. For the better prooffe hereof, consider I pray you my good friend Demetrius, that when he saith, among simple bodies some bend directly to the midst, that is to say downward:
 others from the midst that is to say upward: and a third sort move round about the midst and 50 circularly: in what respect taketh he the midst? Certaine it is, not in regard of voidnesse, for there is no such thing in nature, even by his owne opinion: againe, according unto those that admit it, middle can it have none, no more than first or last: For these be ends and extremities:
 and that which is infinite must consequently be also without an end. But suppose, that some one of them should enforce us to admit a middle in that voidnesse; impossible it is to conceive and imagine the difference in motions of bodies toward it: because there is not in that voidnesse

nesse any puiffance attractive of bodies; nor yet within the same bodies, any deliberation or inclination and affection to tend from all sides to this middle. But no lesse impossible is it to apprehend, that of bodies having no soule any should moove of themselves to an incorporall place, and having no difference of situation; than it is that the same should draw them or give them any motion or inclination to it. It remaineth then, that this middle ought to be understood not locally but corporally, that is to say not in regard of place, but of body. For, seeing this world is an union, or masse compounded of many bodies different and unlike conjoined together; it must needs be, that their diversities engender motions discrepant and differing one from the other: which appeereth by this; that every of these bodies changing substance, change their place also withall. For the subtilization and rarefaction distributeth round about the matter which ariseth from the midst and ascendeth on high: contrariwise, condensation and confipation depresseth and driveth it downward to the middle. But of this point, we need not discourse any more in this place. For what cause soever a man shall suppose to produce such passions and mutations, the same shall containe in it a severall world: for that each of them hath an earth and sea of the owne, each one hath her owne proper middle, as also passions and alterations of bodies, together with a nature and power which preserveth and maintaineth every one in their place and being. For that which is without, whether it have nothing at all, or else an infinite voidnesse, middle can it afford none, as we have said before: but there being many worlds, each of them hath a proper middle apart; in such sort, as in every one there shall be motions proper unto bodies, some falling downe to the midst, others mounting aloft from the midst, others mooving round about the midst, according as they themselves doe distinguish motions. And he who would have, that there being many middles, weighty bodies from all parts should tend unto one alone; may very well be compared unto him, who would have the blood of many men to run from all parts into one vaine: likewise that all their braines should be contained within one and the same membraine or pannicle; supposing it a great inconvenience and absurdity, if of naturall bodies all that are solide be not in one and the same place, and the rare also in another. Absurd is he that thus saith; and no lesse foolish were the other, who thinketh much and is offended, if the whole should have all parts, in their order, range and situation naturall. For it were a very grosse absurdity for a man to say, there were a world, which had the Moone in it so situate, as if a man should carry his braine in his heeles, and his heart in the temples of his head: but there were no absurdity nor inconvenience, if in setting downe many distinct worldes and those separate one from another, a man should distinguish withall and separate their parts. For in every of them, the earth, the sea, and the skie, shall be so placed and situate in their naturall seats, as it is meet and appertaineth: and each of those worlds shall have superior, inferiour, circular, and a centre in the midst; not in regard of another world nor of that which is without, but in it selfe and in respect of it selfe. And as for the supposition which some make of a stone without the world, it cannot be imagined how possibly it should either rest or moove: for how can it hang still, seeing it is ponderous and waighy? or moove toward the midst of the world as other heavy bodies, considering it is neither part of it, nor counted in the substance thereof?

As concerning that earth which is contained in another world and fast bound, we need not to make doubt and question, how it should not fall downe hither by reason of the weight, nor be plucked away from the whole; seeing as we doe, that it hath a naturall strength to containe every part thereof. For if we shall take high and low, not within and in respect of the world, but without forth, we shall be driven unto the same difficulties and distresses, which Epicurus fallen into, who maketh his little Atomes or indivisible bodies to move and tend toward those places which are under foot: as if either his voidnesse had feet, or the infinity which he speaketh of, permit a man to imagine either high or low. And therefore some cause there is to marvel at Chrysippus, or rather to enquire and demand what fantasie hath come into his head, and moved him to say, that this world is seated and placed directly in the midst; and that the substance thereof, from all eternity having taken up and occupied the place of the midst, yet neverthelesse it is so compact and tied together that it endureth alwaies and is (as one would say) immortalized: for so much hath he written in his fourth booke de divinatione, that is to say, Of possible things; dreaming (to no purpose) of a middle place in that vast emptinesse: and yet worse absurdly attributing unto that middle (which is not, nor hath any subsistence) the cause of the worlds continuance and stabilitie; especially having written thus much many times in other places,

places, that the substance is governed and maintained partly by the motions tending to the mids, and partly by others from the mids of it. As for other oppositions besides, that the Stoicks make, who is there that feareth them? as namely, when they demand, How it is possible to mainteine one fatall necessity, and one divine providence? and how it can otherwise be, but that there should be many Dies and Zenes, that is to say, Joves and Jupiters, if we grant that there be many worlds? For to begin withall, if it be an inconvenience, to allow many such Joves and Jupiters, their opinions verily be farre more absurd: for they devise an infinit sort of Sunnes, Moones, Apolloes, Dianaes and Neptunes, in innumerable conversions & revolutions of worlds. Moreover, what necessity is there, to enforce us to avow many Jupiters, if there be many worlds? and not rather, in every of them a severall god, as a soveraigne governor and ruler of the whole, to furnished with all understanding and reason, as he whom we furname the Lord and Father of all things? Or what should hinder, but that all worlds might be subject to the providence & destiny of Jupiter: and he reciprocally have an eie to oversee all, to direct, digest and conduct all, in ministering unto them the principles, beginnings, seeds and reasons of all things that are done and made? For it being so that we do see even here many times, a bodie composed of many other distinct bodies; as for example, the assembly or congregation of a city, an armie, and a daunce; in every one of which bodies there is life, prudence, and intelligence, as Chrysippus thinketh: impossible it is not likewise, that in this universall nature, there should be ten, fifty, yea and a hundred worlds, using all one and the same reason, and correspondent to one beginning. But contrariwise, this order and disposition is best becoming the gods. For we ought not to make the gods like unto the kings of a swarme of bees, which go not forth, but keepe within the hive; nor to holde them enclosed and imprisoned (as it were) rather, and shut up fast within Matter, as these men do, who would have the gods to be certaine habitudes or dispositions of the aire; and supposing them to be powers of waters and of fire infused and mixed within, make them to arise and be engendered together with the world, and so afterwards, to be burnt likewise with it, not allowing them to be loose and at libertie, like as coach-men and pilots are; but in manner of statues or images are set fast unto their bases with nailes, and sodered with lead: even so they enclose the gods within bodily matter, and pin them hard thereto; so as being jointed (as it were) fure unto it, they participate therewith all changes and alterations, even to finall corruption and dissolution. Yet is this opinion fare more grave, religious and magnificent, in my conceit: to holde that the gods be of themselves free, and without all command of any other power. And like as the fiery light Castor and Pollux succour those who are tossed in a tempest, and by their comming and presence

Ally the surging waves of sea below,

And still the blustering winds aloft that blow;

and not failing themselves, nor partaking the same perils with the mariners, but onely appearing in the aire above, save those that were in danger: even so the gods for their pleasure goe from one world to another, to visit them; and together with nature, rule and governe every one of them. For Jupiter verily in Homer, call not his eies far from the city of Troy, either into Thracia, or the Nomades and vagrant Scythians along the river Ister or Daunie: but the true Jupiter indeed hath many faire passages & goodly changes becoming his majesty out of one world into another, neither looking into the infinit voidnesse without, nor beholding himselfe and nothing els, as some have thought; but considering the deeds of men and of gods, the motions also and revolutions of the starres in their spheres. For surely, the deity is not offended with variety, nor hateth mutations: but taketh much pleasure therein, as a man may guesse by the circulations, conversions and changes which appeare in the heaven. I conclude therefore, that the infinitie of worlds is a very senselesse and false conceit, such as in no wise will beare and admit any god, but employeth fortune and chance in the managing of all things: but contrariwise, the administration and providence of a certaine quantity and determinate number of worlds, seemeth unto me neither in majestie and worthinesse inferior, nor in travell more laborious, than that which is employed and restrained to the direction of one alone; which is transformed, renewed and metamorphozed (as it were) an infinit sort of times. After I had delivered this speech, I paused and held my peace. Then Philippus, making no long stay: As for me, I will not greatly strive nor stand upon it (quoth he) whether the truth be so or otherwise: but in case we force God out of the superintendence of one onely world, how is it, that we make him to be Creatour of five worlds, neither more nor lesse? and what the peculiar and speciall reason is of this number to a plurality of worlds, rather than of any other, I would more willingly know, than the occasion or cause, why this Mot [E1] is so consecrated in this Temple. For it is neither a triangular, nor a quadrat, nor a perfect, ne yet a cubique number: neither seemeth it to represent any other elegance unto those, who love and esteeme such speculations as these.

And as for the argument inferred from the number of elements, which Plato himselfe obscurely and under covert tearmes touched, it is very hard to comprehend; neither doth it carie and shew any probabilitie, whereby he should be induced to conclude, and draw in a consequence: that like it is, considering in matter there be engendered five sorts of regular bodies, having equall angles, equall sides, and environed with equall superficies; there should seemably of these five bodies, be five worlds made and formed, from the very first beginning. And yet (quoth I) it should seeme, that Theodorus the Solian, expounding the Mathematicks of Plato, handleth this matter not amisse, nor misinterpreteth the place; and thus goeth he to worke: The Pyramis, Octaedron, Dodecaedron, and Icosaedron (which Plato setteth downe for the first bodies) are right beautiful all, both for their proportions, and also for their equalities: neither is there left for nature any other, to devise and forme better than they, or indeed answerable and like unto them. Howbeit, they have not all either the same constitution, nor the like originall: for the least verily and smallest of the five is the Pyramis; the greatest and that which consisteth of most parts, is Dodecaedron; and of the other two behind, the Icosaedron is bigger by two fold and more, than Octaedron, if you compare their number of triangles. And therefore impossible it is, that they should be all made at once of one and the same matter; for the small and subtilie, and such as in composition are more simple than the rest, were more pliable no doubt, and obedient unto the hand of workemen, who mooved and formed the matter, and therefore by all consequence sooner made and brought into subsistence, than those which had more parts and a greater masse of bodies: of which, and namely of such as had more laborious making, and a busier composition, is Dodecaedron. Whereupon it followeth necessarily, that the Pyramis onely was the first body, and not any of the other as being by nature created and produced afterwards. But the remedie and meane to save and avoid this absurditie also, is to separate and divide the matter into five worlds: for here the Pyramis came fourth first; there the Octaedron, and elsewhere the Icosaedron; and in every of these worlds, out of that which came first into esse, the rest drew their originall, by the concretion of parts, which causeth them all to change into all, according as Plato doth insinuate, discoursing by examples in maner throughout all: but it shall suffice us briefly to learne thus much. For aire is engendered by the extinction of fire: and the same againe being subtilized and rarified, produceth fire. Now in the seeds of these two, a man may know their passions, and the transmutations of all. The feminary or beginning of fire is the Pyramis, composed of foure & twenty first triangles: but the feminary of the aire is Octaedron, consisting of triangles of the same kind, in number fortie eight. And thus the one element of aire, standeth upon two of fire, composed and conjoined together: and againe, one body or element of the aire, is divided and parted into twaine of fire; which becomming to be thickned and conspire more still in it selfe, turneth into the forme of water; in such sort, as throughout, that which cometh first into light, giveth alwaies a ready and easie generation unto all the rest, by way of change and transmutation: and so, that never remaineth solitary and alone which is first; but as one masse and constitution hath the primitive & antecedent motion in another of originall beginning: so in all there is kept one name and denomination. Now surely (quoth Ammonius) it is stoutly done of Theodorus, and he hath quit himselfe very well, in fetching about this matter so industriously. But I would much marvel if these presuppositions of his making, do not overthrow and refuse one another: for he would have, that these five worlds were not composed all at once together; but that the smallest and most subtilie which required least workmanship in the making, came fourth first: then as a thing consequent, and not repugnant at all, he supposed that the matter doth not thrust fourth alwaies into essence, that which is most subtilie and simple; but that otherwhiles the thickest, the most grosse and heaviest parts, shew first in generation. But over and besides all this, after a supposall made, that there be five primitive bodies or elements, and consequently thereupon five worlds; he applieth not his prooffe and probabilitie but unto foure onely, For as touching the cube, he subtracteth and remooveth it quite away, as they doe who play at nine holes, and who trundle little round stones: for that such a square & quadrate body every way is naturally unfit, either to turne into them, or to yield them any meanes to turne into it for that the triangles of which they be composed, are not of the same kind: for all the rest do in a common consist of a demi-triangle, as the base; but the proper subject whereof this cube particularly standeth, is the triangle Ilofcoetes, which admitteth no inclination unto a demi-triangle, nor possibly can be conporate or united to it. Now if it be so, that of those five bodies there be consequently five worlds, & that in each one of those worlds the beginning of their generation and constitution, is that body which is first produced and brought to light: it would come to passe, that where the cube cometh fourth first for the generation of the rest, none of the other bodies can possibly be there, forasmuch as the nature of it is not to turne or change into any one of them. For I let passe heere to alledge, that the element or principle whereof Dodecaedron is composed, is not that triangle which is called Scalenen, with three unequal sides, but some other as they say, how ever Plato hath made his Pyramis, Octaedron, and Icosaedron of it: And therefore (quoth Ammonius, smiling thereat) either you must dissolve these objections, or else alledge some new matter as touching the question now presently in hand. Then answered I: For mine owne part I alledge I am not able at this time any thing that carrieth more probability: but peradventure it were better for a man to yeeld reasons of his owne opinion rather, than of anothers. To begin againe therefore I say, that nature being parted and divided at the first in two parts, the one sensible, mutable, subject to generation and corruption, and varieth every way; the other spirituall and intelligible, and continuing evermore in one and the same state, it were very strange and absurd my good friends, first to say that the spirituall nature receiveth division, and hath diversity and difference in it: and then to thinke much and grow into heat of choler and anger, if a man allow not the passible and corporall nature wholly united and conporate in it selfe, without dividing or separating it into many parts. For more meet it were yet, and reasonable, that natures permanent and divine should cohere unto themselves inseparably, and avoid as much as is possible all distraction and divulsion: and yet this force and power of The Other, meddling also even with these, causeth in spirituall and intellectuall things, greater dissociations and dissimilitudes in forme and essentiall reason, than are the locall distances in those corporall natures. And therefore Plato confuting those who hold this position, that all is one, affirmeth these five grounds and principles of all, to wit, Effence or feeing, The same, The other, and after all, Motion, and Station. Admit these five, no marvell is it, if nature of those five bodily elements hath framed proper figures and representations for every one of them, not simple and pure, but so, as every one of them is most participant of each of those properties and puissances. For, plaine and evident it is that the cube is most meet and fortible unto station and repose, in regard of the stability and stedy firmitude of those broad and flat faces which it hath. As for the Pyramis who seeth not and acknowledgeth not incontinently in it the nature of fire, ever moving in those long and slender sides and sharpe angles that it hath. Also the nature of Dodecaedron apt to comprehend all other figures, may seeme properly to be the image representing Ens, or That which is, in respect of all corporall effence. Of the other twaine, Icosaedron resembleth The Other, or Diverse: but Octaedron, hath a principall reference to the forme of The same. And so by this reckoning, the one of them produceth fourth Aire, capable of all substance in one forme; and the other exhibiteth unto us Water, which by temperature may turne into all sorts of qualities. Now it so be that nature requirereth in all things and throughout all, an equal and uniforme distribution, very probable it is, that therbe also five worlds, and neither more nor fewer, than there be moulds or patterns: to the end that each example or patterne may hold the first place and principall puissance in each world, like as they have in the first constitution and composition of bodies. And this may stand in some fort for an answer, and to satisfie him who marvelleth, how we devide that nature which is subject to generation and alteration, into so many kinds: but yet I beseech you, consider and weigh with me more diligently this argument. Certaine it is, that of those two first and supreme principles, I meane Unity, and Binary or Duality; this latter being the element and originall primitive of all difformity, disorder and confusion, is called Infinity: but contrariwise the nature of Unitie, determining and limiting the void infinity, which hath no proportion nor termination, reduceth it into a good forme, and maketh it in some fort capable and apt to receive a denomination, which alwaies accompanieth sensible things. And verily these two generall principles shew themselves; first in number, or rather indeed to speake generally, no multitude is called number, untill such time as unitie comming to be imprinted as the forme in matter, cutteth off from indeterminate infinity, that which is superfluous, superfluous, heere more and there lesse; for then each multitude becommeth and is made number, when as it is once determined and limited by unitie: but if a man take unitie away, then the indefinite and indeterminate Duality, comming againe in place to confound all, maketh it to be without order, without grace, without number, and without measure. Now considering it is so, that the forme is not the destruction of matter, but rather the figure, ornament and order thereof; it must needs be, that both these principles are within number, from which proceedeth the chiefe dissimilitude and greatest difference. For the indefinite and indeterminate principle, to wit, Duality, is the author and cause of the even number: but the better, to wit, unitie is the father (as one would say) of the odde number; so as the first even number is two, and the first odde number three, of which is compounded five, by conjunction common to both, but in the owne puissance odde. For it behooved, & necessary it was, in as much as that which is corporall & sensible for composition sake, is divided into many parts by the power and force of The Other, that is to say, of Diversity, that it should be neither the first even number, nor yet the first uneven or odde, but a third consisting of both: to the end that it might be procreate of both principles, to wit, of that which engendreth the even number, and of that which produceth the odde; for it could not be, that the one should be parted from the other, because that both of them have the nature & puissance of a principle. These two principles then being conjoinct together, the better being the mightier, is opposed unto the indeterminate infinity, which divideth the corporal nature; & so the matter being divided, the unitie interposing it selfe between, impeacheth the universall nature, that it was not divided and parted into two equal portions: but there was a pluralitie of worlds caused by The Other, that is to say, by Diversity, and difference of that which is infinit and determinate; but this pluralitie was brought into an odde and uneven number, by the vertue and puissance of The same and that which is finite, because the better principle suffred not nature to extend farther than was expedient. For if one had beene pure and simple without mixture, the matter should have had no separation at all; but in as much as it was mixed with Duality, which is a divisive nature, it hath received indeed and suffred by this meanes separation and division: howbeit, staied it hath in good time, because the odde was the master and superior over the even. This was the reason that our ancients in old time were wont to use the verbe Pempsesthai, when they would signifie to number or to reckon: And I thinke verily that this word πεντα, that is to say, All, was derived of Pente, that is to say, Five, & not without good reason, because that five is compounded of the two first numbers; and when other numbers afterwards be multiplied by others, they produce divers numbers: whereas five if be multiplied by an even number and doubled, bringeth forth Ten, a perfect number; but if by the odde, it representeth it selfe againe. Heere I omit to say, that it is compounded of the two first quadrate numbers, to wit of Unity and Four; and that it is the first number which is equivalent to the two before it, in such fort as it compoundeth the fairest triangle of those that have right angle, and is the first number that containeth the sesquialterall proportion. For haply these reasons be not well suitable nor proper unto the discourse of this present matter: but this rather is more convenient to alledge, that in this number, there is a naturall vertue and facultie of dividing, and that nature divideth many things by this number. For even in our owne selves she hath placed five exterior senses, as also five parts of the soule, to wit, naturall, sensitive, concupiscible, irascible, and reasonable: likewise so many fingers in either hand. Also the generall seed is at the most distributed into five portions: for in no history is it found written, that a woman was delivered of more than five children at one birth. The Egyptians also in their fables doe report, that the goddesse Rhea brought forth five gods and goddeses: signifying heereby under covert words, that of one and the same matter five worldes were procreated. Come to the universall fabricke and frame of nature, the earth is divided into five zones: the heaven also in five circles, two Arctiques, two Tropiques, and one Aequinoctiall in the midle. Moreover five revolutions there be of the Planets or wandring starres: for that the Sunne, Venus and Mercurie run together in one race. Furthermore the very world it selfe is composed harmonically respective to five, like as even among us our musickall accord and concert consisteth of the posture of five tetrachords, ranged orderly one after another, to wit, of Hypates, Meses, Synnemene, Diezeugmene, and Hyperbolize likewise. The intervals likewise in song which we use be five in number, Dresis, Semitonion, Tonus, Tricimtonion, and Diatonon. So as, it seemeth that nature taketh more pleasure in making all things according to the number of five, than after a Spharicall or round forme; as Aristotle writeth. But what is the

the cause will some one say, that Plato hath reduced the number of five worldes to the five primitive figures of regular bodies, saying, that God in ordaining and describing the whole world used the Quinarie construction? and yet afterwards having proposed the doubtfull question of the number of worldes (to wit, whether we should hold, there was but one, or rather that there were five in truth?) he sheweth plainly that his conjecture is grounded upon this very argument. If therefore we ought to apply the probability to his minde and opinion, then of necessity with the diversity of these figures and bodies there must ensue presently a difference also of motions, according as he himselfe teacheth, affirming: Whatsoever is subtilized or thickened, with the alteration of substance changeth withall the place. For so, if of the aire is ingendered fire, namely when the Octaedron is dissolved and parted into Pyramides: and contrariwise 10 aire of fire being driven close and thrust together into the force of octaedron: it is not possible that it should be in the place where it was afore, but flee and runne into another, as being forced and driven out of the former, and so fight against whatsoever standeth in the way and maketh resistance. And yet more fully and evidently declareth he the same by a similitude and example of such things, as by fannes or such like instruments whereby come is clenfed, & shaken out, or winowed and tried from the rest: saying that even so the elements shaking the matter, and likewise shaken by it, went alwaies to bring like to like, and some tooke up this place, others that, before the universall world was of them composed as now it is. The general matter therefore being in such estate then (as by good likelihood All must needs be where god is away) presently 20 the first five qualities, or rather the first five bodies, having every one of them their proper inclinations and peculiar motions, went apart: not wholly and altogether, nor severed sincerely afunder one from another, for that when all was huddled pell-mell confusedly, such as were surmounted and vanquished, went evermore even against their nature with the mightier and those which conquered. And therefore when some were haled one way, and others caried another way, it hapned that they made as many portions and distinctions in number just as there were divers kinds of those first bodies: the one of fire, and yet the same not pure, but carying the forme of fire: another of a celestiall nature, not sincere heaven indeed, but standing much of the skie: a third of earth, and yet not simply and wholly earth, but rather earthie. But principally, there was a communication of aire and water, as we have said heeretofore, for that these went their waies filled with many divers kinds. For it was not God who separated and disposed the 30 substance, but having found it so rashly and confusedly dissipated of it selfe, and ech part caried diversly in so great disorder, he digested and arranged it by Symmetrie and competent proportion. Then, after he had set over every one, Reason as a guardian and governesse, he made as many worldes as there were kinds of those first bodies subsistent. And thus let this discourse for Ammonius sake, be dedicated as it wereto the grace and favour of Plato. For mine owne part, I will never stand so precisely upon this number of worldes: many of this minde I am rather, that their opinion who hold that there be more worldes than one (howbeit not infinit but determinate) is not more absurd than either of the other, but founded upon as much reason as they: seeing as I doe, that Matter of the owne nature is spread and diffused into many parts, not resting in one, and yet not permitted by reason, to runne in infinitum. And therefore, especially heere 40
 (if else where) putting our selves in minde of the Academie and the precepts thereof, let us not be over-credulous, but as in a slippery place restrain our assent and beleefe: onely in this point of infinity of worldes, let us stand firme and see we fall not but keepe our selves upright. When I had delivered these reasons above said: Beleefe me (quoth Demetrius) Lamprius giveth us a good and wise admonition, For

The gods, for so deceive us men, devise Right many means, not of false Sophistries

as Euripides saith: but of their deeds & works, when we presume and dare pronounce of so high and great matters, as if we knew them certainly. But as the man himselfe said even now, we must recall our speech unto the argument which was first proposed. For that which heeretofore 50 hath beene said, namely that the Oracles are become mute and lie still without any validity, because the Demons which were wont to governe them, be retired and gone, like as instruments of musick yeeld no found and harmonic when the Musicians handle them not: this (I say) giveth occasion to move another question of greater importance, as touching the cause and power, by which the Demons use to make their prophets and prophetes to be ravished with an Enthusiasme or divine fury and full of fantasticall visions, For it is to no purpose to say, that the

the Oracles are silent, because they be abandoned and forsaken of the Demons; unless we be first perswaded, that when they be present and president over them, they let them a worke, and cause them to speake and prophesie. Then Ammonius taking his turne to speake: Thinke you (quoth he) that these Demons be called any thing els,

*Then spirits clad with substance of the aire,
 Which walke about the earth, now here now there,* as saith Hesiodus? For it seemeth unto me, that looke how one man differeth from another, playing either in a Comedie or a Tragedie: the same difference sheweth in the soule, which is attired and clothed within a bodie during this life. There is nothing therefore herein, either strange 01 or without appearance of reason, if soules meeting with other soules, imprint in them visions and fantasies of future things: like as we also shew many accidents done and past, yea and foretell and prognosticate of such as are to come, not all by lively voice, but some by letters and writings, may by touching onely and the regard of the eie; unless peradventure, you have somewhat els (o Lamprius) to say against this. For it was not long since told us, that you had much disputation and conference with certaine strangers in Lebada; but he who related this newes unto us, could not call exactly to minde what talke passed betweene you, Marvell not thereat (quoth I:) for many affaires and occurrents fell out at once betweene, by occasion that the Oracle was open, and a sacrifice solemnized, which caused our speeches to be dispersed, distracted and scattered disorderly. But now (quoth Ammonius) your auditors be at good leisure, willing also 20 to aske questions and to learne, not desirous to contest and contradict in a litigious and quarrellsome humor; before whom you may have good leave to speake what you will, and for that liberty of speech have pardon at their hands and be held excused, as you see. Now when the rest of the company invited and exhorted me likewise, after some pause made and silence for a while, I began againe in this manner: Certes (quoth I,) o Ammonius it fortuneth so, I wot not how, that even your selfe gave the overture and first occasion of those discourses which then and there were held. For if Demons be spirits and soules separate from bodies, and having no fellowship with them (as your selfe said, following heerein the divine Poet Hesiodus who calleth them:

 Of mortall men, who have the care and charge)*

30 why deprive we those spirits and soules which are within the bodies, of this same puissance, whereby the Demons are able to foresee and foretell things to come? For it is not like, that the soules acquired any new propriety or power, when they have abandoned the bodies, where-with they were not endued before: but thinke we must that they had the same parts and faculties alwaies, although worse I must needs say, when they be mixed with bodies. And some of them verily appeare not at all, but be hidden: others are but obscure and feeble, such as heavily and slowly performe their operations (much like unto those who see through a thicke mist, or move in some moist and waterish substance) desiring greatly to be cured, and to recover that facultie which is their owne; to be discharged also and clenfed of that which hindreth and de- 40 fraudeth them of it. For the soule, even while it is bound and tied to the body, hath indeed a power to foresee and know future things: but blinded it is with the terrestriall mixture of corporall substance; for that, like as the Sunne becometh not then to be cleere, and not afore, when he is past the clouds; but being of himselfe alwaies shining, he seemeth unto us darke and troubled through a mist: even so the soule, getteth not then a new power of divination and prophesie, when she departeth out of the body, as if she were escaped out of a cloud; but having the same before; is dimmed and obscured by the commixtion and confusion with that which is mortall and corruptible. Neither ought we to make a wonder heereat, and thinke it incredible, seeing as wedo (if there were nothing else in the soule) how that facultie which we call Memory, is equippollent and answerable in an opposite respect unto the puissance of divination; and con- 50 sidering the great effect thereof, in preserving and keeping things past or rather indeed keeping them whiles they be. For to say truly, of that which is once passed nothing remaineth nor subsisteth in esse, were they actions, wordes, or passions: for all things be transitory and passe away as soone as they are, because time, in manner of a current or streame, carrieth all away before it: but this memorative facultie of the soule catching hold thereof I know not how, and staying it for slipping away, giveth an imagination of essence and being to those things, which in truth are not. For the Oracle verily which was given to the Thessalians as touching the city Arna, willed them to utter and speake

*That which the blinde see cleare,
And what the deafe doe heare.*

But memory is unto us the hearing of the deafe, and the sight likewise of the blinde; in such sort, as no marvell it is (as I have already said) if our soule in retaining still things which are no more, doth anticipate many of those also, which are not yet. And such objects indeed concerne it rather, and therewith it is affected more. For she bendeth and inclineth towards things that are to come: whereas of such as be already past and come to their end, she is freed and delivered, but onely that she remembreth them. Our soules then having this puissance in them inbred and naturall, though feeble, obscure, and hardly able to expresse and represent their imaginations; yet neverthelesse some of them shew and put them forth many times in dreames 10 and in certaine sacred ceremonies and mysteries: namely, when the body is well purified, or receiveth a fit temperature therefore, or else for that the reasonable and speculative faculty being then freed from the cares of things present, joineth with the unreasonable and imaginative part, and turneth it to thinke upon the future. For I approve not that which Enripides saith:

*I hold him for Diviner best,

but he verily who is directed by the reasonable and intelligent part of the soule, and followeth the conduct and leading there of by all probability. Now that power or facultie of divination (like unto a paire of blanke writing tables, wherein there is nothing written) void of reason and not determinate of it selfe, but onely apt and meet to receive fancies, affections, and preferences, without any discourse of reason, or ratiocination, hitteth upon that which is to come, at what time as it is most removed from that which is present; and in this extasie it is transfused, by a certaine temperature and disposition of the body, which we call Enthusiasme or inspiration. Now such a disposition as this, many times the body of it selfe hath; but the earth putteth forth and yeeldeth unto men the sources and fountaines of many other powers and faculties: some of which transport them out of their wits, bringing maladies, contagions, and mortalities: others againe be sometime good, kinde, and profitable, as they know full well who make experience thereof. But this spring, this winde, or propheticall spirit of divination, is most divine and holy, whether it arise and breath up alone by it selfe through the aire, or be drawn up with some liquid humour. For comming once to be infused and mixed within the body, it causeth a strange temperature and unuall disposition in the soules: the property whereof, a right hard matter it is to declare exactly, and expresse certainly; but a man in reason may attaine thereto by conjecture sundry waies: for by heat and dilatation, it openeth (I wot not what) little holes, by which in a likelihood the imaginative facultie is set on worke about future things; much like as wine which working and boiling in the body fureth up, and among other motions, it revealeth and discoveth many hidden secrets. For the fury of Bacchus and of drunkennesse, if we may beleeve Enripides, containeth much divination: when the soule being enchaufed and enflamed, expelleth all feare, which humane wisdom bringeth in, and by that means many times averteeth and quencherh the divine inspiration. And heerewithall a man may alledge very well, and not without great reason, that sicke comming intermingled with heat, subtilizeth the spirit, and maketh it pure, and of the nature of fire (for according to Heraclitus, the soule it selfe is of a dry constitution: ) whereas humiditie doth not onely dim the sight, and dull the hearing, but also being mingled with the aire, and touching the superficies of mirrors, dusketh the brightnesse of the one, and taketh away the light of the other. On the contrary side, it is not impossible that by some refrigeration and condensation of this spirit, after the manner of the tincture and hardnesse of iron, this part of the soule which doth prophesie, should shew it selfe and get a perfect edge. And like as tinne being melted with brasile (which of it selfe is a metall in the oare, rare, spongiouse, and full of little holes) doth drive it neerer, and maketh it more massie and solid, and withall, causeth it to looke more bright and resplendent: even so, I see no inconvenience to hinder, but that this propheticall exhalation having some congruence and affinity with the soules, should fill up that which is lax and empty, and drive it close together more inwardly. For many things there be, that have a reference and congruence one unto the other: thus the beane is forthable unto the purple die; Sal-nitre likewise helpeth much the tincture of a rich scarlet or crimfon colour, if it be mixed therewith, according also as Empedocles said:

*And with the flower of Saffron red,
Fine flax and silke are coloured.*

And

And we have heard you speake (good friend Demetrius) of the river Cydanus, and the sacred cutting knife of Apollo in Tarsus; and namely, how the said river onely cleneth that iron whereof the knife is made, neither is there any other water in the world able to scoure that knife: like as in the city Olympia, they temper the axes that commeth of the sacrifices, with the water of the river Alpheus, and make thereof a mortar, wherewith they plaister the altar there; but if they assay to doe it with the water of any other river else, it will not sticke to, nor binde one jot. No marvell therefore it is, if the earth sending up out of it many exhalations, these onely are found to transport the soules with an enthusiasme or divine fury, and represent the imaginations and fancies of future things. But without all question and contradiction, the report that goeth of the Oracle in this place, accordeth well to this purpose. For it is said, that this propheticall and divining power heret, shewed it selfe first, by occasion of a certeine heardman, who chanced heereto fall; who thereupon began to call forth certaine fanaticall cries and voices, as if he had bene possessed with such a divine inspiration. Whereof the neighbors and those that came about him, at first made no account; but afterwards, when they saw that it fell out so indeed, as he had foretold, they had the man in great admiration: and the greatest clerks and wisest men of all the Delphians, calling to remembrance his name, gave out that it was Coretus. So that, it seemeth to me, that the soule admitteth this temperature and mixtion with this propheticall spirit, as the sight of the eie is affected with the light. For albeit the eie hath naturally a property and power to see, yet the same is not effectually without the light: even so the soule having this puissance and facultie, to foresee future things, like unto the eie had need of some proper and convenient thing to kindle it as it were, and let an edge upon it. And heerupon it is, that many of our ancients have thought Apollo, and the Sunne, to be one and the same god. They also who know what this beautifull and wise proportion is, and withall doe honour it: looke what reference or respect there is of the body to the soule, of the sight to light, and of the * understanding to the truth; the same force and power they esteeme there is of the Sunnes power unto the nature of Apollo: saying, that he is the issue and geniture proceeding from Apollo who is eternall, and who continually bringeth him forth. For like as the one kindles, bringeth forth and stirreth up the visuall power and verue of the sense: even so doth the other by the propheticall verue of the soule. They therefore who thought that it was one and the selfe same god, by good right dedicated and consecrated this Oracle unto Apollo, and unto the Earth: judging, that the Sunne it was which wrought that temperature and imprinted this disposition in the earth, whereof arose this propheticall evaporation. And verily as Hesiodus upon good consideration, and with much more reason than some Philosophers, called the Earth:

*The ground-worke sure
Of all nature:*

even so we deeme it to be eternall, immortal, and incorruptible: many of the vertues and faculties which are in it, we hold that some faile in one place, and others breed a new and engender in another: and great probability there is, that there be transmutations and changes from one place to another, and that such revolutions as these, in the course and proceesse of long time turne and returne circularly often in it; as a man may conjecture and certainly collect by such things as manifestly do appeere. For in divers and sundry countries, we see that lakes and whole rivers, yea and many more fountaines and springs of hot waters, have failed and beene quite lost, as being fled out of our sight, and hidden within the earth; but afterwards in the very same places they have in time shewed themselves againe, or else run hard by. And of metall mines, we know that some have beene spent cleane and emptied; as namely, those of silver about the territory of Attica: semblably the vaines of brasile oare in Eubaea, out of which they forged sometime the best swords, that were hardened with the tincture of cold water: according to which the Poet Aeschylus said:

*He tooke in hand the keene and doury blade,
Which of Euboean steel sometime was made.*

The rocke also and quarry in Carystia, it is not long since it gave over to bring forth certeine balls or bottomes of lost stone, which they use to spin and draw into thred, in manner of flax: for I suppose that some of you have seene towels, napkins, nets, caules, kerchieves and coifes woven of such thred, which would not burne and consume in the fire; but when they were soule and soiled with occupying, folke flung them into the fire, and tooke them forth againe cleane and faire: but now al this is quite gone, and hardly within the said delie shall a man meet

with some few hairie threds of that matter, running here & there among the hard stones digged out from thence. Now of all these things Aristotle and his sectaries hold : That an exhalation within the earth, is the onely efficient cause, with which of necessity such effects must faile and passe from place to place; as also otherwhiles, breed againe therewith. Semblably are we to thinke of the spirits and exhalations propheticall which issue out of the earth; namely, that they have not a nature immortall, and such as can not age or waxe olde, but subject to change and alteration. For probable it is, that the great gluttes of raine and extraordinary fouds, have extinguished them quite, and that by the terrible fall of thunder-bolts the places were smitten, and they withall dissipated and dispatched: but principally, when the ground hath beene shaken with earthquakes, and thereupon settled downward and fallen in; with trouble and confusion of what, or soever was below; it cannot chuse but such exhalations contained within the hollow caves of the earth, either changed their place and were driven forth, or utterly were stifled and choked. And so in this place also, there remained and appeared some tokens of that great earth-quake, which overthrow the city and staid the Oracle here: like as, by report in the city Orchomenos, there was a plague which swept away a number of people; and therewith the Oracle of Tiresias the prophet, failed for ever, & so continueth at this day mute and to no effect. And whether the like befell unto the Oracles which were wont to be in Cilicia, as we heare say, no man can more certainly enforme us than you Demetrius. Then Demetrius: How things stand now at this present, I wot not; for I have beene a traveller and out of my native country a long time, as yee all know: but when I was in those parts, both that of Mopsus, and also the other of Amphichus, flourished and were in great request. And as for the Oracle of Mopsus, I am able to make report unto you of a most strange and wonderfull event thereof, for that I was my selfe present. The Governour of Cilicia is of himselfe doubtfull and wavering, whether there be gods or no? upon infirmity, as I take it, of miscredence and unbelieve (for otherwise he was a naughty man, a violent oppressour, and scorner of religion.) But having about him certaine Epicureans, who standing much upon this their goodly and beautifull Physiologie forsooth (as they terme it) or else all were marred, scoffe at such things; he sent one of his enfranchised or freed servants unto the Oracle of Mopsus indeed, howbeit, making semblance as if he were an espiall, to discover the campe of his enemies: he sent him (I say) with a letter surely sealed, wherein he had written without the privy of any person whatsoever, a question or demaund to be presented unto the Oracle. This messenger, after the order and custome of the place, remaining all night within the sanctuary of the temple, fell there asleepe, and rehearsed the morrow morning what a dreame he had; and namely, that he thought he saw a faire and beautifull man to present himselfe unto him, and say unto him this onely word Blacke, and no more: for presently he went his way out of his sight. Now wee that were there, thought this to be a foolish and absurd toy, neither wist we what to make of it. But the governour afore said was much astonied thereat, and being stricken with a great remorse and pricke of conscience, worshipped Mopsus and held his Oracle most venerable; for opening the letter, he shewed publickly the demaund contained therein, which went in these words: Shall I sacrifice unto thee a white Bull, or a blacke? inasmuch as the very Epicureans themselves who conversed with him, were much abashed and ashamed. So he offered the sacrifice accordingly, and ever afterwards to his dying day honoured Mopsus right devoutly.

Demetrius having thus said, held his peace: but I desirous to conclude this whole disputation with some corollary, turned againe and cast mine eye upon Philippus and Ammonius who sat together. Now they seemed as if they had somewhat to speake unto me, and thereupon I staid my selfe againe. With that, Ammonius: Philip (quoth he) o Lamprias, hath somewhat yet to say of the question which hath bene all this while debated. For he is of opinion, as many others beside him are, that Apollo is no other god than the Sunne, but even the very same. But the doubt which I moove, is greater and of more important matters. For I wot not how ere while, in the traine of our discourse, we tooke from the gods all divination and ascribed the same in plaine termes to Demons and angels: and now we will seeme, to thrust them out againe from hence, and to disleize them of the Oracle and three footed table of which they were possessed; conferring the beginning and principall cause of prophesie, or rather indeed the very substance and power it selfe, upon winds, vapours, and exhalations. For even those temperatures, heats, tinctions, and consolidations (if I may so say) which have beene talked of, remove our minde and opinion farther off still from the gods, and put into our heads this imagination and conceit of such a cause, as Enripides deviseth Cyclops to alledge in the Tragoedie bearing his name:

*The earth must needs bring forth grasse, this is flat,
Will he or will she, and feed my cattell fatter.*

This onely is the difference, because he saith not that he sacrificed his beasts unto the gods, but unto himselfe and his belly, the greatest of all the Demons: but we both sacrifice and allow powre forth our praies unto them, for to have their answer from the Oracles: and to what purpose I pray you, if it be true, that our owne soules bring with them a propheticall facultie and vertue of divination, and the cause which doth excite and actuate the same, be some temperature of the aire, or rather of winde? What means then, the sacred institutions and creations of these religious prophetesses ordained for the pronouncing of answers? And what is the reason that they give no answer at all, unlesse the host or sacrifice to be killed, tremble all over even from the very feet, and shake whiles the libaments & effusions of hallowed liquors be poured upon it. For it is not enough to wag the head, as other beasts doe which are flaine for sacrifice, but this quaking, panting and shivering must be throughout all the parts of the body, and that with a trembling noise. For if this be wanting, they say the Oracle giveth no answer, neither doe they so much as bring in the religious priestesse Pythia. And yet it were probable that they should both doe and thinke thus, who attribute the greatest part of this propheticall inspiration, either to God or Demon. But according as you say, there is no reason or likelihood therof: for the exhalation that ariseth out of the ground, whether the beast tremble or no, will alwaies if it be present, cause a ravishment and transportation of the spirit, and evermore dispose the soule alike, not onely of Pythia, but also of any body else that first cometh or is presented. And thereupon it followeth, that a meere folly it is, to employ one silly woman in the Oracle, and to put her to it (poore soule) to be a votary and live a pure maiden all the daies of her life, sequestred from the company of man. And as for that Coretas, whom the Delphians name to have beene the first that chancing to fall into this chinke or crevasse of the ground, gave the hansell of the vertue and property of the place, in mine opinion he differed nothing at all from other goateheards, or shepheards, nor excelled them one whit: at least wile if this be a truth that is reported of him, and not a meere fable and vaine fiction, as I suppose it is no better.

And verily when I consider and discourse in my selfe, how many good things this Oracle hath bene cause of unto the Greeks, as well in their warres and martiall affaires, as in the foundations of cities, in the distresses of famine and pestilence, me thinks it were a very indignity and unworthy part, to attribute the invention and originall thereof unto meere fortune and chance, and not unto God and divine providence. But upon this point, I would gladly, o Lamprias, (quoth he) have you to dispute and discourse a little: how say you Philippus, may it please you to have patience the while? Most willingly (quoth Philippus) for my part: and so much I may be bold also to promise in the behalfe of all the company, for I see well that the question by you proposed hath moved them all. And as for my selfe (quoth I) o Philippus, it hath not onely moved, but also abashed and dismaied me, for that in this so notable assembly and conference of so many worthy parsonages, I may seeme above mine age, in bearing my selfe and taking pride in the probability of my wordes, to overthrow or to call into question any of those things, which truly have bene delivered, or religiously beleaved as touching God and divine matters. But satisfie you I will, and in the defence of my selfe produce for my witnesse and advocate both, Plato. For this Philosopher reprooved old Anaxagoras, in that being to much addicted to naturall causes and entangled with them; following also and pursuing alwaies that which necessarily is effected in the passions and affections of naturall bodies, he overpassed the finall and efficient causes, for which and by which things are done, and those are indeed the better causes and principles of greater importance: whereas himselfe either before, or else most of all other Philosophers hath profecuted them both: attributing unto God the beginning of all things wrought by reason: and not depriving in the meane while the matter of those causes which are necessary unto the worke done: but acknowledging heerein, that the adorning and dispose of all this world sensible, dependeth not upon one simple cause alone, as being pure and uncompounded, but was engendered and tooke essence, when matter was coupled and conjoined with reason. That this is so, doe but consider first the workes wrought by the hand of Artisans: as for example (not to goe farther for the matter) that same foot heere and basis so much renowned, of the standing cup, among other ornaments and oblations of this temple (which Herodotus called,

called, Hypocretation) this hath for the materiall cause verily, fire, iron, the mollesying by the meanes of fire, and the tincture or dipping in water, without which this peece of worke could not possibly have bene wrought. But the more principall cause and mistresse indeed, which mooved all this, and did worke by all these, was art and reason applied unto the worke. And verily we see that over such peeces, whether they be pictures or other representations of things, the name of the artificer and workman is written, as for example:

*This picture Polygnotus drew, of Troy won long before,
Who father had Aglaophon, and was in Thalos borne.*

And verily he it was indeed as you see, who painted the destruction of Troy; but without colours ground, confused and mingled one with another, impossible had it bene for him to have exhibited such a picture, so faire and beautifull to the eye as it is. If then some one come now and will needs meddle with the materiall cause, searching into the alterations and mutations thereof, particularizing of Sinopre mixed with Ochre, or Cerusse with blacke, doth he impair or diminish the glory of the painter Polyctus? He also, who discoureteth how iron is hardened, and by what meanes mollified: and how being made soft and tender in the fire, it yeeldeth and obaith them who by beating and knocking drive it out in length and breadth: and afterwards being dipped and plunged into fresh waters till, by the actual coldnesse of the said water (for that the fire heats had softened and rarefied it before) it is thrust close together and condensate: by means whereof it getteth that stiffe, compact and hard temper of Steele, which Homer calleth the very force of iron; reserveth he for the workman any thing lesse heereby, in the principall cause and operation of his worke? I suppose he doth not. For some there be who make prooffe and triall of Physicke drogues, and yet I trow they condemne not thereby the skill of Physicke: like as Plato also himselfe, when he saith: That we doe see, because the light of our eye is mixed with the cleerenesse of the Sunne; and heare by the percussio and beating of the aire, doth not deny that we have the facultie of seeing and power of hearing by reason and providence. For in summe, as I have said and doe still averre, whereas all generation proceedeth of two causes, the most ancient Theologians and Poets, vouchsafed to set their minde upon the better onely and that which was more excellent, chaunting evermore this common refrain and foot 30 (as it were) of the song in all things and actions whatsoever:

*Jove is the first, the midst, the last;
all things of him depend:
By him begin they, and proceed;
in him they come to end.*

After other necessary and naturall causes they never fought farther, nor came neere unto them: whereas the moderne Philosophers who succeeded after them and were named naturalists, tooke a contrary course; and turning cleane aside from that most excellent and divine principle, ascribed all unto bodies, unto passions also of bodies, and I wot not what percussions, mutations and temperatures. And thus it is come to passe, that as well the one sort as the other, are in their 40 opinions defective and come short of that which they should. For as these either of ignorance know not, or of negligence regard not to set downe the efficient principall cause, whereby, and from which: so the other before, leave out the materiall causes, of which; and the instrumentall meanes, by which things are done. But he who first manifestly touched both causes, and coupled with the reason that freely worketh and moveth, the matter which necessarily is subject and suffereth; he (I say) for himselfe & us, answereth all calumnies, and putteth by all surmizes and suspitions whatsoever. For we bereave not divination either of God, or of reason: for as much as we graunt unto it for the subject matter, the soule of man; and for an instrument and plectre (as it were) to set it a worke, we allow a spirit or winde, and an exhalation enthusiasticke. First and formost, the earth it is that engendreth such exhalations: then, that which gi- 50 veth unto the earth all power and vertue of this temperature and mutation is the Sunne, who (as we have learned by tradition from our forefathers) is a god. After this we adjoine thereto, the Daemons as superintendants, overseers and keepers of this temperature (as if it were some harmony and consonance) who in due and convenient time let downe and slacke, or else set up and stretch hard the vertue of this exhalation: taking from it otherwhiles the over-active efficacy that it hath to torment the soule and transport it beside it selfe: tempering therewith a motive

vertue without working any paine, or hurt and damage to them that are inspired and possessed therewith. Wherein he thinkes, we doe nothing that seemeth either absurd or impossible: neither in killing sacrifices before we come to moove the Oracle, and adorning them with coronets of flowers, and powring upon them sacred liquors and libations, doe we ought that is contrary to this discourse and opinion of ours. For the priests and sacrificers, and whosoever have the charge to kill the beast, and to powre upon it the holy libations of wine or other liquors; who also observe and consider the motion, trembling and the whole demeanour thereof, doe the same for no other end or cause but to have a signe, that God giveth care unto their demand. For necessary it is that the beast sacrificed unto the gods be pure, found, entier, im- 10 maculate, and uncorrupt both in soule and bodie. And verily, for the body it is no hard matter to judge and know the markes: as for the soule they make an experiment, by setting before bulles, meale: by presenting unto swine, eich-peale: for if they will not fall to, nor tast thereof, it is a certaine token that they be not right. For the goat, cold water is the triall. Now if the beast make no shew and semblance of being mooved or affected, when as the said water is powred aloft on it, be sure the soule thereof is not disposed as it ought to be by nature.

Now, say it go for currant and be constantly beleevd, that it is an undoubted and infallible signe, that the God will give answer, when the host or sacrifice thus drenched doth stire; and contrariwise, that he will not answer, if the beast queetch not: I see nothing herein repugnant 20 to that, which we have before delivered. For every natural power produceth the effect for which it is ordained, better or worse, according as the time and season is more or lesse convenient: and probable it is, that God giveth us certaine signes, whereby we may know when the opportunity is past. For mine owne part, I am of this minde, that the very exhalation it selfe which ariseth out of the earth, is not alwaies of the same sort; but at one time is slacke and feeble, at another stretched out and strong. And the argument which maketh me thus to judge, I may easily con- 30 firme and verifie by the testimonie of many strangers and of all those ministers who serve in the temple. For the chamber or rounge, wherein they are set and give attendance who come to demand the answer of the Oracle, is filled thorow (not often, nor at certaine set times, but as it falleth out after some space betwene) with so fragrant an odour and pleasant breath, as the most pretious ointments and sweetest perfumes in the world can yeeld no better. And this ariseth from the sanctuarie and vault of the temple, as out of some fource and lively fountain: and verily 40 like it is, that it is heat, or at leastwise some other puissance, that sendeth it forth. Now if per-adventure, this may seeme unto you not probable nor to found of truth: yet will ye at leastwise confesse unto me, that the Prophetesse Pythia hath that part of the soule, unto which this winde or prophetical spirit approacheth, disposed some time in this sort and otherwhiles in that, and keepeth not alwaies the same temperature, as an harmonic immutable. For many troubles and passions there be that possesse her body, and enter likewise in her soule, some apparent; but more, secret and unseene: with which (she finding herselfe seized and replenished, better it were 50 for her not to present and exhibit herselfe to this divine inspiration of the god, being not altogether cleane and pure from all perturbations; like unto an instrument of Musicke well set in tune and sounding sweetly, but passionate and out of order. For neither wine doth surprize the drunken man alwaies alike, and as much at one time as at another; nor the sound of the flute or shaulme affecteth after one and the same sort at all times, him who naturally is given to be soone ravished with divine inspiration: but the same persons are one time more, and another while lesse transported beside themselves; and drunken likewise, more or lesse. The reason is, because in their bodies there is a divers temperature: but principally, the imaginative part of the soule, and which receiveth the images and fantasies, is possessed by the body, and subject to change with it, as appeareth evidently by dreames: for sometimes there appeare many visions and fantasies of all sorts in our sleeps; otherwhiles againe, we are free from all such illusions, and rest in great quietnesse and tranquillitie. We our selves know this Cleom here of Daulis, who all his life time 50 (and many yeeres he lived) never (as he said himselfe) dreamed nor saw any vision in his sleeper: and of those in former times, we have heard as much reported of Thrasymedes the Hecerean. The cause whereof, was the temperature of the bodie: whereas contrariwise it is seene, that the complexion of melancholicke persons is apt to dreame much, and subject to many illusions in the night; although it seemeth their dreames and visions be more regular, and fall out truer than others, for that such persons touching their imaginative faculty with one fanisie or other, it can not chuse but they meet with the truth otherwhiles: much like as when a man shoots many shafts,

shafts, it goeth hard if he hit not the marke with one. When as therefore the imaginative part and the propheticall faculty is well disposed and futable with the temperature of the exhalation, as it were with some medicinable potion, then of necessitie there must be engendred within the bodies of Prophets an Enthusiasme or divine furie: contrariwise, when there is no such proportionate disposition, there can be no propheticall inspiration; or if there be, it is fanaticall, unreasonable, violent and troublefome: as we know, how of late it befel to that Pythias or Prophetesse, who is newly departed. For there being many pilgrims and strangers come from forren parts to consult with the Oracle, it is said, that the host or beast to be sacrificed, did endure the first libaments and liquors that were powred upon it, never stirring thereat nor once quenching for the matter: but after that the Priests and Sacrificers powred still, and never gave over to cast liquor on, beyond all measure; at length (after great laving and drenching of it) hardly and with much adoe it yielded and trembled a little. But what hapned hereupon to the Prophetesse or Pythias aforesaid? Went she did indeed downe into the cave or hole, against her will (as they said) and with no alacrity at all: but incontinently, when she was come up againe, at the very first words and answers that she pronounced, it was well known by the horfencesse of her voice, that she could not endure the violence of possession, being replenished with a maligne and mite spirit, much like unto a ship caried away under full sailes with a blustering gale of wind. Inso-much as in the end being exceedingly troubled, and with a fearefull and hideous crie, making haste to get out, she flung herselfe downe, and fell upon the earth: so that not onely the foresaid pilgrims fled for feare, but Nicander also the High-priest, and other Sacrificers and religious ministers that were present. Who notwithstanding afterwards taking heart unto them, and entring againe into the place, tooke her up lying still in an extasie besides herselfe: and in very trueth, she lived not many daies after. And therefore it is, that the said Pythias keepeth her bodie pure and cleane from the company of man, and forbidden she is to converse or have commerce all her life time with any stranger. Also, before they come to the Oracle, they observe certaine signes; for that they thinke it is known unto the God, when her bodie is prepared and disposed to receive (without danger of her person) this Enthusiasme. For the force and vertue of this exhalation, doth not move and incite all sorts of persons, nor the same alwaies after one maner, nor yet as much at one time as at another: but giveth onely a beginning, and setteth to (as it were) a match to kindle it, as we have said before; even unto those onely who are prepared and framed aforehand to suffer and receive this alteration. Now this exhalation (without all question) is divine and celestially: howbeit for all that, not such as may not faile and cease, not incorruptible, not subject to age and decay, nor able to last and endure for ever: and under it, all things suffer violence, which are betwene the earth and the moone, according to our doctrine: however others there be who affirme, that those things also which are above, are not able to resist it; but being wearied an eternall and infinite time, are quickly changed and renewed (as one would say) by a second birth & regeneration. But of these matters (quoth I) advise you I would and my selfe also, elsedones to call to minde, and consider often this discourse, for that they be points exposed to many reprehensions, and sundry objections may be alledged against them. All which, the time will not suffer us now to prosecute at large: and therefore let us put them off unto another opportunity, together with the doubts and questions which Philippus moved as touching Apollo and the Sunne.

The Summarie.

Among infinite testimonies of the fury of maligne spirits and evil angels (who having beene created at first good, kept not their originall, but fell from the degree and state of happinesse, wherein continue by the grace and favour of God the good angels, who minister and attend upon those who shall receive the inheritance of salvation and everlasting life) these may bereckoned for the chiefe and principall, that such reprobate spirits and accursed fiends, endeavour & practise by all meanes possible to make themselves to be adored by men: and faine would they be set in the throne of him, who having imprisoned and tied them fast in a deepe dungeon, with the chaine of darknesse, reserveth them to the judgement of that great day of doome. And so farre proceeded they in pride and presumption, as to cause themselves to be stiled by the name of God; yea, and to be adorned with those titles, which are due and appertine unto the Aeternall, their soveraigne judge. Their devices and artificall meanes to bring this about, be wonderfull, and of exceeding variety: according as the infinit numbers of idols swarming in all parts, and so many strange and uncouth superstitions, wherewith the world hath beene diffamed unto this present day, doe testifie and give evident prooffe. But if there be any place in the whole earth, wherein Satan hath actually shewed his furious rage against God and man, it is Greece: and above all, in that renowned temple of Delphi, which was the common seat, upon which this cursed enemy hath received the homages of an infinit number of people of all sorts and qualities, under the colour and pretence of resolving their doubtfull questions. Heere then especially presumed he and was so bold, as to take upon him the name of God: and for to reacht thereto, hath set out and garnished his Oracles, with ambiguous speeches, short and sententious, intermingling some trueris among lies: even as it pleased the just judge of the world, to let the reines loose unto this notorious seducer, and to give him power for to deceive and abuse the world: as also by certaine notable sayings (as these: Know thy selfe. Nothing too much: and such like) he hath kept bound unto him, persons of highest spirit and greatest conceit: causing them to thinke, that in delivering so goodly precepts for the rule and direction of this life, it must needs be the true friend of mankind, yea and the very heavenly wisdom, that spake by these Oracles. But his audacious pride, together with most intolerable impudence, hath appeared in the inscription of this bare word, EI, upon the porch of the temple of Apollo in Delphi, in that he pretended title and claimed thereby (according to the last interpretation thereof in this present discourse) to put himselfe in the place of the eternall God: who onely is, and evereth Being unto all things. And that which worse is, the blindness was so horrible, even of the wisest Sages, that this opinion hath beene seated in their heads whilst this tyrant possessed them, in such sort, as they tooke pleasure to suffer themselves so to be confused by him. But hereby good cause have we to praise our God, who hath discovered and laid open to us such impostures, and maketh his majestie known unto us by his word, to be the onely true and eternall deitie, in adoring and worshipping whom, we may safely and truly say EI, that is to say, Thou art: as contrariwise, the deceitfull wiles and illusions of Satan and his complices, do declare how fearefull and horrible the judgement of God is upon such rebellious spirits. Now if some over-busy and curious head, will heere dispute and reason against the justice of him who is the disposer of all things, and enterprise to controule that eternall wisdom which governeth the world, for having mercy upon such as it pleaseth him, and suffering suffering to fall from so excellent an estate, the Apostate and disobedient angels, and yet permitting them to have such a powerfull hand over the most part of Adams children; we answer in one word: Man, what art thou, that thou wilt plead against God? Shall the thing formed, say unto him who formed it, Why hast thou made me so? Hath not the potter full power to make of the same masse of earth or clay, one vessel for honor, and another for dishonor? The judgements of God are unsearchable, they have neither bottom nor brinke: the riches of his wisdom and knowledge are inscrutable, and beyond all computation: his waies are hidden and impossible to be found out. If then there be any place in the consideration of the secrets of God, where we ought to be retentive, warie and discret, it is in this, where every man hath just occasion to thinke upon this notable lesson and advertisement: Not to presume for to know over and above that which he should, but to be wise unto sobriety: and that no man ought to be puffed up with pride, but rather to feare. Moreover, as touching the contents of this discourse, the author having used an honest and decent Preface, faith in general: That by this present inscription, Apollo intended to make himselfe knowne, and to incite every man to inquire into time. But heerein the enemy of mankind sheweth his audacity and boldnesse sufficiently, as also how he deludeth and mocketh his slaves; in that after he had deprived them of right and sound judgement, he stirreth them up to know, who he is: which is as much as if one should plucke out the eyes, and cut in twaine the hamstrings of a traveller or wayfaring man; and then bid him seeke out his way, and goe onward on his journey. Now he brings in foure drivers perfonages, delivering their minds as touching this Ad<sub>1</sub>, E<sub>1</sub>. Lamprias opining in the first place, thinketh that the first and principall wise Sages of Greece devised it, for that they would be knowne and discerned from others. Ammonius secondly, 20 referreth and applieth it to the Wishes and Questions of those who resort unto the Oracle. Theon the third, attributeth this mysterie unto Logicke, and doth all that possibly he can to maintaine his opinion. Eustrophus the Mathematician speaking in the fourth place, and seconded by Plutarch, Philosophizeth at large upon the number of 5. represented by the letter E: he discoureth and runneth through all the Mathematickes, and divers parts of Philosophy, and all to approve and make good his conceit: but his drift and end is, to shew under the myssicall sense of numbers, the perfection of his Apollo, which he draweth and fetcheth also from the consideration of his titles, epithets and attributes. But Ammonius gathering together their voices, and closing or stopping up the disputation, seemeth to hit the marke: proving by most strong and learned reasons, that Apollo would by this word instruct pilgrims, how they ought to salute and call him, so wit in saying thus, E<sub>1</sub> it that is so say, 30 Thou art he: which is opposite unto that salutation which this false god (usurping the name of the true Jehovah, or alwaies Existent) greeteth men with, in setting just before their eyes, in the emrie and forefront of his temple, these two words, Γνωθι σεαυτον: that is to say, Know thy selfe. Having enriched this with two evident proofs, the one taken from the uncerteine condition of creatures; the other from the firmitude and true estate or being of the Creator; he exhorteth his followers to lift up themselves to the contemplation of the essence of God, and to honour the Sunne, his expresse image. Which done, he refuteth certaine contrary opinions: and after a new confirmation of his discourse, he endeth where he first began; to wit, that the knowledge of God and our selves, are opposite in such sort, as yet neverthelesse they must meet and concur in us. But all the application of this discourse unto Apollo (whom you must take for the very diuell) in no wise is 40 fit and agreeable. And heerein a man may see better yet, what madnesse and folly is the wisdom of man: and in how thicke and palpable darknesse they goe groping with their hands before them, who are no otherwise guided than by the discourse of their owne reason. Which teacheth us once againe to adore the secrets of God: to recognize and apprehend his mercies in the matter of our salvation: to dread also his justice, which sheweth it selfe in the deplorable and piteous blindness of so many nations; even from the time that some first entered into the world, unto this present day.

WHAT SIGNIFIETH THIS

word E<sub>1</sub>, engraven over the dore of Apolloses temple in the city of Delphi.

Light of late in my reading (friend Sarapion) upon certaine pretie [Iambique] verses, not unelegantly endited, which Dicaearchus supposeth that the Poet Euripides delivered unto king Archelaus, to this effect:

No gifts will I to you present,
Since poore I am, and wealth you have:
Left I for folly of you be shent,
Or by such giving seeme to crave.

For he, who of that little meanes which he hath, bestoweth some small present upon them that are rich and possesse much, gratifieth them nothing at all, nor deserveth any thanks: and that which worke is, because no man will believe that he giveth (be it never so little) for nothing, he incurreth the suspition and obloquie of being cautelous, illiberal, and simply naught. But forasmuch as the gifts that be in the nature 20 of silver, gold and temporall goods, be in regard of beautie and liberall courtesie, farre inferiour to those which go in the kinde of good letters, and proceed from learning: it standeth well with honesty, both to give such, and also to demand the like of those who receive the same. And therefore, in sending presently unto you, and for your sake unto those friends about you in those parts, certaine discourses gathered together as touching the Temple and Oracle of Apollo Pythius, as an offering of first fruits; I confesse that I expect from you others againe, both more in number and better in value, considering that you live in a great city, have more leasure, and enjoy the benefit of more books, and all sort of scholasticall conferences and learned exercises. And verily it seemeth, that our good and kinde Apollo doth indeed remedy, ease and assaile the doubtfull difficulties ordinarily incident to this life of ours, by giving answer unto those who re- 30 paire unto his Oracle: but such as concerne matter of learning, he putteth forth and propoeth himselfe unto that part of our minde, which naturally is given to Philosophize and study wisdom, imprinting therein a covetous desire to know and understand the truth: as may appeare by many other examples, and namely, in this petie mot, E<sub>1</sub>, consecrated in his temple. For it is not like, that it was by mere chance and adventure, nor by a lotterie (as it were) of letters shuffled together, that this word alone should have the preeminence with this god, as to precede and goe before all others; ne yet, that it should have the honour to be consecrated unto God, or dedicated in the temple as a thing of speciall regard for to be seene and beheld: but it must needs be, that either the first learned men (who at the beginning had the charge of this temple) knew some particular and exquisite propertie in this word, or els used it as a device to 40 symbolize some matter of singularity, or covertly to signifie a thing of great consequence. Having therefore many times before, clearly put by and avoided, or passed over this question proposed in the schooles for to be discussed and discoursed upon; of late I was surprized and set upon by mine owne children, upon occasion that I was debating with certaine strangers, as desirous to satisfie them: whom being ready to depart out of the city of Delphi, it was no part of civility either to detaine long, or altogether to reject, having so earnest a minde to heare me say somewhat. When therefore, as we were set about the temple, I beganne partly to looke unto some things my selfe, and partly to demand and enquire of them; I was put in minde and admonished by the place and matters then handled, of a former question which before time (when 50 Xerxes passed thorow these parts) I heard Ammonius to discourse, and others besides, in this variety place; and as touching a question of the same difficultie likewise propounded. For, considering that this god Apollo is no lesse a Philosopher than a Prophet, Ammonius then delivered, that in regard thereof the surnames might very well be fitted and applied, which were attributed unto him very rightly and with good reasons (showing and declaring, that he is Pythius, a Questionist to those who begin to learne and enquire; Delius and Phaneus, that is to say, cleere and light some unto such as have the truth a little thining and appearing unto them; Ammonius, that is to say, skillfull and learned unto as many as have attained unto knowledge already; and Leistes, that notus, as one would say, Eloquent or Discourfing, when they put their fciencie in praftice and make ufe thereof, proceeding for to conferre, difpute and difcoursfe one with another. And for that it appertaineth unto Philofophers, to enquire, admire and caft doubts, by good right the moft part of divine matters belonging to the gods, are couched & hidden under darke enigmes and covert fpeeches, and thereupon require that a man fhould demand, why? and whether? as alfo to be instructed in the caufe. As for example, about the maintenance of the immortall or eternal fire, Why of all kinds of wood they burne the Firre only? Alfo, Wherefore they never make any perfume but of the Laurell? Likewife, What is the reafon, that in this temple there be no more but two images of two deftinies or fatall fifters, named Parce, whereas in all places els there be three of them? Semblably, What fhould be the caufe, that no woman (whatsoever she be) is permitted to have accesse unto this Oracle for counsell or refolution? Againe, What is the reafon of that fabricke or three footed table? and fuch other matters which invite, allure and draw thofe who are not altogether witleffe, void of fenfe and reafon, to afke, to fee and heare fomewhat, yea and to difpute about them, what they fhould meane? And to this purpofe, doe but marke and confider thefe infcriptions ftanding in the forefront of this Temple: Know thy felfe, and Nothing too much: what a number of questions and learned difputations they have moved: alfo, what a multitude of goodly difcourfes have fprung & proceeded from fuch writings, as out of fome feed or graine of corne. And this will I fay unto you, that the matter now in question, is no leffe fertile and plentifull, than any one of the other.

When Ammonius had thus faid, my brother Lamprias began in this wife: And yet (quoth he) the reafon which we all have heard as touching this question, is very plaine and fhort. For reported it is, that thofe ancient Sages or wife men, who by fome are named Sophifters, were indeed of themfelves no more than five: to wit, Chilon, Thales, Solon, Bias, and Pittacus. But when firft Cleobulus the tyrant of the Lindians, and then Periander the tyrant likewife of Corinth (who had neither of them any one jot of vertue or wifdome) by the greatneffe of their power, by the number of their friends, and by many benefits and demerits whereby they obliged their adherents, acquired forcibly this reputation, in despite of all ufurped the name of Sages: and to this purpofe caufed to be fpredd fowen and divulged throughout all Greece certaine odde fentences and notable fayings, as well as thofe of the others, wherewith the former Sages above named were difcontented. Howbeit for all this, thefe five wifemen would in no hand difcover and convince their vanity, nor yet openly conteft and enter into termes of quarell with them about this reputation, ne yet debate the matter againft fo mighty perfonages, who had fo great meanes of countenance in the world: but being affembled upon a time in this place, after conference together they confecrated and dedicated here the letter [E] which as it ftandeth fifth in the order of the Alphabet, fo in number it fignifieth five: as if they testified and depofed here before the god, that they were but five; protefting that the fixth and the feventh they rejected and excluded out of their focietie, as who had no right to belong unto them. Now that this conjecture is not befide the purpofe, a man may know, who hath but heard them fpeake who have the charge and fuperintendence of this temple; namely, how they call that E1, which is written in gold, the E1 of Livia Augusta the emperrefe and wife of Augustus Caesar: the other in braffe, the E1 of the Athenians: and the firft, which is moft ancient, and for the matter and fubftance thereof no better than cut in wood, at this very day they name, the E1 of the Sages; as being dedicated not by one of them alone, but by all together. Heereat Ammonius pleafantly fmiled, as fuppofting this to be the proper and peculiar conceit of Lamprias himfelfe, howsoever befemed to father it upon others, feigning that he heard it elfe where, to the end that he might not be called to account, and put to the maintenance and defence thereof. Then another of the company who were there prefent, faid that this was much like unto a foolifh toy which a Chaldaean ftanger, and by profeflion an Aftrologer, not long fince fet abroad: That feven letters there were forfooth in all the Alphabet, which were vocall and of themfelves rendered a voice: like as feven ftarres there were in the heaven, which had their proper motions apart, at liberty, and not bound and linked to others. Alfo that among thofe vocall letters or vowels, E was the fecond; even as the Sunne of all the Planets was next unto the Moone: and that all the Greeks in manner, with one accord, hold Apollo and the Sunne, to be both one. But this, when all is done, favourerth altogether of his counting table of judiciall Aftronomie, and of his triviall difcourfing head. Moreover it feemeth that Lamprias taketh not heed, but ere he is aware, ftirreth up all thofe who have the charge of the temple, againft this reafon of his. For there is not a man man in all the citie of Delphi, who knoweth ought of that which he hath faid, but they alledge the common opinion, & that which runneth currant throughout the world, which is: That it is neither the outward forme and fhew, nor the found; but the very Mot only as it is written, conteineth fome fecret fignification: for it is as the Delphians doe conceive of it. And with that the high prieft Nicander himfelfe (who was prefent) faid, that this E1 is the forme and maner that they ufe, who come to confult with the god Apollo, and to conver their questions unto him: and ordinarily, it carrieth the firft place in all their interrogatories. For ufuall it is with them thus to demaund: E1 νικάνω; E1 ζωοποιώ, &c. that is to fay, If, or whether they fhall have victory? if they fhall marry? if it will be expedient for them to goeto fea? if they were beft to till the ground? or if they fhould do well to make a voiage and travell into forren parts? And here-in the God (who is wife and learned, mocking the Logicians, bidding them farewell who hold, that of this participle or Conjunction E1, that is to fay, If, and of what Subjunctive propofition foever following after it, nothing can be made, nor categorically affirmed) both underftandeth all interrogations annexed unto E1, as reall things in effe, and fo accepteth of them. And for as much as this E1 is proper for an interrogation propofed unto him as a Divinor or Prophet: and common it is with us, by it to pray unto him, as to a god; they thinke that this word E1 is of no leffe validity to pray and with by, than it is to demaund or afke a question: for everie one that praith, ufeth ordinarily this forme: E1 ἐπιτελόν, that is to fay, O if it might pleafe god. And thus Archichelmus wrote:

E1 δε, ἡμῶν ὅλως ἔργα Νεοβούλου θεῶν:
O if my lucke and hap were fuch,
As Neobules hand to touch.

And it is faid, that in the adverb of wifhing ΕΙΘΕ, which fignifieth, Would God; the fecond fyllable θ, is an adjunction idle and fuperfluous, for that ΕΙ alone fignifieth as much: like as Εἰ in this verfe of the Poet Sophron:

αἴμα τέκνον θέλῃ δ' ἀποδόναι:
Deftious alfo in their need
Of children, for their joy and need:

as alfo in Homer:

Εἰς βλάσιν ὅντιν ἔγὼ λήσω πόλεος:
As I will now, even thee difgrace,
And foile thy ftrengh in prefent place.

Where Εἰ fignifieth juft nothing. Thus you fee, how in this little word E1 there is an optative power fufficiently declared. When Nicander had delivered thefe words, Theon (for I prefuppofe you know him, being a familiar friend of ours) demaunded of Ammonius, whether Logike might have the libertie to fpeake in her owne defence, being thus wronged and troden under foote? when Ammonius willed him to fpeake hardly, and to fay all that he could, and for to helpe her out of the mire: Certes, quoth he then, there be many Oracles which beare witneffe & evidently fhew, that god Apollo is a moft skilful Logician. For in fome fort it belongeth to one and the fame artift, both to move doubtfull ambiguities, and alfo to affoile and cleere the fame. Moreover, according as Plato faid, that there being in old time an Oracle given unto the Greeks, that they fhould double the altar within the temple of Delos, (which is a piece of worke for an expert Geometrician to performe, and who had the very habie and perfection of that Art) it was not that indeed which the god commanded the Greeks to doe, but he enjoined them to ftudie Geometrie: even fo, in giving otherwhiles ambiguous answers, and doubtfull Oracles, he recommendeth thereby and augmenteth fo much the more, the credit of Logike, as being a fciencie right neceffary for as many as would gladdly underftand his fpeech. Now in Logike this Conjunction E1, that is to fay, If (which is fo apt to continue a fpeech and propofition) hath a great force, as being that which giveth forme unto that propofition, which is moft agreeable to difcoursfe of reafon and argumentation. And verily of this nature be all thefe Hypotheticall propofitions, copulative, difjunctive, &c. And who can deny it? confidering that the very brute beafts themfelves have in fome fort a certaine knowledge and intelligence of the fubfiftence of things: but nature hath given to man alone the notice of confequence, and the judgement for to know how to difcerne that which followeth upon every thing. For, that it is day; and, that it is light, the very wolves, dogs, and cocks doe perceive: but that, if it be day of neceffitie it muft make the aire light, there is no creature fave onely man, that knoweth: for for he alone hath intelligence of the beginning and of the end, of the antecedent and the consequent, of the proceeding and finishing of things: as also of the coherence and bringing together of both ends and extremes, of the conference of one to another; what habitude, Correspondence, or difference there is betweene: and this is it whereof all demonstrations take their chiefe originall and beginning. Now since it is so, that all Philosophie whatsoever, consisteth in the knowledge of the truth; and the light which cleareth the truth, is demonstration; and the beginning of demonstration, is the coherence and knitting of propositions together: by good right that power which maketh and maintaineth this, was dedicated and consecrated by the Sages and wise men unto this god, who above all others loveth the truth. Again, this god is a Divinor and Prophet; but the arte of Divining is as touching future things, by the means of such as are either present or past. For as nothing is done or made without cause; so there is nothing foreknown without a precedent reason: but so far as that is, dependeth and followeth upon that which hath beene; and consequently all that shall be, hath a first and dependance of that which is, by a certaine continuitie, which proceedeth from the beginning to the end: he who hath the skill to see into causes, and by naturall reason how to compose and joine them together, knoweth and is able to discourse

What things are now, what shall hereafter come,

As also what are past, both all and some,

according as Homer saith: who very well and wisely setteth in the first place the present, then the future, and that which is past. For of the present dependeth all Syllogisme and reasoning, and that by the vertue & efficacie of a conjunction: for that if this thing be, such a thing went before; and conversim, if this be; that shall be. For all the artificiall feat and skill of discourse and argument, is the knowledge of consequence, as hath beene said already: but it is the sense, that giveth anticipation unto the discourse of reason. And therefore although haply it may seeme to stand little with decent honesty, yet I will not be afraid to affirme that this reason properly is the Tripode or three footed table as one would say, and Oracle of truth: namely, when the disputer supposeth a consequence upon that which was premised and went before: and then afterwards assuming that which is extant and subsistent, commeth in the end to induce and inferre a finall conclusion of his demonstration. Now if it be so, that Apollo Pythius, as the report goeth, loveth musick, and be delighted in the singing of swans, and sound of lute and harpe; what marvel is it then, if for the affection that he beareth unto logicke, he likewise embrace and love that part of speech, which he seeth Philosophers most willingly and oftentest to use? Hercules before that he had loosed the bonds wherewith Prometheus was tied, and having not as yet conferred and talked with Chiron and Atlas two great Sophisters and professors of disputation, but being a yong man still, and a plaine Boeotian, abolished all logicke at first, and scoffed at this little Mot E<sup>1</sup>: but soone after seemed as if he would plucke away by force the three footed table of Apollo, yea and contest with the god, about the art of divining; for that together with age and proceesse of time he proceeded so farre, as that he became by that means a most skillfull prophet, and as subtile and excellent a logician. When Theon had made an end of this speech, Eustrophus the Athenian, as I take it, directed his wordes unto us & said: See you not how valiantly Theon defendeth the art of logicke, & hath in manner gotten on the lions skin of Hercules? It is not therefore decent, that we who in one word referre all affaires, all natures and principles jointly together, as well of divine as of humane things into number, and making it the author, master, and ruler even of such matters as simply are most faire and precious, should sitte still and say never a word: but rather for our part, offer the fruits of the Mathematicks unto god Apollo. For we say and affirme that this letter E, of it selfe, neither in puissance, nor in forme, ne yet in name & pronounciation, hath any thing in it above other letters: howbeit we thinke, that preferred it hath beene before all the rest, in this regard that it is a character and mark of the number five, which is in all things of greatest vertue and validity, and is named Pempas. Whereupon our Sages and great clerks in times past, when they would expresse the verbe [to number] used Pempas, as one would say, to count and reckon by fives. And verily Eustrophus in saying thus, addressed his speech unto me, not merily but in good earnest, for that I was very affectionate and much addicted then unto the Mathematicks; but yet so, as in all things I observed and kept still the old rule: To much of nothing, as being a schollar of the Academic schoole. I answered therefore, that Eustrophus had solved passing well the difficulty of the question by this number. For seeing it is so (quoth I) that number in generality is divided into even and and odde, unity is in power and efficacy common to them both: in such sort, as being put unto the even, it maketh it odde; and likewise added to the odde, causeth the same to be even. Now the beginning and ground of even numbers is Two; and of odde, Three is the first: of which being joined together is engendred Five, which by good right is highly honored as being the first compound of the first simple numbers, whereupon it is worthily named Tetradis, that is to say, Marriage; because the even number hath some resemblance to the female, and the odde, a reference to the male. For in the sections & divisions of numbers into equal parts, the even is altogether cleane parted and severed asunder, leaving a certaine void space betweene the parts, as a beginning of capacity apt to receive somewhat more: contrariwise in the odde number, if a man doe as much by it, and cut it into two numbers, there remaineth alwaies somewhat in the midst betweene, fit for subdivision, yea and generation of new numbers: whereby it appeareth that more generative it is than the other. And whensoever it commeth to be mixed with the other, it carrieth the preeminence, and is master alwaies, but never mastered. For what mixture soever you make of them twaine, you shall never come thereby to an even number: but mix and compose them as often and in what maner you will, there shall arise alwaies thereof an odde number. And that which more is, both the one and the other added to it selfe, or compounded with it selfe, sheweth the difference that is betweene them. For never shall you see an even number joined with another that is even, to produce an odde; for it goeth not out of his proper nature, as having not the power to beget any other than it selfe, so feeble it is and imperfect: but odde numbers coupled and mingled with others that be odde, bring forth many even numbers, so powerfull it is to engender every way. As for all the other properties and different puissances of numbers, the time will not now serve to discourse thoroughly of them all. But hereby you see, wherefore the ancient Pythagorean Philosophers called Five, the Marriage; as being compounded of the first male and of the first female. The same also is sometime named Tetradis; for that being multiplied by it selfe, it falleth out still to determine in it selfe. For like as nature taking a graine of wheat in the nature of seed, and so diffusing it, produceth many formes and divers kindes of things betweene, through which the passeth and proceedeth, until at last she bringeth her worke to an end; and when all is done sheweth a corne of wheat againe, rendering the first beginning, in the end of all: even so, when other numbers multiply themselves, and end by growing and multiplication in other numbers, only five & six, if they be multiplied by themselves, do bring forth and regenerate likewise themselves: for six times six, maketh thirty six; and five times five, ariseth to twenty five. But take thus much withall againe, that Six doth this but once and after one maner onely, when of it selfe it becommeth that four square number: but unto Five the same befalleth, when it is multiplied by it selfe; and besides particularly, it hath this property, that by addition of it selfe it produceth also it selfe, in as much as it maketh ten; which it doth alternatively, and holdeth on this course in infinite, as farre as any numbers will extend: so as this number resembleth, that principle or first cause, which doth conduct and governe this universall world. For like as it, of the owne selfe preserveth the world; and reciprocally, of the world returneth into it selfe, according as Heraclitus said of the fire:

πῦρ εἰς ἀνθρώπους, καὶ

καὶ πῦρ ἀνθρώπων:

Fire into all things first doth turne,

And all things shall to fire returne:

like as golde is exchanged for wares, and wares likewise for golde: even so the meeting of five with it selfe, howsoever it be, can engender and bring forth nothing either imperfect or strange, but all the changes that it hath, be limited and certaine. For either it begetteth it selfe, or els produceth ten; that is to say, that which is proper and familiar, or els perfect and accomplished.

Now if a man should come unto me and demand: What is all this (good sir) unto Apollo? I will answer againe: That this concerneth not Apollo alone, but Bacchus also, who hath no lesse to do with the city of Delphos, nor is of lesse authority there, than Apollo himselfe. For we have heard the Theologians (partly in verse and partly in prose) sing and say, That this god being of his owne nature incorruptible and immortal: yet, I wot not by what sentence and reason, he is transfused and changed in many sorts. Sometime he is all on a light fire, and causeth all things to be of the same nature, and like unto all things: otherwhiles most variable, in all manner of formes, passions & puissances all different, and becommeth (as now he is) the Worlds, so called by a most common and best known name. But the Sages and wiser sort, willing to the proverb, πῦρ εἰς ἀνθρώ-πους: whereupon a thing is said to be εἰς ἀνθρώπους, which is not to the purpose.

conceale and keepe these secrets hidden from common people, name this mutation & change of his into fire, Apollo; signifying thereby, a kinde of sole unity whereunto it reduceth all things, and negation of plurality: and Phæbus likewise; betokening thereby his purity and cleerenesse from filth and pollution. As for his conversion into winds, water, earth, starres, and into sundry kinds of plants and living creatures, together with the order and disposition thereof, such as we see; all this passion (I say) and mutation, they covertly do signifie under the name of a certaine distraction and dismembring: and in these regards, they call him selfe Dionysus, Zagreus, Nyctelius, Iodætes. They exhibit also and counterfet I wot not what deaths, destructions and dispartitions; regenerations also, and resurrections: which be fables all, and enigmaticall fictions, devised for to represent the foresaid mutations. And verily, to Bacchus they do chant in their songs 10 certaine Dithyrambicke ditties and tunes, full of passion and change, with motions and agitations to and fro. For according as Aeschylus saith:

The Dithyrambe with clamours dissonant, Sorts well with Bacchus, where he is resant.

But unto the other (that is to say, Apollo) they sing the Pæan, which is a setled kind of song, and Musicke modest and sober. Moreover, in all their pictures and portraictures of images and statues, they make Apollo alwaies with a yong face, and never aging: but the other, to wit, Bacchus, they represent in many shapés, and as many formes and visages. And in one word, to the one they attribute a constancy uniforme and evermore the same, a regular order, a serious and sincere gravity: but unto the other, mixed sports, games, wantonnesse and insolency; in summe, 20 such a gravity as is interlaced with fury, madnesse and inequality: they invoke and call upon him by the name of Bacchus Eniuv:

*Bacchus (I say) swayed Eniuv,
Who women doth to rage incite:
And in such service furious,
And frantike worship, takes delight:*

noting hereby not unfittly and without good purpose that which is proper to the one and the other mutation. But for that the time of the revolutions in these changes is not equall and alike, but of the one (which is called Coros, and signifieth plenty or satiety) longer; and of the other (named Chresmosyne, which betokeneth want and necessity) shorter: observing even herein the 30 proportion, they use the canticle Pæan, during all the rest of the yeere, in their sacrifices: but in the beginning of winter, they stire up the Dithyrambe, and downe goeth Pæan; and so invoke this god for three moneths space in stead of the other, supposing that there is the same proportion of the conflagration of the world to the restoring and reparation thereof, as is of three to one. But peradventure we have dwelt longer upon this point than we should, considering the time: howbeit this is certaine, that they attribute the number of five unto this god Apollo, as proper and peculiar unto him; saying, that one while it begetteth it selfe by multiplication, as fire; and another while maketh of it selfe ten, as the world. Moreover, thinke we not, that this number hath no societie with Musicke, which is so agreeable unto this god, as nothing so much? Certes, harmonie is (to say at once) occupied most of all about accords, which we call Symphonies: and that those are in number five, and no more, reason prooveth, and experience will convince it to be so, even unto him who shall make the triall, either with strings or pipe-holes, by the very sense of hearing only, without any other reason. For all these accords take their generation by proportion in number. Now the proportion of the Musicke or Symphonie Diatessaron, is Epitritos or Sesquialterall, that is to say, the whole and a third part over: of Diapente, Hemolios or Sesquialterall, that is to say, the whole and halfe as much more: of Diapason, double: of Diapason with Diapente together, triple: & of Disdiapason, quadruple. And as for that which the Musicians bring in over and above these, to wit, Diapason and Diatessaron (for so they name it) they are not worthy to be admitted and received, as transcending all meane and measure to gratifie forsooth the unreasonable pleasure of the eare against all proportion, and 50 breaking as it were the ordinance of the law.

To let passe therefore the five positures of the Tetrachords, as also the first five tones, tropes, changes, notes or harmonies, (call them what you will) for that they change and alter by setting up or letting downe the strings, more or lesse, or by streining or easing the voice; all the rest are constituted as bases and trebles. For see you not that there being many, or rather infinit intervals, yet five there be onely used in song; namely, Diesis, Hemitonium, Tonos, Trifemitonium, nion, and Ditonos? Neither is there any space or intervall greater or lesse in voices, distinguishing by base and treble, high and low, that can be expressed in long. But to passe by many other such things (quoth I) onely Plato I will alledge, who affirmeth, that there is indeed but one world: many if there were more in number, and not the same one alone; it must needs be that there are five in all, and not one more. But grant that there be no more in truth than one, as Aristotle holdeth; yet so it is, that the same seemeth to be composed and coagmented in some sort of five other worlds: whereof one is that of earth, another of water, the third of fire, the fourth of aire; as for the fifth, some call it heaven, others light, and some againe, the skie; and there be, who name it a quint-essence: unto which onely it is proper and naturall (of all other 10 bodies) to turne round, not by violent force, nor otherwise by chance and aventure. Plato therefore observing and knowing well enough, that the most beautifull and perfect figures of regular bodies which be in the world & within compass of nature, are five in number (namely, the Pyramis, the Cube, the Octaedron, Icosaedron & Dodecaedron) hath very fittly appropriated and attributed ech of these noble figures unto one or other of those first bodies. Others there be also who apply the faculties of the naturall senses, which likewise be in number five, unto the said primitive bodies: to wit, Touching, which is firme, solid and hard, to Earth; Tasting, which judgeth of the qualities of favours by the meanes of moisture, to Water; Hearing, to the Aire, for that the aire being beaten upon is the voice and found in the eares: of the other twaine, Smelling hath for the object Sent or odour, which being in maner of a perfume, is ingendred and 20 levated by heat, and therefore holdeth of the Fire; as for the Sight, which is cleere and bright, by a certaine affinitie and consanguinity which it hath with the heaven and with light, hath a temperature and complexion mingled of the one and the other: neither is there in any living creature other sense, nor in the whole world any other nature and substance simple and uncompound; but a marvellous distribution there is and congruity of five to five, as it evidently appeareth.

When I had thus said, and made a stop withall, after a little pause betweene: O what a fault (quoth I) δ Eustrophus, had I like to have committed: for I went within a litle of passing over Homer altogether, as if he had not bene the first that divided the world into five parts; allotting three of them which are in the middes unto three gods, and the other two which be the extremes (namely, heaven and earth, whereof the one is the limit of things beneath, the other the 30 bound of things above) in common and not distributed like the others. But our speech must remember to returne againe, as Euripides saith, from whence it hath digressed. For they who magnifie the quaternarie or number of foure, teach not amisse nor beside the purpose, that everie solide body hath taken the beginning and generation by reason of it. For it being so, that every solide consisteth in length and bredth, having withall a depth: before length there is to be supposed a posture and situation of a point or pricke, answerable to unitie in numbers; and longitude without bredth is called a line; and the moving of a line into bredth, and the procreation of a superficies thereby, consisteth of three: afterwards, when there is adjoined thereto profundity or depth, the augmentation groweth by foure, untill it become a perfect solidity. So 40 that every man seeth, that the quaternary having brought nature to this point, as to performe and accomplish a body, in giving it a double magnitude or masse with firme soliditie apt to make resistance, leaveth it afterwards destitute of the thing which is greatest and principall. For that which is without a soule, to speake plaine, is in maner of an Orphan, unperfect and good for nothing, so long as it is without a soule to use and guide it: but the motion or disposition which putteth in the soule, ingenerated by meanes of the number of five, is it that bringeth perfection and consummation unto nature. Whereby it appeareth that there is an essence more excellent than the foure, inasmuch as a living body endued with a soule, is of a more noble nature, than that which hath none: but more than so, the beauty and excellent power of this number five, proceeding yet farther, would not suffer a body animate to be extended into infinite kinds, but hath given unto us five divers sorts of animate and living natures in all. For there 50 be Gods; Demons, or Angels; Demi-gods, or Heroës: then after these, a fourth kind, of Men; and last of all, in the fifth place, is that of brute Beasts and unreasonable. Furthermore, if you come and divide the soule according to nature, the first and obscurest part or puissance thereof, is the vegetative or nutritive faculty: the second is the sensitive: then the appetitive: after it the irascible, wherein is engendred anger. Now when it is once come unto that power which discourseth by reason, and brought nature as it were to perfection, there it resteth in the fifth, as in the very pitch & top of all. Since then this number hath so many, and those to great puifances & faculties, the very generation thereof is beautiful to be confidered; I meane not that whereof we have already heerefore difcoursed, when we faid, that compofed it was of two and three, but that which is made by the conjunction of the firft principle, with the firft fquare and quadrate number. And what is that principle or beginning of all numbers? even one or unitie, and that firft quadrat is Foure: and of thefe twaine (as a man would fay, of forme and of matter) being brought to perfection, is procreated this Quinarie or number of five. Now if it be true, as fome do hold, that unitie it felfe is quadrat and foure-square, as being that which is the power of it felfe, and determineth in it felfe, then five being thus compounded of the two firft quadrat numbers, ought fo much the rather to be efteemed fo noble and excellent as none can be comparable unto it. And yet there is one excellency behind, that paffeth all thofe which went before. But I feare me (quoth I) left if the fame be uttered, it would debate in fome fort the honor of our Plato, like as himfelfe faid, the honour and authority of Anaxagoras was deprefsed and put downe by the name of the Moone, who attributed unto himfelfe the firft invention of the Moones illuminations by the Sunne; whereas it was a very ancient opinion long before he was borne. How fay you, hath he not faid thus much in his Dialogue entituled Cratylus? Yes verily, answered Euthyphrus; but I fee not the like confequence for all that. But you know (quoth I) that in his booke entituled: The Sophifter, he fetteth downe five moft principall beginnings of all things: to wit, That which is: The fame: The other: Motion, the fourth: and Reft for the fifth. Moreover in his Dialogue Philebus, he bringeth in another kinde of partition and divifion of thefe principles, where he faith: That one is Infinite: another Finite, or the end: and of the mixture of thefe twaine, is made and accomplished all generation: as for the caufe whereby they are mixed, he putteth it for the fourth kinde: but leaveth to our conjecture the fifth: by the meanes whereof, that which is compofed and mixed is redivided, and feparate againe. And for mine owne part, I fuppofe verily, that thefe principles be the figures and images (as it were) of thofe before: to wit, of That which is, The thing engendered: of Motion, Infinite: of Reft, The End or Finit: of The fame, the Causethat mixeth: of The other, the Causethat doth feparate. But fay they be divers principles, and not the fame: yet howsoever it be, there are alwaies ftill five kinds, & five differences of the faid principles. Some of them before Plato, being of the fame opinion, or having heard fo much of another, confecrated two E. unto the god of this temple, as a very figne to fymbolize that number which comprehendeth all. And peradventure, having heard alfo, that Good appeareth in five kinds: whereof the firft is Meane or Meafure; the fecond, Symmetrie or Proportion; the third, Underftanding; the fourth, The Sciences, Arts and True Opinions, which are in the foule; the fifth, Pure and Sincere Pleafure, without mixture of any trouble and paine: they ftayed there, reciting this verfe out of Orpheus:

But at the fixth age ceafe your fong:

It booteth not to chaunt fo long.

After thefe difcourses paffed betwene us: Yet one briefe word more (quoth he) will I fay unto Nicander, and thofe about him;

For fong I will

To men of skill.

The fixth day of the moneth when you lead the Propheteffe Pythia into fome hal named Prytanium, the firft cafting of lots among you, of three, tendeth to five: for the cafteth three; and you, two: how fay you is it not fo? Yes verily, quoth Nicander: but the caufe heereof we dare not reveale and declare unto others. Well then (quoth I, fmiling thereat) untill fuch time as god permitteth us after we are become holy and confecrate, for to know the truth thereof, meane while let that alfo be added unto the praifes which have bene alledged in the recommendation of the number Five.

Thus ended the difcourfe as touching the commendations attributed unto the number of five, by the Arithmeticians and Mathematicians, as far as I can remember or call to mind. And so Ammonius (as he was a man who befetow not the worft and leaft part of his time in Mathematicke Philofophy) tooke no fmall pleafure in the hearing of fuch difcourses and faid: Needlefle it is and to no purpofe, to ftand much upon the precise and exact confutation of that which thefe yong men heere have alledged, unleffe it be that every number will afford you alfo fufficient matter and argument of praife, if you will but take the paines to looke into them: for, to fay nothing of others, a whole day would not be enough to exprefse in words all the virtues ties and properties of the fared number Seven, dedicated to Apollo. And moreover we fhall feeme to pronounce againft the Sages and wifemen, that they fight both againft common law received, and all antiquity of time; if diffeizing the number of feven of that preeminence, whereof it is in poffeffion, they fhould confecrate Five unto Apollo, as more meet and becomming for him. And therefore mine opinion is, that this writing E<sub>1</sub> fignifieth neither number, nor order, nor conjunction, nor any other defective particle; but is an entier falutation of it felfe, and a compellation of the God: which together with the very utterance and pronuntiation of the word induceth the fpeaker to think of the greameffe & power of him, who feemeth to falute and greet every one of us when we come hither, with thefe words Ἐὐχαρίστησον, Know thy felfe, which fignifieth no leffe, than if he faid χαίρει, that is to fay, All haile or god fave you: and we againe to render the like, anfwer him E<sub>1</sub>, that is to fay, Ἐὐχαρίστησον unto him not a falfe, but a true appellation and title which onely and to him alone appertaineth, namely, that he is. For in very truth and to fpeake as it is, we who are mortall men, have no part at all of being indeed, becaufe that all humane nature being ever in the midft betwene generation and corruption, giveth but an obfcure appearance, a darke shadow, a weake and uncertaine opinion of it felfe. And if peradventure you bend your minde and cogitation for to comprehend a fubftance and effence thereof, you fhall doe as much good as if you would cluch water in your hand with a bent fift; for the more you feeme to gripe and preffe together that which of the owne nature is fluid and runneth out, fo much the more fhall you leefe of that which you will clafpe and hold: and even fo, all things being fubject to alteration, and to paffe from one change unto another, reafon seeking for a reall fubftitence is deceived, as not able to apprehend any thing fubftant in truth and permanent; for that every thing tendeth to a being before it is, or beginneth to die fofoone as it is engendered. For, as Heraclitus was wont to fay, a man cannot poffibly enter twice into one and the fame river: no more is he able to finde any mortall fubftance twice in one and the fame eftate. Such is the fuddenefle and celerity of change, that no fooner is it diflipated but it gathereth againe anon, or rather indeed not againe, nor anon, but at once it both fubfifteth and alfo ceafeth to be, it cometh and goeth together; in fuch fort, as that which beginneth to breed, never reacheth to the perfection of being, for that in very deed this generation is never accomplished, nor reflects as being come to a ful end and perfection of being, but continually changeth and moveth from one to another: even as of humane feed, firft there is gathered within the mothers wombe a fruit or maffe without forme; then an infant having fome forme and fhape; afterwards being out of the mothers belly it is a sucking babe, anon it proves to be a lad or boy, within a while a ftirling or fpringall, then a youth, afterwards a man grown, confequently an elderly & ancient perfon, & laft of all a crooked old man: fo that the former ages & precedent generations be alwaies abolifhed by the fubfequent & thofe that follow. But we like ridiculous fooles be affraid of one kinde of death, when as we have already died fo many deaths, and doe nothing daily and houely but die ftill. For not onely (as Heraclitus faith) the death of fire is the life of aire; and the end of aire, the beginning of water: but much more evidently we may obferve the fame in our felves. The floure of our yeeres dieth and paffeeth away when old age cometh: youth endeth in the floure of lufly and perfect age: childhood determineth in youth: infancy in childhood. Yesterday dieth in this day, and this day will be dead by to morrow: neither continueth any man alwaies one and the fame, but we are engendered many, according as the matter glideth, turneth and is driven about one image, mould or patterne common to all figures. For, were it not fo, but that we continued ftill the fame, how is it that we take delight now in thefe things, whereas we joied before in others? how is it that we love and hate, praife and difpraife contrary things? how cometh it to paffe that we ufe divers fpeeches, fal into different difcourses, & are in fundry affections; retaine not the fame vifage, one countenance, one minde and one thought? For there is no likelihood at all, that without change a man fhould entertaine other paffions; and looke who is changed, he continueth not the fame; and if he be not the fame, he is not at all: but together with changing from the fame, he changeth alfo to be fimplly, for that continually he is altered from one to another: and by confequence our fenfe is deceived miftaking that which appeareth, for that which is indeed; and all for want of knowledge, what it is to be. But what is it (in truth) to be? Surely to be eternall, that is to fay, which never had beginning in generation, nor fhall have end by corruption; and in which, time never worketh any mutation. For a moveable and mutable thing is time, appearing (as it were) in a shadow with the matter which runneth and floweth continually, never remain-

ning stable, permanent and solid, but may be compared unto a leaking vessell, containing in it (after a sort) generations and corruptions. And to it properly belong these teames: for, and after: Hath bene, & shall be: which presently at the very first sight do evidently shew, that time hath no being. For it were a great folly and manifest absurditie to say, that a thing is, which as yet commeth not into esse, or hath already ceased to be. And as for these words, Present, Instant, Now, &c. by which it seemeth that principally we ground and mainteine the intelligence of Time, reason discovereth the same, and immediatly overthroweth it; for incontinently it is thrust out & dispatched, into future, and past: so that it fareth with us in this case, as with those who would see a thing very farre distant; for of necessitie the visuall beames of his sight doe faile before they can reach thereto. Now if the same befall to nature which is measured, 10 that unto time which measureth it; there is nothing in it permanent nor subsistent, but all things therein be either breeding or dying, according as they have reference unto time. And therefore it may not be allowed to say of that which is, It hath bene, or it shall be: for these termes be certaine inclinations, passages, departures and chaunges of that which cannot endure nor continue in being. Whereupon, we are to conclude that God alone is (and that, not according to any measure of time, but respectiue to eternitie) immutable and unmoouable, not gaged within the compasse of time, nor subiect either to inclination or declination any way: before whom nothing ever was, nor after whom ought shall be, nothing future, nothing past, nothing elder, nothing younger; but being one really, by this one Present or Now, accomplisheth his eternitie and being alway. Neither is there any thing, that may truly be said to be, 20 but he alone, nor of him may it be verified: He hath bene, or shall be, for that he is without beginning and end. In this manner therefore we ought in our worship and adoration, to salute and invoke him, saying, E1, that is to say, Thou art; unless a man will rather, according as some of the ancients used to doe, salve him by this title E1 EN, that is to say, Thou art one: for god is not many, as every one of us, who are a confused heape and masse composed, or rather thrust together of infinit diuersities and differences proceeding from all sorts of alterations: but as that which is, ought to be one; so that which is one, ought to be: for alternative diuersitie being the difference of that which is, departeth from it, and goeth to the engendering of that which is not. And therefore very rightly agreeth unto this god, the first of his names, as also the second and the third: for Apollo he is called, as denying and disavowing multitudo, that is 30 to say, plurality & multitude: likewise, Teios, which is as much to say, as One, or alone: thirdly, Phaebus, by which name, they called in the olde time, All that was cleane and pure, without mixture and pollution. And seemably even at this day, the Thessalians (if I be not deceived) say, that their priests upon certaine vacant dayes, when they keepe forth of their temples and live apart privatly to themselves, epithoroues. Now that which is one, is also pure and sincere; for pollution commeth by occasion that one thing is mingled with another: like as Homer speaking in one place of Yvorie having a tincture of red, said it was polluted; and the word that he useth is muireos. Diets also, when they would expresse that their colours be medleies or mixed, use the word despeides, that is to say, to be corrupted; and the very mixture they tearme psogos, that is to say, Corruption. It behooveth therefore, that the thing which is sincere and incorruptible, 40 should be also one and simple, without all mixture whatsoever. In which regard, they who thinke that Apollo and the Sunne be both one god, are worthy to be made much of and loved for their good conceit and pleasant wit, because they repose the notion of god in that which of all things that they know and desire, they honour and reverence most. And now, so long as we are in this life, as if we dreamed the most beautifull dreame that a man could imagine of this god Apollo, let us excite and stirre up our mindes to passe yet farther and mount higher, for to contemplate and behold that which is above our selves, in adoring principally indeed his effluence: but yet honoring withall his image, to wit, the Sunne, and that generative vertue which he hath infused into it, for to produce and bring forth; representing in some sort, by his brightnesse some obscure resemblances and darke shewes of his clemency, benignity, and blessednesse, as 50 far forth as it is possible for a sensible nature, to shew an intellectuall; and for that which is immoveable, to expresse that which is stable and parmanent. Moreover, as touching I wot not what extasies and leapings forth of himselfe and his owne nature, certaine strange alterations likewise, as namely when he casteth fire and withall dismembred and teareth himselfe, as they say: as also that he stretcheth, dilareth and spreadeth forth; and contrariwise how he gathereth and draweth in himselfe heere below, into the earth, the sea, the windes, the starres, and uncouth accidents cidents of beasts and plants; they be such absurdities, as are not to be named without impiety. Or else if we admit them, he will become worse than the little boy, whom the Poets feigne, playing upon the sea shore with an heape of sand, which he first raised, and then cast downe againe and scattered abroad: if (I say) he should continually play at this game like salt and loofe, namely in framing the world first, where before it was not; and then anon destroying it, so soone as it is made. For contrariwise, how much or how little soever of him is infused into the world, the same in some sort containeth and confirmeth the substance thereof, maintaining the corporall nature of it which otherwise by reason of infirmity and weaknesse tendeth alwaies to corruption. In my conceit therefore, against this opinion principally hath bene directly opposed this Mot and denomination of god, E1; that is to say, Thou art: as giving good testimony in 10 his behalfe, that in him there is never any change or mutation. But either to do, or suffer this, as is before said, belongeth to any other god or rather indeed to any other Dæmon, ordained to have the superintendence of that nature, which is subiect both to generation and corruption: as may appeare immediatly by the significations of their names, which are quite contrary and directly doe contradict one the other. For our god here is named Apollo, the other Pluto: as if one would say, Not Many; and Many. The one is cleped Delius that is, cleere and evident: the other Aidonemus, that is to say, obscure blinde and unseene. Again the former, is named Phaebus, which is as much as Shining or resplendent: but the latter Scotius, which is all one with Darke. About him are seated the Muses and Mnemosyne, that is to say, Memory: but nere 20 to this are Lethe, that is to say, Oblivion and silence. Our Apollo, is surnamed Theonius and Phanous, of Secing and shewing: but Pluto is

*The Lord of night so * bleake and darke,
Of idle sleeps that can not wake:*

who also is

*To gods and men most odious,
And to them as malicious.*

Of whom Pindarus said not unpleasantly:
Condemn'd of all he was, for that He never any child begat.

30 And therefore Euripides to this purpose spake right well:
Soule-songs, dirges, libations funerall Faire Phœbus please not, he takes them not at all.

And before him, Stesichorus:

*Apollo joies in mery songs, in dances, sports and plaies:
But Pluto takes delight in sighs, in groanes and plaints alwaies.*

And Sophocles seemeth evidently to attribute unto either of them their muscicall instruments, by these verses:

40 *The Psalterie and pleasant Lute,
With dolefull mores do not well sute.*

For very late it was, and but the other day to speake of, that the pipe and hautboies durst presume to sound, and be heard in matters of mirth and delight: but in former times it drew folke to mourning and sorrow, to heaue funerals & convoies of the dead, and in such cases and services employed it was, as it were not very honourable nor jocund and delectable; howsoever after, it came to be intermingled in all occasions one with another. Mary they especially, who confusedly have hudled the worship of the gods with the service of Dæmons, brought those instruments in request and reputation.

But to conclude, it seemeth that this Mot E1, is somewhat contrary unto the precept Tristes 50 numen, and yet after a sort to accord and agree therewith. For as the one is a word of devout admiration and reverent worship directed to God, as eternall and everlasting: so the other is an advertisement given unto men mortall, to put them in minde of their fraile and weake nature.

AN EXPLANATION OF SUNDRY TEARMES SOMEWHAT

obscure, in this translation of Plutarch, in favour of the unlearned Reader; after the order of the Alphabet.

A.
A. Ulu, A forename among the Romans.
A. Abyrtsee, A deintie kinde of meate, with the Medes & other Barbarous nations, sharpe & quicke of taste to provoke and please the appetite, composed of Leeks, Garlike, Cresses, Senecio, Pomgranate kernels, and such like.

Academie, A shadowy place full of groves, a mile distant from Athens, where Plato the Philosopher was borne, and wherein hee taught. Of it, the Academicke Philosophers tooke their name; whose manner was to discourse and dispute of all questions, but to determine and resolve of nothing. And for the great frequency and concourse of scholars to that place, our Universities and great schooles of learning, be named Academies.

Aediles, Certaine magistrates or officers in Rome: who were of two sorts; Plebeij and Curules. Plebeij, of the Commons onely, two in number, more ancient than the other; chosen by the people alone, to second and assist the Tribunes of the Commons, as their right hands. This name they tooke of the charge which they had to mainteine temples and chapels: albeit they registred the Sanctions and Acts of the people, called Plebiscita, and kept the same in their owne custodie; were Clerks of the Market, and looked to weights and measures, &c. yea, and exhibited the games and playes named Plebeij. Curules were likewise twain, elected out of the order and degree of the Patrij: so called of the Yvorie chaire wherein they were allowed to sit, as officers of greater state; and by vertue whereof, in some cases, and at certain times they might exercise civill jurisdiction. It belonged unto these to set forth the solemnities, called Ludi Magni or Romani: overseers they were likewise of the buildings thoroughout the city, as well publike as private, in manner of the Astynomi in Athens: they had regard unto the publike vaults, sinks, conveniences, and conduits of the waters that served the city, as also to the Arsenall, &c. Moreover, they had power to attach the bodies of great persons: and were charged to see unto the provision of corne and victuals. At the first, none but of noble families or Patricians were advanced to this place: but in processe of time, Commoners also attained thereto. Reverberation, that is to say, A smiting or driving backe.

Rhapsodie, A sowing together or conjoining of those Poems and verses especially heroicke or hexametre, which before were loose and scattered: such as were those of Homer, when they were reduced into one entier body of Ilias and Odyssea. Those Poets also, who recite or pronounce such verses, were termed Rhapsodi.

Rivals and Corrivals, Counter-suitors: or those who make love together, unto one and the same woman.

To Ruminare, that is to say, To ponder and consider, or revolve a thing in the minde:

a borrowed speech from beaists that chew the cudde.

S

Satyri, Woodwolves, or monstrous creatures with tailes, yet resembling in some sort, partly men & women, & in part goats, given much to venery and lasciviousnesse, whereupon they had that name: also to scurrill, trumping and jibing, for which they were also called Silem, especially when they grew aged; supposd by the rural herdsmen to be the faeries or gods (I would not else) of the woods.

Satyræ or Satyrs were certaine Poems received in place of Comædia vetus, detestling and reprooving the misdemeanours of people and their vices: at first by way of myrth and jest, not sharply and after a biting manner to the shame, disgrace or hurt of any person; such were they that Horace composd; howbeit they grew afterward to more diracity and licentiousnesse, noting in broad tearmes without respect all leandnesse, and sparing no degrees; as those were of Juvenales and Persius penning. Latine poets onely, handled this argument, both in the one sort and the other.

Scammonie, A medicinable plant, and the juice thereof issuing out of the roote when it is wounded or cut: it purgeth yellow choler strongly. The same juice or liquor being concrete or thickned and withall corrected is called Dacrydium; as one would say, the tears destilling from the roote: and is the same which the unlearned Apothecaries call Diagridium; as if forsooth it were some compound like their Diaphanicon.

Scelet, The dead body of a man artificially dried or tanned, for to be kept and seene a long time. It is taken also for a dead carcase of man or woman, represented with the bones onely, and ligaments.

Scepticke philosophers, VVho defended from Pyrho; so called, for that they would consider of all matters in question, but determine of none: and in this respect they were more precise than the Academicks.
